But we turn from this rather dispiriting topic. In his intercourse with society, Campbell was a shrewd observer of those often contradictory elements of which it is composed. Adverting to the absurd and ludicrous, he had the art or talent of heightening their effect by touches peculiarly his own; while the quiet gravity with which he related his personal anecdotes or adventures, added greatly to the charm, and often threw his unsuspecting hearers into uncontrollable fits of laughter. Nor was the pathos with which he dilated on some tale of human misery less captivating; it runs through all his poetry, and in hearing or relating a story of human wrongs or suffering, we have often seen him affected to tears, which he vainly strove to conceal by an abrupt transition to some ludicrous incident in his own personal history. As an example, which has not yet found its way to the public, we may relate the following, which he told one evening in our little domestic circle where he was a frequent visitor, and where the conversation had taken, as he thought, a somewhat too serious turn:—

"In my early life, when I resided in the island of Mull, most of those old feudal customs which civilization had almost banished from the Lowlands, were still religiously observed in the Hebrides—more especially those of a social and festive character, which it was thought had the effect of keeping up old acquaintance, and of tightening the bonds of good fellowship. Rural weddings and 'roaring wakes' were then occasions for social rendezvous, which were not to be overlooked. Both these ceremonies were accompanied by feasting, music, dancing, and that liberal enjoyment of the native broost which was too often carried to excess. I was in general a willing and a welcome guest at these doings; for, smitten as I often was with melancholy in this dreary solitude, I was glad to avail myself of any occasion that promised even temporary exhilaration. Well, the first of these meetings at which I was present one evening, happened to be a dredgee, a term which I need only explain by saying that it was got up for the sake of a young widow, who had just put on her weeds, and stood much in need of friendly sympathy and consolation. At first it was rather a dull affair, for the widow looked very disconsolate, and every look of her fair face was contagious. But as the quaigh was active, and the whiskey went its frequent round, the circle became more lively; until at last, to my utter astonishment, the bagpipes were introduced; and after a cuvonach or so—just to quiet the spirit of their departed host—up started a couple of dancers, and began jigging it over the floor with all the grace and agility peculiar to my Hebridean friends. This movement was infectious: another and another couple started up—reel followed upon reel, until the only parties who had resisted the infection," continued the poet, "were the widow and myself,—she, oppressed with her own private sorrow, and I, restrained by feelings of courtesy from quitting her side. I observed, however, that she 'kept time' with her hand—all unconsciously, no doubt—against the bench where we sat, while her thoughts were wandering about the moorland Cairn, which had that very morning received her husband's remains. I pitied her from my very heart. But, behold, just as I was addressing to her one of my most sympathizing looks, up came a brisk Highlander, whose step and figure in the dance had excited both admiration and envy; and, making a low bow to the widow, followed by a few words of condolence, he craved the honour of her hand for the next reel. The widow, as you may well suppose, was shocked beyond measure! while I, starting to my feet, made a show as if I meant to resent the insult. But she, pulling me gently back, rebuked the kilted stranger with a look, at which he instantly withdrew. In a few minutes, however, the young chieftain returned to the charge. The widow frowned, and wept, and declared that nothing on earth should ever tempt her to such a breach of decorum. But the more she frowned, the more he smiled and pressed his suit: 'Just one reel,' he repeated, 'only one! Allan of Mull, the best piper in the Isles, was only waiting her bidding to strike up.' The plea was irresistible. 'Weel, weel,' sighed the widow, rising and giving him her hand, 'what maun be, maun be! But, heeh, sirs, let it be a lightsome spring, for I hac a heavy, heavy heart!' The next minute the widow was capering away to a most 'lightsome' air—hands across—cast off—down the middle, and up again. And a merrier dredgee," concluded the poet, "was never seen in Mull."

On another occasion, when he presented a copy of some verses, which he had just finished, to a lady of our family, he described their origin as follows:—"Many long years ago, while I was sealed up in the Hebrides, I became intimate with a family who had a beautiful parrot, which a young mariner had brought from South America as a present to his sweetheart. This happened long before my arrival in Mull; and Poll for many years had been a much-prized and petted favourite in the household. He was a captive, to be sure, but allowed at times to be outside his cage on parole; and, always observing good faith and gratitude for such indulgences, they were repeated as often as appeared consistent with safe custody. The few words of Gaelic which he had picked up in his voyage to the north, were just sufficient, on his arrival, to bespeak the good-will of the family, and recommend himself to their hospitality; but his vocabulary was soon increased,—he became a great mimic,—he could imitate the cries of every domestic animal,—the voices of the servants:—he could laugh, whistle, and scold, like any other biped around him. He was, in short, a match even for Kelly's renowned parrot: for although he could not, or would not, sing 'God save the King,' he was a proficient in 'Charlie is my Darling,' and other Jacobite airs, with which he never failed to regale the company, when properly introduced.

"Poll was indeed a remarkable specimen of his tribe, and the daily wonder of the whole neighbourhood. Years flew by: and although kind treatment had quite reconciled him to his cage, it could not ward off the usual effects of old age, particularly in a climate where the sun rarely penetrated within the bars of his prison. When I first saw him, his memory had greatly failed him; while his bright green plumage was fast verging into a silvery grey. He had but little left of that triumphant chuckle which used to provoke such laughter among the youngsters; and day after day he would sit mute and moping on his perch, seldom answering the numerous questions that were put to him regarding the cause of his malady. Had any child of the family been sick, it could hardly have been treated with greater tenderness than Poll.

"At last, one fine morning, just as the vernal equinox had blown a few ships into harbour, a stranger was announced, and immediately recognised by the master of the house as a 'Don' something—a Spanish merchant, whose kindness to a young member of the family had been often mentioned in his letters from Mexico. One of his own ships, a brig, in which he had made the voyage, was then in the bay, driven in by stress of weather, for Mull was no market for Spanish goods. But that was not my business; he would most likely pay a visit to Greenock, where, in the present day at least, Spanish cargoes are rife enough.

"No sooner had their visitor exchanged salutations with the master of the house and his family, than the parrot caught his eye; and, going up to the cage, he addressed the aged bird in familiar Spanish. The effect was electric: the poor blind captive seemed as if suddenly awakened to a new existence; he fluttered his wings in ecstasy—opened his eyes, fixed them, dim and sightless as they were, intently on the stranger; then answered him in the same speech—not an accent of which he had ever heard for twenty years. His joy was excessive—but it was very short; for in the midst of his screams and antics, poor Poll dropped dead from his perch."

Such was the incident upon which Campbell composed the little ballad entitled "The Parrot." It had taken strong hold of his memory, and, after the lapse of forty years,¹ found its way into the pages of the "New Monthly," and is now incorporated with his acknowledged Poems. The following is an extract.—

"The deep affections of the breast,
That Heaven to living things imparts,
Are not exclusively possess'd
By human hearts.

A parrot from the Spanish Main,
Full young, and early caged, came o'er,
With bright wings to the bleak domain
Of Mulla's shore.

But, petted in our climate cold,
He lived and chatter'd many a day:
Until with age, from green and gold,
His wings grew grey.

At last, when blind and seeming dumb,
He scolded, laugh'd, and spoke no more,
A Spanish stranger chanced to come
To Mulla's shore;

He hail'd the bird in Spanish speech;
The bird in Spanish speech replied,
Flapp'd round his cage, with joyous screech,— Dropt down, and died!"

GOUGANE BARRA.

(With an Engraving.)

THE approach to the romantic lake of Gougane Barra is now sufficiently easy; although, a hundred years ago, a pilgrimage of two miles occupied two hours. Dr. Smith pathetically describes the toil; he calls it "the rudest highway that ever was passed; a well-spirited beast trembles at every step: some parts of the road lie shelving from one side to the other, which often trips up a horse; other places are pointed rocks, standing like so many sugar-loaves, from one to three feet high, between which a horse must take time to place and fix his feet." The road is still, however, not conveniently passable for ordinary vehicles; and the tourist will do wisely to foot it from Burke's cottage—a mile, as the guide will tell him, but certainly two miles English.

A sudden turning in the road brings him within view, and almost over, the lake of Gougano Barra—a scene of more utter loneliness, stern grandeur, or savage magnificence, it is difficult to conceive; reckoned, however, as all things savage are, by one passage of gentle and inviting beauty, upon which the eye turns as to a spring-well in the desert—the little island with its group of graceful ash-trees and ruined chapel. Down from the surrounding mountains rush numerous streams, tributaries to the lake, that collect and sends them forth in a bountiful river—for here the Lee has its source—until they form the noble harbour of Cork, and lose themselves in the broad Atlantic. In summer these streams are gentle rills, but in winter foaming cataracts; rushing over ridges of projecting rocks, and baring them even of the lichen that strives to cling to their sides. We literally "hopped" across the river Lee.

When the traveller stands within this amphitheatre of hills, he feels, as it were, severed from his fellow-beings—as if imprisoned for ever; for on whichever side he looks, escape from the valley seems impossible; "so that if a person," writes the old historian, "were carried into it blindfold, it would seem almost impossible, without the wings of an eagle, to get out—the mountains forming, as it were, a wall of rocks some hundred yards high."

The small island is nearly mid-way in the lake; a rude artificial causeway leads into it from the mainland. This is the famous hermitage of St. Fin Bar, who is said to have lived here previous to his founding the cathedral of Cork. It is classed among the "holiest" places in Ireland, and has long been a favourite resort of devotees, in the confident expectation that its consecrated waters have power to heal all kinds of diseases; making the blind to see, the deaf to hear, and the lame to walk. Here, at certain seasons—twice in the year—they assemble in crowds, bringing their sick children and ailing animals to bathe; and upon the neighbouring bushes and wooden crosses hang fragments of clothes, or halters and spannels, in proof that to the various animals, biped and quadruped, the lake has performed the anticipated miracle of making them whole.

These patterns have grown out of fashion of late years—not above 100 pilgrims have attended on the 24th of June, the great fête day. A few years ago, on the same occasion, there were probably not less than 10,000 present: some slept among the heather or under tents, but the most part spent the night in drinking and dancing. The scenes of depravity that took place it is, therefore, difficult to overrate. Mr. Burke joined us heartily in rejoicing that the evil was almost at an end. Happily, many customs that are equally opposed to reason and religion are rapidly retiring before the advancing spirit of improvement, and its gigantic ally, Education: they will, no doubt, be classed ere long only among instances of gone-by absurdities. Very few indeed were this year the bathers in the holy well at Gougano Barra. It is, however, one of the wells that have kept their reputation for centuries; their fame being undoubtedly coeval with the introduction of Christianity, while that of some, probably, preceded it—the early Christian teachers having, it is believed, merely changed the object of worship, leaving the altars of idolatry unbroken and undisturbed. These wells are to be found in nearly all the parishes of the kingdom: they are generally, as we have intimated, betokened by rude crosses immediately above them, by fragments of cloth, and bits of rags of all colours, hung upon the neighbouring bushes and left as memorials; sometimes the crutches of convalescent visitors are bequeathed as offerings, and not unfrequently small buildings, for prayer and shelter, have been raised above and around them.

GALILEO AND HIS DAUGHTER.

BY J. R.

I HAD been walking in a grove of lime-trees, arched above me, like the stately roofing of a cathedral. As I entered, the daylight was yet strong; but when I left my temporary retreat, the heavens were clustered over with stars, and one of them, high above the old grey tower of the ancient monastery of St. Augustine, almost cast a shadow across the landscape—it was the planet Jupiter: and I have never observed it—at least, thus eminent among its brethren—without being more or less reminded of—

"The starry Galileo, and his woes."

To this planet did the philosopher direct the then newly-invented telescope, the result being the discovery of four attendant moons: while the analogy derived from the motions of these little stars, performing their revolutions round the primary planet in perfect order and concord, afforded an argument that had a powerful influence in confirming Galileo's own views in favour of the Copernican system of the universe, and ultimately converting the scientific world to the same opinion.

Yet little more than two centuries since, on the 14th February, 1633, the astronomer, cited before the Inquisition, arrived at Rome, to answer the charge of heresy and blasphemy; while, a few months ago, in the brief but glorious day-burst of Roman liberty, that very Inquisition was invaded by an exultant populace, and among its archives, full of memorials of martyred worth and of heroic endurance, most eagerly, but in vain, was sought the record of the process against the great philosopher.

Galileo, on a former occasion, in reference to some of his scientific discoveries, had heard rumours of papal persecution, and as a cautious friend whispered to him the unpleasant tidings, he had exclaimed, "Never will I barter the freedom of my intellect to one as liable to error as myself!"

The time quickly arrived to test his courage and his resolution.

For a little while, we are informed, he was allowed to remain secluded in the palace of his friend Nicolini. In a few months, however, he was removed to an apartment in the Exchequer of the Inquisition, still being permitted the attendance of his own servant, and many indulgences of which they had not decided to deprive him. On the twenty-first of June, of the same year, he appeared before the Holy Office. Through its gloomy halls and passages he passed to the tribunal. There was little here, as in the other ecclesiastical buildings of Rome, to captivate the senses. The dark walls were unadorned with the creations of art—state and ceremony were the gloomy ushers to the chamber of intolerance. In silence and in mystery commenced the preparations. The familiars of the office advanced to the astronomer, and arrayed him in the penitential garment; and as he approached, with a slow and measured step, the tribunal, cardinals and prelates noiselessly assembled, and a dark circle of officers and priests closed in, while, as if conscious that the battle had commenced in earnest between mind and power, all the pomp and splendour of the hierarchy of Rome—that system which had hitherto possessed a sway unlimited over the fears and opinions of mankind—was summoned up to increase the solemnity and significance of the judgment about to be pronounced against him.

To the tedious succession of technical proceedings, mocking justice by their very assumption of formality, it would be needless to refer. Solemnly, however, and by an authority which it was fatal to resist, Galileo was called on to renounce a truth which his whole life had been consecrated to reveal and to maintain, "The motion through space of the Earth and Planets round the Sun."

Then, immediately, assuming he had nothing to allege, would attempt no resistance, and offer no defence, came the sentence of the tribunal, banning and anathematizing all who held the doctrine, that the sun is the centre of the system, as a tenet "philosophically false, and formally heretical."

And then they sentenced the old and infirm philosopher—this band of infallibles!—they bade him abjure and detest the said errors and heresies. They decreed his book to the flames, and they condemned him for life to the dungeons of the inquisition, bidding him recite, "once a week, seven penitential psalms for the good of his soul!"

Did Galileo yield? Did he renounce that theory now affording such ample proof of the beauty and order of the universe; to whose very laws Kepler, the friend and contemporary of the philosopher, was even then, though unconsciously, bearing evidence, by his wonderful theorem of velocities and distances, a problem which Newton afterwards confirmed and illustrated?

Did Galileo yield? He did. Broken by age and infirmity, importuned by friends more alarmed than himself, perhaps, at the terrors of that merciless tribunal, he signed his abjuration; yielded all his judges demanded; echoed their curse and ban, as their superstition or their hate required. There is a darker tale dimly hinted by those familiar with the technicalities of the Holy Office, that the terms, "Il riguroso esame," during which Galileo is reported to have answered like a good christian, officially announce the application of torture.

Then occurred, perhaps scarcely an hour afterwards, that remarkable episode in this man's history. As he arose from the ground on which, all kneeling, he had pronounced his abjuration, he gave a significant stamp, and whispered to a friend, "E pur si muove!" "Yet it does move,"—ay, and in spite of Inquisitions, has gone round—nay, the whole world of thought itself has moved, and having received an impulse from such minds, will revolve for ages in a glorious cycle for mankind! But the most touching incident of Galileo's story is yet to come.

After several years of confinement at Arcetri, the great astronomer was permitted to retire to Florence, upon the conditions that he should neither quit his house, nor receive the visits of his friends. They removed him from a prison, to make a prison of his home. Alas! it was even worse than this.

Much as the greatest minds love fame, and struggle to obtain it, the proudest triumphs of genius and of science, the applause of the world itself, ever loud and obtrusive, is not to be compared to the low and gentle murmurs of pleasure and of pride from those we love. There was one being from whom Galileo had been accustomed to hear those consolations—his child, his gentle Maria Galilei. He had been otherwise a solitary indeed, and now more than ever so, when he was cut off from the communion of the greatest minds. To his lovely girl, his daughter, his heart clung with more than fondness. No wife of Pliny, perhaps, ever wafted to her husband with sweeter devotion the echoes of the applauding world without, greeting him she loved, than she did—his Maria Galilei. As he returned from prison, the way seemed tedious, the fleetest travelling all too slow, till he should once more fold her to his heart; and she, too, she anticipated meeting her father with a pleasure greater than ever before enjoyed, since he had now become a victim, sainted in her eyes, by the persecution he had suffered.

Short, indeed, was this happiness, if enjoyed at all. Within the month, she died, and the home of Galileo was more than a prison—it was a desolate altar, on which the last and most precious of his household gods was shivered. And he died too, a few years afterwards, that good old man!

But he had yielded—he was no martyr! Yes, indeed! But be it remembered, that if he possessed not the moral courage of a Huss, a Savonarola, or a Luther, he was not called to exercise it in so high a cause. The assertion and support of a religious truth is impressed with far deeper obligations than the advocacy of a scientific one, however well maintained by analogy, and confirmed by reason.

Still there was a deep devotional sentiment that pervaded the character of Galileo. Before he died, he became totally blind; yet he did not despair. Like Milton, he laboured on for mankind—nay, pursued his scientific studies, inventing mechanical substitutes for his loss of vision, to enable him still to pursue his arduous researches.

It is true he was shut out, like the elder Herschel, from the view of that glorious company towards which his spirit had so often soared. Well might his friend Castelli say, in allusion to his infirmity, "that the noblest eyes were darkened which nature had ever made,—eyes so privileged, and gifted with such rare qualities, that they might be said to have seen more than all those who had gone before him, and to have opened the eyes of all who were to come." Galileo himself bore noble tribute to his friend, when he exclaimed,—

"Never, never will I cease to use the senses which God has left me; and though this heaven, this earth, this universe, be henceforth shrunk for me into the narrow space which I myself fill, so it please God, it shall content me."

The malice of his enemies long survived his death. The partisans of Rome disputed his right to make a will. They denied him a monument, for which large sums had been subscribed.

A hundred years afterwards, when a splendid memorial was about to be erected to his memory, the President of the Florentine Academy descended into his grave, and desecrated his remains, by bearing off, as relics for a museum, the thumb of his right hand, and one of his vertebrae! So the victims of the religious fury of one age become the martyrs of science in another!

And what is the moral of what we have written concerning Galileo? Is there no teaching that may instruct our own times, especially when we see how, through scorn and persecution, and this world's contumely, and through the gloom and shadows of ignorance and fear, the form and substance of mighty Truth rises, slowly and dimly, perchance, at first, but grandly and majestically ere long? Little more than two hundred years have passed since the death of Galileo, but ample justice has been done to his memory. His name will be a watchword through all time, to urge men forward in the great cause of moral and intellectual progress; and the Tree of Knowledge, whose fruits were once on earth, plucked, perhaps, ere they were matured, has shot up with its golden branches into the skies, over which has radiated the smiles of a beneficent Providence to cheer man onward in the career of virtue and intelligence.

"There is something," as a profound writer has observed,¹ "in the spirit of the present age, greater than the age itself. It is, the appearance of a new power in the world, the multitude of minds now pressing forward in the great task of the moral and intellectual regeneration of mankind."

And this cause must ultimately triumph. The energies and discoveries of men like Galileo, remote as their history becomes, have an undying influence.

The power of a great mind is like the attraction of a sun. It appears in the infinite bounds of space, far, far away, as a grain among other gold dust at the feet of the Eternal, or at most, but as a luminous spot; and yet we know that its influence controls, and is necessary for, the order and arrangement of the nearest, as well as the remotest system. So in the moral and intellectual universe, from world to world, from star to star, the influence of one great mind extends, and we are drawn towards it by an unseen, but all-pervading affinity. Thus has the cause of moral and intellectual progress a sure guarantee of success. It has become a necessity, interwoven with the spirit of the age—a necessity impressed by every revelation of social evil, as well as proclaimed by every scientific discovery—gaining increased energy and power from the manifestation of every new wonder and mystery of nature—nay, from the building of every steam-ship, the laying down of every new line of railway.

THE CHILDREN.

BY R. E. S.

THE CHILDREN! When I hear those words, they vibrate through my frame
As if the chord of life were struck, and sacred music came.

The children! Ah! these simple words, how much do they convey!

What tender thoughts! what longing thoughts! when they are far away.

When all the little anxious cares are vanish'd or forgot,
And nought but love and tenderness cling round the baby's cot!

The little crib—the little chair—the little broken toy—
Has each its own small claim for love, as token of past joy.

The little voices hush'd in sleep! the little forms so still!

(A tear is rising in my eye against my own good-will.)
One with his sweet angelic smile—his seraph bird-like tone,

Another with his dark brown eyes—his crystal laugh—my own—

My precious boy! with head thrown back to show those pearly teeth,

The sweetest boy! the noble child! with the tender soul beneath.

That loving heart! that blessed one! with his little serious look,

His smile of quick intelligence, like sunshine on a brook.

And then the gentle girl comes forth with her golden waving hair,

Her large soft eyes of tender blue, and her face so sweet and fair.

Thou wert the first I loved, sweet child, thy brother—now claim part

Of that which once was all thine own—this tender loving heart

(1) Channing.

And still thou hast too much by far—too much by far have they,
And God will ask me for the love I am giving thus away.
Then go, sweet forms, I banish ye, my courage fails me now,
I dare no longer look on ye—God bless each angel brow!

THE WIFE OF KONG TOLV.¹

A FAIRY TALE OF SCANDINAVIA.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "COLA MONTI."

HYLDREDA KALM stood at the door of her cottage, and looked abroad into the quietness of the sabbath morn.—The village of Skjelskør lay at a little distance down the vale, lighted by the sunshine of a Zealand summer, which, though brief, is glowing and lovely even as that of the south. Hyldreda had looked for seventeen years upon this beautiful scene, the place where she was born. Sunday after Sunday she had stood thus and listened for the distant tinkle of the church bell. A stranger, passing by, might have said, how lovely were her face and form; but the widowed mother, whose sole stay she was, and the little delicate sister who had been her darling from the cradle, would have answered, that if none were so fair, none were likewise so good as Hyldreda; and that all the village knew. If she did love to bestow greater taste and care on her Sunday garments than most young damsels of her class, she had a right—for was she not beautiful as any lady? And did not the eyes of Esbern Lynge say so, when, week after week, he came up the hilly road, and descended again to the little chapel, supporting the feeble mother's slow steps, and watching his betrothed as she bounded on before, with little Resa in her hand?

"Is Esbern coming?" said the mother's voice within.

"I know not—I did not look," answered Hyldreda, with a girlish wilfulness. "I saw only the sun shining on the river, and the oak-wood waving in the breeze."

"Look down the road, child; the time passes. Go quickly."

"She is gone already," said Resa, laughing merrily. "She is standing under the great elder-tree to wait for Esbern Lynge."

"Call her back—call her back!" cried the mother, anxiously. "To stand beneath an elder-tree, and this night will be St. John's Eve! On Sunday, too, and she a Sunday-child! Call her quickly, Resa!"

The little child lifted up her voice, "Hyld—"

"Not her name—utter not her name!" And the widow Kalm went on muttering to herself, "Perhaps the Hyldemoer² will not have heard. Alas the day! when my child was born under an elder-tree, and I, poor desolate mother! was terrified into giving my babe that name. Great Hyldemoer, be propitiated! Holy Virgin!" and the widow's prayer became a curious mingling of superstition and piety, "Blessed Mary! let not the elves have power over my child! Have I not kept her heart from evil?—does not the holy cross lie on her pure breast day and night? Do I not lead her every Sunday, winter and summer, in storm, sunshine, or snow, to the chapel in the valley? And this day I will say for her a double prayer."

The mother's counted beads had scarce come to an end when Hyldreda stood by her side, and, following the light-footed damsel, came Esbern Lynge.

"Child, why didst thou linger under the tree?" said the widow. "It does not become a young maiden to stand flaunting outside her door. Who wert thou watching so eagerly?"

"Not thee, Esbern," laughed the girl, shaking her head at her betrothed, who interposed with a happy, conscious face; "I was looking at a grand train that wound along the road, and thinking how pleasant it would be to dress on a Sunday like the lady of the castle, and recline idly behind four prancing horses instead of trudging on in these clumsy shoes."

The mother frowned, and Esbern Lynge looked sorrowful.

"I wish I could give her all she longs for," sighed the young man, as they proceeded on their way, his duteous arm supporting the widow, while Hyldreda and Resa went bounding onward before them; "She is as beautiful as a queen—I would that I could make her one."

"Wish rather, Esbern, that Heaven may make her a pious, lowly-hearted maid, and, in good time, a wife; that she may live in humility and content, and die in peace among her own people."

Esbern said nothing—he could not think of death and her together. So he and the widow Kalm walked on silently—and so slowly that they soon lost sight of the two blithe sisters.

Hyldreda was talking merrily of the grand sight she had just seen, and describing to little Resa the gilded coach, the prancing horses, with glittering harness. "Oh! but it was a goodly train, as it swept down towards the river. Who knows?—perhaps it may have been the king and queen themselves!"

"No," said little Resa, rather fearfully, "you know Kong Tolv³ never lets any mortal king pass the bridge of Skjelskør."

"Kong Tolv! what, more stories about Kong Tolv!" laughed the merry maiden; "I never saw him; I wish I could see him, for then I might believe in thy tales, little one."

"Hush, hush!—But mother told me never to speak of these things to thee," answered Resa; "unsay the wish, or some harm may come."

"I care not! who would heed these elfin tales on such a lovely day? Look, Resa, down that sunny meadow, where there is a cloud shadow dancing on the grass; a strange cloud it is too, for it almost resembles a human form."

"It is Kong Tolv rolling himself in the sunshine,"

(1) The idea of this story is partly taken from a Danish Fæsa, or legendary ballad, entitled "Proud Margaret."

(2) Hyldemoer, elder-mother, is the name of a Danish elf inhabiting the elder tree. Eda signifies a grandmother or female ancestor. Children born on Sundays were especially under the power of the elves.

(3) Kong Tolv, or King Twelve, is one of the Elle-kings who divide the fairy sovereignty of Zealand.

cried the trembling child; "look away, my sister, lest ne should hear us."

Again Hyldreda's fearless laugh made music through the still air, and she kept looking back until they passed from the open road into the gloom of the oak wood.

"It is strange that thou shouldst be so brave," said Resa once more. "I tremble at the very thought of the Elle-people of whom our villagers tell, while thou hast not a single fear. Why is it, sister?"

"I know not, save that I never yet feared anything," answered Hyldreda, carelessly. "As for Kong Tolv, let him come; I care not."

While she spoke, a breeze swept through the oak-wood, the trees began to bend their tops, and the under branches were stirred with leafy murmurings, as the young girl passed beneath. She lifted her fair face to meet them. "Ah! 'tis delicious, this soft scented wind; it touches my face like airy kisses; it makes the leaves seem to talk to me in musical whispers. Dost thou not hear them too, little Resa? and dost thou not——?"

Hyldreda suddenly stopped, and gazed eagerly down the road.

"Well, sister," said Resa, "what art dreaming of now? Come, we shall be late at church, and mother will scold." But the elder sister stood motionless. "How strange thine eyes look; what dost thou see, Hyldreda?"

"Look—what is there!"

"Nothing, but a cloud of dust that the wind sweeps forward. Stand back, sister, or it will blind thee."

Still Hyldreda bent forward with admiring eyes, muttering, "Oh! the grand golden chariot, with its four beautiful white horses! And therein sits a man—surely it is the king! and the lady beside him is the queen. See, she turns—"

Hyldreda paused, dumb with wonder, for despite the gorgeous show of jewelled attire, she recognised that face. It was the same she had looked at an hour before in the little cracked mirror. The lady in the carriage was the exact counterpart of herself!

The pageant came and vanished. Little Resa turned round and wiped her eyes—she, innocent child, had seen nothing but a cloud of dust. Her elder sister answered not her questionings, but remained silent, oppressed by a nameless awe. It passed not, even when the chapel was reached, and Hyldreda knelt to pray. Above the sound of the hymn she heard the ravishing music of the leaves in the oak wood, and instead of the priest she seemed to behold the two dazzling forms which had sat side by side in the golden chariot.

When service was ended, and all went homewards, she lingered under the trees where the vision, or reality, whichever it was, had met her sight, half longing for its reappearance. But her mother whispered something to Esbern, and they hurried Hyldreda away.

She laid aside her Sunday mantle, the scarlet woof which to spin, weave, and fashion, had cost her a world of pains. How coarse and ugly it seemed! She threw it contemptuously aside, and thought how beautiful looked the purple-robed lady, who was so like herself.

"And why should I not be as fair as she? I should, if I were only dressed as fine. Heaven might as well have made me a lady, instead of a poor peasant girl."

These repinings entered the young heart hitherto so pure and happy. They haunted her even when she rejoined her mother, Resa, and Esbern Lyngre. She prepared the noonday meal, but her step was heavy and her hand unwilling. The fare seemed coarse, the cottage looked dark and poor. She wondered what sort of a palace home was that owned by the beautiful lady; and whether the king, if king the stranger were, presided at his banquet table as awkwardly as did Esbern Lyngre at the mean board here.

At the twilight, Hyldreda did not steal out as usual to talk with her lover beneath the rose-porch. She went and hid herself out of his sight, under the branches of the great elder-tree, which to her had always a strange charm, perhaps because it was the spot of all others where she was forbidden to stay. However, this day Hyldreda began to feel herself to be no longer a child, but a woman whose will was free.

She sat under the dreamy darkness of the heavy foliage. Its faint sickly odour overpowered her like a spell. Even the white bunches of elder flowers seemed to grow alive in the twilight, and to change into faces, looking at her whithersoever she turned. She shut her eyes, and tried to summon back the phantom of the golden chariot, and especially of the king-like man who sat inside. Scarcely had she seen him clearly, but she felt he looked a king. If wishing could bring to her so glorious a fortune, she would almost like to have, in addition to the splendours of rich dress and grand palaces, such a noble-looking man for her lord and husband.

And the poor maiden was rudely awakened from her dream, by feeling on her delicate shoulders the two heavy hands of Esbern Lyngre.

Haughtily she shook them off. Alas! he, loving her so much, had ever been lightly loved in return! to-day he was not loved at all. He came at an ill time, for the moment his hand put aside the elder branches, all the dazzling fancies of his betrothed vanished in air. He came, too, with an ill wooing, for he implored her to trifle no more, but to fulfil her mother's hope and his, and enter as mistress at the little blacksmith's forge. She, who had just been dreaming of a palace home! Not a word she answered at first, and then cold, cruel words, worse than silence. So Esbern, who, though a lover, was a manly hearted youth, and thought it shame to be mocked by a girl's light tongue, left her there and went away, not angry, but very sorrowful.

Little Resa came to summon her sister. But Hyldreda trembled before the gathering storm, for widow Kalm, though a tender mother, was one who well knew how to rule. Her loud, severe voice already warned the girl of the reproof that was coming. To avoid it only for a little, until her own proud spirit was calmed, Hyldreda told Resa she would not come in until after she had taken a little walk down the moonlight road. As she passed from under the elder-tree, she heard a voice, like her mother's, and yet not her mother's—no, it could never be, for it shouted after her,

"Come now, or come no more!"

Some evil impulse goaded the haughty girl to assert her womanly right of free action, and she passed from her home, flying with swift steps. A little, only a little absence, to show her indignant pride, and she would be back again, to heal all strife. Nevertheless, ere she was aware, Hyldreda had reached the oak-wood, beneath which she had seen the morning's bewildering sight.

And there again, brighter in the moonlight than it had ever seemed in the day, came sweeping by the stately pageant. Its torches flung red shadows on the trees, its wheels resounded through the night's quiet with a music as of silver bells. And sitting in his state alone, grand but smiling, was the lord of all this splendour.

The chariot stopped, and he dismounted. Then the whole train vanished, and, shorn of all his glories, except a certain brightness which his very presence seemed to shed, the king, if he were indeed such, stood beside the trembling peasant maid.

He did not address her, but looked in her face inquiringly, until Hyldreda felt herself forced to be the first to speak.

"My lord, who art thou, and what is thy will with me?"

He smiled. "Thanks, gentle maiden, for thy question has taken off the spell. Otherwise it could not be broken, even by Kong Tolv."

Hyldreda shuddered with fear. Her fingers tried to seize the cross which always lay on her breast, but no! she had thrown aside the coarse black wooden crucifix, while dreaming of ornaments of gold. And it was St. John's Eve, and she stood beneath the haunted oak-wood. No power had she to fly, and her prayers died on her lips, for she knew herself in the Hill-king's power.

Kong Tolv began to woo, after the elfin fashion, brief and bold. "Fair maiden, the Dronningstolen¹ is empty, and 'tis thou must fill it. Come and enter my palace under the aill."

But the maiden sobbed out that she was too lowly to sit on a queen's chair, and that none of mortals, save the dead, made their home underground. And she prayed the Elle-king to let her go back to her mother and little Resa.

He only laughed. "Wouldst be content, then, with the poor cottage, and the black bread, and the labour from morn till eve. Didst thou not of thyself wish for a palace and a lord like me? And did not the Hyldemoer waft me the wish, so that I came to meet and welcome thee under the hill?"

Hyldreda made one despairing effort to escape, but she heard again Kong Tolv's proud laugh, and looking up, she saw that the thick oak-wood had changed to an army. In place of every tree stood a fierce warrior, ready to guard every step. She thought it must be all a delirious dream that would vanish with the morning. Suddenly she heard the far village clock strike the hour. Mechanically she counted—one—two—three—four—up to twelve.

(1) Dronningstolen, or Queen's Chair.

As she pronounced the last word, Kong Tolv caught her in his arms, saying, "Thou hast named me and art mine."

Instantly all the scene vanished, and Hyldreda found herself standing on the bleak side of a little hill, alone in the moonlight. But very soon the clear night darkened, and a heavy storm arose. Trembling she looked around for shelter, and saw in the hill-side a tiny door, which seemed to invite her to enter. She did so! In a moment she stood dazzled by a blaze of light—a mortal amidst the festival of the elves. She heard the voice of Kong Tolv, half-speaking, half-singing:—

"Welcome, maiden, fair and free,
Thou hast come of thyself in the hill to me;
Stay thou here, nor thy fate deplore;
Thou hast come of thyself in at my door."

And bewildered by the music, the dance, and the splendour, Hyldreda remembered no more the cottage, with its one empty chair,—nor the miserable mother, nor the little sister straining her weeping eyes along the lonely road.

The mortal maiden became the Elle-king's bride, and lived in the hill for seven long years;—at least, so they seemed in Elfinland, where time passes like the passing of a strain of music, that dies but to be again renewed. Little thought had she of the world above ground, for in the hill-palace was continual pleasure, and magnificence without end. No remembrance of lost kindred troubled her, for she sat in the Dronningstolen, and all the elfin people bowed down before the wife of the mighty Kong Tolv.

She might have lived so always, with no desire ever to go back to earth, save that one day she saw trickling down through the palace roof a pearly stream. The elves fled away, for they said it was some mortal weeping on the grassy hill overhead. But Hyldreda stayed and looked on until the stream settled into a clear pellucid pool. A sweet mirror it made, and the Hill-king's bride ever loved to see her own beauty. So she went and gazed down into the shining water.

There she beheld—not the image of the elfin-queen, but of the peasant maid, with her mantle of crimson woof, her coarse dress, and her black crucifix. She turned away in disgust, but soon her people brought her elfin mirrors, wherein she could see her present self, gorgeously clad, and a thousand times more fair. It kindled in her heart a proud desire.

She said to her lord, "Let me go back for a little while to my native village, and my ancient home, that I may show them all my splendour, and my greatness. Let me enter, sitting in my gilded chariot, with the four white horses, and feel myself as queen-like as the lady I once saw beneath the oak-wood."

Kong Tolv laughed, and assented. "But," he said, "keep thy own proud self the while. The first sigh, the first tear, and I carry thee back into the hill with shame."

So Hyldreda left the fairy-palace, sweeping through the village, with a pageant worthy a queen. Thus in her haughtiness, after seven years had gone by, she came to her mother's door.

—Seven years, none of which had cast one shadow on the daughter's beauty. But time and grief together had bowed the mother almost to the verge of the grave. The one knew not the other, until little Resa came between; little Resa, who looked her sister's olden self, blooming in the sweetness of seventeen. Nothing to her was the magnificence of the beautiful guest; she only saw Hyldreda, the lost and found.

"Where hast thou been?" said the mother, doubtfully, when in answer to all their carresses, the stately lady only looked on them with a proud smile; "Who gave thee those grand dresses, and put the matron's veil upon thy hair?"

"I am the Hill-king's wife," said Hyldreda. "I dwell in a gorgeous palace, and sit on a queen's throne."

"God preserve thee!" answered the mother. But Hyldreda turned away, for Kong Tolv had commanded her never to hear or utter the one holy Name. She began to inquire about her long-forgotten home, but half-carelessly, as if she had no interest in it now.

"And who was it," she asked, "that wept on the hill-side until the tears dropped through, staining my palace walls?"

"I," answered Resa, blushing; and then Hyldreda perceived that, young as she was, the girl wore the matron's head-tire. "I, sitting there, with my babe, wept to think of my poor sister who died long ago, and never knew the sweetness of wifehood and motherhood. And almost it grieved me, to think that my love had blotted out the bitterness of her memory even from the heart of Esbern Lyngse."

At the name, proudly laughed the elder sister, "Take thy husband and be happy, girl; I envy thee not; I am the wife of the great Hill-king."

"And does thy lord love thee? Does he sit beside thee at eve, and let thee lean thy tired head on his breast, as Esbern does with me? And hast thou young children dancing about thy feet, and a little blue-eyed one to creep dovelike to thy heart at nights, as mine does? Say, dear sister, art thou as happy as I?"

Hyldreda paused. Earth's sweet ties arose before her, and the grandeur of her lot seemed only loneliness. Forgetting her lord's command, she sighed, she even wept one regretful tear; and that moment in her presence stood Kong Tolv.

"Kill me, but save my mother, my sister," cried the wife, with a broken heart. The prayer was needless; they saw not the Elle-king, and he marked not them—he only bore away Hyldreda, singing mockingly in her ear something of the same rhyme which had bound her his:—

"Complainest thou here all drearilie—
Camest thou not of thyself in the hill to me?
And stayest thou here thy lot to deplore?
Camest thou not of thyself in at my door."

When the mother and sister of Hyldreda lifted up their eyes, they saw nothing but a cloud of dust sweeping past the cottage-door, they heard nothing but the ancient elder-tree howling aloud as its branches were tossed about in a gust of wintry wind.

Kong Tolv took back to the hill his mortal bride. There he set her in a golden chair, and brought to her to drink a silver horn of elfin-wine, in the which he had dropped an ear of wheat. At the first draught, she forgot the village where she had dwelt—at the second, she forgot the sister who had been her darling—at the third, she forgot the mother who bore her. Again she rejoiced in the glories of the fairy-palace, and in the life of never-ceasing pleasure.

Month after month rolled by—by her scarce counted, or counted only in jest, as she would number a handful of roses, all held so fast and sure, that none could fall or fade;—or as she would mark one by one the little waves of a rivulet whose source was eternally flowing.

Hyldreda thought no more of any earthly thing, until there came, added to her own, a young, new life. When her beautiful babe, half-elf, half-mortal, nestled in her woman's breast, it awakened there the fountain of human love, and of long forgotten memories.

"Oh! let me go home once—once more," she implored of her lord. "Let me go to ask my mother's forgiveness, and above all, to crave the church's blessing on this my innocent babe."

Kong Tolv frowned, and then looked sad. For it is the one great sorrow of the Elle-people, that they, with all others of the elfin race, are shut out from Heaven's mercy. Therefore do they often steal mortal wives, and strive to have their children christened according to holy rite, in order to participate in the blessings granted to the offspring of Adam.

"Do as thou wilt," the Hill-king answered; "but know, there awaits a penalty. In exchange for a soul, must be given a life."

His dark saying fell coldly on the heart of the young mother. It terrified her for a time, but soon the sweet strange wiles of her elfin-babe beguiled her into renewed happiness; so that her longing faded away.

The child grew not like a mortal child. An unearthly beauty was in its face; wondrous precocious signs marked it from its birth. Its baby-speech was very wisdom. Its baby-smile was full of thought. The mother read her olden soul—the pure soul that was hers of yore—in her infant's eyes.

One day when Hyldreda was following the child in its play, she noticed it disappear through what seemed the outlet of the fairy-palace, which outlet she herself had never been able to find. She forgot that her boy was of elfin as well as of mortal race. Out it passed, the mother eagerly pursuing, until she found herself with the child in a meadow near the village of Skjelskør, where years ago she had often played. It was on a Sunday morning, and cheerfully yet solemnly rang out the chapel-bells. All the sounds and sights of earth came back upon her, with a longing that would not be restrained.

In the white frozen grass, for it was winter-time, knelt the wife of Kong Tolv, holding fast to her bosom the elfn babe, who shivered at every blast of wind, yet, shivering, seemed to smile. Hyldreda knelt, until the chapel-bells ceased at service-time. And then there came bursting from her lips the long-sealed prayers, the prayers of her childhood. While she breathed them, the rich fairy garments crumbled from her, and she remained clad in the coarse dress she wore when Kong Tolv carried her away; save that it hung in miserable tatters, as if worn for years, and through its rents the icy wind pierced her bosom, so that the heart within might have sunk and died, but for the ever-abiding warmth of maternal love.

That told her how in one other mother's heart there must be warmth still.

"I will go home," she murmured, "I will say, Mother, take me in and save me, or else I die!" And so, when the night closed, and all the villagers were safe at home, and none could mock at her and her misery, the poor desolate one crept to her mother's door.

It had been open to her even when she came in her pride; how would it be closed against her sorrow and humility? And was there ever a true mother's breast, that while life yet throbbed there, was not a refuge for a repentant child?

Hyldreda found shelter and rest. But the little elfn babe, unused to the air of earth, uttered continual moanings. At night, the strange eyes never closed, but looked at her with a dumb entreaty. And tenfold returned the mother's first desire, that her darling should become a "christened child."

Much the old grandame gloried in this, looking with distrust on the pining, withered babe. But keenly upon Hyldreda's memory came back the saying of Kong Tolv, that for a soul would be exchanged a life. It must be hers. That, doubtless, was the purchase; and thus had Heaven ordained the expiation of her sin. If so, meekly she would offer it, so that Heaven would admit into its mercy her beloved child.

It was in the night—in the cold white night, that the widow Kalm, with her daughter and the mysterious babe, came to the chapel of Skjelskør. All the way thither they had been followed by strange, unearthly noises; and as they passed beneath the oak-wood, it seemed as if the overhanging branches were transformed into giant hands, that evermore snatched at the child. But in vain; for the mother held it fast, and on its little breast she had laid the wooden cross which she herself used to wear when a girl. Bitterly the infant had wailed, but when they crossed the threshold of the chapel, it ceased, and a smile broke over its face—a smile pure and saintly, such as little children wear, lying in a sleep so beautiful that the bier seems like the cradle.

The mother beheld it, and thought, What if her foreboding should be true; that the moment which opened the gate of heaven's mercy unto her babe, should close upon herself life and life's sweetnesses? But she felt no fear.

"Let me kiss thee once again, my babe, my darling!" she murmured; "perhaps I may never kiss thee more. Even now, I feel as if my eyes were growing dark, and thy little face were gliding from my sight. But I can let thee go, my sweet! God will take care of thee, and keep thee safe, even amidst this bitter world."

She clasped and kissed the child once more and my sight, kneeling, calm, but very pale, she awaited whatever might be her doom.

The priest, performing by stealth what he almost deemed a desecration of the hallowed rite, began to read the ceremony over the fairy babe. All the while, it looked at him with those mysterious eyes, so lately opened to the world, yet which seemed to express the emotions of a whole existence. But when the sprinkled water touched them, they closed, softly, slowly, like a blue flower at night.

The mother, still living, and full of thankful wonder that she did live, took from the priest's arms her recovered treasure, her Christian child. It lay all smiling, but it lifted not its eyes: the colour was fading on its lips, and its little hands were growing cold. For it—not for her, had been the warning. It had rendered up its little life, and received an immortal soul.

For years after this, there abode in the village of Skjelskør a woman whom some people thought was an utter stranger, for none so grave, and at the same time so good, was ever known among the light-hearted people of Zealand. Others said that if any one could come back alive from fairy land, the woman must be Hyldreda Kalm. But as later generations arose, they mocked at the story of Kong Tolv and the palace under the hill, and considered the whole legend but an allegory, the moral of which they did not fail to preach to their fair young daughters continually.

Nevertheless, this woman had surely once lived, for her memory, embalmed by its own rich virtues, long lingered in the place where she had dwelt. She must have died there too, for they pointed out her grave, and a smaller one beside it, though whose that was, none knew. There was a tradition that when she died—it was on a winter night, and the clock was just striking twelve—there arose a stormy wind which swept through the neighbouring oak-wood, laying every tree prostrate on the ground. And from that hour there was no record of the Elle-people or the mighty Kong Tolv having been ever again seen in Zealand.

FANCIES ABOUT FICTIONS.

BY F. B.

No age, probably, has been more distinguished than the present by the progress of utilitarian views, and the practical bias of men's minds, and yet, perhaps, there never was one so prolific in works of pure fiction. How the two facts are to be reconciled, would be a curious inquiry; but so it is. The greater portion of men raise their voices against all that does not bear a positive and evident stamp of use and expediency, or that has not upon it at least some faint reflection of that glare which surrounds the golden idol of their worship; and yet the same age which counts them as its children is rich beyond others in the stores of imagination. The poet, indeed, is deemed visionary, and he who looks any higher than common, is at once branded as an enthusiast; but still, despite all this, the writer of fiction maintains his place, and exercises a sway over—shall we say, the hearts of these worldly men? ay, more,—their very pockets are not closed to his labours. Shall we take this for a token that Fancy is not quite dead among us?—that there is still a something within, which the debasing worship of mammon has not utterly destroyed?—that man's heart can still feel the touch of sympathy? for, though it be awakened only by a fancied distress, still the feeling must be there, or it could not come into exercise at all; and who can tell, but the seed which has been once developed may grow and gather strength, till it bring forth the fruit of many a good and blessed deed.

Strange it may seem, that the distress of fiction should call forth a sympathy, and touch a chord, over which real and visible suffering had no power; but it is not so strange as at first sight it would seem to be. The world with its mammon-worship makes man, who was in the beginning born to love, a selfish being in all he does; self becomes to him the spring of every work,—in self all his actions centre,—the end to which he looks is self. If, then, he be a true worshipper of the idol,—if he have wholly given himself up to his debasing service,—he will harden his heart against the sight of distress, lest in any way self should suffer; but while the picture is only fancied, he fears no attack upon his own darling, and, unawares it may be, suffers his heart to respond in notes, however faint and feeble, to some strains of that music which played around it in an earlier and better day.

Be the cause, however, what it will, fiction is loved in this age that professes to be great in its search for solid truth. It may be that there is a moral in this. What think you, good reader,—would it be a strange thing, if, in the end, the fiction prove more real than the truth men grasp at? It may be, the loving heart and the quick fancy shall tell greater truths than have ever been reached after by the grasping hand, or reckoned upon by the calculating head. Who knows but we may at last say of him who follows the idol of the age:—

"Heu! quoties fidem,
Mutatosque deos febit, et aspera

*Nigris æquora ventis
Emirabitur insolens,
Qui nunc te fruitur credulus aurea!"*

It may be that the long-pursuit shall turn out to be only

"Trouble on trouble, pain on pain, Long labour unto aged breath;"

while that which was in form a fiction, veiled beneath its principles of deepest truth, founded in the very inmost feelings, bound up with the very dearest hopes of our hearts.

Well, we are not going to moralize, for we scarcely expect to be listened to if we do, since moralizing is one of the privileges every man claims for himself; and however much he may love it, he is but little patient to endure it from others; and so, gentle reader and fair, you who, we know, have a great regard for the "last new novel," we will refrain from the temptation, lest you should deal out to this page the same measure which is given even to that book that you rejoice in; for even in the "new novel" the moralizing bits are to be skipped by old custom and undeniable right. And yet, again, fair reader, we would pause awhile, lest it should seem that we had reckoned you with these worldly minds,—these electro-plated hearts, of which we spoke; but do not mistake; it was said that this age is very utilitarian, and very full of fiction, in more senses than one, and that it was a strange thing that the two should co-exist; but we never said that all readers of fiction were utilitarian; for we ourselves delight in a pleasant tale, and yet we should be very far from considering ourselves complimented by being called utilitarian.

And yet we do believe in utilitarianism, if it were only rightly defined, and hold that every man, no matter how poor he be, or how feeble, has his own place assigned him, his own sphere of usefulness, his own work to do, and he who best fulfils it is the best utilitarian of all, and the only one. Would we had more of them! we should then live more in the soft influence of the heart's best sunshine, even though we might be somewhat wanting in the glare of that golden light which dazzles so many among us now. We believe that all men have their set work,—their "mission," if you like the word; and whoever—let him be novelist, or what you will—has, in the exercise of it, had the power to touch one chord of feeling; to wake one heart to sympathy with its fellows, though it were but for a moment; to make the eyes of one man dim, because the mist of another's grief was upon them, for a little space veiling the clearness of their earthly vision, but letting in a flood of light from heaven—has done something for our nature: and, let the so-called utilitarians scoff and sneer as they may, the little leaven which he has thrown in shall do more for the world—aye, and be more expedient, too—than aught they have ever brought to pass, after long hours of weary eyes, and aching heads, and hands that tremble with much labour.

Yes, we do love a pleasant tale,—a pleasant tale on a winter's evening, a fairy tale, such as children delight to hear. We have not yet forgotten all our stories of meekness in suffering, and of good deeds that received their reward at last. There is still a little corner of memory left for Cinderella, and those other simple histories that the child would treasure up. How many a seed of fancy is laid up in these; better, far better, than all the modern store of "Hydrostatics made easy," and "Newton's Principia adapted to childish minds!" "A time for all things," is the motto of the wise: the weight that the full-grown tree would scarcely feel, would break down and crush the tender sapling. Men who force children's minds in this fashion, always seem to be looking up for the high branches of the oak, when, as yet, the shoot has scarcely burst through the husk of the acorn; and if we fancy aright, they will look long, and look hard, and see nothing in the end but a wild-goose flying above their heads. It does not shame us to confess that we have not yet lost our love for fairy lore; but, at the same time, we would not have it supposed that we never rise higher than this. It is pleasant to live over our childish days again, but we would still have something that suits the fuller growth of the man.

And we love a tale of dread,—some old legend, to be read at midnight by a solitary lamp and a dying fire, when we are surrounded by shadows that we can people as we will. A thrilling thing it is to hold converse, even in imagination, with a world beyond our own,—a world that is real, and, it may be, close about us; for who can tell what sights, what spirit-wonders might meet us, if the weakness of our flesh did not obscure our clearer vision? Surely we are not all alone; and it is a fearful thing to think what eyes may be upon us, watching every deed;—some, it may be, exulting at the evil of our lives, and laying up all our ill-doing for the Accuser; while others, guardian spirits and holy, mourn beside us, to watch our waywardness, and stand ready to minister to us if we would gird ourselves to strive with the evil that is around us; and all the while they keep watching the sign upon our foreheads,—the sign fraught with mystery and blessing,—to see if it becomes brighter or more dim as we advance. But such theme, though ever to be borne in mind, is not lightly to be dealt with, and so we pass it by, as too hallowed for our present talk.

We love an old legend,—an old story of "glamour might;" for, however unreal it may seem, the very thrill of spirit, the very quickening of pulse which it causes, prove that there is something beyond the mere material world, something that lies deeper than the mere feelings of sense. We love to trace in these stories that straining of the human mind beyond its present bounds, whereby it witnesses to itself the greatness of its own power; for it was some such thought as this that dictated the old tales of wizard might. We love these tales of wonder, and to hear how—

"'Tis said, as through the aisles they pass'd,
They heard strange noises on the blast;
And through the cloister-galleries small,
Which at mid-height thread the chancel wall,
Loud sobs and laughter louder ran,
And voices unlike the voice of man."

And we delight much in a tale of love,—valorous knight, and ladye fair—to be dreamed over in the green fields, or under the pleasant shado, where we can watch the shadows that the clouds are making as they float above us,—fickle and changeeful shadows, uncertain as that of which we read. But it is not every tale that is a pleasant one, nor will three volumes always set us dreaming. And if we like a story of wonder, and do not quarrel with a spice of necromancy, yet there is "reason in our madness," for it is not every absurdity, nor every raw-head horror, that can move us as we say. The common stories of witches and broomsticks, and all the demonology of our British Solomon, we hold in utter abhorrence. There is nothing pleasant in witchcraft, and all we ever yet saw of such fiction only tended to show the soul of man in its most degraded form, and not as reaching after higher being. Mischief done for the sake of mischief, and power used only for evil, together with all the clumsy machinery of such stories, we cannot bear to dwell upon. We cannot bear to see man's spirit shown in so foul a light; nay, as if it were not bad enough to degrade the human race in this sort, they must even choose out its fairest portion for their libel, and woman must bear all the odium of this satanic dealing,—old, generally, and infirm, but not a whit the less woman. We protest against these witches, and, we repeat it, we cannot tolerate them, with their broomsticks, and rats' tails, and toads, and all the other disgusting ingredients of their cauldrons;—those three notable ones always excepted, who startled the thane of Glamis in the first instance, and have sat for their portraits, and kept their pot boiling and bubbling for all romance-writers since. We rather like a respectable wizard, such as Michael Scott, of whom it was said—

"That when, in Salamanca's cave,
Him listed his magic wand to wave,
The bells would ring in Notre Dame!"

though in these electric days, that does not strike us as so very wonderful a thing; and as for his "bridling the Tweed with a curb of stone," it might be tolerably difficult in the "dark ages," but the Menai Straits would laugh at him if he boasted of such a thing now-a-days;—for the sea can laugh, good reader, and Æschylus says so;—or if laughing is not dignified enough, it can smile, at all events, and a smile of beauty it is. However, putting aside all this, Michael

Scott was a comparatively decent member of society, and we have no objection to him; but witches we utterly abhor; their wonderful doings we do not mind, but we protest against the broomsticks; we have rather a taste for the spirits, but we cannot swallow the toads; we don't find fault with the thunder, but the brimstone chokes us, and the blue fire spoils our complexions. Neither do we admire such passages as the following, which occurs in the last romance of a well-known writer:—

"Was it disturbed fancy, or did he really behold, on the summit of the structure; a grisly shape, resembling—if it resembled any thing human—a gigantic black cat, with roughened, staring skin, and flaming eye-balls?"

We hope humanity is flattered by the comparison.

We are not to be satisfied with every fiction that comes into our hands. The circulating libraries have a plenteous store, but we would not choose to have all they contain. It is not the mere making of a plot, and the putting together a certain number of characters, like a Chinese puzzle, that constitutes a readable tale. We may have interesting young ladies, whose eyes make the stars look dim, and whose perfections are so great that they end in moonshine, and lackadaisical youths, "sighing like furnace," and cross papas and obstinate step-mothers; nay more, there may be two travellers on horseback, and a thunder-storm, a tapestried chamber, and even a trap-door, with tender speeches, cut and dried, or sounding words, highly seasoned for the occasion,—and yet we shall not be one whit nearer a good and interesting tale. The fact is, that before a story can interest us, it must cease to be fiction. It must have a moral in it, well drawn, and such as the reader will feel; but that moral must not be thrust forward upon his notice, or the book becomes a mere lesson, as it were. The reader must be led to the moral, and not forced upon it. And the feeling of the book, the living principle of it, which is the impress of the writer's mind, must be true, even though the form in which it appears be fiction. The writer must live over all his characters, put himself in their position, and think their thoughts, and when he has done all this, and given the story a reality to his own mind, he may then venture to tell it to others, and in proportion as he has felt himself, so will he succeed in moving them. And in all this he ought not to suffer himself to appear, except as narrator, and in some forms of the novel even this is not to be allowed; his own feelings and thoughts must be completely swallowed up by the characters of his tale, and each of these must be consistent. And the whole story must have life given to it, as we said, by bearing the impress of the writer's mind. We do not mean that it must bear the tinge of his thoughts,—for that would contradict what we have said,—but it must carry with it the marks of his having thought out all his characters, and lived the story over. It is not enough, either, to give a picture of any one period; a tale that does no more than this, will not be lasting; it must represent those feelings of men's hearts that have ever been the same from the beginning, and which are common to all men. It may in conjunction with these give the picture of a period, but these are the essentials.

A tale well told may be the moral of a history; and will often do its work when history would be put aside. This ought not to be the case, but yet it is so too often. It may be that the majority of men read history directly for information, fiction for amusement; the one is meant to be the object of the understanding, the other of the imagination; the one is pursued as, in some degree, a duty, the other as a pleasure. And if there be any truth in this, it is not surprising that men love fiction. It appeals to the imagination, and the imagination revels in the unknown. We are all treading upon the very verge of an unknown world, and ever and anon voices are wafted to us, borne by no earthly winds, and we listen to their sound, and long to know more of that which they utter, and we build up in our own souls palaces of beauty, and fashion for ourselves gardens where we may wander at will. This can imagination do, and what wonder is it, if men love it well?

Works of fiction, however, like all other things, have their abuses. Their use is recreation; for the mind, like the body, cannot remain always on the stretch. But when they are resorted to for killing time, as the saying is,—time which is all too short,—then we cannot sufficiently deprecate their use. They become then almost a necessity to him who has devoted himself to them, and relaxing his mind, little by little, they leave him at last a weak creature, scarcely capable of forming a judgment on any matter harder than common. The truth they contain is altogether missed by him, if it lie not quite upon the surface, and the fiction is all for which he has a care. He lives in a world of fiction, and having dared to "kill time," as he calls it, and not being yet called into the realities of eternity, he hovers, as it were, between the two, living in a world of shadows that satisfy him in nothing, and only lure him on to destruction. They are to the mind exactly what stimulants are to the body, useful in their place, but ruinous if abused. There is but little difference between the opium-eater and the confirmed novel-reader; the former makes his own dreams by the agency of a drug, the latter lives in the dreams called up by the powers of another.

And since we have spoken of children, and what they love, we would say somewhat against the thoughtlessness that puts tales of all kinds into their hands. Let them have their fairies, and their pleasant stories, which the innocence of a child can love; but let them not be shown all the knaveries of the world, and its foul deeds in a fair guise, and all its sophistries decked out with specious art. They will know them all too soon; let us not forestall the time. If the seed of good can be planted by these means, so also can the root of evil; and where the one grows slowly, the other will shoot up and increase, and bear a tenfold fruit of bitterness.

But there is one class of novel of which we scarcely know how to speak,—that, namely, which is known as the religious novel. We cannot say that we are over-fond of these. There is no doubt that sound principles may often be instilled by them, and will reach quarters from which they would otherwise, perhaps, be shut out; but yet we doubt them. Those who are taught in this way, can scarcely be said to be taught at all. If they can by this means be led to inquiry, and then be watched over carefully, it will be well; but if they merely read the novel, as they would others, the probability is that they get very little worth the knowing. They will read superficially, and they will argue badly, and be left always at the mercy of the latest speaker. They will only know results, or if they hear of the principles from which those results are derived, they will not digest them and make them their own; and then the first opponent of the views they have imbibed, if he has really studied his subject, will, in nine cases out of ten, either bring them over to himself, or unsettle them altogether. Religion is all truth, and is not to be taught by fiction; meaning, of course, by this, such fiction as most of our novels present. Parables and allegories come under quite a different head, and do not affect the question at all; and tales in which a principle of action is shown by example can scarcely be objected to. That with which we find fault is discussion about religious truths, and matters of faith introduced into the story. There is here no room for imagination. Imagination ceases when faith is consummated; therefore the subject and its medium are unsuited to each other. The solemn truths which confessors have witnessed, and holy martyrs have sealed with their blood, are scarcely fit subjects for the varied scenes of a modern tale. Some hands there are who know how to blend them, as far as it can be done, and these we hardly need mention; but yet the example seems scarcely a good one. We do not like to see great and vital doctrines made the subject of a flip-pant discourse. It may be we take an unfair view, but to us it does not seem so; the subject is an important one, however, and worthy of being well considered.

And now, Reader, we have told you our fancies; do they seem to you to be truths, or only fictions, after all, themselves?

Chalfont.

ARRIVED at last; after what a journey! Ned had sent me word overnight to expect, this forenoon, a smart young cavalier, on a fine prancing steed, with rich accoutrements. Howbeit, cousin is neither young nor handsome; and, at the time specifyde, there was brought up to y^e door an old white horse, blind of one eye, with an aquiline nose, and, I should think, eight feet high. The bridle was diverse from y^e pillion, which was finely embroidered, but tarnisht, with y^e stuffing oozing out in severall places. - Howbeit, 'twas the onlie equipage to be hired in y^e ward, for love or money . . . so Ned said . . . And he had a huge payr of gauntlett gloves, a whip, that was y^e smartest thing about him, and a kind of vizard over his nose and mouth, which, he sayd, was to prevent his being too alluring; but I know 'twas to ward off infection. I had meant to be brave; and Nurse and I had brushed up y^e green camblet skirt, but the rent mother had made in it would show; however, Nurse thought that, when I was up, she could conceal it with a corking pin. Thus appointed, Ned led y^e way, saying, the onlie occasion on which a gentleman needed not to excuse himself to a lady for going first, was when they were to ride a pillion. Noe more jesting when once a-horseback; for, after pacing through a few deserted streets, we found ourselves amidst such a medly of carts, coaches, and wagons, full of people and goods, all pouring out of town, that Ned had enough to doe to keep cleare of 'em, and of the horsemen and empty vehicles coming back for fresh loads. Dear heart! what jostling, cursing, and swearing! And how awfull y^e cause! Houses padlocked and shuttered wherever we passed, and some with red crosses on y^e doors. At y^e first turnpike 'twas worst of alle—a complete stoppage; men squabbling, women crying, and much good daylight wasted. Howbeit, Ned desired me to keep my mouth shut, my eyes open, and to trust to his good care; and, by dint of some shrewd pilotage, weathered y^e strait; after which, our old horse, whose paces, to do him justice, proved very casie, took longer steps than anie other on y^e road, by which means we soon got quit of y^e throng; onlie, we continuallie gained on fresh parties,—some dreadfully overloaded, some knocked up alreadie, some baiting at y^e roadside, and many of y^e poorer sort erecting 'emselves rude tents and cabins under y^e hedges. Soon I began to rejoyce in y^e green fields, and sayd, how sweet was y^e air; and Ned sayd, "Ah!—a brick-kiln," and signed at one with his whip. But I knew the wind came t'other way;—and c'en bricks are better than dead rats.

Half-way to Amersham, found Hob Carter's wagon, with father's organ in't, sticking in y^e hedge, without man or horse; and, by-and-by, came upon Hob him-self, with a party, carousing. Ned gave it him well, and sent him back at double-quick time. 'Twas too bad. He had left town overnight, and promised to be at Chalfont by noon. I s^d have beene fain to keep him in advance of us; howbeit, we were forc't to leave him in y^e rear; and, about two miles beyond Amersham, we turned off the high road into a country lane, which soon brought us to a small retired hamlet, shaded with trees, and surrounded with pleasant meadows and orchards, which was no other than Chalfont. There was mother near y^e gate, putting some fine things to bleach on a sweetbriar-hedge. Ned stopt to chat with her, and learn where he might put his horse, while I went to seek father; and soon found him, sitting up in a strait chair, outside y^e garden-door. Sayd, kissing him, "Dear father, how is't with you? Are you comfortable here?"

"Anything but that," replies he, very shortlie. "I am not in any way at my ease in this place. I can get no definite notion of what 'tis like, and what notion I have is unfavourable. To finish all, they have stuck me up here, like a bottle in the smoke."

"But here is a cushion for you," quoth I, running in and back agayn; "and I will set your scat in y^e sun, and out of the wind, and put your staff within reach."

"Thanks, dear Deb. And now, look about, child, and tell me, with precision, what the place is like."

Soc I told him 'twas an irregular two-storied tenement, parcel wood, parcel brick, with a deep roof of old tiles that had lost their colour, and were curiouslie variegated with green and yellow moss; and that y^e caves were dentilled, with birds' nests built in 'em, and a big honeysuckle growing to y^e upper floor; and there was a great and a little gable, and a heavy chimney-stack; a casement of four compartments next y^e door, and, another of two over it; four lattice windows at tother end; in front, a steep meadow, enamelled with king-cups and blue-bells; alongside y^e gable-end, a village road, with deep cart-ruts, and hawthorn hedges. Onlie one small dwelling at hand, little better than a crazy haystack, or big bird's nest; sheep in y^e field, bees in y^e honeysuckle; and a little rippling rivulet flowing on continually.

"Why, now you have sett me quite at ease," cries he, turning his bright eyes thankfully towards y^e sky. "I begin to like the place, and to bless the warm sun and pure air. Ha! so there is a rippling rivulet, that floweth on continually! . . . Lord, forgive me for my peevish petulance . . . for forgetting that I could still hear the lark sing her morning hymn, scent the meadow-sweet and new-mown hay, detect the bee at his industry, and the woodpecker at his mischief, discern the breath of cows, and hear the lambs bleat, and the rivulet ripple contin-u-ally! Come! let us go and seek Ned."

And, throwing his arm about me, hugs me to him, saying, "This is my best walking-stick," and steps forward briskly and fearlessly.

Truly, I think Ned loves him as though he were his own father; and, indeed, he hath scarce known any other. Kissing his hand reverently, he says,— "Honoured Nunks, how fares it with you? Do you like Chalfont?"

"Indeed I do, Ned," responds father, heartily. "'Tis a little Zoar, whither I and my fugitive family have escaped from the wicked city; and, I thank God, my wife has no mind to look back."

"We may as well go in now," says mother.

"No, no," says father; "I feel there is an hour of summer's sunset still left. We will abide where we are, and keep as long as we can out of the smell of your soap-suds. . . Let's sit upon the ground."

"And tell strange stories of the deaths of kings," says Ned, laughing.

"That was the saying, Ned, of one who writ much well, and much amiss."

"Let's forgive what he writ amiss, for the sake of what he writ well," says Ned.

"That will I never," says father. "If paltry wits cannot be holy and witty at y^e same time, that does not hold good with nobler spiritts. . . If it did, they had best never be witty at all. Thy brother Jack hath yet to learn that strength is not coarseness."

Ned softly hummed—

"Sweetest Shakspeare, Fancy's child!"

"Ah! you may quote me against myself," says father,— "you may quote Beza against Beza, and Erasmus against Erasmus; but that will not shake the eternal laws of purity and truth. But, mind you, Ned, never did anie reach a more lofty or tragic height than this child of fancy; never did any represent nature more purely to the life; and e'en where the polishments of art are most wanting in him, he pleaseth with a certain wild and native elegance."

"And what have you now in hand, uncle?" Ned asks.

"'Firmianus Chlorus,'" says father. "But I don't find much in him."

"I mean, what of your own?"

"Oh!" laughing; "things in heaven, Ned, and things on earth, and things under the earth. The old story, whereof you have already seen many parcels; but, you know, my vein ne'er flows so happily as from y^e autumnal to the vernal equinox. Howbeit, there is something in the quality of this air would arouse the old man of Chios himself."

"Sure," cries Ned, "you have less need than any blind man to complain, since you have but closed your eyes on earth to look on heaven."

Father paused; then, stedfastly, in words I've since sett down, said:—

"When I consider how my light is spent,
Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent, which is death to hide,
Lodgod with me useless, though my soul, more bent
To serve therewith my Maker, and present
My true account, lest He, returning, chide:
'Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?'
I fondly ask. But Patience, to prevent
That murmur, soon replies,—'God doth not need Either man's work, or his own gifts. Who best Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
Is kingly; thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest.
They also serve who only stand and wait.'"

. . . . We were all quiet enough for a while after this . . . Ned onlie breathing hard, and queezing father's hand. At length, mother calls from the house,— "Who will come in to strawberries and cream?"

"Ah!" says father, "that is not an ill call. And when we have discussed our neat repast, thou, Ned, shalt touch the theorbo, and let us hear thy balmy voice. Time was, when thou didst sing like a young chorister."

Anne told me, at bed-time, of the journey down. The coach, she said, was most uncomfortable, mother having so over-stuffed it. For her share, she had a knife-box under her feet, a plate-basket at her back, a bird-cage bobbing over her head, and a lapfull of crockery-ware. Providentially, Betty turned squeamish, and could not ride inside, so she was put upon the box, to the great comfort of all within. Father, at the outset, was chafed and captious, but soon settled down, improved the circumstances of the times, made jokes on mother, recalled old journies to Buckinghamshire, and, finally, set himself to silent self-communion, with a pensive smile on his face, which, as Anne said, let her know well enough what he was about. Arrived at Chalfont, her first care was to make him comfortable; while mother, Mary, and Betty were turning the house upside down; and in this her care, she so well succeeded, that, to her dismay, he bade her take pen and ink, and commenced dictating to her as composedly as if they were in Bunhill Fields. This was somewhat inopportune, for every thing was to seek and to set in order; and, indeed, mother soon came in, all of a heat, and said, "I wonder, my dear, you can keep Nan here, at such idling, when she has her bed to make, and her box to unpack." Father let her go without a word, and sate in peacefull cogitation all the rest of the evening,—the only person at leisure in the house. Howbeit, the next time he heard mother chiding—which was after supper—at Anne, for trying to catch a bat, which was a creature she longed to look at narrowly, he said,—“My dear, we should be very cautious how we cut off another person’s pleasures. ’Tis an easy thing to say to them, ‘You are wrong, or foolish,’ and soe check them in their pursuit; but what have we to give them that will compensate for it? How many harmless refreshments and refuges from sick or tired thought may thus be destroyed! We may deprive the spider of his web, and the robin of his nest, but can never repair the damage to them. Let us live, and let live; leave me to hunt my butterfly, and Anne to catch her bat.”

... Just as we were returning to the house, Mary ran forth, crying,—“Oh, Deb! you have not yet seen our cow. She has just been milked, and is being turned out, even now, to the pasture. See, there she is; but all the others have gone out of sight, over the hill.”

“Indeed, Mr. Milton, I know nothing of hexameters, or hexagons either: ’tis enough for me to keep all strait and tight. Let’s to supper.”

Anne had crushed his strawberries, and mixed them with cream, and now she put his spoon into his hand, saying, in jest, “Father, this is angels’ food, you know. I have pressed the meath from many a berry, and tempered dulcet creams.”

“Indeed, I know not if you call it such,” she replies, in y^e same undertone. “He hath given over all those grand things with hard names, that used to make him so notable abroad, and so esteemed by his own party at home; and now only amuses himself by making the Bible a peg to hang his idleness upon.”

Sure, what a look Ned gave her! Fearfull lest father s^d overhear, (for blindness quickens y^e other senses,) he runs up to the book-shelf, and cries,—“Why, uncle, you have brought down plenty of enter tainment with you! Here are Plato, Xenophon, and Sallust, Homer and Euripides, Dante and Petrarch, Chaucer and Spenser, . . . and . . . oh, oh! you read plays sometimes, though you were so hard upon Shakspeare. . . . Here’s ‘La Scena Tragica d’Adamo ed Eva,’ dedicated to the Duchess of Mantua.”

“Come away from that corner, Ned,” says father; “there’s a rat behind the books; he will bite your fingers,—I hear him scratching now. You had best attack your strawberries.”

“I think this sort will preserve well,” says mother. “Betty, in lighting from the coach, must needs sett her foot on the only pot of preserve I had left; which she had stuffed under the seat, instead of carrying it, as she was bidden, in her hand.”

“How fine it is, though,” says father, laughing, “to peacock it in a coach now and then! Pavoneggiarsi in un cocchio! Only, except for the bravery of it, I doubt if little Deb were not better off on her pillion. I remember, on my road to Paris, the bottom of the caroché fell out; and there sate I, with Hubert, who was my attendant, with our feet dangling through. Even the grave Grotius laughed at the accident.”

“Believe me, he was,” says father. “He had had enough to make him so. One feels taller in the consciousness of having known such a man. He was great in practical things; he was also a profound scholar, though he made out the fourth kingdom in Daniel’s prophecy to be the kingdoms of the Jagidæ and the Seleucidæ; which, you know, Ned, could not possibly be.”

Chatting thus of this and that, we idled over supper, had some musick, and went to bed. And soe much for the only guest we are like to have for some months.

SONG.

TEMPT not me with fiery wine,
Though with ruby tint it shine,—
In my goblet sparkling rise
Draughts the crystal spring supplies.
Oh! why should I my brain confuse,
My hand unnerve, my cheek suffuse?
What though others choose to obey
Senseless custom’s tyrant sway;
She shall have no slave in me,—
Free I am, I will be free.—J. N.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

BY MRS. POSTANS.

THE very last day I was in Bombay I had a chat with my friend Tiabjee, the milliner, anent Indian railways. It was about three o'clock, and the man of muslin had just concluded his prayers, (the prayers proper for that time of the day,) when I came into his Store to rest, after a very hot palankeen ride from the country to the fort, undertaken with the object of having a chat upon the very engrossing subject of railways. Tiabjee is fond of chatting; he prefers it to the realizing even cent. per cent. for China silks or Genoa velvets, and this is much. Moreover, he chats well, pleasantly, and to the purpose, as he hath good command of English words, is sufficiently well-natured, and thoroughly informed on all matters of interest of the day. We commenced our chat, then, with things social, moral, and political; talked of Sir Jemsetjee's last ball; wondered what would be the effect of the young parsee's (having perpetrated bigamy) advancing such a very idle excuse as that of having been constrained, in the first instance, to marry an ugly woman; and then we talked in a free way of the Governor-General as people are apt to do who evidently suppose legislation to be a fairy gift bestowed only on themselves, on which they reason after the fact, and show a marvellous deal of acumen. A vast deal of uncharitableness having been taken off our hands in this manner, I asked my friend Tiabjee what shares he had taken in the last railway speculations. He told me they were all gone; and he, the man of muslin, regretted the fact exceedingly, inasmuch as he felt quite sure they would answer, and pay well, although the innovation must tend to ruin landholders in Bombay, as all persons of wealth would bigg houses on the Ghauts, to enjoy the cool breezes, and keep only offices in Bombay. He had his doubts, too, about the monsoon's power of rusting trains, the effect of climate on the engineers, the result of contraction and expansion of metals in the tropics, and so on. That modern science, so fruitful in expedients to conquer difficulties of this nature, would not fail those who trusted to her power in the East, I felt satisfied; but my own apprehensions were excited, as to how, in the first place, coolies could be depended upon for their labour, they being a class sadly addicted to wrapping their cumlies (goat's hair cloaks) around their slender forms on all occasions of leisure, and seeking quiet siestas on the shortest notice; and, secondly, how the Bunjaras would bear such an innovation on their usages as the railroad threatened.

This most interesting race, the travelling grain-merchants of western India, (who lead a life wholly nomadic, and have done so earlier than is recorded,) have their best interests opposed to the introduction of foreign innovation in the matter of transit. The Bunjaras have no sympathy with civilized life; from the people of India they move, think, live apart, varying in dress, language, religion, from all about them. Rajpoots by origin, they can follow no trade; the Bunjara may serve only as a soldier; in all other callings he must be free and independent. For hundreds of years we find them, as hordes, encamping in the open air and living by the exchange of merchandise. They are owners of great droves of bullocks, which, laden with grain in the upper country, they drive to the coast, exchanging their burthens for salt, at a favourable market, but sedulously avoiding all intercourse with strangers and their cities. The Bunjaras are a stout, sturdy race; sturdy and stout in action and resolve as they are in body and form, Spartan-like in their sense of honour, free in opinion as the mountain breeze, keeping apart from men and their cabals, and existing by their own energies. A short time since, I journeyed on horseback over the very line of this proposed railway, from the city of Nassick to Bombay, and encountered several hundreds of bullocks heavily laden, and attended by Bunjara families; the men armed with sword and matelock, the children propped up among the bullock furniture, and each younger woman of the tribe looking much as one fancies the Jewish maiden must have looked when she obtained grace and favour in the sight of King Ahasuerus, who "made her queen instead of Vashti."

It is worthy of remark that the choice of colours among the Bunjara women is altogether opposed to general taste among the Hindoos. Red and yellow among the latter are always favourite tints, and blue is never worn by any but the common people, to whom it is recommended by the cheapness of the indigo used in dying. The Bunjara women, on the contrary, select the richest imaginable Tyrian purple, a sort of rosy smalt, as the ground of their attire, which is bordered by a deep phylactery of divers colours in curious needle-work, wrought in with small mirrors, beads, and sparkling crystals. Their sarree has a fringe of shells, and their handsome arms and delicate ankles are laden with rich ornaments. The Bunjara women plait their hair with crimson silk, and suffer it to fall on either side of the face, the ends secured with silver tassels, and on the summit of the head they wear a small tiara studded with silver stars.

The reader may think this rather a fanciful and exaggerated dress for the wife of a drover; but these costumes are heirlooms, and though they are often seen faded, torn, travel-stained, and grim, the materials are always as I have described them, differing in freshness but never in character.

It is said that these Bunjara hordes are to be remunerated for the loss of birthright, as merchants and cattle owners, by employment as hewers of wood and drawers of water; but the prejudices of their origin as Rajpoot emigrants would materially, I should think, militate against this arrangement; and, being an energetic and defensive people, it is not unlikely that they may essay means for opposing the introduction of a mode of transit which must throw them wholly out of occupation; the chief object of the railway being the conveyance of merchandise, and the Bunjaras, though commonly spoken of as grain-merchants, and having faithfully served our armies as such under Wellington and Cornwallis, do, in fact, traffic in all description of goods, exchanging their bargains according to the markets. Thus rice, cotton, salt, coarse cloth, merchandise, and provisions of very varied kinds are often found filling their sacks, to be disposed of at a profit of cent. per cent. although they often realize much more. From the fifteenth century to the present, we know that the interests of these wandering merchants have entirely depended on the lack of all other means for the transit of goods over rocky passes of the great Deccan range. With the introduction of railway communication the occupations of this remarkable tribe will cease, and whatever prejudice may compel them to suffer, the Bunjara must perforce offer up his independence at the shrine of his necessities. In other times, and under other rule, (remembering his Rajpoot origin,) he might have sought remuneration in acts of outrage and plunder; but he must now adapt his energies to any form best suited to advance his interests, and suffer himself to be carried forward with others by the great flood of advancing civilization.

Among the native speculators in Bombay the "railway" is the favourite topic. Opinions generally are divided upon it; but though visions of rust-caten trams, wandering tigers, sleeping coolies and singed engineers create doubts with some, the considerate and well-informed natives, like my friend Tiahjee, hail the project with delight, and anticipate from it more improvement in a few years to western India than centuries could produce by ordinary means. The path of the fire-king is already in some degree marked out; beginning at a flag-staff planted under-water at Back Bay, in the Presidency, and repeated across the sands and through the Girgaum woods across the Bombay flats to the village of Mahim beyond. These landmarks are surmounted by inverted water-vessels, white-washed, which appears an odd sort of signal to the uninitiated; and I heard that a list of the fort purvoes, or writers, had been taken with a view of ascertaining what the patronage of second-class carriages was likely to be, to the exclusion of office shigrams, dirzi carts, and crazy buggies, the present mode of conveyance to and from the suburbs.

The country through which the line will pass, after leaving the Mahim station, is beautiful in the extreme. Running along the Syhadree range of western hills, by the steep and richly wooded Malsej Ghaut, on to the rocky, wild, and picturesque pass of the Alleh Kind, a jaghire of Holkar's, in the fine Pergunna, or district of Jooneer. At this point the line is doubled, one running through the Alleh Pass, near Bhote Gungulhuree, to Candcish and Indore; the southern line, along the general affluents of the Beema river to Sholapore; but both remarkable for the richness, grandeur, and picturesque character of the country through which they are marked. Descriptions of scenery are always tedious, or I might enlarge for pages on rock-like mountains, towering in every fantastic form the imagination could picture into the rosy blue of an eastern sky; on dense forests, garlanded with brilliant flowers, and sparkling with rivers formed by a thousand foaming cataracts, roaring their downward course over the dark rocks in which they have worn fissures; on orchards of fragrant mango-trees bowing beneath their gold-like fruit, not guarded by dragons, like the apples of the Hesperides, but watched by merry, light-hearted Mahratta peasants, troling forth their pleasant morning songs, the women attired in the brightest and most cheering colours the sun can smile on: but it is enough to say that the amateur traveller, who, weary of the land of the Pharaohs and its antiquities, of the desert and its transit vans, (which last, by the way, he soon will be,) presses on to India, burning to see the wonders of this ancient land, her cave temples, sacred mounts, gigantic foliage, and picturesque people, can, in this same railway route, see enough of the characteristic beauties of the land to recompense him for all he may have endured ere his arrival in a country new in feature and interesting to the reflecting traveller beyond any that the sun shines on; and this, whether he regards its ancient history, present condition, or certain progress towards the highest state of civilization; the germ of which he may be assured has already burst.

The reader unacquainted with India may feel some interest about the class of peasantry who are likely to be employed, more or less, in the multifarious duties incidental to the introduction of railways into India; and there can be no question that the sooner natives are educated in the duties required, sufficiently to take charge of the subordinate offices, the better, as they are more temperate than Europeans, and more adapted to endure the trials of climate. At present, in the merchants' and lawyers' offices in Bombay, the little sharp bright-eyed Mahratta purvoo is found more useful to his employer than the European clerk. At present, too, some employment for boys of the middle class, who have been well educated at the college schools, is much wanted; for, while I sojourned at Jooneer, in the Deccan, and other places enjoying the benefit of branch academics, I was distressed beyond measure at the numbers of well-educated Mahratta lads, possessing mathematical knowledge, and speaking English well, who solicited introductions and certificates of ability, desiring to be employed, but in vain, by district civilians. To this class the employment afforded by a railway will be invaluable, and also to a class below these again, including the active Mahratta peasantry, who, quick enough to acquire any knowledge, and with the energy of mountaineers, will soon become fitted to act as the "stokers and pokers" of the new system. How oddly, however, to European eyes, will this proposed railway look, with its attendant servitors! the second-class full of turbans of every variety of colour, with a melange of camels, elephants, and buffaloes in the cattle vans!

By the side of the road, we shall have towering palm-trees, far overtopping the safety valve of the "Lion" locomotive: and at the stations, Alleh Kind Junction and others, the gardens will, no doubt, be laid out with bushes of the scarlet-berried castor plant, and moon flower, with the mogree, and changeable rose; while the refreshment tables, tended by clever Parsees, will be covered with dishes of ripe mangoes, plantains, custard apples, Guava jelly, and buffalo humps, with pale ale for the Feringees, and sherbets of all varieties, fresh drawn toddy and lime-juice for Orientals. How odd it will all look! dirty "Govind Rows" and Hajee Ahmeds parading the platforms with Guzerattee and Mahratta newspapers, the chabook and the samarchand; and between them will appear little green rolls of pān and betel nut; while the verandahs of the waiting-rooms will be the resort of all the Natch women, bird tamers, jugglers, and mendicant Fakirs in the land. The police in attendance, we suppose, will be similarly attired to their brethren in Bombay; that is, in blue baize dresses, yellow turbans, Roman-like sandals, and black belts; they will have a mark of caste, or circular spot of scarlet pigment between the eyes, and carry a truncheon. They would, no doubt, have enough to do if they were ever where they were required, which, of course, they will not be; and we may be sure that the conversation of the second-class will include the word "pice," or "rice," in every second phrase. Should smoking be forbidden, hubble-bubbles for the second class, and hookas for the first, will, of course, be provided at the stations; and a "ladies' carriage," well curtained and provided with carpets and cushions, will be set aside for the Zenanas of the rich Parsee, Hindoo, or Moslem gentlemen, whose families may desire a change. The Mahratta women of inferior condition can travel well enough without such arrangements, and will gaily chatter all the way, the braids of their glossy hair being twined with fresh balsam blossoms, while baskets of fresh fruits are piled up by their sides.

The Mahratta peasant, whose duty it may be to grease the wheels, or light the lamps, fed with cocoanut oil, previous to the train entering the Alleh Kind tunnel, will be as worthy of remark as any thing the European traveller will see in this line of country. As I have observed more than once, I was long a resident in the part of western India now marked for this railway line, and during that time so constantly observant of, and amused by the habits of the people, that I cannot avoid thinking that the reader of this trifling paper may feel some curiosity to know what manner of man the Mahratta peasant of our day really is; for his ancestors are old acquaintances of the English, and the name, perhaps, more generally known than that of any other class of the Hindoo natives of India, thanks to our Deekan wars.

In the rainy season, then, these Mahratta peasantry certainly are the oddest-looking folks imaginable, though it must be admitted the device by which they become so is ingenious enough, and worthy approval. As umbrellas would not suit well with active labour, they leave these to their superiors in wealth and station, but produce greater results of comfort to themselves by wearing, as a cloak, a sort of thatch, ingeniously made of the stout stems and leaves of the palm. These cloaks are called "ela," vary in form, and have the advantage of not requiring buttons, or being agitated by the wind. One description of them resembles a boat, supposing an individual to put his head into the bow, and, suddenly giving it a jerk that threw it over his back, to walk away with it; another resembles the Greek capote, with the stiff, square hood over the head; and the third is a bunch of long leaves tied together at the top, and falling in a sort of thick fringe over the body, similar to an attire that, in children's books, I have seen on that most interesting of all adventurers, Robinson Crusoe. The effect of the gear is, however, ludicrous in the extreme, a side view only allowing the feet and hands of the wearer to be perceived. The better class of peasantry, who can afford such a luxury, are protected by a cumli, which is nothing more nor less than a long black scarf of goat's hair, doubled, with the two sides sewn together; this, being put over the head, falls round the body like an Arab cloak, and descends half way to the ankle, the fringed ends gradually diminishing the sensation of heat, till the bare legs and unclad feet are accustomed to it, I suppose, miserable as they look. But, it may be remarked that a Mahratta never clothes these inferior members, but devotes all his attention to his head and shoulders, a peculiarity which, in some instances, produces the most indescribable and ludicrous effects.

They are a contented race, these Mahrattas, though so energetic and industrious. I asked little "Chimnee," one day, (a Mahratta girl that brought water for our kitchen, at Gora Bunder,) about her mode of life, and she told me that people of her condition (coolies) ate vegetables uncooked, with a little red rice boiled with salt and water; that when they assisted the fisherman of the village, he gave them the very small fish, which were useless for sale, and they broiled these on hot ashes; sometimes, for carrying the Banian's goods, they were given the dust and broken grain from the rice after it was winnowed, but these were rarities, coarse red rice being their usual food. The men were employed in the fields, and earned about two annas (three-halfpence) a day; these were employed to purchase clothing generally, and a Mahratta woman's costume, loonghi, boddee, (or chola,) and scarf cost about three rupees. Her ornaments, (for the poorest have these,) bangles, anklets, and gold head-flower, were heir-looms, and given by the husband's family on marriage.

Until this period the attempt has been always found a failure to introduce new mechanical means to the natives of India; for some two thousand years this ancient people have continued their primitive usages and implements despite all the attempts that have been made from time to time by practical Europeans resident among them to introduce mechanical forces of various kinds, supposed by us to be means far better suited to produce desired ends than the rude implements in daily use. These attempts have principally been made in the Deccan, in consequence of the activity, intelligence, and agricultural habits of the Mahratta peasantry, but without effect; and it will be for the mechanics of the railway to supersede old things and introduce new, to overthrow the prejudices of ages, to shake "caste" to its foundations, by introducing the demand for workmen cunning in matters hitherto unknown, and thus, by knowledge, prepare the way for general doubt in things existent in their fables, legends, and idolatries; so working until truth appears and leavens the whole mass. The fact is that, as far as they have gone, the natives were right in opposing innovation in matters of mechanics and agricultural implements, and their bigotry may be defended by the following facts:—

There is a convenient practice in Mahratta villages, and among farmers, of paying for work in kind, and by the year. Thus the carpenter who repairs the wood-work of the well, the shoemaker who resews the leather for the water-bags, the ironmonger who puts a fresh nut to the handle of the wheel, receives no pay for his labour; but, when the harvest is gathered in, receives so many measures of grain, and with these he is provided with food for his family. New work is paid for in money, but repairs always in kind; and in the way I mention, yearly or half yearly, according to the number of crops.

This is one of the facts which make it so difficult to introduce among the cultivators of India any new system requiring tools and agricultural or mechanical implements different to those now in use among them. The original cost of those they possess is very trifling, for the workmanship is rude, but they answer the purpose well, while the village artisans are capable of repairing them, and do so, as I have shown, without cost to the farmer. Models have been introduced into Bombay, of windmills intended to be applied to the Persian wheel, for the purpose of raising water without the use of bullocks. An uncovenanted public servant at Jooneer, above the Ghats, has attempted to induce an adoption of an English screw for extracting saccharine matter from the sugar-cane, and the native farmers are considered stupid and apathetic that they do not immediately adopt what we imagine improved means for agricultural and other purposes, instead of obstinately adhering to their own rude methods. But consider the case, for instance, of the windmill. In any other country the idea would be admirable, but here its use is open to two serious objections; one, the original cost, and the other, the difficulty of repair. Workmen must be introduced as well as mills, or, like a lady's piano in a jungle station, which she cannot tune herself, the first blast of hot wind, or the first shower, would render the instrument useless. In all countries it is wise to depend as much as possible on the resources of the land itself, avoiding all wants that must be supplied by foreign means. India is especially a cattle breeding country; as with Isaac in Gerar, so is it often with the herdsmen of India—they strive together for the use of wells,¹ and their flocks are their sole post sessions. The value therefore of animal labour is trifling; a pair of bullocks, strong to labour, cost, perhaps, twelve rupees, (a pound sterling,) and the wood-work, bags, and ropes for the native well, thirty shillings more; the whole serves for years, and if a murrain occurs among the cattle, they are easily replaced. The machine is oiled with the castor or mustard oil, expressed by means of two rough stones and an hour's camel labour, while the bullocks are fed on cotton seeds, produced in the fields they help to cultivate. So with the sugar-cane: the English screw looked well, and seemed efficient, under European supervision; but it was soon found that the Mahratta farmers, not caring to be outdone in the market, did, with their stones, and earthenware, and blindfolded old camels, speedily produce sugar of equal quality, and sold it at a much lower rate, in the neighbouring markets. We observe, in fact, that wherever similar character of climate exists, similar means of agriculture have been tried and are found to succeed: the simple hand-plough, used for turning up hard rocky ground in Cutch, I have observed in common use in the stony fields of Malta; the water-bag used by the Arabs on the banks of the Nile is precisely similar to that which may be seen guided by the hands of a Sindlian on the Indus; and, to follow the idea further, the contadina of Italy wears, to protect her head, under her heavy basket of ripe grapes, a folded cloth in form precisely like that which the Mahratta woman of the Concan places under her burthen of gold-like mangoes; while the more, I think, we reflect on these resemblances and the more we follow them out, not only in articles of common use and in costume, but in arts, religions, politics, and manners, the more certainly we shall yield to the conviction expressed by Mr. Disraeli, "that men in a parallel condition remain but uniform beings."

The railway is, however, a thing of wonder and of might. No "sham thing," as Mr. Carlyle might say, but a matter all truth, all fact, capable of the minutest demonstration, and arriving at ends beyond all that eastern imagination has dreamed of the acts of demi-gods. Beside the idea of mechanics, too, of levers, pistons, exhausted receivers, and the might of iron will, the railway will be freighted with ideas, new, bright, resistless, to the people whose tangled forests are set at nought by the power of the fire-king. Painters, poets, writers, statesmen, will travel in the East to see its wonders and imbibe its poetry. Knowledge will be disseminated, and that wisdom which leads to mutual tolerance will be acquired by both the learned and the ignorant.

In the early history of the world the Jewish people were the great teachers and civilizers of the nations; they had the strength which springs from union, common fellowship, and common interests of no ordinary kind, and this became the powerful agency which was providentially made available for the extension of their power among the idolatrous nations that surrounded them. The people of India have never possessed strength, for they have never possessed that union which constitutes strength; there has ever been the division of interests which rendered them an easy prey to the conqueror. In western India, besides the great classes of Hindoos, Mahomedans, and Parsees, we have the numerous castes of the former people, and the two great sects of the latter, to impede progress and weaken national power; so that in these latter days it remains for the Gentile world to create the oneness of interest required, and to become the schoolmaster of the East; to bring low the hills, to exalt the valleys, and to make the crooked paths straight. A very short period has elapsed since our chosen band of men of practical science left us for our eastern shores, anticipating success in all their efforts. They are prepared, it appears, to meet the two principal difficulties of a physical kind that present themselves,—the expansion of metal by heat, and the destruction of woodwork by means of insect architecture; while they are willing to depend, and that, too, most wisely, on native capacity for a provision of working men. Hitherto India has offered no encouragement to Indian labour, skill, or energy, neither has our government. Without trial, without inquiry, it is the common, but not the less unjust practice to speak of the natives of India as an incapable race; to laugh at their drawings, shudder at their music, and grow enraged at their stupidity. This impression is as unworthy those who encourage it as it is injurious to those who are its objects. The whole fault is the result of want of trial and consistent encouragement; and I am sure that, under fostering influences, the native of India, the Hindoo, will display perceptions as keen, faculties as capable, and acquirement as perfect, as any individual in civilized Europe to whom the same character of mental culture and mechanical practice had been applied. This, hitherto, has not been a popular idea, but a few years will prove it, I think, to be a true one. A great era has commenced for India; from the modern city of the Gentiles are emanating those rays of light calculated to illumine the ends of the world. And while the marbles of Thebes and Nineveh speak with the tongues of fulfilled prophecy in our island of the West, we send forth to a people who yet worship at Pagan fanes not less ancient, the great civilizer of modern times, and, by the power of the fire-king, India may once again rise from the dust, become learned, wise, and fertile, as in ancient days, and to her science and her wealth add that power of Christianity which, as the circles of time pass round, may make her, freed from prejudice and strong in union, great among the nations of the world.

"Yes! let the wilderness rejoice,
The voiceless champaign hear the voice
Of millions long estranged;
That waste, and want, and war may cease.
And all men know, that love and peace
Are—good for good exchanged!"

ON SHAKSPEARE'S INDIVIDUALITY IN HIS CHARACTERS.

BY MARY COWDEN CLARKE.

In the legend of "Troilus and Cressida," we have another of those world's love-stories, of which Shakspeare has given us his own surpassing-version. It has stirred men's hearts ever since that old Homeric time, when in its own truth and nature it befell. It moved the earnest heart of Chaucer to indite those five books of "Troilus and Cressida;" full of his own cordial fervour, and fresh candour of expression; uniting the simple—almost child-like—enthusiasm of youth, with the tenderness and pity of experienced age. It inspired Shakspeare's mighty heart with the thought to make it furnish his play with the gentle influences of human joy and sorrow, where all else was ambition, worldly glory, advantage, and strife.

The main interest of the story is the regret it inspires, at seeing so fine, so pure a nature, attach itself to one less excellent—one so incapable of returning faith for faith. The regret, that one so noble, so single-hearted, as Troilus, should be fated to cast away the treasure of his love upon a woman so fickle, so light-hearted, as Cressida; regret, that he, so strong in truth, should believe in one so false; regret, above all, for her, that she should be unworthy such a lover as Troilus. For Troilus is essentially of a noble nature; not merely noble by contrast with his unworthy mistress, but noble in his own qualities—his own spirit of goodness, honour, truth.

Chaucer, in his exquisite version of the story, has depicted him thus throughout; and amid many powerful touches, portraying his native excellence, there is one worthy of Nature herself—whose great disciples Chaucer and Shakspeare were. The fine touch, here especially alluded to, is the self-improvement of which Troilus is conscious, when blessed in love. He feels in himself "a new quality;" he becomes blithe, open of cheer, free in generosity, active in good deeds, alert in duty, fresh-nerved in courage, disposed to charity and pity towards those who are in distress, full of glad sympathy with those who are, like himself, fortunate in love, benign, courteous, affable to every one—and all this because of his own happiness—the secret joy he hoards at heart:—

This is a fine and subtle indication of Troilus's innate excellence. It is only base natures that are deteriorated and brutalized by passion; those that are originally virtuous, it ennobles, elevates, and purifies into still more exalted virtue.

The dramatist, as well as the poet, has made him an exemplar of faith. He is faithful in the strict sense of the word—he is full of faith; and he has faith in its utmost comprehensiveness. He has the faith of youth—for it is ardent, and sees no obstacles; the faith of sincerity—for he means all he says; the faith of honour—he will not break his word once pledged; the faith of generosity—he will never betray one who confides in him; the faith of simplicity—he cannot conceive the failure of others; the faith of love—for he has implicit belief in the beauty, the desert, the truth of his mistress, and will rather mistrust his own merits than her constancy. He will scarcely credit the evidence of his own senses, which inform him of her treachery; but will sooner think his own eyes and ears play him false than that she does.

Troilus is all compounded and compact of faith. The basis of his character is faith. Faith constitutes his individuality; faith is the centre of his circle of good qualities—the key-stone that combines and supports their arched firmness. His faith is the faith of virtue,—not of weakness. His is the unmistrustful credit which goodness gives to all which it has not proved to be evil,—and no credulity. He believes in honesty, because he cannot suspect the existence of that which finds no suggestive reflection in his own transparent nature. He expects truth, because his own heart is truthful. He learns to look for fidelity, because there is nothing in his own soul which teaches him to beware of perfidy. He confides, for he is sincere. He dreads no guile—for he is himself all probity.

Not alone in that which concerns his love, is Troilus's faith apparent; but in all his opinions, his words, his deeds, it forms the striking feature which characterizes him. In the scene where he, and Hector, and others of the royal Trojan brethren, are discussing with their father, Priam, the delivery of Helen to the Greeks, Troilus's arguments throughout are marked by justice, integrity,—good faith :—

"I take to-day a wife, and my election
Is led on in the conduct of my will;
My will enkindled by mine eyes and ears,
Two traded pilots 'twixt the dangerous shores
Of will and judgment: How may I avoid,
Although my will distaste what it elected,
The wife I chose? there can be no evasion
To blench from this, and to stand firm by honour:
We turn not back the silks upon the merchant,
When we have soiled them; nor the remainder viands
We do not throw in unrespective sieve,
Because we now are full."

And further on, he says :—

"We may not think the justness of each act
Such and no other than event doth form it."

In all the scenes with Cressida, the prevailing characteristic of his nature is strikingly shown. One of the first things he says to her, bespeaks the steadfast faith of his young hopeful heart :—

"Fears make devils cherubins; they never see truly
... O, let my lady apprehend no fear: in all Cupid's pageant there is presented no monster."

His mode of pledging himself to her, is in perfect

keeping with the simple honesty of his nature; for when Cressida, in her light way, speaks of the proverbial over-vowing of lovers, he replies :—

"Are there such? Such are not we: Praise us as we are tasted, allow us as we prove; our head shall go bare, till merit crown it: no perfection in reversion shall have a praise in present: we will not name desert, before his birth; and, being born, his addition shall be humble. Few words to fair faith: Troilus shall be such to Cressid, as what envy can say worst, shall be a mock for his truth; and what truth can speak truest, not truer than Troilus."

This is the candour of faith itself. His faith suffices to countervail his modesty. Troilus is essentially diffident of his own merits, but he knows himself to be unstained in truth, and he honestly avouches it. His speech completely bears out what Ulysses—that shrewd observer and judge of men—says of him :—

"firm of word;
Speaking in deeds, and deedless in his tongue."

There is a very natural touch in that same first scene with his mistress. When she avows her affection for him, owning that she has "loved him night and day, for many weary months," he says :—"Why was my Cressid, then, so hard to win?" His frank honest nature cannot comprehend the coquetry, the frivolous coyness of hers. When she suddenly proposes to withdraw, in the midst of their interview, how natural is his surprise; how admirably are both their dispositions indicated! In affected confusion, she says :—

"For this time will I take my leave, my lord.

Troil. Your leave, sweet Cressid! What offends you, lady?

Cres. Sir, mine own company.

Troil. Yourself." You cannot shun

How well, in these last few words of his, do we see the man incapable of playing tricks with his own understanding,—the man who never palters, or uses subterfuges, with his own conscience!

Such a man can understand nothing of the doubling, the shifting, the manœuvring, the artful holding off for better advance, the affected delays, the calculated yieldings, the evasions, the windings, the caprices, of such a character as hers. His honest heart knows no tricks of diplomacy in love—how should he suspect them in hers? His own love is liberal in its bounty of gift and expectancy—he cannot do hers the injustice to believe it less so.

We learn from his rapturous soliloquy immediately previous to his first interview, (it is in soliloquy, be it observed, when a man is holding converse with his own soul, within the sanctuary of his own heart, when thoughts that no witness renders maculate, that no utterance to other ears makes less sacred, pass through his brain,) of what passionate elements Troilus's love is composed. No transport of anticipation was ever perhaps more fervently penned than those few lines. It is the very poetry of sense. In a subsequent scene, there are a few words, which, though as calm and collected as the others are tumultuous, yet express with scarce less force the concentrated emotion of such a love as his. They occur where he is compelled to deliver up Cressida. He says to Paris:—

"I'll bring her to the Grecian presently;
And to his hand when I deliver her,
Think it an altar; and thy brother Troilus
A priest, there offering to it his own heart."

In the scene where he parts from her, the anxiety he expresses that she shall keep true, proceeds less from any want of faith in her, than from an instinct of affection. He involuntarily feels that his own nature is superior in truth to hers. He unconsciously shrinks from the fact, though unaware of its existence. He says:—

"I speak not, 'be thou true,' as fearing thee;
For I will throw my glove to death himself
'That there's no maculation in thy heart."

Still, he cannot help repeating, "But yet, be true." She, sensitive in her conscious weakness, is hurt at his injunction; but how nobly he vindicates himself from any want of faith in her. He generously speaks of the superior merits of the Grecian youths, and beseeches her to believe it "a kind of godly jealousy" that "makes him afraid" of them. The fact is, though he does not know it, he is answering, and striving to reassure, his own instinctive fears; while he thinks he is only reassuring and warning her. She petulantly exclaims, "O heavens, you love me not!" when he replies, with the modesty that distinguishes him, as well as his faith:—

"Die I a villain then!
*In this I do not call your faith in question,
So mainly as my merit: I cannot sing,
Nor heel the light lavolt, nor sweeten talk,
Nor play at subtle games; fair virtues all,
To which the Grecians are most prompt and pregnant:*
But I can tell, that in each grace of these
There lurks a still and dumb-discoursive devil,
That tempts most cunningly: but be not tempted.
Cres. Do you think, I will?

Troil. No.
But something may be done, that we will not:
And sometimes we are devils to ourselves,
When we tempt the frailty of our powers,
Presuming on their changeful potency."

This is the language of a man strong, but not presumptuous, in his faith. He has the courage of modesty, the bravery of truth, which can afford to allow that there may exist superior power; but it is precisely because he can confide in his strength, that he admits the possibility of failure or overthrow. The strong in faith may venture upon such admission; it is only the consciously weak, who weakly and rashly vaunt their invincibility. Throughout this very scene, the violent professions, the confident asseverations, the prodigality of protestation on the part of the unstable Cressida, are forcibly contrasted with the courageous diffidence of the faithful Troilus.

When she in turn, however, asks him, "My lord, will you be true?" his reply sums his character:—

"Who I? alas, it is my vice, my fault;
'While others fish with craft for great opinion,

I with great truth catch mere simplicity;
Whilst some with cunning gild their copper crowns,
With truth and plainness I do wear mine bare.
Fear not my truth; the mora' of my wit
Is—plain, and true,—there's all the reach of it."

The conduct of Troilus, in the scene where he receives proof of Cressida's infidelity, where he witnesses her falsehood to him, is in perfect harmony with his character. His grief finds vent in those heart-broken exclamations, "O withered truth!" and "O beauty! where's thy faith?" as if her lapse from plighted troth affected him even more deeply than his own loss; as if he prized her honour above his own happiness; it is her proved treachery that wrings those cries of lament from him. The extreme difficulty with which he brings himself to believe what he sees and hears, the reluctance with which he admits the possibility of what is actually passing before him, are well expressed by his words of amazement, as, one after another, the proofs of her changed affection become apparent. He utters scarcely more than these broken ejaculations of surprise, grief, and incredulity, during the whole scene, until Diomed and Cressida leave the spot, and then his speech still proves his unwillingness to believe her false:—

"Sith yet there is a credence in my heart,
An esperance so obstinately strong,
That doth invert the attest of eyes and ears;
As if those organs had deceptive functions,
Created only to calumniate.
Was Cressid here?"

His devoted heart desperately clings to the wreck of his love, unwilling to desert the vessel in which he had embarked his sum of trust. He cannot yet forsake her, though she has forsaken him. And how generously his faith maintains itself in spite of all! How noble is the chief source of his refusal to credit her guilt!—

"Let it not be believed, for womanhood!
Think, we had mothers; do not give advantage
To stubborn critics—apt, without a theme,
For depravation,—to square the general sex
By Cressid's rule: rather think this not Cressid."

In the very beautiful speech that follows,—too long, alas, to quote,—beginning, "This she's, no;" we see the soul of the man of truth and faith struggling between his wish to disbelieve what he has proved, and his incapability of denying what he knows to be fact; and very affectingly and very powerfully is the struggle depicted. Even at the last, we find his conviction of her falsehood is insufficient to destroy his affection, however it may lay waste his hopes. His love, too generously faithful to avenge itself in hating her, takes refuge in resentment against the man who has robbed him of her. He says to Ulysses:—

"Never did young man fancy
With so eternal and so fix'd a soul.
Hark, Greek; As much as I do Cressid love,
So much by weight hate I her Diomed."

Almost his final words express as much regret as reproach:—

"O Cressid ! O false Cressid ! false, false, false ;
Let all untruths stand by thy stained name,
And they'll seem glorious."

All that we see of him afterwards is hurried, reckless, distracted,—like a man who has lost all hope. We hear of him, on the battle-field, that he

"hath done to-day
*Mad and fantastic execution ;
Engaging and redeeming of himself,
With such a careless force, and forceless care,
As if that luck, in very spite of cunning, Bade him win all."*

And he himself exclaims :—

"Fate, hear me what I say !
I reckon not though I end my life to-day."

There is one little incident, occurring in the very midst of the turmoil of these concluding scenes, which confirms what we remarked of his own faith of heart making her lapse from faith the bitterest circumstance in his loss of Cressida. Pandarus delivers him a letter from her on the battle-field ; when Troilus, in the anguish of receiving hollow professions from one so false, tears the paper, scatters the fragments to the wind, exclaiming :—" Words, words, mere words, no matter from the heart !" His own faithful heart revolts from her falsehood, though it cannot tear itself from her image.

Troilus's is one of the most mournful fates that can befall mankind. His love is fixed where he must despise ; no safe anchorage for affection upon the barren shoals and quicksands of a light inconstant heart ; coquetry is instable, arid, and sterile, as sand itself.

In complete contrast to the loves of Troilus and Cressida, are those of Florizel and Perdita. Florizel's mistress is as pure and firm in her innocent constancy, as Troilus's is light and mutable. Good reason has Florizel to say :—

"I bless the time
When my good falcon made her flight across Thy father's ground."

Highly as he perpetually thinks and speaks of her, she still makes good his every praise. He is a fond lover, a proud lover ; but the merit of her he has chosen, makes all his fondness and pride bare justice. In his case, the hyperbole of a lover becomes simple truth. His warmest eulogy is plainest speech to set forth pretty Perdita. No words can show her fairer or better than she is,—not even the words of a partial lover, who beholds all through the rosy medium of happiness and affection.

Florizel is enthusiastically in love, but he has ample warrant for his enthusiasm. His admiration of her festival attire is expressed with all the ardour of a young happy lover, who finds everything charming that his mistress wears ; but we know that, in reality, Perdita's unusually gay dress does become her no less than the quieter russet which she ordinarily wears, though in her modesty she disclaims wishing to be thus "prank'd up." We are as certain as if we beheld her (so accurately has the poet pictured this fair creature) that her appearance fully bears out her lover's words :—

"These your unusual weeds to each part of you
Do give a life : no shepherdess ; but Flora, Peering in April's front. This your sheep-shearing
Is as a meeting of the petty gods,
And you the queen on't."

Even that exquisite and well-known speech of his, commending each thing she does, her speaking, her singing, her dancing, her perfect grace in all,—high in extolment as it is,—we know does not express one jot more than her desert ; for all she, in her sweet modesty, tells him his "praises are too large." We know that it is not the mere partiality of a lover—enthusiastic though it be—because the two sedate men, Polixenes and Camillo, whose age and station remove them from all suspicion of fanaticism in beauty, bear testimony to its being mere fact. The former declares :—

"This is the prettiest low-born lass, that ever Ran on the green-sward : nothing she does or seems,
But smacks of something greater than herself ;
Too noble for this place."

Florizel is enthusiastic in his admiration of her personal attractions ; he even interrupts himself, when plighting his troth to her, that he may extol her hand ; but he is no less enthusiastic in his esteem for her good qualities, than in his appreciation of her beauty. He knows her good sense, her superior mind, her purity of heart. When Polixenes bids him ransack the pedlar's stores for gifts to present her with he replies :—

"Old sir,
She prizes not such trifles as these are.
The gifts, she looks from me, are pack'd and lock'd
Up in my heart ; which I have given already,
But not deliver'd.—O, hear me breathe my life
Before this ancient sir, who, it should seem,
Hath sometime loved : I take thy hand, this hand,
As soft as dove's down, and as white as it ;
Or Ethiopian's tooth, or the fanned snow,
That's bolted by the northern blasts twice o'er."

He is so much in earnest in his enthusiasm, that he would fain have the whole universe bear witness to his dedication of himself to her.—

"the earth, the heavens, and all.
That, were I crown'd the most imperial monarch,
Thereof most worthy ; were I the fairest youth
That ever made eye swerve ; had force and knowledge,
More than was ever man's,—I would not prize them,
Without her love : for her, employ them all ;
Commend them, and condemn them, to her service,
Or to their own perdition."

When the time comes to test the sincerity of his enthusiasm, he proves it, in steadily abiding by his pledged word. Upon his father's pronouncing the decree of separation between himself and Perdita, he declares his resolution of sacrificing all else rather than his mistress ; affirming that :—

"Not for Bohemia, nor the pomp that may Be thereat glean'd ; for all the sun sees, or
The close earth wombs, or the profound seas hide
In unknown fathoms, will I break my oath
To this my fair beloved."

That she is fully worthy this enthusiastic devotion of her lover, we well know; for we know that she equals him in steadfastness and firm unblenching constancy.

We see this young lover, Prince Florizel, in his disguise of the rustic swain, Doricles, depicted by the words of the old shepherd, which bear beautiful evidence of the sincerity combined with enthusiasm that distinguish the character; and the conclusion of the speech forms a bewitching picture of his and his mistress's prince pastoral love:—

"They call him Doricles; and he boasts himself
To have a worthy feeding; but I have it Upon his own report, and I believe it;
He looks like sooth. He says, he loves my daughter;
I think so too: for never gazed the moon
Upon the water as he'll stand, and read,
As 'twere, my daughter's eyes: and, to be plain,
I think there is not half a kiss to choose,
Who loves another best."

We have thus surveyed two of Shakspeare's prince-lovers; the Trojan prince Troilus, and Prince Florizel. There is yet a third, Prince Ferdinand, in the TEMPEST; and he is as distinctly individualized as either of the others; and then how finely his peculiar character harmonizes with the ideality of the beautiful story in which he plays his part! Ferdinand, heir to the throne of Naples, is no common-place prince,—no ordinary royal-highness. He does not seem to belong to mundane princedom, to material and earthly sovereignty, to be one of those flesh-and-blood electorals or apparents to be found in "this working-day world;" but rather to be one of those kings' sons of the realm of Fiction and Faery, who possess privileges beyond mere sovereign succession—one of those who dwell in the region of high Romance,—to whom it is given to pass their lives in adventure and marvel, to woo and win beings surpassing all mortal maidens in goodness and grace, and to exist amid all the blissful realities of this fair green world of ours, while they partake in all the visionary beatitudes of the universe of Fancy and Imagination.

Ferdinand is of a highly imaginative temperament. He is, as it were, prepared by nature for the destiny which awaits him. He is scarcely surprised at the marvels which meet him at every step upon his setting foot in the Enchanted Island. He encounters them with an admiring, rather than an astonished air. He acquiesces in them at once, as a part of that Dream-land, where it is evident he has frequently dwelt in idea. We feel that his musings have often wandered to such possibilities, such scenes, as those now actually passing before him; and that his habit of thought renders them less startling, less unfamiliar, than they would be to any other than himself. We are possessed with the notion, that had this young prince, with his warmth of imagination, his ardour of fancy, been condemned to the cold routine of a court, —that had he never left Naples,—never taken that fateful journey, never chanced upon its wondrous incidents, he would have spent a wasted, aimless, disappointed life; unhappy, from a vague half-conscious lack of something that should fulfil the aspirations of such a nature as his. Neapolitan gaieties, court masks, insipid pleasures, conventional worldly women, would have formed no fitting social atmosphere for him; and, had he been condemned to such a fate, he would have become its victim. The true congenial element for him—in which his soul could freely breathe, and taste its plenitude of vigour, and existence, and joy,—was the aerial world of Romance; and this, it was his good hap to be thrown upon, in the course of that eventful voyage from Tunis back to Naples, after the marriage of his sister Claribel. How naturally from him, with his glowing fancy, his affinity for the spiritually beautiful, comes the exclamation,—

"Let me live here ever;
So rare a wonder'd father, and a wife,
Make this place Paradise."

The manner in which Ferdinand's imaginative temperament predisposes him to receive the strangeness of the adventures that befall him, has another artistic fitness; it not only renders them bewitchingly beautiful and alluring to himself, but it serves to reconcile us to their probability, and brings us to regard them with admiration, interest, and a sort of willing credence. For the time, we believe in the wonders we behold; and all the more, for seeing how they strike Ferdinand. He takes them for granted, welcoming them with a kind of awe, mixed with delight; and so do we, spell-bound, and entranced, as he is. His example unconsciously influences us, as we follow his footsteps, drawn on by Ariel's floating music. See how the prince's first words betoken his having yielded up his spirits at once to the witching ascendancy,—the potent spell, that all around exercises upon him:—

"Where should this music be? 't the air, or the earth?
It sounds no more:—and sure it waits upon
Some god of the island. Sitting on a bank
Weeping again the king my father's wreck,
This music crept by me upon the waters;
Allaying both their fury, and my passion,
With its sweet air: thence I have follow'd it,
Or it hath drawn me rather:—But 'tis gone.
No, it begins again."

Then comes the exquisite song, "Full fathom five;" and at its close, Ferdinand's words again show how he accedes to the supernatural of what he witnesses.—

"The ditty does remember my drown'd father.—
This is no mortal business, nor no sound
That the earth owes."

We are prepared for this feature of strong imaginativeness in his character, even before we see him; for when Ariel describes the conduct of those on board the ship, during the terrors of the spirit-raised storm, and of the ghostly-flaming vessel, he mentions that,

"The king's son, Ferdinand,
With hair up-staring (then like reeds, not hair,)
Was the first man that leap'd; cried, Hell is empty,
And all the devils are here."

And then, too, when he first sees Miranda, he accosts her immediately as a superhuman being:—

"Most sure, the goddess, on whom these airs attend!"
His sudden and lavish love at first sight,—his unreserved consecration of his heart to her at once,— his abrupt offer,—

"O, if a virgin,
And your affection not gone forth, I'll make you Queen of Naples!"

are all of a piece with his ardour of fancy. The way in which this new-behold creature becomes suddenly all in all to him:—

"My father's loss, the weakness which I feel,
The wreck of all my friends, or this man's threats,
To whom I am subdued, are but light to me,
Might I but through my prison once a-day
Behold this maid: all corners else o' the earth
Let liberty make use of; space enough
Have I in such prison;"

her all-sufficiency to his joy:—

"'tis fresh morning with me,
When you are by at night;"

the entire subjugation of his spirit to her influence:—

"Hear my soul speak;—
The very instant that I saw you, did
My heart fly to your service; there resides,
To make me slave to it;—"

each affords accumulated proof of his fervour of imagination.

The very purity of his passion,—of which we have evidence in his noble speech to Miranda's father,—is another indication of the imaginativeness of his nature; refinement and delicacy, as well as fervour, of love, being a distinguishing quality in persons of his temperament.

Ferdinand's filial affection and reverence, also,— of which the poet has given us pointed instances,— not only harmonize well with the young prince's own character, but are in beautiful keeping with the story itself—that wondrous tale of a father and child cast away and dwelling upon an enchanted island—as real as it is fictitious—as substantial as it is ideal—as true and precious in our love and imagination as it is spiritual and poetical.

We have now seen three more of Shakspeare's lovers—Troilus, the faithful; Florizel, the enthusiastic; Ferdinand, the imaginative; all three, princes;
but all three, individually characterized.

THE DESERTED.

WHAT a crowd of melancholy thoughts are awakened by the contemplation of that life-like presentment of feminine grief to which the painter has given the short though expressive title of The Deserted! It is but a word; it expresses but a single fact; yet in that one word how much of sin and suffering is included! How trite and common-place do we deem the oft-told tale of woman's trusting and confiding heart, of man's slighted vows and broken oaths! To the shame of our nature, the event is one of every-day occurrence, and it has long since become so familiar to our ears, that we have well-nigh forgotten its enormity, and are but too apt to treat the blackest species of ingratitude as an offenceso venial as scarcely to tarnish the brightness of the perpetrator's honour. We shall, however, be asked, who is the deserted of our engraving. In reply we must say, that it is not as the portrait of an individual, but as the emblem of a class, that we wish to look upon its beauties. Yet, as our sympathies are always more active when claimed for the woes of a single sufferer than when they are directed to a multitude of the wronged, we shall venture to insert Tennyson's beautiful lines on Mariana, as fitting companions to the artist's conception, and hope that the verse of the Laureate-expectant will be found worthy of the plate and the author.

MARIANA.

WITH blackest moss the flower-pots
Were thickly crusted, one and all,
The rusted nails fell from the knots
That held the peach to the garden-wall.
The broken sheds look'd sad and strange,
Unlifted was the clinking latch,
Weeded and worn the ancient thatch
Upon the lonely moated grange.
She only said, "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary;
I would that I were dead!"

Her tears fell with the dews at even,
Her tears fell ere the dews were dried,
She could not look on the sweet heaven,
Either at morn or eventide.
After the flitting of the bats,
When thickest dark did trace the sky,
She drew her casement-curtain by,
And glanced athwart the glooming flats.
She only said, "The night is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

Upon the middle of the night,
Waking she heard the night-fowl crow:
The cock sung out an hour ere light.
From the dark fen the oxen's low
Came to her: without hope of change,
In sleep she seem'd to walk forlorn,
Till cold winds woke the grey-eyed morn
About the lonely moated grange.
She only said, "The day is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

About a stone-cast from the wall,
A sluice with blacken'd waters slept,
And o'er it many, round and small,
The cluster'd marish-mosses crept.
Hard by a poplar shook alway,
All silver-green with gnarled bark,
For leagues no other tree did dark
The level waste, the rounding grey.
She only said, "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

And ever when the moon was low,
 And the shrill winds were up an' away,
 In the white curtain, to and fro,
 She saw the gusty shadow away.
 But when the moon was very low,
 And wild winds bound within their cell,
 The shadow of the poplar fell
 Upon her bed, across her brow.
 She only said, "The night is dreary,
 He cometh not," she said;
 She said, "I am awcary, awcary,
 I would that I were dead!"

All day within the dreamy house,
 The doors upon their hinges creak'd;
 The blue fly sung i' the pane; the mouse
 Behind the mouldering wainscot shriek'd,
 Or from the crevice peep'd about.
 Old faces glimmer'd through the doors,
 Old footsteps trod the upper floors,
 Old voices call'd her from without.
 She only said, "My life is dreary,
 He cometh not," she said;
 She said, "I am awcary, awcary,
 I would that I were dead;"

The sparrow's chirrup on the roof,
 The slow clock ticking, and the sound
 Which to the wooing wind aloof
 The poplar made, did all confound
 Her sense; but most she loathed the hour
 When the thick-moted sunbeam lay
 Athwart the chambers, and the day
 Down-sloped was westering in his bower.
 Then, said she, "I am very dreary,
 He will not come," she said;
 She wept, "I am awcary, awcary,
 Oh God, that I were dead!"

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

"So faint, so languishes, grows dim and dies,
 All that this world is proud of."

ANOTHER shining light has disappeared from our literary hemisphere. Scarcely were the last sad offices performed over the venerable William Lisle Bowles, when it was announced that WILLIAM WORDSWORTH had also followed him to the tomb. Both have quitted this earthly sphere in the maturity of years and fame; both have left behind them a reputation that will be as enduring as the language in which they wrote, and the literature which they elevated and adorned. For more than half a century their names have been familiar as household words; joint labourers in a field which they cultivated with exemplary taste, it rewarded them with a noble harvest, and enriched the country with new treasures of intellectual growth—treasures matured by the united strength of genius, fortitude, and patience; and on which the progress of the human mind and the voice of sound criticism have pronounced the verdict of excellence. They had each the happiness to see that most of the thoughts and sentiments to which they had given impassioned utterance in youth—but for which the readers of poetry were not then prepared—had been silently taking root in the national mind, and returned to them, in the evening of life, with accumulated honours.

The Rev. WILLIAM LISLE BOWLES lived to the patriarchal age of eighty-eight; and during his long career enjoyed the esteem and friendship of all to whom he was intimately known, either in personal intercourse or by his writings. It is now sixty-one years since his "Sonnets" were first given to the world—nor then prematurely, for he was in his twenty-seventh year before he ventured on the perils of authorship. At Trinity College, Oxford, of which he was entered in 1782, he gained the Chancellor's prize for a Latin poem; and while residing there he was honoured by many distinguished contemporaries, whom his talents and conversation had made the delighted companions of his promising career. His "Sonnets" appear to have acted with an inspiring impulse upon the youthful mind of Coleridge, who has recorded in one of his own sonnets, that his "obligations to Mr. Bowles were indeed important, and for radical good;" for he adopted him as a classic model when the fountain of his own imagination was opened, and he began to shape his thoughts into poetry:

"My heart has thank'd thee, Bowles, for those soft strains,
 Whose sadness soothes me like the murmuring
 Of wild bees in the sunny showers of spring."

The Sonnets have been frequently reprinted; and by means of them his poetical fame has a lasting place in the history of English literature. Mr. Bowles' edition of Pope—owing to some severe strictures passed on the personal character of that poet—drew upon him much needless indignation and obloquy from several of the master spirits of the day. Byron expressed his disapprobation in pungent satire; while Campbell—although he openly condemned the censure on Pope, as rash, and unsupported by sufficient evidence—always expressed himself in terms of just respect for the talents and character of Mr. Bowles; and, by postponing his threatened "refutation" till a more convenient season, he avoided the controversy, which was never resumed. Lord Byron, on the contrary, returned again and again to the charge; and, in the ridicule with which he attacked the Sonnet—"the Spirit of Discovery,"—he handled his weapon with dexterity.¹ But Mr. Bowles, under these provocations, neither lost his temper as a man, nor his mild forbearance as a Christian; and when the noble poet sank into an untimely grave, the author of the Sonnets was among the very first to offer a tribute to his memory and his genius. Be this generous act recorded to his honour wherever his name is mentioned in conjunction with Byron:—

"But I will bid th' Arcadian cypress wave
 Pluck the green laurel from the Perseus' side,
 And pray thy spirit may such quiet have,
 That not one thought unkind be murmur'd o'er thy grave."

This was in the right spirit,—a noble revenge; and were it permitted to those authors who have passed away from amongst us to revise their works, we may indulge the belief, that they would gladly expunge many of those harsh and bitter expressions, by which they had wounded the peace or ridiculed the failings of men to whom they were closely allied by the ties of mutual taste, genius, and philanthropy. To have injured, by deliberate insult, the character and feelings of one unoffending man, is a blot upon genius, however it may plume itself on its own superiority, or excuse itself on the strength of popular encouragement. Wit is a dangerous weapon; and whenever it is made subservient to illiberal or licentious purposes, it seldom leaves its master unpunished. Byron, it is said, (whose parodies were so ingeniously turned as always to provoke a smile, or so pointed as to inflict a wound,) expressed his regret that he had, more than once, unconsciously transgressed the limits of sober truth, while employing his wit as the vehicle of some personal antipathy.¹ But where the object against whom it is aimed is too callous, or too high-minded to fear its point, the shaft returns blunted to him who threw it, and the triumph is defeated. * * *

Besides the works above named, Mr. Bowles wrote a memoir of the pious and learned Bishop Ken, and contributed, we have reason to believe, to several of the leading reviews and periodicals of his day. In his sacred office of an able and conscientious pastor, he published a volume of Sermons, well adapted to the rural congregation among whom he ministered for half a century, and strongly enforced that practical Christianity of which he was himself an amiable and genuine example. At his quiet Rectory of Bremhill, he enjoyed that happiness which the faithful discharge of his duties could alone bestow. If he had once literary enemies, he either outlived their enmity, or converted it into friendship; while his numerous admirers, during a long life, neither forsook nor betrayed him. In his own family, he had the pride and happiness to witness his own principles and talents perpetuated and refined, and to leave behind him many to whom the example of his life had been a blessing;—while as the final hour approached, he enjoyed that foretaste of a blessed hereafter, which nothing but the voice from within, the consciousness of a well-spent life, can bestow.

Thus, one by one, the lights of this world are extinguished: and while the tomb closed over Bowles, Wordsworth was lying on his death-bed.

Rydal Mount, so long a place of pilgrimage—the local habitation of him whose life and song had thrown a sanctity around the spot, is now desolate. The spell which attracted so many travellers to its classic shades, and made strangers and sojourners look upon them as the residence of a “more present divinity,” is now broken. Their glory is departed; the habitation that knew him so long, shall henceforth know him no more for ever: but, in the mind and heart of the people, the name and fame of the great poet are as firmly grounded as the lakes and mountains which, for half a century, at least, have heard the promptings of his genius, and from their deepest solitudes re-echoed to the strains of his lyre. The place where he dwelt—the walks he frequented—the scenes he admired—the rocks and rivers on whose banks he sought and found inspiring influences—the chamber in which he wrote—the chair in which he sat—and the couch on which he rested from his labours—will long present objects of attraction to the votaries of true genius. The rural church to which his remains are to be consigned, will henceforth be regarded as a shrine which the poet's dust has rendered precious, and to which the frequent pilgrim of the Lakes will direct his steps.

The last time we met Mr. Wordsworth was at Hampstead, where he had come to spend a few days with some of his long-cherished and admiring friends. But at that time, his mind was ill at ease; for his daughter—the highly-gifted daughter whose subsequent death occasioned a shock from which he never fully recovered—was then a confirmed invalid; and the daily reports which followed him served only to strengthen his apprehensions, and to baffle the hopes of her recovery. But even with this painful prospect before him, his conversation, though desultory, was deeply interesting; he touched upon most of the men and the topics that had been famous or popular during his own literary career; and dwelt, with quiet satisfaction, on the part he had taken, and the success which at last had attended him, in the society of several illustrious contemporaries, whose cunity had now settled down into steady friendship and admiration. It was a gratifying thing to see men who, in early life, had quoted his poetry only to turn it into ridicule, making voluntary confession of their mistake, soliciting his friendship, and taking as much pleasure to publish the beauties of his poems, as they had once bestowed pains to detect their blemishes. Some of his reviewers, who had often degraded the duties of impartial criticism, by blending eloquence with scurrility, had the candour at last to acknowledge their critical errors, and to sign their recantation.

Mr. Wordsworth, however, was soon recalled from Hampstead by intelligence more and more discouraging; and he returned to Westmoreland, where the heaviest affliction that had ever visited his domestic hearth then awaited him. This was his last visit to the South; for, after the domestic calamity to which we have alluded, his own health became irretrievably impaired. His mental energy, which had so nobly supported him under former trials and disappointments, now lost its healthy tone; and when this shock fell upon him, the physical powers were shaken almost to dissolution, and his life, for a time, was placed in actual jeopardy. But again he rallied—again his mind recovered somewhat of its natural tone; the Muse came to his aid, and he composed a sonnet,—his last, we believe,—addressed to a pious lady, whose extensive charities to the destitute had made her an object of public misrepresentation. His improved health, however, was not permanent. To those who had familiar access to the poet, it was but too obvious that all those moral and physical powers, of which he had long been an example, were fast verging to decay. In this condition he was attacked by an inflammatory disease, which he had barely strength of constitution to resist—not to throw off; and when this malady, under judicious treatment, had been in some measure subdued, it left him in that stage of debility and prostration, to which the kindness of friends or the skill of physicians could minister no permanent relief.

At length, on the twenty-third of April, (the anniversary on which the eyes of Shakspeare first opened to the light,) the spirit of William Wordsworth, by an easy and placid transition, passed away from the midst of us, to take its place among those disembodied minds, with whom, in hours of solitude and inspiration, he had long held close and fervent communion.

And now it may be asked,—“On whom has the poet’s mantle descended?” On whom! This is a question which few will attempt to answer. Of the present day and generation there is, probably, no votary of the Muses who could exercise the functions of that sacred office with more inviolable regard to the lofty trust reposed in him,—with more manifest advantage to the best interests of humanity,—with more salutary influence upon the minds and hearts of his readers—than the late Mr. Wordsworth. Between his life and his writings there subsisted the closest harmony, the strictest consistency. The graces which adorned his poetry were reduced to practical illustration in his private walk and conversation. To him the lines of a late classic and highly-gifted contemporary may be happily applied—“Know thine own worth, and reverence the lyre;” and again:—

“Oh! deem not, ’midst this worldly strife,
An idle art the poet brings;
Let high philosophy control,
And sages calm, the stream of life,—
’Tis he refines its fountain-springs,
The nobler passions of the soul!”

* * * *

But to return to the subject of these brief remarks: Mr. Wordsworth was born at Cockermouth, April 7th, 1770, educated at Hawkeshead Grammar School, and finished his academical studies at St. John’s, Cambridge. At the age of twenty-three, he made his first appearance as a poet, by publishing “An Evening Walk, an Epistle in Verse;” and again, in the course of the same year, “Descriptive Sketches in Verse,” the materials for which he had collected during a summer excursion amongst the Swiss and Italian Alps. By his youthful companions at College these poems were received with acclamation; and Coleridge—who was then at Cambridge, and Wordsworth’s junior by only two years—has recorded that the impression left upon his mind by the “Descriptive Sketches” was so fixed, that “seldom, if ever, was the emergence of an original poet’s genius above the literary horizon more evidently announced.”¹

Four years later, (in the summer of 1798,) appeared the first volume of his “Lyrical Ballads,” the copyright of which he sold to Mr. Cottle, of Bristol, for thirty guineas. This literary venture completely failed; and the loss sustained by the publisher amounted to nearly the whole expenses. But although, for a time, thrown aside as mere waste paper, the “Ballads” were not forgotten by the few good judges who, in opposition to the multitude, had borne testimony to their poetical merit; and, in the course of years, they recovered from the neglect with which they had been treated, and were received by the public with nearly the same degree of favour which had been extended to his more recent and elaborate works. Such are the strange popular caprices by which the fortunes of a poet may be lost and won!

In the year 1803, Mr. Wordsworth married Miss Hutchinson,—the lady who now, after forty-seven years of unalloyed happiness, is left to bewail his loss; but domestic cares, which are so apt to increase with the joys of the married state, rarely interrupted Mr. Wordsworth’s intercourse with the Muses. His express mission to mankind was poetry; and, early and deeply impressed with this conviction, he applied with diligence and success to the discharge of those duties which it enjoined. In the course of three years, he made another publishing venture of “Poems,” in two volumes. The society of Mr. Southey,—who had also taken up his residence in the neighbourhood, and identified himself with the “lake school,” so called,—and the visits of Coleridge, with those of other congenial and highly-cultivated minds, had the effect of stimulating Mr. Wordsworth’s genius to higher efforts; and every month, every year added something new to his reputation—to the materials of that monumentum ære perennius, which was to transmit his name to a grateful posterity.

It is well known, however, that his poetical course, during these early years, was neither smooth nor successful. The language and sentiments in which his inspirations were embodied, drew upon him three sets of enemies and scoffers:—the shallow, who turned into ridicule what they could not interpret or comprehend; the grave and superficial, who smiled at his childlike simplicity; and the self-sufficient Zoilus, who sneered at his poems, as the “very effusions or ravings of a bewildered intellect.” There were a few, nevertheless, who perused his works with avidity; men who confidently predicted, that the day would certainly arrive, when the derision with which the poet was then assailed would be converted into applause. Their prediction was literally verified—though not until the author had reached that stage of his life’s journey upon which few of his contemporaries, friends or rivals, were permitted to enter. But, by the time he had lost his “Hyperion locks,” he had earned a rich crown of bays to supply the deficiency. The snows of eld were concealed under a wreath of well-merited laurel. * * *

His "Poems," in two volumes, were followed by "The Excursion," his principal work; in which all the beauties of his style and school, with some of their blemishes, are eminently conspicuous. But, as criticism is not the object with which these desultory remarks are thrown together, we shall not in this place attempt any analysis of a poem, the merits of which are now universally acknowledged. From "The Edinburgh," however, its reception was much more scurrilous than courteous: even Jeffrey—the most accomplished and versatile critic of his day—could discover in its pages neither "beauty nor comeliness;" and, yielding to the prejudices of his office and perhaps politics, made an effort to strangle the poem at the very moment it was ushered into the world. "Have you seen 'The Excursion?'" he inquired.—"I have crushed it," he said, triumphantly. "He crushed it!" said Southey, when the boast was repeated to him.—"He crush 'The Excursion?'" As well may the critic attempt to crush Helvellyn." And so it proved; for "The Excursion" was not crushed;—it grew rapidly in favour with the public; and the highest praise that can be given to it is, that, in the evening of life, Lord Jeffrey himself revoked his censure, and joined in the applause. A fact so honourable, both to the poet and his critic, cannot be too often repeated;—the frank acknowledgment of his error was the highest tribute that could be offered to the poem.

Among the exquisite passages with which "The Excursion" abounds is the following:—

"I have seen
A curious child applying to his ear
The convolutions of a smooth-lipp'd shell,
To which, in silence hush'd, his very soul
Listen'd intensely, and his countenance soon
Brighten'd with joy; for, murmuring from within,
Were heard sonorous cadences; whereby,
To his belief, the monitor express'd
Mysterious union with its native sea.
Even such a shell the Universe itself
Is to the ear of Faith, and doth impart
Authentic tidings of invisible things,—
Of ebb and flow, and ever-during power,—
And central peace, subsisting at the heart
Of endless agitation."

By this, and many similar passages, Wordsworth has vindicated his right to be considered a great philosophical poet,—the greatest, perhaps, of his age. But, at the very moment when "The Excursion" appeared to have brought the public mind to a just and flattering appreciation of his genius, some of his best friends were staggered and alarmed by the publication of his "Peter Bell," which, for a time at least, neutralized all the praise bestowed on its predecessor, and, to the surly opponents of the "Lake School," furnished new matter for parody, satire, and personal invective. It was taken up by Lord Byron, in the following strain:—

"'Pedlars,' and 'boats,' and 'wagons!' Oh! ye shades
Of Pope and Dryden, are we come to this?
That trash of such sort not alone evades
Contempt, but, from the bathos' vast abyss,

Floats, scumlike, uppermost; and these Jack Cades
Of sense and song above your graves may hiss;—
The little 'Boatman' and his 'Peter Bell'
Can sneer at him who drew Achitophel!"

But Mr. Wordsworth was not a poet so morbidly sensitive as to quail under such attacks. A thorough confidence in his own powers—a thorough persuasion that he was in the right path, was to him like an impenetrable shield, from which the shafts of ridicule rebounded in perfect harmlessness; and whilst the laugh against him was loudest, he could regard the cause with undiminished complacency, and draw consolation from his own breast—from the verdict of futurity. In this state of enviable composure he wrote:—

"A book of late came forth, called 'Peter Bell'
Not negligent the style; the matter—good
As aught that Song records of 'Robin Hood,'
Or 'Roy,'¹ renowned through many a Scottish dell;
But some (who brook these hackney'd themes full well, Nor heat at 'Tam o' Shanter's' name their blood,) Wax'd wroth, and with foul claws—a harpy brood—
On bard and hero clamorously fell!
Heed not—wild Rover once through heath and glen,
Who mad'st, at length, the better life thy choice—
Heed not such onset! Nay, if praise of men
To thee appear not an unmeaning voice,
Lift up that gray-hair'd forehead, and rejoice
In the just tribute of thy poet's pen."

The following year (1815) produced the "Waggoner," published under the auspices of his old friend, Charles Lamb, and followed, at only a short interval, by the "White Doe of Rylstone." Of these two poems, the latter, founded on an interesting tradition connected with the scenery of Bolton Abbey, in Yorkshire, met with a favourable reception from the public, and retrieved some portion, at least, of that poetical standing which its two precursors appeared to have forfeited, or, at least, endangered.

In his next publication, entitled the "River Duddon," described in a series of odes, Mr. Wordsworth put forth all his strength. It was the last great effort of his poetical life, and fully succeeded in placing his reputation upon a basis which no criticism, however virulent, could overturn. The reviewers of this volume were liberal in their commendation; the readers and judges of poetry were charmed with its melody and philosophy, and the new "Sonnets" were pronounced to be of Miltonic excellence. A collected edition of his poems was then demanded; another quickly followed; and at last the patience and resolution with which, during thirty long years, he had prosecuted his arduous but ennobling task, were crowned with success.² It was to this result he had always looked forward with confidence; for, to be permanent, high reputation, he thought, must be of slow growth: and while slowly, but surely, working his way upwards, under many discouragements, he had been often heard to observe, that very few great poets had ever risen into sudden eminence; that, for the proper development of the poetical faculty,—like that of sculpture,—continued labour, study, and perseverance were indispensable; and, in his own case, he had more than completed his tenth lustrum, before he could flatter himself with having made any lasting impression on the national mind. Let every young aspirant, who blames the public taste, and complains that merit is overlooked and forgotten, redouble his exertions; and, profiting by the example of Wordsworth, owe to his own talent and perseverance what he would be ashamed to claim as a mark of courtesy. Let him not solicit where he may command. But in Mr. Wordsworth's case, the steepness of the ascent was already overcome; the glorious landscape that expanded before him was sweetened by the reflection, that to the vigour of his own indomitable genius he owed the poetical wreath,—the only distinction to which he had ever aspired; and, with the tranquil feelings of a mind that has achieved some great and difficult undertaking, he sat down to enjoy the calm pleasures of domestic life, cheered and sweetened by the certainty of increasing fame,—the consciousness of having secured a permanent station among the greatest poets that England has produced.

The Sonnets to the River Duddon were followed, in 1835, by "Yarrow Revisited, and other Poems," which, although they did little, perhaps, to extend his reputation, yet did not fall short of it; and in the circles of his many attached and admiring friends they were welcomed with new delight.

From this period, there is little in Mr. Wordsworth's career, as a great poetical light, that can interest the public. On the death of Mr. Southey, he accepted the vacant Laureateship; and on the Queen's visit to Cambridge, he composed an ode to commemorate the event. But, although there are several fine passages in this piece, there is little to redeem it from that oblivion to which, from time to time, so many of its laurelled predecessors have been quietly consigned. When the Muse begins to flatter, her wings too often begin to flag; and her convulsive efforts to soar aloft only encumber her flight, and hasten her descent.

It was the poet's good fortune to conciliate the favour of Ministers. In addition to his patrimony,—which raised him above the necessity of literary hire,—he received from Sir Robert Peel a pension of 300*l.* per annum; and, with 300*l.* more derived from his office of Distributor of Stamps—now held by one of his sons—Mr. Wordsworth was relieved from all those bitter feelings of dependence which often chill and cramp the efforts of genius. His income enabling him to indulge the pleasures of hospitality, he was seldom without his parlour guests; and, during the summer, when the lake scenery was in its richest livery, Rydal Mount was the classic spot to which the intellectual pilgrims of all countries directed their steps. They who had the good fortune to cross its hospitable threshold, or to attend the poet in his walks, were sure to return home with sentiments of confirmed admiration for the poet, and of veneration for the man. It was there that the close and beautiful connexion between the author and his works was most apparent—the one a mere transcript of the other; what he inserted in his poems was practically illustrated in his daily life and conversation; and the lessons of virtue which it was his grand aim to inculcate, were reduced to practice at his own hearth. His life was blameless, his end peaceful.

"He lived unenvied, not unblessed;
Reason his guide, and happiness his guest.
In the clear mirror of his moral page
We trace the manners of a purer age.
His soul, with thirst of genuine glory fraught,
Scorn'd the false lustre of licentious thought.—
One fair asylum from the world he knew.
One chosen seat, that charms with various view.
And there I trace, when the gray evening lowers
A silent chronicle of happier hours."¹

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRBANK."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

IS IN TWO FYTTES, VIZ.: FYTTE THE FIRST, A SULKY FIT—FYTTE THE SECOND, A FIT OF HYSTERICS.

FRERE reached the drawing-room in a state of mind which the occurrences related in the last chapter had not tended to render more amiable. The front room was evidently the more popular of the two, a numerous group being gathered round Mrs. Brahmin, who in the sweetest of mild sopranos was daintily cooing forth a plaintive love-ditty, which was evidently telling well with John Dace, D.D. Avoiding the crowd, Frere made his way into the back drawing-room, which, barring an ardent flirtation in a corner between two poor young things who could not, by the most remote possibility, marry for the next fifteen years, was unoccupied. Here seating himself astride across a chair as if it had been a horse, and leaning his arms on the back, he fell into a deep fit of musing. From this he was roused by the approach of a light footstep, and looking up, perceived Rose Arundel.

"Why, Mr. Frere," she exclaimed playfully, "I do believe you were asleep; will you not come into the other room? Mrs. Brahmin is singing like a nightingale, and charming everybody."

"Nightingales are humbugs, and I hate singing women in general, and abominate Mrs. Brahmin in particular, so I'm better where I am," was the grumpy reply.

Rose had often before received speeches from Frere quite as rude as the present one, but in this instance there was a peculiarity in his method of delivering it which at once struck her attention. Usually his bearish sayings were accompanied by a half-smile, or merry twinkle of the eye, which proved that he was more than half in jest, but now there was a bitter earnestness in his tone which she had never before remarked, and Rose felt at once that something had occurred to annoy him; so she quietly drew a chair to the table near which he was seated, and carelessly turning over the pages of a book of prints which lay before her, observed,

"If you are not to be tempted within the syren's influence, and positively refuse to be charmed with sweet sounds, I suppose I am bound by all the rules of politeness to remain here, and try to talk you into a more harmonious frame of mind."

"Pray do nothing of the kind," returned Frere, "unless you've some better reason than a mere compliance with what you please to term 'the rules of politeness,' for they're things I trouble my head about mighty little. Besides," he added, sarcastically, "your new friend, Mr. James Rasper, must have found his way up-stairs by this time, I should imagine, and I should be sorry to deprive you of the pleasure of his intellectual conversation, more particularly as you seem to appreciate it so thoroughly."

"How viciously you said that!" returned Rose, smiling; "but tell me, are you really angry? have I done anything to annoy you? I'm sure it's most unwittingly on my part, if I have;" and as she spoke she looked so good, and so willing to be penitent for any possible offence, that a man must have had the heart of an ogre to have resisted her. Such a heart, however, Frere appeared to possess, for he answered shortly,—

"No, I've no fault to find with you. I dare say it's quite according to the 'rules of politeness,' to cast off old friends, and take up with new ones at a minute's notice, though they may contrive to talk about horses till they prove themselves little better than asses to the mind of an unprejudiced auditor. There is your friend, conversing eagerly with Bracy, asking no doubt what has become of you."

"You are very unjust, Mr. Frere," returned Rose, looking hard at her book, and speaking eagerly and quickly; "Mr. Rasper is no friend of mine; I scarcely knew his name till you mentioned it. He sat next me at dinner, and talked to me about horses and galloping over ploughed fields after foxes, till I became so stupid that I had scarcely two ideas left in my head, but of course I was bound to attend to him civilly; so much for my new friend, as you call him; what you mean by my casting off old ones I don't at all know; I have done nothing of the kind, that I am aware of."

"No, you have not," returned Frere, recalled to his better self by Rose's harangue; "it is I who am, as you say, unjust and absurd, but the fact is, that I wanted to talk to you myself. All these good people are bores, more or less, none of 'em able to converse rationally for five minutes together. I meant to have handed you down to dinner, but that silky scheming widow got hold of me instead, and irritated me with her bland platitudes; and then I heard that idiot prating to you about horses' legs, and you appeared so well satisfied with him, when I knew that you were one of the few women who could understand and appreciate better things, that altogether I grew savage, and could gladly have punched my own head or any one else's."

"It is quite as well Mr. Rasper was on the opposite side of the table to you," returned Rose, "or you might have carried out your theoretical inclinations, by practising on him, and then we should have had a scene."

Frere looked a little awkward and conscious as he replied,

"Though I am a bear, I am not quite such a savage animal as all that comes to; I do not give the fatal hug unless I am attacked first."

At this moment Bracy and Mr. Rasper, whose backs were turned towards them, approached within earshot. The latter appeared much excited, and Rose heard him say,

"It's no use talking, I've been grossly insulted, sir, and if you won't take my message to him, by — I'll take it myself, and give him as good as he gave me, or perhaps a little better."

Frere heard him also, and a flush of anger passed across his features.

"My dear Rasper, you're excited," returned Bracy soothingly, "I did not witness the affair certainly, but I cannot think that any insult was intended. Frere is rough in his manner, but the best hearted fellow in the world."

"I don't know what you may consider an insult, Mr. Bracy; but taking a man by the collar, and swinging him over the banisters like a cat, at the risk of his neck, is quite insult enough for me, one for which I'll have satisfaction, too."

"Hush, my dear fellow, you'll attract general attention, if you speak so loud. Here, come aside with me, and we'll talk the matter over quietly."

So saying, he drew Rasper's arm within his own, and led him through a side door which opened upon the staircase. Involuntarily glancing at his companion, Frere perceived her eyes riveted on his features with an expression of alarmed inquiry.

"Well, what's the matter?" he demanded, answering her speaking look.

"What is that man so angry about?" returned Rose, breathlessly: "what have you been doing?"

"Nothing very wonderful," rejoined Frere, coolly. "The young gentleman, as I suppose one is bound to call him, drank rather more wine than was prudent, and fancying I looked a quiet, easy-tempered kind of person, by way of a dull jest, indulged himself with falling against and rudely pushing by me on the staircase; and I, not being at the moment inclined for joking, did, as he very truly observed, swing him like a cat over the banisters, where, cat-like, he fell upon his legs."

"Oh, Mr. Frere, how could you do such a thing? And now he is dreadfully angry, and talked about sending you a message, which means that he wants to fight a duel. Mr. Frere, you will not fight with him?" and, as Rose spoke, her pale cheek flushed with unwonted animation, and tears, scarcely repressed, glistened in her earnest eyes.

"What do you think about it?" returned Frere, looking at her with a kind smile.

"Oh, I think, I hope, you are too good, too wise, to do such a thing. For Lewis' sake, for the sake of all your friends, you will refrain."

"For a better reason still, my dear, warm-hearted little friend," returned Frere, kindly, but solemnly; "for God's sake I will not break His commandment, or incur the guilt of shedding a fellow-creature's blood. But," he added, "all this folly has frightened you;" and, as he spoke, he took her little trembling hand in his, and stroked it caressingly, and this time it was not withdrawn.

"Then you will apologise, I suppose," Rose observed, after a short pause.

"Well, we'll hope that may not be necessary," returned her companion, "seeing that Rasper the infuriated was more to blame in the affair than I was; but if the good youth is so obtuse that nothing less will soothe him, I suppose I must accommodate his stupidity by doing so. It is a less evil to pocket one's dignity for once in a way, than to murder or be murdered in support of it."

At this moment Bracy entered the room solo, with such a vexed and anxious expression of countenance that Frere, who guessed rightly at the cause, could, though he liked him the better for it, scarcely forbear smiling.

"Go back to your singing widow," observed Frere to Rose, "and when I have administered his sop to Cerberus I will come and tell you what wry faces he has made in swallowing it."

Rose fixed her eyes on him with a scrutinizing glance, and, reading in his honest face that he was not deceiving her, smiled on him approvingly, and rising quietly, mingled with the company in the front drawing-room.

"I say, Frere," began Bracy, as Rose disappeared, "I'm sadly afraid you have got into a tiresome scrape. That young fool, Rasper, declares you've pitched him over the banisters."

"A true bill, so far, and richly he deserved it," returned Frere.

"I can well believe that," was Bracy's reply, "for he was more than half screwed when he left the dinner-table; but the shake appears to have sobered him into a state of the most lively vindictiveness. However, it's no laughing matter, I can assure you: he has sent you a message by me, and means fighting."

"He may, but I don't," returned Frere, shortly.

"My dear Frere, I wish I could make you understand that the affair is serious. Rasper's determined to have you out. I can make no impression upon him, and you can't refuse to meet a man after pitching him over the banisters," rejoined Bracy, in a tone of annoyance.

"Can't I though?" returned Frere, smiling. "I'm not of such a yielding disposition as you imagine. Where is the sweet youth?"

"I left him in the cloak-room," answered Bracy; and, as Frere immediately turned to descend the stairs, continued, "'Pon my word, you'd better not go near him: he's especially savage. Depend upon it, you will have something disagreeable occur."

"Do you think I'm going to be forced into fighting a duel, a sin of the first magnitude in my eyes, because I'm afraid of meeting an angry boy? You don't know me yet," returned Frere, sternly; and, without waiting further parley, he ran down stairs, followed by Bracy, with a face of the most comic perplexity. The door of the cloak-room stood half open, and at the farther end of the apartment might be perceived the outraged Rasper, pacing up and down like a caged lion, "nursing his wrath to keep it warm." Unintimidated even by this tremendous spectacle, Frere coolly entered the room, and immediately walked up to his late antagonist, holding out his hand.

"Come, Mr. Rasper," he said, "this has been a foolish business altogether, and the sooner we mutually forget it the better. Here's my hand: let's be friends."

That this was a mode of procedure on which Mr. Rasper had not calculated, was evident, as well by his extreme embarrassment as by his appearing completely at a loss what course to pursue. For a moment he seemed half inclined to accept Frere's proffered hand; but his eye fell upon Bracy, and probably recalling the threats he had breathed forth in the hearing of that worthy individual, he felt that his dignity was at stake; and, giving himself a shake, to re-arouse his indignation, he replied, "I shall do no such thing, sir. You have grossly insulted me, and I demand satisfaction."

"Excuse me," returned Frere, quietly, "I did not insult you: I simply would not allow you to insult me; no man worthy of the name would."

"It's no use jangling about it, like a couple of women. I consider that you have insulted me. What you may think, matters nothing to me. I have been insulted, and I require satisfaction, and I will have it, too," reiterated Mr. Rasper, talking himself into a passion.

"Now listen to me," returned Frere, impressively, "you are a younger man than I am, and have probably therefore more of life before you. You are of an age and temperament to enjoy life vividly. There are many that love you; I can answer for three, for I met your mother and two sisters at Lord Ambergate's, a fortnight since, and the good lady entertained me half-an-hour with your praises. Why, then, seek to throw away your own life and embitter theirs, or to bring upon your head the guilt of homicide, entailing banishment from your home and country, and other evil consequences, merely because, having drunk a few extra glasses of wine, you sought to play off a practical joke upon me, and I, not being at the moment in a jesting humour, retaliated upon you, as you or any other man of spirit would have done in my situation? Come, look at it in a common-sense point of view: is this a cause for which to lose a life or take one?"

After waiting a moment for a reply, during which time Rasper stood gnawing the finger of his white glove in irresolution, Frere resumed—

"If you're sorry for your share in the matter, I'm perfectly willing to own that I am for mine; and now once more here's my hand—what do you say?"

"Say, that you're a regular out-and-out good fellow, and that I'm a —d ass, and beg your pardon heartily," was the energetic rejoinder; and bringing his hand down upon Frere's with a smack that re-echoed through the room, Rasper and his late antagonist shook hands with the strength and energy of a brace of giants; and then, both talking at once with the greatest volubility, they ascended the stairs arm in arm, Bracy following them, with his left eye fixed in a species of chronic wink, expressive of any amount of the most intense satisfaction and sagacity. As they re-entered the drawing-room, Rose, whose powers of hearing, always acute, were in the present instance rendered still more so by anxiety, caught the following words—"Then you promise you will dine with me at Lovegrove's on Thursday, and I'll pick up half-a-dozen fellows that I know you'll like to meet, regular top-sawyers, that you're safe to find in the first flight, be it where it may."

"Only on condition that you come to my rooms on Friday, and bring your brother, and we'll show you sporting men how we book-worms live—Bracy, we shall see you?"

"You'll dine with us too, at Blackwall, Mr. Bracy," rejoined the first speaker, who was none other than the redoubtable Rasper—and numerous other genial sentences of like import reached the ear and comforted the heart of that little philanthropist, Rose Arundel, who could no more bear to see her fellow-creatures disagree, than could Dr. Watts, when in his benevolence he indited that pretty hymn, which begins—

"Let dogs delight to bark and bite, For 'tis their nature to—!"

then proceeds to state the interesting ornithological fact, that "Birds in their little nests agree," and touchingly appeals to the nobler instincts of childhood, in the pathetic metrical remonstrance—

"Those little hands were never made
To tear each others' eyes."

Oh! excellent and prosy Watts, doer of dull moral platitudes into duller doggrel, co-tormentor with Pinnock and the Latin grammar of my early boyhood, would that for thy sake I had the pen of Thomas Carlyle, for then would I write thee down that which I suspect thou wast, my Watts, in most resonant un-English, nay, I would make thee the subject of a "Latter-Day Pamphlet," and treating of thee in connexion with the verato questio of prison discipline, would by thy aid invent a new and horrible punishment for refractory felons, who in lieu of handcuffs and bread and water, hard labour or solitary confinement, should straightway be condemned to a severe course of "Watts' Hymns."

Thomas Bracy, his mind being relieved from the onus of this rather serious episode in his evening's amusement, now cast his eyes around, to discover how the various schemes projected by his fertile brain might be progressing. The first group that met his eye afforded him unmixed satisfaction—Lady Lombard, seated on a low fauteuil, was listening with delighted attention to De Grandeville, who, hanging over her, was talking eagerly about himself, with an air of the most lover-like devotion. The next pair that his glance fell upon scarcely pleased him so well, for Mrs. Brahmin had again hooked the Dace, and appeared in a fair way of landing him safely. "However," reflected Bracy, "one comfort is, that he's such an awful fool, he will bore her to death in less than a week after they're married, and she'll revenge herself by flirting with every man she meets, which is safe to worry him to distraction, and they'll be a wretched miserable couple; so I really believe there'll be more comedy evolved by letting them alone, than by interfering with them;" and consoling himself by this agreeable view of the matter, he turned his attention to the staid, mental and physical, of General Gudgeon. That gallant son of Mars, as though conscious of the hopes and fears that were abroad concerning his possible behaviour, was taking the best method of neutralizing the dangerous effects of his devotion to Bacchus, by composing himself to sleep in a mighty arm chair. Next him was seated Miss Mac Salvo, who was engaged in a truly edifying conversation with Mrs. Dackerel, mother to the "postponed one," on the propriety of establishing a female Missionary Society for the prevention of Polygamy amongst the Aborigines of the North-eastern Districts of South Australia; an evil which both ladies agreed to be mainly owing to the fact, that the women did not know how to conduct themselves like the women of civilized nations; a fact to which Bracy assented, by observing, "that was self-evident, or the men would find one wife quite enough;" on which Miss Mac Salvo turned up the whites, or more properly speaking, the yellows of her eyes, and ejaculated, "Ah, yes, indeed!" with much unction, though it is to be doubted whether after all she perceived the full force of the remark.

"Why, General," exclaimed Bracy, quickly, "you have been in Australia; you're the very man we want; rouse up, my dear sir, and enlighten our darkness."

"Pray, sir," observed Miss Mac Salvo, addressing General Gudgeon, "pray, sir, can you give me any insight into the habits and customs of those interesting, but, alas! misguided individuals, the aborigines of South Australia; more particularly with reference to the female portion of the population,—any little anecdotes which may occur to you now?"

"By Jo-o-ove, ma'am," returned the general, whose English had not yet "suffered a recovery," "you've come to—you've come to the right, eh—to the, the right, what-is-it?"

"Shop," suggested Bracy.

"Ye-es, to the right sho-op, if that's what you want, ma'am,—I should think there ain't a man—there ain't a man—eh? yes, breathing—that can tell you more—eh? more about larks—"

"It is scarcely with a view to the natural history of the country, that I am anxious to gain information," interrupted Miss Mac Salvo; "the facts I require regard the general behaviour and moral conduct of the female population of the north-eastern district."

"Ph! oh, yes—yes, I under—I understand what you're up to, eh?" resumed the general, with what he intended for a significant wink at Bracy, "there was Tom Slasher and me—a rare wild young, eh? yes a wild young dog was Tom; well, ma'am, there was a gal over there,—she wasn't one of the natives, though—they're taw-taw—yes tawney coloured—but this gal was a nigger—reg'lar darkie—Black-hide Susan, Tom used to call her—witty chap was Tom."

And the General being fairly started, continued to talk most volubly, though, from the peculiarities of his diction, he did not get to the point of his story so quickly as might have been expected. In the mean time Frere contrived to rejoin Rose, and seating himself almost in her pocket, he observed in a low voice—

"Well, I've contrived to tame the dragon, you see."

"Yes, and persuaded him to dine with you instead of upon you," returned Rose smiling; "but tell me," she added, "how did you contrive to satisfy him. Were you forced to apologise?"

"Oh, I put the thing before him in a common sense point of view," replied Frere; "appealed to his good feeling, as if I had faith in his possessing such a quality, which is the sure way to call it forth if it exists, and wound up by telling him that if he was sorry for his share in the business, I was ditto for mine; which mode of treatment proved eminently successful. He applied a forcible adjective to the word ass, and stigmatising himself by the epithet thus compounded, he shook me heartily by the hand, and straightway we became the greatest friends, ratifying the contract by an exchange of dinner invitations, without which ceremony no solemn league and covenant is considered binding in England in these days of enlightened civilization."

"Well, I think you have behaved more bravely and nobly than if you had fought twenty duels," exclaimed Rose, fairly carried away by her admiration. "I esteem and respect you, and—and—!" Here she stopped short, and a bright blush overspread her pale features, for she perceived Frere's fine eyes fixed upon her with an expression of delighted surprise, which she had never observed in them before, and which brought to her recollection the fact, that after all he was a living man not many years older than herself, instead of some magnanimous philosophical and eccentric character in history, done into modern English, and animated by magic for her express delectation. The light in Frere's eyes had however faded, and he had relapsed into his accustomed manner ere he replied: "I can't say I see anything to make a fuss about in it. I wasn't going to let a half-tipsy boy insult me with impunity, so I pitched him over the banisters as a trifling hint to that effect; neither did I feel inclined to shoot him, or let him shoot me, by way of compensation for his tumble, because it would have been equally wrong and irrational so to do, and I went and told him my ideas in plain English, which was the natural course to pursue, and produced the expected result; I really can't see anything remarkable in it all."

"I fancy that I do," replied Rose, archly; "but, of course, we poor women cannot pretend to be competent judges in such a case."

"You know you don't think anything of the kind," returned Frere; "you've got a very good opinion of your own judgment, so don't tell stories."

"Without either admitting or denying the truth of your assertion, I should like to know what grounds you have for making it," asked Rose.

"I can soon tell you, if that's all you want to know," returned Frere. "You could not act for yourself with the quiet decision I have before now seen you exercise, when occasion required it, unless you possessed sufficient self-appreciation to give you the requisite degree of confidence."

Ere Rose could reply, their conversation was interrupted by a piercing shriek, followed by an extreme bustle and confusion on the other side of the room. The cause was soon explained.—Excited with wine, and artfully drawn on by Bracy, General Gudgeon had told one of his "gentleman's stories" to Miss Mac Salvo, on the strength of which outrageous anecdote, that zealous advocate for establishing a Female Missionary Society for the Prevention of Polygamy amongst the Aborigines of the North-Eastern District of South Australia, had seen fit to go off into a perfect tornado of the most alarming hysterics!

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

SHOWS, AMONGST OTHER MATTERS, HOW RICHARD FRERE PASSED A RESTLESS NIGHT.

THE hysterical affection of the praiseworthy anti-polygamist having taken place late in the evening, may be said to have broken up the party. Mrs. General Gudgeon, who, when the catastrophe occurred, was more or less asleep over the same book of prints to which she had devoted herself on her first arrival, originated, as she witnessed the confusion, a faint idea—(all this lady's ideas, and they were not many, were of a dim and hazy character, so that a good impression of her thoughts—if we may be allowed the term—was a rarity hardly to be met with)—that her better half was in some way connected with the matter; and knowing that dining out usually "produced an effect upon him," (as she delicately and indefinitely phrased it,) she forthwith instituted an inquiry after her carriage; and that "vehicle for the transmission of heavy bodies" being reported in readiness, she issued marching orders, and, as soon as the honourable and gallant officer could be got upon his legs, took him in tow, and in his company departed.

The Dackerels hastened to follow this example, the maternal Dackerel having come in for her share of the General's "good things," and appearing much inclined to "trump" Miss Mac Salvo's hysterics with a fainting fit, J. D. D., with a face even longer than usual, supported her retiring footsteps. He had been warming his chilly spirit in the sunshine of the widow's smiles, till, in the possibility of some day calling that delicate creature his own, the outline of a new and fascinating destiny had been traced upon the foolscap paper of his imagination; but the doom was still upon him, and in the calls of filial piety he recognised a fresh postponement even of this last forlorn hope. Frere had shaken hands with Rose, apologized for not being able to lunch with them the next day,—a thing which nobody had asked him to do,—and, having set the butler and both the tall footmen to look for his cotton umbrella, and put on consecutively two wrong great coats, was about to walk home, when Mr. James Rasper interfered;—he would drive his friend home—anywhere—everywhere—so that he would but accompany him; he wanted to show him his cab; he wished to learn his opinion of his horse—in short, he would not be denied; and Frere, beginning to think his friendship a worse alternative than his animosity, was forced to consent, which he did thus,—

"Well, yes, if you like. I shall get home sooner, that's one comfort; and I've got three hours' work to do before I can go to bed. Is this your trap?—the brute won't kick, will he? Ugh!—what an awkward thing to get into. I believe I've broken my shin. Go ahead! Mind you steer clear of the lamp-post. I can't think why people ride, when they've got legs to walk with."

Bracy waited patiently to hand Miss Mac Salvo down stairs, which he did with much gravity and decorum, lamenting the disgraceful conduct of General Gudgeon, of whom he remarked, with a portentous shake of the head, that "he greatly feared he was not a man of a sober or edifying frame of mind,"—which observation was certainly true, as far as the sobriety was concerned.

Whether Jemima of the sour countenance had, in arranging Frere's bed, imparted somewhat of the angularity of her own nature to the feathers, or whether the events of the evening had excited that part of his system in regard to the existence whereof he indulged in a very bigotry of scepticism, namely, his nerves; certain it is, that when (having read Hindostance till daylight peeped in upon his studies) he went to bed, he did not follow his usual system of dropping asleep almost as soon as he had laid his head upon his pillow; neither could he apply his ordinary remedy for insomnolency, for, when he tried to concentrate his attention on some difficult sentence in his Hindostance, or to solve mentally an abstruse mathematical problem, a figure in white muslin obscured the Asiatic characters, or entangled itself inextricably with rectangular triangles, so that the wished-for Q. E. D. could never be arrived at. Frere had never thought Rose Arundel pretty till that night,—one reason for which might have been, that he had never thought about her appearance at all; but now, all of a sudden, the recollection of her animated face, as, carried away by the impulse of the moment, she had begun to tell him how she admired his noble conduct, occurred to him, and all its good points flashed upon him, and haunted, and oppressed him. The smooth, broad forehead—he had observed that before, and decided it to be a good forehead, in a practical point of view—i.e. a capacious knowledge-box; but now he felt that it was something more, and the mysterious attribute of beauty forced itself upon his notice, and flung its charm around him. Then her eyes—those deep, earnest, truthful eyes, seemed yet to gaze at him, with a bright expression of interest sparkling through their softness. He could not, try as he pleased, banish the recollection of that look; as he lay and thought, it came across him, and bewitched him like a spell. And her mouth—what a world of eloquence was there! even in its silence:—there might be traced the same firmness and resolution which marked the haughty curl of Lewis's short upper lip; but the pride and sternness were wanting, and in their place a chastened pensive expression seemed to afford a guarantee that the strength of character thus indicated could alone be aroused in a good cause;—but the true expression of that mouth was to be discovered only when a smile, suggestive of every softer, brighter trait of woman's nature, revealed the little pearl-like teeth. All this seemed to have come upon Frere like a sudden inspiration: he could not banish it from his recollection; and the more he reflected upon it, the less he understood it. And so, he tossed and tumbled about, restless alike in mind and body, till at last, just as the clock struck six, he fell into a dose. But sleep afforded him no refuge from his tormentress. Rose, changed and yet the same, haunted his dreams; but a halo appeared to surround her,—she had acquired a character of sanctity in his eyes. Never again could he inadvertently address her as "sir," and he would as soon have thought of connecting the idea of a "good fellow" with one of Raphael's Madonnas as with Rose Arundel. At half-past seven, Jemima—a very chronometer for punctuality—knocked at his door, and, receiving no answer, sans cérémonie walked in, to see what might be the matter; and, finding her master rather snoring than otherwise, invaded his slumbers, by exclaiming, in a shrill voice:—

"It ain't of much use me getting out of my blessed bed with the rhumatiz in the small o' my back, to bring your hot water by half-past seven, if you lay there snoring like a hog, Master Richard, and won't answer a body when they call you;" to which appeal she received the somewhat inconsequent reply,—

"Well, suppose I wouldn't let him shoot me, there's nothing very fine in that, Rose."

"Listen to him," exclaimed Jemima, aghast, "lor' a mussy! I hope he ain't a wandering, or took to the drink. Master Richard, will ye please to wake, and talk like a christian, and not go frightening a body out of their wits," she continued in a tone of voice, as of an agitated sea-mew.

"Oh, what? oh is that you, Jemima? I was so sound asleep; go away and I'll get up directly," muttered Frere, becoming conscious of those usual colloquial antipodes, "his room and his company."

But Jemima had been flurried and rendered anxious on his account, first by his silence, next by his incoherent address, and now finding her alarm had been without foundation, her better feelings turned sour, and having her master at an advantage, seeing that he could not rise till she should please to convey herself away; she gave vent to her acidulated sentiments in the following harangue,—

"Yes it's all very well to say 'go away,' as if you was speaking to a dog, after frightening people out of their wits, by talking gibberish about shooting, and fine roses; but I see how it is, you're a taking to evil courses, a staying out here till one o'clock in the morning, for I heard ye a comin' in, lying awake with the rheumatiz in the small o'my back drinking, and smoking cigars, which spiles the teeth, and hundermines the hintelleets, and accounts for being non compo Mondays the next morning; but I've lived with you and yours thirty year and odd, and I ain't a going to see you rack-and-ruining of your constitution, without a speaking up to tell you of it, for all your looking black at the woman that nursed you when yer was an innocent baby, all unconseious of sich gong's on."

"My good woman, don't talk such rubbish, but go away and let me get my things on," returned Frere, in a species of apologetic growl.

"Rubbish indeed," continued Jemima, in a violent falsetto, her temper being thoroughly aroused by the contemptuous epithet applied to her unappreciated homily, "that's all the thanks one gets for one's good advice, is it? but I don't care. I've lived with you, man and boy, nigh half my life, which like the grass of the field, is three score years and ten, come Michaelmas twelvemonth, and I'm not a-going to see you take to evil courses without lifting up my voice as a deacon set on a hill to warn you against 'em, which is what your blessed mother would have done, only too gladly, if she wasn't an angel in the family vault, where we must all go when our time comes smoking filthy cigars and stopping out till one o'clock in the morning, indeed!" and muttering these words over and over to herself, as a sort of refrain, Jemima hobbled out of the room with more stoutness and alacrity than could have been expected from her antiquated appearance. Relieved from the incubus of her presence, Frere rose and proceeded to dress himself; but the nightmare that had oppressed him, whether sleeping or waking, haunted him still; in vain he tried to shave himself, the vision in white muslin came between his face and the looking-glass, and occasioned him to cut his chin. At his frugal breakfast it was with him again, and strange to say, took away his appetite; it went out with him to his scientific institution, and weakened his perceptions, and absorbed his attention, and dulled his memory, till even the most positively resolved nebule swam in a mist before him, and the mountains of the moon, which had lately brought forth a new crater, might have been the bona fide products of that planet instead of merely her African godchildren, for aught that he could have stated to the contrary. He got through his morning's work somehow, and then the vision prompted him to call at Lady Lombard's, and gave him no peace till he started for the goodly mansion of that hospitable widow, which he did in such an unusually agitated frame of mind, that for the first time in the memory of man he forgot his cotton umbrella;—he hurried wildly through the streets, overthrowing little children and reversing apple-women, not to mention, an insane attempt to constitute himself a member of the "happy family," by dashing violently against the wires of their cage, which contains all kinds of strange animals except a Richard Frere, or a Podiceps Cornutus, till at last he reached the locality in which Lady Lombard's house was situated.

And here a new and unaccountable crotchet took possession of his brain. Frere, who since he could run alone, and express his sentiments intelligibly in his native tongue, had never known what bashfulness meant, was seized with a sudden attack of that uncomfortable sensation, the extinguisher of so many would-be shining lights of humanity, who but for that "flooring" quality would have published such books, and made such speeches, that the hair of society at large, upraised with wonder and admiration, must have stood on end through all time, "like quills upon the fretful porcupine." So violent was this attack of shyness, that after having hurried from his office as though life and death hung upon his speed, he could not make up his mind whether to pay the projected visit or not, and actually strolled up and down, passing and repassing the door some half-dozen times, before he ventured to knock at it; nay, to such an extent had this mysterious "timor panico" seized upon him that when the plush-clad "man mountain" appeared in answer to his summons, he merely left his card, and, inquiring meekly how the ladies were, posted off at, if anything, a more rapid pace than that at which he had walked on his way thither.

Then, ere he had proceeded the length of a street, came the reaction, under the influence of which he not unjustly stigmatized himself as an egregious fool; and but for very shame would fain have retraced his steps. He could not, however, make up any credible excuse for facing the noble footman a second time, so, as the next best thing to seeing Rose, he found his way to Park Crescent, and called upon Lewis, to whom he related how that he felt so restless and fidgety that he was persuaded he must be about to develop a feverish cold, or some analogous abomination. Having engaged Lewis to accompany him on the following evening to a lecture at the Palæontological, on "the relations of the earlier Zoophytes," whoever they might be, he was about to depart, when, as he reached the hall, a carriage, with a splendid pair of greys, dashed up to the door, and a pretty little brunette, with sparkling black eyes, a brilliant complexion, and a bonnet the colour of raspberry ice, descended, and passing Picci with a glance half saucy, half contemptuous, ran upstairs as if she were an habituée of the house. This was Emily, Countess Portici, Lord Bellefield's younger sister, who, having at nineteen run away with an Italian nobleman, for love of his black eyes and ivory complexion, had, ere she was five-and-twenty, grown heartily sick of them and of Italy, and discovered some good reason to quit that land of uncomfortable splendour to enjoy the gaieties of a London spring, leaving her picturesque husband to console himself as best he might during her absence. She possessed very high spirits, without any vast amount of judgment to counterbalance them, and her present frame of mind was that of a school-girl rejoicing in a holiday, into which she was determined to cram as much pleasure, fun, and frolic as an unlimited capacity for enjoyment would enable her to undergo. On the strength of her position as a married woman, she constituted herself Annie's chaperon on all occasions when the vigilance of Minerva Livingstone could be eluded; and, as that Gorgon of the nineteenth century was not so young as she had been, and found late hours tend to reduce her stamina, and degrade the dignity of ill temper to the ignominious level of mere peevishness, she unwillingly allowed the Countess Portici to act as her substitute, and escort Annie to such evening entertainments as from their nature threatened to invade the hours dedicated by Minerva to repose. There was much similarity of feature and of manner between the countess and her brother Charles Leicester, only that Charley's languid drawl was in Emily replaced by a sparkling vivacity, which, together with a certain selfish good-nature that led her to promote the enjoyment of others on every occasion in which it did not come in contact with her own, was sufficient to render her a general favourite. Annie was no exception to this rule; and, always delighted to escape from the petrifying influence of Minerva, eagerly seconded all her lively cousin's schemes for her amusement.

The object of the countess's visit on the present occasion was to secure Annie for the following evening, when they were to dine together, and were afterwards to be escorted to the Opera by Lord Bellefield, where they were to hear a new soprano, with a voice three notes higher than that of anybody else, which notes might by a mild and easy figure of speech be not inaptly termed bank notes, seeing that by their exercise the fair cantatrice had realized the satisfactory sum of thirty thousand pounds.

The countess's scheme happening to fit in very nicely with the views of the elders, as the General dined out, and Minerva was nursing a cold, which must have reduced the temperature of her blood to some frightful figure below zero, the project met with no more opposition than, from the constitution of Miss Livingstone's mind, was inevitable. And thus it came about that on the following day Emily called for Annie, and the two girls (for the matron was a very girlish specimen of five-and-twenty) drove round the park together, and then retired to Emily's boudoir, and "talked confidence" till it was time to dress. Annie's revelations did not go much more than skin-deep, and related chiefly to anxieties concerning papa, and difficulties with Aunt Martha, who was "so tiresome about things, and never would let anybody love her," and then branched off to a retrospective sketch of the preliminary difficulties which had obstructed Charley Leicester's wedding, ending by a detailed account of the ceremony itself, and Annie's hopes and fears as to the ultimate result of the bridegroom's good resolutions.

Emily, on the contrary, plunged at once in medias res, and related how all last winter she had been rendered wretched by "Alessandro's" attentions to the Marchese Giulia di B——am (she revealed the blank in an agitated whisper), and what all her particular friends had said to her on the subject, and how she had jointly and severally replied to them that the dignity of her sex supported her; whence, warning with her subject, she went on to state how she in her turn had supported this dignity by repulsing the advances of Captain Augustus (familiarily and affectionately reduced, for colloquial purposes, into Gus.) Travers, who, having been her first love, and retired ricc Alessandro Conte de Portici promoted to the rank of husband, considered that it was again his innings, and had diligently sought to become platonically her third love, and disputed the post of canalier sercente with all and sundry, in spite of which constancy and devotion she had persevered in her repulsiveness, until, between her cruelty and a reckless indifference to malaria, poor Gus. was attacked with a brain fever, and then of course when he grew a little better she could not continue unkind to him, for she might have had his life to answer for, and that was a serious consideration; and so by degrees he took to coming to the Palazzo Portici constantly, and went about to places with her, and somehow she got accustomed to him, and Alessandro did not seem to mind, and poor Gus. always behaved very well, and only asked to be allowed the privilege of her friendship, and every body did the same sort of thing—"It's their way over there, you know, Annie dear;" till at last Bellefield came, and he had never been able to endure Gus. because he was so handsome, poor fellow, so Bellefield made a great fuss, and said all sorts of shocking things, and set Alessandro at her; and worse than all, quarrelled with Gus. and wanted to horsewhip him, and it almost came to a duel, only she wrote Gus. a little note, imploring him not to fight, but to go away and forget her; and he had done the first directly, and she dared say he had done the second, for she'd never seen him since, which she was very glad of;—and here she heaved a deep sigh, and caressed a comic and unnatural transalpine poodle, which by reason of its flowing locks looked like an animated carriage mat, as though it had been a pet lamb, the sole prop of some heart-broken and dishevelled shepherdess, to which picture of pastoral pathos did Emily, Countess di Portici, then and there mentally assimilate herself.

And to all this history of loves, and hates, and platonic friendships, whatever they might be, simple innocent Annie listened with much interest and more perplexity. She had a vague notion that Emily had behaved foolishly, if not wrongly; but she was very fond of her cousin, who, from the difference in their respective ages, had acquired a degree of ascendancy over her, which their natural characters scarcely warranted. Then Annie's deep ignorance of foreign manners and customs threw a mist of uncertainty around the whole affair, beneath the shadow of which she was able to put the most charitable construction on Emily's conduct, without "stultifying her moral sense," to speak as a logician; still she felt called upon to give her cousin a little good advice in regard to striving entirely to forget, and scrupulously to avoid for the future the too fascinating Gus, for which Emily kissed her, and called her a dear silly little prude; then twining their arms round each other's taper waists, the girls descended to the dining room, united for the time being, literally and figuratively, by the closest bonds of amity and affection. Standing rather in awe of her brother, Emily conducted herself during the meal with so much gravity and decorum, that she quite threw a shade over Annie's usual lightheartedness, and by the time they reached their opera box, a more sombre trio, (not even excepting the soprano, the tenor, and the baritone, of whom the first two were prepared to be poisoned, and the third to stab himself on their marble tomb before the evening should be over,) could not have been found beneath the roof of Her Majesty's theatre.

Between the acts of the opera a divertissement was introduced, in which a danseuse, who had acquired an Italian reputation, but who was, as yet, unknown in England, was to make her first appearance. Emily was conversing volubly about her various merits, when a fashionably-dressed young man, with delicate features, a profusion of dark waving curls, and a pair of the most interesting little black moustachios imaginable, lounged into one of the stalls, and began lazily to scrutinize the company through a richly-mounted opera-glass. He was undeniably handsome, but the expression of his face was disagreeable, and his whole demeanour blasé and puppyish in the extreme. As he entered, Annie perceived her cousin to give a violent start, and, as she met her glance, to colour slightly; then, evidently unwilling to attract her brother's notice, she made a successful effort to recover herself, and appeared completely absorbed in the terpsichorean prodigies of the new opera dancer. Just at the conclusion of the divertissement, some one knocked at the door of the box, and, on Lord Bellefield's opening it, Annie heard a man's voice say, in a hurried manner,

"I beg your lordship's pardon, but can you allow me two minutes' conversation with you?" Lord Bellefield replied in the affirmative, and quitted the box, closing the door behind him. As he did so, Emily, laying her finger on her cousin's arm, said, in a hurried whisper,—“Annie, do you see that gentleman in the fourth row of stalls, the sixth from this end? That's Gus,—isn't he handsome, poor fellow? Ah!” she continued, as the object of her scrutiny suddenly brought his opera-glass to bear upon their box, “he has made me out, and he does not know that Bellefield is here. Oh! I hope he won't think of coming up!”

As she spoke, Gus, having become aware of her presence, made an almost imperceptible sign of recognition, and in the same quiet manner telegraphed an entreaty to be allowed to join her; upon which Emily frowned, and shook her head, by way of prohibition,—favouring Gus afterwards with a pensive smile, to show that her refusal proceeded less from choice than from necessity. Almost as she did so, Lord Bellefield returned, looking annoyed and anxious. “I am obliged to leave you for half-an-hour,” he said; “but you will be perfectly safe here, and I shall return in plenty of time to escort you home. You may depend upon my coming to fetch you.” And almost before he finished speaking, he had quitted the box, and was gone.

Confused and half-frightened at his sudden departure, Annie remained for a minute or two with her eyes fixed on the door through which he had, as it were, vanished; when she again glanced towards the stage, the stall lately occupied by Augustus Travers was vacant.

THE day was bright and summery, and in high good spirits we mounted our car towards noon, and took our way to Dunluce Castle. It was but a mile or two from Bushmills, and before we were well settled in our seats, this finest of ruined castles (I think the most picturesque ruin I ever saw,) broke upon us, like an apparition, in the road. Dunluce stands on a perpendicular and insulated rock, the entire surface of which is so completely occupied by the edifice, that the external walls are in continuation with the perpendicular sides of the rock. The walls of the building were never very lofty, but from the great area which they enclosed, contained a considerable number of apartments. One small vaulted room is said to be inhabited by a Banshee, whose chief occupation is sweeping the floor. This story originates in the fact, that the floor is at all times as clean as if it had just then been swept; but this difficulty can be explained without the introduction of Maw Roi, the fairy, by the fact, that the wind gains admittance through an aperture on a level with the floor, and thus preserves the appearance of cleanliness and freedom from dust, just now described. In the north-eastern end is a small room, actually projecting over the sea, the rocky base having fallen away, and from the door of this apartment there is a giddy view of the sea beneath. The rock on which the castle stands is not surrounded by water, but is united at the bottom of the chasm to the main-land by a ledge of rock a little higher than the surface of the ocean. The castle was entered by a bridge formed in the following manner:—two parallel walls, about eight feet asunder, thrown across the chasm, connected the rock with the main-land. Upon these planks were laid crosswise for the admission of visitors, and removed immediately after the passage was effected. At present but one of the walls remains, about thirteen inches in thickness, and the only pathway to the castle is along its summit, over the awful rocky chasm. The distance at which the other parallel wall was placed may be perceived by the traces of its adhesion to the opposite rock.

On the main-land, close to the castle, a second collection of similar buildings are seen, erected at a later period by one of the Antrim family, in consequence of the giving way of an apartment on the verge of the rock. Beneath the cliff on which the castle stands, is a cave penetrating completely through from the sea to the rocky basin on the land-side of the castle. It may be entered by a small aperture in the south end, and at low-water there is a good deal of the flooring uncovered, which consists of large round stones, this form is the consequence of the action of the waves. The sides and roof are of basalt, possessing merely the usual characters, here also is a very remarkable echo when the surface of the water is unruddled.

Though all accurate knowledge of the date of erection, and the name of the founder of Dunluce Castle are completely lost, yet the history of its proprietors for the last few centuries is extremely interesting, and affords a very characteristic account of the state of society in the feudal periods of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. It has been conjectured that De Courcy, Earl of Ulster, originally founded this castle, but the architecture is not of so very ancient a date. In the fifteenth century it was held by the English, at which period it seems to have fallen into the hands of a noble English family, called by Camden, M'Willis, from whose hands it passed into the possession of the M'Donalds of the Isles, and to their descendants it belongs to this day.

About the year 1580, Colonel M'Donald, brother to James, Lord of Cantyre, came into Ireland with a band of men to assist Tyreconnel against the great O'Neil, with whom he was then at war. In passing through the Rout, he was hospitably received and entertained by M'Quillan, the lord and master of the Rout and Kileonery. At that time there was a war between M'Quillan and the men of Killeteragh beyond the Bann. On the day when Colonel M'Donald was taking his departure to proceed on his journey to Tyreconnel, M'Quillan, who was not equal in war to his savage neighbours, called together his militia, or gallogloghs, to revenge his affronts over the Bann; and M'Donald, thinking it uncivil not to offer his services that day to M'Quillan, after being so kindly treated, sent one of his gentlemen with an offer of assistance in the field. M'Quillan was well pleased with the offer, and declared it to be a perpetual obligation on him and his posterity. So M'Quillan and the Highlanders went against the enemy; and where there was a cow taken from M'Quillan's people before, there were two taken back; after which M'Quillan and Colonel M'Donald returned with great prey, and without the loss of a man.

Winter then drawing nigh, M'Quillan gave Colonel M'Donald an invitation to stay with him at his castle of Dunluce, advising him to settle there until the spring, and to quarter his men up and down the Rout. This M'Donald gladly accepted; but in the course of the winter seduced M'Quillan's daughter, and privately married her; upon which ground the M'Donalds afterwards founded their claim to the M'Quillan's territories. The men were quartered two and two throughout the Rout; that is to say, one of M'Quillan's gallogloghs and a Highlander in every tenant's house. It so happened that the galloglogh, besides his ordinary mess, was entitled to a noggin of milk as a privilege. This the Highlanders esteemed to be a great affront, and at last one of them asked his landlord "Why don't you give me milk as you give the other?"

The galloglogh immediately made answer, "Would you, a Highland beggar as you are, compare yourself to me or any of M'Quillan's gallogloghs?"

The poor tenant, heartily tired of both, said, "Come, gentlemen, I'll open the door, and you may go and fight it out in the field, and he that has the victory let him take milk and all to himself."

The galloglogh was soon slain in the encounter, after which the Highlander came in and died heartily. M'Quillan's gallogloghs assembled to demand satisfaction; and in a council which was held, where the conduct of the Scots was debated, their great power, and the disgrace arising from the seduction of M'Quillan's daughter, it was agreed that each galloglogh should kill his comrade Highlander by night, and their lord and master with them, but M'Donald's wife discovered the plot, and told it to her husband. So the Highlanders fled in the night-time, and in attempting to escape into Scotland, were driven into the island of Rathery.

In 1612, Dunluce Castle was the scene of a villainous act of treachery. In the month of April of that year, General Munroe made a visit to the Earl of Antrim at this castle, and was received with many expressions of joy, and honoured with splendid entertainments; and, further, the earl offered him assistance of men and money to reduce the country to tranquillity. But Munroe, when this was over, seized on the earl's person, and put the other castles of his lordship into the hands of the Marquis of Argyle's men. He conveyed the earl to Carrickfergus, and imprisoned him in the castle, but from this he soon effected his escape, and withdrew to England.

There are, of course, numerous traditions connected with Dunluce, but I had not time to inquire them out among the people, and it has been well done by that fruit-gathering traveller, Cesar Otway, whose description of a visit to Dunluce I subjoin.

"It was as fine a morning as ever fell from heaven when we landed at Dunluce; not a cloud in the sky, not a wave on the water; the brown basaltic rock, with the towers of the ancient fortress that capped and covered it—all its grey bastions and pointed gables lay pictured on the incumbent mirror of the ocean; everything was reposing—every thing so still, that nothing was heard but the flash of our oars, and the song of Alick M'Mullen, to break the silence of the sea. We rowed round this peninsular fortress, and then entered the fine cavern that so curiously perforates the rock, and opens its dark arch to admit our boat. He must, indeed, have a mind cased up in all the common-place of dull existence, who would not while within this cavern and under this fortress, enter into the associations connected with the scene; who could not hold communings with the 'Genius Loci.' Fancy I know called up for me the war-boats and the foemen, who, either issued from, or took shelter in this sea-cave. I imagined, as the tide was growling amidst the far recesses, that I heard the moanings of chained captives, and the huge rocks around must be bales of plunder, landed and lodged here, and I took an interest, and supposed myself a sharer in the triumphs of the fortunate, and the helplessness of the captive, while suffering under the misery that bold bad men inflicted in troubled times, when the M'Quillans of the Rout, and the M'Donnells of the Glyns, either gained or lost this debateable stronghold. Landing in this cavern, we passed up through its land side entrance towards the ruin; the day had become exceeding warm, and going forth from the coolness of the cave into the sultry atmosphere, we felt doubly the force of the sun's power—the sea-birds had retreated to their distant rocks—the goats were panting under the shaded ledges of the cliffs—the rooks and choughs, with open beaks and drooping wings, were scattered over the downs, from whose surface they arose with a quivering undulating motion; we were all glad for a time to retire to, where under the shade of the projected cliff, a cold, clear spring offered its refreshing waters.

"Reader, surely you cannot be at a loss for a drawing or print of Dunluce Castle; take it now I pray you in hand, and observe with me the narrow wall that connects the ruined fortress with the mainland; see how this wall is perforated, and without any support from beneath, how it hangs there, bearing time and tempest, and still needing no power of arch, simply by the power of its own cemented material; the art of man could not make such another self-supported thing, it is about eighteen inches broad, just the path of a man, do not fear to cross it, rest assured it wont tumble with you, it has borne many a better man, so come on, who's afraid?"

"I really cannot bring myself to venture," was the reply of both my companions.

"Sit ye down then, ye giddy-headed cockneys, and bask your day in the sun, Alick and I will step across and visit the Banshee."

"So, with the greatest ease, we tripped across: Carrick-a-Rede is seventy times more fearful.

"And now, Mr. M'Mullen, as you and I have this old place to ourselves, come show me everything, and tell me all about it."

"With the greatest pleasure in life, sir," says Alick, 'for it gave me joy to see a gentleman like you, hopping like a jackdaw over that bit of a wall; and indeed many a good one comes here like you, gentleman and lady, who I believe have their skulls full of what they call nerve, instead of sensible steady brains.'

"Well, Alick, beyond a doubt this is a fine old place."

"Why, then, sir, it's you that may say that, for many a battle and bloody head was about it in good old fighting times, when fighting and fun were all one in merry Ireland."

"Come then, Alick, tell me some of this fighting fun that the good old happy people you speak of enjoyed here in Dunluce."

"And does it become me to tell your honour of the wars of Dunluce? why I thought as how with your black coat and spatterdashes, you might be a scholar—besides, as you intend to see the Causeway, and the Cave, and Pleaskin, it may be your honour won't have time to hear all I have to tell you about the M'Quillans and M'Donnells, and Surly Boy and Captain Merriman—but, at any rate, I'll tell you, in short, about the boat-race, whereby this castle was won and lost, when the M'Quillans and M'Donnells contended for it in the presence of the King of Scotland, and agreed to leave their right to the issue of a row from Isla to Dunluce—he who first touched the land was to have the castle as his prize; so they started on just such a day as this, wind and wave agreed to sit still and let the oarmen have fair play—and to be sure it was they who rowed for honour and glory as for life, and the M'Quillans prayed enough to St. Patrick, and the M'Donnells to Columkille of the Isles, and neither, you may be sure, spared the spirits—for it's hard to say whether John Highlandman or Pat of the green hills is better at that work; but, at any rate, on they came, beautiful and abreast, like two swans cutting, with white bosoms, the green waters; and now it was Pull Paddy, and now it was Pull Sandy, and none on the shore could tell for their lives which was foremost; but at any rate, the Irish boys shouted enough, and prayed enough for the M'Quillans: and now, sir, they were within stone's throw, and almost within ear's length, when what do you think my Scotchman did? For never put it past canny Sawney, all the world over, for getting the better of others; and if he fails at fair beating, he'll not pass by cheating: so it was here. The two chiefs were each at their boat's bow, and M'Quillan had his long arm outstretched, and M'Donnell held his locharbar axe in his hand, and all at once laying his left wrist on the gunwale before him, he slashed at it with his hatchet; severed it at a blow, and while it was spinning out blood, he flung it with all his force against the rock; and do you see where that sea-parrot is now perched, on that bird's-nest ledge there the bleeding hand lay, and the red mark is said to be there, though I have never seen it, unto this very day.

"Huzza for M'Donnell, Dunluce is our own,
For spite of M'Quillan, the castle is won."

Such was the cry of the Scotchmen as they landed, and so it was that even the Irish gave it in favour of the foreigner, who, at the expense of his limb, won the prize, and long and many a day the Scotchman held it, until he became a good Irishman, and to this hour you may see a bloody hand painted in the middle of Lord Antrim's coat of arms.'—Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland, by Stirling Coyne.

EMERSON'S REPRESENTATIVE MEN.¹

OF the multiplicity of books which the press in these years is continually sending forth, there is a small and comparatively neglected number deserving considerably more attention than the rest. These are the writings of a few recluse thinkers, who, holding themselves aloof from the allurements of a temporary popularity, have respect rather to that better and loftier distinction, which consists in giving shape and utterance to thoughts calculated to promote the spiritual elevation of humanity. These men aim, apparently, at that which is properly the end of all literature and philosophy—the discovery and publication of truth and wisdom. Being enlightened and inspired by these admirable realities, they seek to shed around them something of the grand effulgence which has illumined and exalted their own souls. They would make their words a living and impressive testimony to whatsoever is highest, most beautiful, and excellent in man; and with splendid thoughts and images, would recall him to the contemplation of that potential worthiness, which is lodged as a germ within his soul, and which, by sedulous striving and endeavour, may be practically developed in his character and life.

Among the men thus earnestly devoted to this noblest work of literature, it is now almost becoming fashionable to reckon Emerson. His writings, though at first misapprehended and abused, both in America and England, have gradually won their way to the reverent admiration of many a thoughtful reader, and have gained, at length, a considerably wide celebrity; so that even the obtusest of gainsayers are beginning to perceive that it is no longer advisable to speak of him otherwise than respectfully. Two or three years ago, he was highly eulogised in "Blackwood;" and Mr. Gilfillan, more recently, has asserted (we suppose from personal knowledge) that "sincere spirits, in every part of the country, who have, many of them, no sympathy with Emerson's surmised opinions, delight, nevertheless, to do him honour, as an earnest, honest, and gifted man." When he was in England, in 1848, the intelligent classes of all opinions anxiously thronged to hear him lecture; even Exeter-hall was, for two evenings at least, quite handsomely occupied, and from time to time resounded with the applauses of the audience.

We are not prepared to say that everything Emerson has written ought to be received as worthy of implicit acceptance; but we nevertheless believe that he has written very little which is not fairly entitled to a candid consideration. The sayings of a man of genius are always worth examining. His very errors are instructive; and may often indirectly aid the cause of truth better than the most respectable array of commonplaces. To use a definition of his own, Emerson is a "man thinking." He does not expect you to receive his utterances without examination; he neither aspires nor desires to teach dogmatically; but seems to say to you, "Such and such a thought has arisen in my mind; see, friends what you can make of it." His originality of expression is very remarkable; and is indeed the occasion of much of that obscurity which has been attributed to his writings. It is not to be denied that these writings present considerable difficulties to unprepared readers. We have met with even intelligent persons who declared they could not apprehend his meaning. The frequent novelty of the thoughts, and the general uncommonness of the phraseology employed in uttering them, give to these productions a character of strangeness, which is not readily apprehensible to minds principally familiar with the easy clearness of the current literature. They require a sustained and vigilant attention, such, probably, as few ready and rapid readers may be inclined to give; their full and complete significance being nowise discernible at a glance, but to be gathered only by repeated and sedulous perusal. In short, Emerson is a writer whose works demand that almost obsolete kind of application which is expressed by the word study. He is, therefore, never likely to be popular, in the wide and ordinary sense of the expression. The greatest order of minds really never are so with the mass of their contemporaries. The popularity which Shakspeare enjoyed in his own age, is not the same kind of popularity which he enjoys at present with the poetical and philosophical class of minds that can best appreciate his excellences. The popularity of Cervantes was altogether secondary, and far inferior in extent to that of Lope de Vega, who was the acknowledged prince of dramatists of his time, but whose works are now read only by critics and scholars out of motives of curiosity, while the illustrious Don Quixote is the delight of every household. For one earnest reader of Coleridge or William Wordsworth, there have probably been thousands who have derived a morbid and temporary gratification from the pages of Ainsworth or Eugène Sue. The present popularity of a writer is no evidence or indication of the greatness of his genius, or of the ultimate influence which he will exercise upon society. A blaze of fireworks, or a burning tar-barrel, may very effectually illuminate a common street or market-place, and for a time exclude from observation more permanent and less ostentatious lights; but above, in the vast firmament, the stars send forth their lustres, gently and solemnly for ever, over boundless realms of space.

Ebenezer Elliott has said, that through his habit of reading only the master-pieces of literature, he found their thoughts invariably suggested to him other thoughts, which, if not new in themselves, were at least new to him. This is precisely one of the merits of Emerson. He suggests as much as he teaches. If you have any capacity for reflection, he has the power to make you think. Accepting no hearsays, he strives to unravel the actual truth of things. He deals at first hand with the loftiest speculations, and, leading you through regions of difficult and abstruse thought, leaves you finally in possession of novel and commanding truths. Under the shifting appearances of existence, his genius has the power to detect the electric current which runs through them, and is the splendour and the mystery of life. Man and nature are his great themes, and the habitual objects of his reverence. He holds by a latent worthiness in man: not man as he finds him in commonplace and degenerate society; but man exalted to the height of his possibilities, through a wise and earnest culture. He exults in the beauty and magnificence of nature; but loves her not alone for the glories of her sensuous impressions, but rather in so far as she is the symbol of a ruling and predominating spirit. It is the divinity that is supreme, and pervades all the elements of creation; nor is man invested with any worth or greatness, save as he partakes of the Divine energy, and subordinates his aims to the constitution of the universe.

The leading lesson which Emerson inculcates, is, that all knowledge and inquiry should minister to the training and development of the individual man—to the unfolding and manifestation of whatsoever is most noble and enduring in his soul. He would have a man "to know his worth, and keep things under his feet." To promote the formation and culture of character, is the chief aim of all his writings. He insists that, under all circumstances, we should possess a cultivated self-reliance—or rather a reliance on the intuitions communicated by that remoter Power, whence every individuality derives its basis and its strength—that we should yield an habitual obedience to the voice of moral sentiment, and strive to realize the aspirations that arise in us when we are most consciously in communion with exalted truths and feelings. He would have us, regardless of all customs and conventions, of all merely secular restraints, prescribed courtesies and compliances, to endeavour to attain to a nobleness and truthfulness of life and manners, which should exhibit a constant reference of every action to the highest known and revealed standards of right and purity, and give the impression of a mind in unison with the natural realities of things. Whatsoever aids are to be accepted as the means of successfully educating and elucidating the inborn character, must be restricted to their proper agency as means, that so the soul of man may grow in freedom, and be advanced to the very utmost, in its career of a spiritual development. Enlargement and elevation of soul and intellect, form the grand success of life. He only is turning his life to just account, who lives in conformity with the divine ordinances, and is rising progressively to higher stages of intellectual and moral energy and perfection.

To Emerson's mind, the workings of the universe are infallible. God has ordained that truth and justice shall succeed, and that all falsehood in act or word, every lying and unjust pretension, shall finally and permanently fail. Hence, to him, the apparent success of cunning and injustice is a sheer delusion. He holds that, "In labour, as in life, there can be no cheating. The thief steals from himself; the swindler swindles himself. For the real price of labour is knowledge and virtue, whereof wealth and credit are signs. These signs, like paper money, may be counterfeited or stolen; but that which they represent—namely, knowledge and virtue—cannot be counterfeited or stolen. These ends of labour cannot be answered but by real exertions of the mind, and in obedience to pure motives. The cheat, the defaulter, the gambler, cannot extort the benefit, cannot extort the knowledge of material and moral nature, which his honest care and pains yield to the operative. The law of nature is, do the thing, and you shall have the power; but they who do not the thing, have not the power." In like manner, a lie is its own disgrace: there is so much abstracted from the man; he is the less a man to the extent of the enormity of the lie. Only in truth and rectitude is well-being possible: but he who pursues the true and good, has the furtherance of all nature to establish his endeavours, and his success is clenched by the enduring integrity of her laws.

The order of the universe, and the ideal relations of men, being thus inviolable, Emerson tests the worth of a man's activity by its approximation to the pre-ordained conditions under which human nature has been appointed to display itself. Virtue, with him, is that which harmonises with the design of God—the visible manifestation of the sacred laws, which are the vital forces of humanity, and according to which, all life and human action must practically correspond. This doctrine is well and ably illustrated in the sixth of these lectures—on Napoleon, who stands as the representative "man of the world:" and it is to this that we shall here direct our chief attention, inasmuch as it is an exposition of the whole character and aims of the age in which we live.

"Men," it is asserted in the introductory discourse, "have a pictorial or representative quality, and serve us in the intellect." As things are representative of large classes of objects distinguished by the same or kindred characteristics; so "men are also representative; first, of things, and secondly, of ideas." Thus, in Emerson's arrangement, Plato stands as the representative of Philosophy; Swendenborg, of the whole class of mystics; Montaigne, of the sceptical tendencies of modern cultivation; Shakspeare, of the poet; Goethe, of the writer, or class of literary men; and Napoleon, of the man of active life and enterprise in the nineteenth century. The influence or predominance of these, in their several departments, is ascribed to their large receptive powers, and to the faithfulness wherewith they represent the prevailing tendencies of their age, condition, art, or circumstances. Napoleon, for example, "owes his predominance to the fidelity with which he expresses the tone of thought and belief, the aims of the masses of active and cultivated men" in the times in which he lived and established his supremacy. His success was the result of the general accordance of his aims, with the universal aims of his times and country. His whole generation furthered and supported him in his purpose, because he sought after the like distinctions, and laboured for the same ends, as those which were the objects of the general pursuit. Napoleon became the leader and highest personage of France and Europe, because the people whom he swayed were all Napoleons in less degree, and were kindled with the like spirit and desires which were displayed supremely in himself. They were ruled by the hope of partaking of his fortunes, and were his willing servants, inasmuch as they saw in him the successful reflection of their own ambition.

In bringing this colossal figure once more before the reader; it will be needful to transcribe first, some of Emerson's remarks on the special characteristics of the age which afforded so astonishing a field for the exercise of his abilities.

"In our society," says he, "there is a standing antagonism between the conservative and the democratic classes; between those who have made their fortunes, and the young and the poor who have fortunes to make; between the interests of dead labour,—that is, the labour of hands long ago still in the grave, which labour is now entombed in money stocks, or in land and buildings owned by capitalists—and the interests of living labour, which seeks to possess itself of land, and buildings, and money stocks. The first class is timid, selfish, illiberal, hating innovation, and continually losing numbers by death. The second class is selfish also, encroaching, bold, self-relying, always outnumbering the other, and recruiting its numbers every hour by births. It desires to keep open every avenue to the competition of all, and to multiply avenues;—the class of business men in America, in England, in France, and throughout Europe; the class of industry and skill;—Napoleon is its representative. The instinct of active, brave, able men throughout the middle class everywhere, has pointed out Napoleon as the incarnate democrat. He had their virtues, and their vices: above all, he had their spirit or aim. That tendency is material, pointing at a sensual success, and employing the richest and most various means to that end; conversant with mechanical powers, highly intellectual, widely and accurately learned and skilful, but subordinating all intellectual and spiritual forces into means to a material success. To be the rich man is the end. 'God has granted,' says the Koran,

'to every people a prophet in its own tongue.' Paris, and London, and New York, the spirit of commerce, of money, and material power, were also to have their prophet, and Bonaparte was qualified and sent."

The written history of Napoleon affords delight to countless readers, because every man reads in it his own history, on the grandest scale. He sees himself and all his projects magnified to those dimensions in which he loves to contemplate them. Besides, Napoleon is entirely a man of to-day; there is nothing antiquated or traditional about him; he is a living mass of strength applied to the occasions of the hour. He "is thoroughly modern, and, at the highest point of his fortunes, has the very spirit of the newspapers. He is no saint—to use his own word, 'no capuchin;' and he is no hero, in the high sense. The common man finds in him the qualities and powers of common men. He finds him, like himself, by birth a citizen, who, by very intelligible merits, arrived at such a commanding position that he could indulge all those tastes which the common man possesses, but is obliged to conceal and deny; good society, good books, fast travelling, dress, dinners, servants without number, personal weight, the execution of his ideas, the standing in the attitude of a benefactor to all persons about him, the refined enjoyments of pictures, statues, music, palaces, and conventional honours; precisely what is agreeable to the heart of every man in the nineteenth century, this powerful man possessed."

It is to be admitted that a man of such truth of adaptation to the mind of the masses around him "becomes not merely representative, but actually a monopolizer and usurper of other minds." Indeed, a person of Napoleon's stamp and character almost ceases to have a private speech or opinion.

"He is so largely receptive, and is so placed, that he comes to be a bureau for all the intelligence, wit, and power of the age and country. He gains the battles; he makes the code; he makes the system of weights and measures; he levels the Alps; he builds the roads. All distinguished engineers, savans, statistas, report to him; so likewise do all good heads in every kind; he adopts the best measures, sets his stamp on them, and not on these alone, but on every happy and memorable expression. Every sentence spoken by Napoleon, and every line of his writing, deserves reading, as it is the sense of France.

"Bonaparte was the idol of common men, because he had in a transcendent degree the qualities and powers of common men. There is a certain satisfaction in coming down to the lowest ground of politics, for we get rid of cant and hypocrisy. Bonaparte wrought in common with that great class he represented, for power and wealth, but Bonaparte especially, without any scruple as to the means. All the sentiments which embarrass men's pursuit of these objects, he set aside. The sentiments were for women and children. . . . He would help himself with his hands and his head. With him is no miracle, and no magic. He is a worker in brass, in iron, in wood, in earth, in roads, in buildings, in money, and in troops, and a very consistent and wise master workman. He is never weak and literary, but acts with the solidity and precision of natural agents. He has not lost his native sense and sympathy with things. Men give way before such a man, as before natural events. To be sure, there are men enough who are immersed in things, as farmers, smiths, sailors, and mechanics generally; and we know how real and solid such men appear in the presence of scholars and grammarians: but these men ordinarily lack the power of arrangement, and are like hands without a head. But Bonaparte superadded to this mineral and animal force, insight and generalizations, so that men saw in him combined the natural and intellectual power, as if the sea and land had taken flesh and begun to cipher. Therefore the land and the sea seem to presuppose them. He came unto his own and they received him. This ciphering operative knows what he is working with and what is the right product. He knew the properties of gold and iron, of wheels and ships, of troops and diplomatists, and required that each should do after its kind."

By a fortunate combination of the times, his constitution, and his early circumstances, Napoleon was developed as the "pattern democrat."

"He had the virtues of his class, and the conditions for their activity. That common sense, which no sooner respects any end than it finds the means to effect it; the delight in the use of means, in the choice, simplification, and combining of means; the directness and thoroughness of his work; the prudence with which all was seen, and the energy with which all was done, make him the natural organ and head of what I may almost call from its extent the modern party."

"Nature must have far the greatest share in every success, and so in his. Such a man was wanted, and such a man was born: a man of stone and iron, capable of sitting on horseback sixteen or seventeen hours; of going many days together without rest or food, except by snatches; and with the speed and spring of a tiger in action; a man not embarrassed by any scruples—compact, instant, selfish, prudent, and of a perception which did not suffer itself to be balked or misled by any pretences of others, or any superstition, or any heat or haste of his own. He respected the power of nature and fortune, and ascribed to it his superiority, instead of valuing himself, like inferior men, on his opinionativeness, and waging war with nature. His favourite rhetoric lay in allusions to his star, and he pleased himself as well as the people, when he styled himself the 'Child of Destiny.' 'They charge me,' he said, 'with the commission of great crimes: men of my stamp do not commit crimes. Nothing has been more simple than my elevation; 'tis in vain to ascribe it to intrigue or crime; it was owing to the peculiarities of the times, and to my reputation of having fought well against the enemies of my country. I have always marched with the opinion of great masses, and with events. Of what use, then, would crimes be to me?' Again he said, speaking of his son, 'My son cannot replace me; I could not replace myself. I am the creature of circumstances.'"

Napoleon had a directness of action rarely before combined with such extraordinary comprehension. "He is a realist, terrific to all talkers, and confused truth-obscuring persons. He sees where the matter hinges, throws himself on the precise point of resistance, and slights all other considerations. He is strong in the right manner, namely, by insight. He never blundered into victory, but won his battles in his head, before he won them on the field. His principal means are in himself: he asks counsel of no other. In 1796 he writes to the Directory, 'I have conducted the campaign without consulting any one. I should have done no good if I had been under the necessity of conforming to the notions of another person. I have gained some advantages over superior forces, and when totally destitute of everything, because in the persuasion that your confidence was reposed in me, my actions were as prompt as my thoughts.'"

History is full of the imbecility of governors and ruling persons; and there is to this day a standing complaint that they seldom or never know what to do in times of difficulty.

"But Napoleon understood his business. Here was a man who, in each moment and emergency, knew what to do next. It is an immense comfort and refreshment to the spirits, not only of kings, but of citizens. Few men have any next; they live from hand to mouth, without plan, and are ever at the end of their line, and, after each action, wait for an impulse from abroad. Napoleon had been the first man of the world, if his ends had been purely public. As he is, he inspires confidence and vigour by the extraordinary unity of his action. He is firm, sure, self-denying, self-postponing, sacrificing everything to his aim—money, troops, generals, and his own safety also, to his aim; not misled, like common adventurers, by the splendour of his own means. 'Incidents ought not to govern policy,' he said, 'but policy incidents.' 'To be hurried away by every event is to have no political system at all.' His victories were only so many doors, and he never for a moment lost sight of his way onward, in the dazzle and uproar of the present circumstance. He knew what to do, and he flew to his mark. He would shorten a straight line to come at his object. Horrible anecdotes may, no doubt, be collected from his history, of the price at which he bought his successes; but he must not therefore be set down as cruel, but only as one who knew no impediment to his will; not blood-thirsty, not cruel—but woe to what thing or person stood in his way!—not blood-thirsty, but not sparing of blood, and pitiless. He saw only the object: the obstacle must give way. 'Sire, General Clarke cannot combine with General Junot, for the dreadful fire of the Austrian battery.' 'Let him carry the battery.'—'Sire, every regiment that approaches the heavy artillery is sacrificed. Sire, what orders?'—'Forward, forward.'"

Napoleon's vigour was guarded and tempered by the coolest prudence and punctuality. "A thunderbolt in the attack, he was found invulnerable in his intrenchments." Every movement was the result of calculation. In fighting a battle, he concerned himself extremely little about what he should do in case of success, but thought a great deal about what should be done in case of a reverse of fortune.

"The same prudence and good sense mark all his behaviour. His instructions to his secretary at the Tuileries are worth remembering—'During the night, enter my chamber as seldom as possible. Do not awake me when you have any good news to communicate: with that there is no hurry. But when you bring bad news, rouse me instantly, for then there is not a moment to be lost.' It was a whimsical economy of the same kind which dictated his practice, when general in Italy, in regard to his burdensome correspondence. He directed Bourrienne to leave all letters unopened for three weeks, and then observed with satisfaction how large a part of the correspondence had thus disposed of itself, and no longer required an answer. His achievement of business was immense, and enlarges the known powers of man. There have been many working kings—Ulysses, Alfred, Justinian, Czar Peter, William of Orange,—but none who accomplished a tithe of this man's performance."

To his manifold gifts of nature Napoleon added the advantage of having been born to a private and humble fortune. He passed through all the degrees of military service—was a citizen before he was an emperor—and had thus a knowledge of all the rights and claims of citizenship.

"His grand weapon, namely, the millions whom he directed, he owed to the representative character which clothed him. He interests us as he stands for France and Europe; and he exists as captain and king only as far as the Revolution, or the interest of the industrious masses, found an organ and a leader in him. In the social interests, he knew the meaning and value of labour, and threw himself naturally on that side. I like an incident mentioned by one of his biographers at St. Helena. 'When walking with Mrs. Balcombe, some servants carrying heavy boxes passed by on the road, and Mrs. Balcombe desired them, in rather an angry tone, to keep back. Napoleon interfered, saying, "Respect the burden, madam." In the time of the empire he directed attention to the improvement and embellishment of the markets of the capital. 'The market-place,' he said, 'is the Louvre of the common people.' . . .

"But though there is in particulars this identity between Napoleon and the mass of the people, his real strength lay in their conviction that he was their representative, in his genius and aims, not only when he courted, but when he controlled and even decimated them by his deadly conscriptions. He knew as well as any Jacobin in France how to philosophize on liberty and equality, and, when allusion was made to the precious blood of centuries which was spilled by the killing of the Duc d'Enghien, he suggested, 'Neither is my blood ditch water.' The people felt that no longer the throne was occupied, and the land sucked of all its nourishment, by a small class of legitimates, secluded from all community with the children of the soil, and holding the ideas and superstitions of a long-forgotten state of society. Instead of that vampire, a man of themselves held in the Tuileries knowledge and ideas like their own, opening, of course to them and their children, all places of power and trust. The day of sleepy, selfish policy, ever narrowing the means and opportunities of young men, was ended, and a new day of expansion and demand was come. A market for all the powers and productions of man was opened; brilliant prizes glittered in the eyes of youth and talent. The old, iron-bound, feudal France was changed into a young Ohio or New York; and those who smarted under the immediate rigours of the new monarch pardoned them as the necessary severities of the military system which had driven out the oppressor. And even when the majority of the people had begun to ask whether they had really gained anything under the exhausting levies of men and money of the new master, the whole talent of the country—in every rank and kindred—took his part, and defended him, as its natural patron and chieftain.

"Napoleon met this natural expectation. The necessity of his position required a hospitality to every sort of talent, and its appointment to trusts; and his feeling went along with his policy. . . . Every species of merit was sought and advanced under his government. 'I know,' he said, 'the depth or draught of water of every one of my generals.' Natural power was sure to be well received at his court. Seventeen men in his time were raised from common soldiers to the rank of king, marshal, duke, or general; and the crosses of his Legion of Honour were given to personal valour, and not to family connexion. 'When soldiers have been baptized in the fire of a battle-field, they have all one rank in my eyes.'"

Napoleon seems thus to have been marked out in the eyes of the masses as a natural-born king, as one who was really competent to rule and govern, and was accordingly raised with their sanction or assent to the office of command.

"There is something in the success of grand talent which enlists an universal sympathy. For, in the prevalence of sense and spirit over stupidity and malversation, all reasonable men have an interest, and, as intellectual beings, we feel the air purified by the electric shock, when material force is overthrown by intellectual energies. As soon as we are removed out of the reach of local and accidental partialities, man feels that Napoleon fights for him; these are honest victories; this strong steam-engine does our work. Whatever appeals to the imagination, by transcending the ordinary limits of human ability, wonderfully encourages and liberates us. This capacious head, revolving and sovereignly disposing trains of affairs, and animating such multitudes of agents; this eye, which looked through Europe; this prompt invention; this inexhaustible resource; what events, what romantic pictures! What strange situations! . . . We cannot, in the universal imbecility, indecision, and indolence of men, sufficiently congratulate ourselves on this strong and ready actor, who took occasion by the beard, and showed us how much may be accomplished by the mere force of such virtues as all men possess in less degrees; namely, by punctuality, by personal attention, by courage, and thoroughness."

Emerson would cite Napoleon, in his earlier years, as a model of prudence. His power does not consist in any extravagant force, wild enthusiasm, or singular capacity of persuasion, "but in the exercise of common sense on each emergency, instead of abiding by rules and customs." The grand lesson taught by him is that which native vigour uniformly teaches,—that it is always acceptable, and may find its opportunities.

"To what heaps of cowardly doubts is not that man's life an answer. When he appeared, it was the belief of military men that there could be nothing new in war; as it is the belief of men to-day, that nothing more can be undertaken in politics, or in church, or in letters, or in trade, or in farming, or in our social manners and customs; and as it is, at all times, the belief of society, that the world is used up. But Bonaparte knew better than society, and, moreover, knew that he knew better. I think all men know, better than they do. Bonaparte relied on his own sense, and did not care for other people's. The world treated his novelties just as it treats every body's novelties—made infinite objection; mustered all the impediments: but he snapped his finger at their objections."

How he rose through successive gradations of eminence till he reached the loftiest place in Europe, is matter of history more or less familiar to all readers. Who does not see that he was eminently the creature of his age; a man of nerve and vigour, sense, accomplishments,—every way fitted to take the lead in a great social revolution? His grand fault is, that he was nowise conscious of any mission to act publicly for the benefit of his race, but wrought only or mainly for the satisfaction of his personal ambition. In this respect, however, he is not the less a faithful representative of the prevailing aims of the nineteenth century. It is for a personal importance that we are all striving. A worldly success is the great pursuit of life. As is well known, there is also a too general indifference about the means. Since it is not mainly worth, but social consequence, that commands respect, in all departments of society, the social consequence is sought after, often with an utter unscrupulousness in regard to the mode of its attainment. The virtues and abilities which are most esteemed are precisely those which Napoleon displayed in his career. They are in general worthy of respect; but the ends for which they are exercised, splendid as the results may be, are not the ends for which men ought exclusively to live. Talent, activity, brilliant successes, shall be honoured; they naturally command the esteem of men; but if they have no purpose beyond a material aggrandisement of the individual, if their final scope is but a conventional exaltation, their aim is partial, frivolous, and false. Man does not through them answer the design of his existence. He dwarfs his true greatness. It is a sacrifice of the eternal for the temporary. Moreover, it is even in life a failure, since it accords not with the constitution of the world. It is a thing of to-day, which Fate disowns to-morrow. Here, again, however, we must return to Emerson:—

"I call Napoleon the agent or attorney of the middle class of modern society: of the throng who fill the markets, shops, counting-houses, manufactories, ships, of the modern world, aiming to be rich. He was the agitator, the destroyer of prescription, the internal improver, the liberal, the radical, the inventor of means, the opener of doors and markets, the subverter of monopoly and abuse. Of course, the rich and aristocratic did not like him. England, the centre of capital, and Rome and Austria, centres of tradition and genealogy, opposed him. The consternation of the dull and conservative classes, the terror of the foolish old men and old women of the Roman conclave—who in their despair took hold of anything, and would cling to red-hot iron—the vain attempts of statisticians to amuse and deceive him, of the Emperor of Austria to bribe him, and the instinct of the young, ardent, and active men, everywhere, which pointed him out as the giant of the middle class, make his history bright and commanding."

In all this glowing delineation, whatever worth or merit Napoleon had has been fairly and faithfully exhibited. There remains, however, another side or view of him and his procedure, which is also rendered with no less spirit and fidelity.

"He had the virtues of the masses of his constituents: he had also their vices. I am sorry that the brilliant picture has its reverse. But that is the fatal quality which we discover in our pursuit of wealth, that it is treacherous, and is bought by the breaking or weakening of the sentiments; and it is inevitable that we should find the same fact in the history of this unscrupulous champion, who proposed to himself simply a brilliant career, without any stipulation or scruple concerning the means."

"Bonaparte was singularly destitute of generous sentiments. The highest placed individual in the most cultivated age and population of the world, he has not the merit of common truth and honesty. He is unjust to all his generals, egotistic, and monopolizing; meanly stealing the credit of their great actions from Kellermann, from Bernadotte; intriguing to involve his faithful Junot in hopeless bankruptcy, in order to drive him to a distance from Paris, because the familiarity of his manners offends the new pride of his throne. He is a boundless liar. The official paper, his 'Moniteurs,' and all his bulletins, are proverbs for saying what he wished to be believed; and (what is worse) he sat, in his premature old age, in his lonely island, coldly falsifying facts, and dates, and characters, and giving to history a theatrical éclat. Like all Frenchmen, he has a passion for stage effect. Every action that breathes of generosity is poisoned by his calculation. His star, his love of glory, his doctrine of the immortality of the soul, are all French. 'I must dazzle and astonish. If I were to give the liberty of the press, my power could not last three days.' To make a great noise is his favourite design. 'A great reputation is a great noise: the more there is made the farther off it is heard. Laws, institutions, monuments, nations, all fall; but the noise continues, and resounds in after ages.' His doctrine of immortality is simply fame. His theory of influence is not flattering. 'There are two levers for moving men, interest and fear. Love is a silly infatuation, depend upon it. Friendship is but a name. . . . I know very well that I have no true friends. As long as I continue to be what I am, I may have as many pretended friends as I please. Leave sensibility to women: but men should be firm in heart and purpose, or they should have nothing to do with war and government.'

"He was thoroughly unscrupulous. He would steal, slander, assassinate, drown, and poison, as his interest dictated. He had no generosity, but more vulgar hatred. He was intensely selfish; he was perfidious; he cheated at cards; he was a prodigious gossip, and opened letters; and delighted in his infamous police; and rubbed his hands with joy when he had intercepted some morsel of intelligence, concerning the men and women about him, boasting that 'he knew everything,' and interfered with the cutting of the dresses of the women; and listened after the hurrahs and compliments of the street, incognito. . . . In short, when you have penetrated through all this immense power and splendour, you were not dealing with a gentleman at last, but with an impostor and a rogue; and he fully deserved the epithet of Jupiter Scapin, or a sort of scamp Jupiter."

It ought to be mentioned that the two parties into which modern society is divided, the Democrat and the Conservative, differ only as young and old—the party which stands on its possessions, and the party which strives to realize possessions. "The democrat is a young conservative; the conservative is an old democrat, ripe and gone to seed; because both parties stand on the ground of the supreme value of property, which one endeavours to get and the other to keep. Bonaparte may be said to represent the whole history of the party—its youth and its age—yes, and with poetic justice, its fate, in his own."

"Here was an experiment under the most favourable conditions, of the powers of intellect without conscience. Never was such a leader so endowed, and so weaponed; never leader found such aids and followers. And what was the result of this vast talent and power, of these immense armies, burned cities, squandered treasures, immolated millions of men, of this demoralized Europe? It came to no result. All passed away, like the smoke of his artillery, and left no trace. He left France smaller, poorer, and feebler than he found it, and the whole contest for freedom had to be begun again. The attempt was in principle suicidal. France served him with life, and limb, and estate as long as it could identify its interest with him; but when men saw, that after victory was another war; after the destruction of armies new conscriptions; and they who had toiled so desperately were never nearer to their reward;—they deserted him. Men found that this absorbing egotism was deadly to other men. It resembled the torpedo, which inflicts a succession of shocks on any one who takes hold of it, producing spasms, which contract the muscles of the hand, so that the man cannot open his fingers, and the animal inflicts new and more violent shocks, until he paralyzes and kills his victim. So this exorbitant egotist narrowed, impoverished, and absorbed the power and existence of those who served him; and the universal cry of France and Europe, in 1814, was, 'Enough of Bonaparte.'

"It was not Bonaparte's fault. He did all that in him lay, to live and thrive without moral principle. It was the nature of things, the eternal law of man and of the world, which balked and ruined him; and the result, in a million experiments, will be the same. Every experiment, by multitudes or by individuals, that has a sensual and selfish aim, will fail. The pacific P^{our}rier will be as inefficient as the pernicious Napoleon. As long as our civilization is essentially one of property, of fences, of exclusiveness, it will be mocked by delusions. Our riches will leave us sick, there will be bitterness in our laughter, and our wine will burn our mouth. Only that good profits, which we can taste with all doors open, and which serves all men."

If Napoleon is to stand as the representative of the popular external life and aims of the nineteenth century, Emerson conceives that its other half, its poet, is to be found in Goethe—"a man quite domesticated in the century, breathing its air, enjoying its fruits, impossible at any earlier time, and taking away by his colossal parts the reproach of weakness, which, but for him, would lie on the intellectual works of the period."

"He appears at a time when a general culture has spread itself, and has smoothed down all sharp individual traits; when, in the absence of heroic characters, a social comfort and co-operation have come in. There is no poet, but scores of poetic writers: no Columbus, but hundreds of post captains with transit telescope, barometer, and concentrated soup and pemmican; no Demosthenes, no Chatham, but any number of clever parliamentary and forensic debaters; no prophet or saint, but colleges of divinity; no learned men, but learned societies, a cheap press, reading rooms, and book clubs, without number. There was never such a miscellany of facts. The world extends itself like American trade. We conceive Greek or Roman life, life in the middle ages, to be a simple and comprehensible affair; but modern life to respect a multitude of things which is distracting.

"Goethe was the philosopher of this multiplicity, hundred-handed, Argus-eyed, able and happy to cope with this rolling miscellany of facts and sciences, and, by his own versatility, to dispose of them with ease. A manly mind unembarrassed by the variety of coats of convention with which life had got encrusted, easily able by his subtlety to pierce these, and to draw his strength from nature, with which he lived in full communion. What is strange, too, he lived in a small town, in a petty state, in a defeated state, and in a time when Germany played no such leading part in the world's affairs, as to swell the bosom of her sons with any metropolitan pride, such as might have cheered a French, or English, or once a Roman or Attic genius. Yet there is no trace of provincial limitation in his muse. He is not a debtor to his position, but was born with a free and controlling genius. . . .

"He was the soul of his century. If that was learned, and had become, by population, compact organization, and drill of parts, one great exploring expedition, accumulating a glut of facts and fruits too fast for any hitherto existing savans to classify, this man's mind had ample chambers for the distribution of all. He had a power to unite the detached atoms by their own law. He has clothed our modern existence with poetry. . . . He has explained the distinction between the antique and modern spirit and art. He has defined art, its scope and laws. He has said the best things about nature that ever were said. He treats nature as the old philosophers, as the seven wise masters did, and, with whatever loss of French tabulation and dissection, poetry and humanity remain to us; and they have some doctoral skill. Eyes are better, on the whole, than telescopes or microscopes. He has contributed a key to many parts of nature, through the rare turn for unity and simplicity in his mind. . . .

"What distinguishes Goethe for French and English readers is a property which he shares with his nation, a habitual reference to interior truth. In England and in America, there is a respect for talent, and if it is exerted in support of any ascertained or intelligible interest or party, or in regular opposition to any, the public is satisfied. In France, there is even a greater delight in intellectual brilliancy, for its own sake. And, in all these countries men of talent write from talent. It is enough if the understanding is occupied, the taste propitiated,—so many columns, so many hours, filled in a lively and creditable way. The German intellect wants the French sprightliness, the fine practical understanding of the English, and the American adventure; but it has a certain probity which never rests in a superficial performance, but asks steadily, to what end? A German public asks for a controlling sincerity. Here is activity of thought; but what is it for? What does the man mean?"

Goethe teaches the pre-eminence of spiritual culture. The end of life is to be the development and perfecting of the spiritual nature. Emerson inculcates the same doctrine. Here, however, we are compelled to close our quotations from this book. To some it may seem singular and superfluous to have quoted so largely from a volume which may be purchased for a trifle. In justification we may say that cheap books are numberless, and therefore cannot be all accessible to general readers. A wise selection is required; and, moreover, readers cannot always know beforehand what books are worthy of attention. We venture to recommend this to all such as wish for something in a book beyond amusement. It has more wisdom and practical downright sense in it than will be found in whole circulating libraries. It is honestly worthy of all the time and pains required to master it, and will yield no inconsiderable results to any attentive reader. It is the expression of a mind highly gifted, thoroughly and accurately informed in various knowledge, filled with a pure purpose,—a mind admirably fitted to enlighten others, and to show them the way onwards through obscure and difficult investigations. Let the writings of such a man be widely known, weighed with candour, and the truths they yield adopted in human practice. Something of latitude must in this age be permitted to opinion; yet we strenuously recommend that Emerson may have no undue quarter for his opinions, should any of them, after a due examination, be found false, partial, or exaggerated. Truth, knowledge, wisdom—to the end that we may incorporate them in life—these are what we want; these we should reverence and accept, wheresoever they may be found, permitting no prejudice, no vanity, to defraud us of the possession.

WE are sorry to be unable to speak of this book in the manner which its pretensions would seem to claim.

(1) "Shirley." By the author of "Jane Eyre."

Indeed, the extracts appended to the publisher's advertisements, and purporting to be specimens of the opinions expressed by some contemporary journals, might lead us to fear that we were perversely singular, did we not know how to estimate at its real value such piecemeal criticism. We have been, we confess, disappointed. A comparison of the present with the earlier production of the same hand would well induce many to reconsider the verdict which they passed; not, indeed, unanimously, though in the main, it was a favourable one, two years ago. The opponents of "Jane Eyre" (and they were "legion") will find in "Shirley" much to cavil at—more to condemn. The somewhat offensive portraiture of a female character in the one is so little altered in the other, that we can hardly hail it as an improvement, or even a sign of progress. "Jane Eyre" had, at least, the charm of originality; the freshness of the colouring no less than the novelty of the subject, arrested and interested us, while it also extorted our praise. Its faults—arising, perhaps, from a desire to express strongly rather than delicately, what was strongly felt—were, indeed, numerous; but still, we were willing to hope they were capable of emendation, without marring aught of the genuine spirit that breathed throughout the work. But, as we said, we have been disappointed in our hopes, when even thus much cannot be urged in favour of its successor. Here, either blinded by too indiscriminate praise, or too eager in asserting a complete triumph over the reign of convention, the authoress has outdone herself. So little satisfied are we with the change, that we would have preferred another "Jane Eyre," with all its errors, rather than sacrifice so entirely all its merits. We now discover, with concern, that the writer's is but a limited skill. With her, to feel deeply is to paint coarsely, to mould with spirit is to leave deplorable excrescences on the work. She cannot polish without wearing off all vigour, character, and truth. The world complained of her last work, because the sentiments, however genuine, were too lightly veiled, and the expression of them too little suited to the taste of the age. The authoress has ill-judgedly or wilfully mistaken its opinion. We are as far from being prudish as from being over-aristocratic. It is not because Jane Eyre is low-born or a governess that her sentiments displease us, neither is it because Shirley is more highly bred that we can tolerate her utter recklessness of expression and thought. The error consists in making a woman and a heroine, one in whom we are to take special interest and delight, such that her sex disowns her—nay, will even blush for her. With all her claims on our commendation, therefore, we cannot but say that the authoress has lost ground. What was original has here become simply imaginary, and unreal; and she has marred freshness by bombast, homeliness by unmeaning common-place. The same mistaken notions pervade her whole work, and involve her in a crowd of absurdities. Sincerum est nisi vas, quodcumque infundis acescit.

• We cannot better illustrate what we mean than by going more in detail into the work before us. We refrain from giving any extracts, in consideration of the value of our space. Shirley, of course, must first attract our attention; yet we hardly know why any undue importance is conceded to her. There is no reason why the tale might not, omissis omittendis, have been called "Caroline;" or, even "The Three Curates." There are at least materials for several tales here squandered in profusion. The attempt to make Shirley what is vulgarly called a "character," has, we think, proved an unequivocal and signal failure. We have stated our opinion, that she is far from being a just representation of her sex. We think, that to produce such was not even the authoress's intention. We are tempted to be ill-natured, and to hazard a solution of what may appear an enigma. It is almost self-evident that, so far as her course of fiction has hitherto gone, the writer has drawn the image of her heroine from but one model, its features slightly varied, as circumstances required, but without presenting in three different novels an extraordinary and unmistakable likeness, such as it is impossible to regard as casual. Are we overstepping our office in inquiring "whether this is a portrait of what the writer is, or wishes, or fancies herself to be?" We might remind the reader of Lord Byron's taste for giving in his poetry what has well been called, a "loose incognito" of himself. Vanity, morbid vanity, does such an attempt betray. But, while we condemn both as equally absurd, and something more than absurd, we must do the latter the justice of saying, that the effect they produce is widely different. Toleration of error impliedly carries with it somewhat of condonation, besides, there are many points of relief in, if there were not much to be said in excuse for, Lord Byron's self-portraiture. Lara, Manfred, the Giaour, and others, are not without interest; further, they are characters too far removed from our own sphere to render themselves distasteful. Besides, the self-idolatry is too harmless to put us out of temper with the author. His design, vain and foolish as it is, we can afford to smile at. Those "dark imaginings" on which his withered soul loved to dwell, the burning language, in which we read the outpouring of the poet's own bitter complaints, thus given only in a more current shape to the world, afford materials for many able passages; with which, gifted as their author is with the eloquence of woe, it is not unnatural that we should sympathise at least in some sort. At all events, none can say their patience is tried. But in "Shirley," nature, taste, all conspire to induce us to rebel against so gratuitous a self-gratification, or self-glorification; and this, too, in spite of the utmost deference towards a lady, and one who has pleased us once not a little. We would willingly have believed that common report had erred on the question of authorship. The style of thought and expression is so marvellously unfeminine, that we know not which to condemn most, the unblushing avowal, by implication, that the writer identifies herself therewith, or the vanity that prompted its publication. Besides, the self-portraiture here, somewhat more pretentiously concealed, becomes on that account more intolerable; we are jealous, too, of the assumptive spirit displayed throughout the work, and we gladly take our revenge by avoiding those parts for the sake of which it is only too evident that a certain event is described, or a certain character introduced. For what other earthly purpose is such stress laid upon such an incident as the Village-school Festival, but to enable Shirley, and Caroline, or rather the authoress, to hold forth on the subject of nature, accompanying it with a discourse on mythology and metaphysics that is positively startling? "These be thy gods, O Israel;" we can never be thankful enough that we are not obliged to live under such a creed. Many, we feel sure, will not waste their eye-sight on so gratuitous a lecture, but will, like the Nigger, exclaim against the tyranny of uniting the infliction of the lash with that of a sermon. Equally uncalled for, except with a like intent, is the appearance on the same occasion of the "prize mechanic," William Farren, with the historically-inclined overlooker John Scott, whereby the taste of these two most philosophic young ladies is gratified by a discussion on politics, ad nauseam. Whence Caroline derived her knowledge, or acquired on the instant a taste she has never before discovered, we must leave to the reader's sagacity to determine. But our present intention, from which we have somewhat wandered, was to examine the breadth and depth of our heroine's character,—one in its conception as repugnant to good taste, as it is foreign to even the most artificial spirit of romance. What is she represented to be, or rather what is she not? Beauty, talent, wealth alone, only place her on a level with other idols of romance or the drama. It is but fair to confess that she is something more. A second Jane Eyre as she would appear uncramped by her position and circumstances; a somewhat rational and subdued Catherine Linton, transported from the chilling neighbourhood of "Wuthering Heights," and put on her best behaviour as a responsible land-owner amidst the luxuries of Fieldhead Manor. A blue- stocking of an importunate description, she can rave of Oceanus and the Titans—of Nature on her knees before heaven—can recognise in her Nature, (while in that position, we suppose!) the true prototype of Eve; whereas, Milton (more shame for him!) neglected this obvious model, and, though his penetration into the regions of Sin, Death, and Hell, was so truthful, could paint the innocence of "our first mother" by no more proper image than one borrowed from his cook.

Yet, with all this fine discrimination of what a woman should be, "Captain Kceldar" is a very sceptic to her better feelings—her practice is as wide as the poles asunder from her principles. Young ladies there may no doubt be found who, in their impatience of society's control, may occasionally breathe a wish that they had been born of the stronger and freer sex. Let such, we say, read "Shirley," and learn to be content. Wayward, fantastical being! she must be wooed in the accents of very churlishness, in repartee of the most approved Amabean temper. Haughty, high-spirited Amazon! when won, she must be held fast with bit and bridle, which she will champ the while for very defiance of the bonds that curb her ancient liberty. Bold the man that meets her angry glance of withering scorn! Mr. Donne, the low-bred curate, gets himself very nearly kicked for the experiment; we thought this incident alone was wanting to crown the grand conception. Bitten by a mad dog (as supposed), she conceals her terrors for three weeks till they prey visibly on her frame, and then, one being alone is to be trusted with the secret; and that person, not one of her own sex, her bosom friend, nor even her respected rector, Mr. Helstone, but a "young old cher ami," as Tom Shuffleton would call him, half lover, half French master, and whose better half his pupil eventually becomes. He is bound to eternal silence; he is to be alone admitted to the scene of her expected ravings; with his own hand he is to administer the poisonous narcotic that is to rescue her from the feather-bed. And this is character, and incident, and fine original writing! Can it be so? Are we mistaken? Have we missed the right point whence to discern the true heroic, which, thinks our authoress, like charity, conceals a multitude of sins? We are inclined to believe we have not; and yet, in the nineteenth century, this is attempted to be forced upon the public. One of the laudatory extracts, above alluded to, goes so far as to tell us (and heaven knows we had need of the information,) that "there is something in 'Shirley' akin to Jane Austen's books, or Maria Edgeworth's, or Walter Scott's." Here is a fair specimen of random criticism. The latter artist, in spite of our critic, we put out of court, and we think we might safely leave the two ladies to contradict the assertion. Yet will the curious inquire, Whom has the critic in his eye to compare with "Shirley?" Will he echo answer, "Elizabeth Bennet, of Pride and Prejudice?" Judge, reader, between them: here behold "the counterfeit presentment of two" women; the one, a bold but artistic sketch of an every-day character, the other elaborated out of all truth, the mere fantastic creation of a limited imagination and a morbid mind. One thing Miss Austen and Miss Edgeworth never forgot in their pictures, whether of vulgar or genteel life—the charm that belongs to truth and reality. But such has no allurements for the authoress of "Shirley;" effect is all she looks for—startling effect—to produce which, after having in one novel exhausted her view of nature, she seeks for a monstrous birth. And to set off the chief figure, the others are drawn in a style unworthy of the same hand. What is not in the authoress's sense of the word original, is painfully common-place. The affection of two such women as Caroline and Shirley were impossible, if the latter be a truthful representation; the amity of the lion and the lamb is not more ideal. We do not profess to understand the Yorke family; their oddities may be "locally" authentic: we must leave their merits to be discerned by the initiated. Meanwhile, we may in silence admire the dominus utriusque lingue, and weigh in sceptical mood the historical probability of blending with a broad Yorkshire lingo the pure intonation of the French accent.

We have yet another complaint to make, where we already feel that enough has been said. The last lines of "Shirley" we read with an intense desire to understand our authoress, and to part on good terms. This we find impossible. After remarking that perhaps the reader would be glad to have the moral pointed out to him, the book concludes with the pious wish that heaven may speed him in the discovery. We must certainly have been at a loss for an interpretation of these words, when we are tempted to fancy them ironical. Now, without subscribing to the doctrine of the extreme school, that would point with a strict meaning what is intended merely to amuse, we still cannot but agree in the verdict that puts all unmeaning works out of the pale of true art. We wish to be understood distinctly. The proper end of romance, no less than of her twin sister, the drama, must not be forgotten. The right purpose once overstepped, either may admit of the grossest perversion and abuse; once made the means of pandering to the bad passions of men,—false sentiment, be it remembered, being one,—its occupation is obviously lost. We might have fairly expected that in her third production, a writer would think it high time to employ her acknowledged powers in the attainment of more solid if not more worthy results. In a tale that reflects neither the features of nature, nor real character, nor just sentiment, was it unreasonable to look for design, or, if you will, a moral?—by which we mean, something more than a mere dancing of the puppets during three volumes, and then doing no more than marrying up all who were marriageable,—a consummation that might have been arrived at, without much violence, on their first introduction. We have in a memorable instance in our age seen the long-established romance give place to a style that, disguised under an apparently easy garb, carries with it a deep, lasting, and serious moral. But it is the pencil in a master's hand, the magician's rod wielded by the arch-enchanter, that has been all-powerful and successful. Let those who would follow Thackeray in his bold desertion of a beaten track, beware of the dangers that beset every footstep. In "Shirley" the attempt has been made: we fear, or, perhaps, we hope, the opinion of the world will not sanction a further effort. It is at best but the imitation, by the journeyman, of the form without the substance. Petty conceits, quips of style, mere bubbles upon the stream, will not fill, much less atone for, the void that is every where apparent. The great merit of Thackeray is his taste for picturesque effect, which he produces by an ingenious, yet simple process, of grouping together in amusing contrast the salient absurdities and contradictions in men; he is quite content to take his materials from every-day life. The great fault of "Currer Bell" is a neglect of the picturesque, even where it should strike her most obviously, in her observation of the face of nature. Graphic power she undoubtedly possesses, and of an extraordinary kind;

yet her pictures are like those of Turner, not calculated to please. Like him, the images she chooses are not such as fall under usual observation. We could hardly expect her to be more successful when she came to treat of the more complex subject of man.

To deny the present volumes any merit is not our wish, were it in our power, though we leave its elucidation to abler hands. In what we have advanced above to their discredit, it may possibly happen that some may not concur—be that as it may, we cannot but remember the words of a great critic on a triumph, temporary because ill-deserved, that, "though it may make the unskilful admire, it cannot but make the judicious grieve; the censure of which one must in your allowance o'erweigh a whole theatre of others."

SKETCHES OF THE NEWSPAPER PRESS.'

No history is more full of curious anecdotes than that of newspapers. It exhibits the struggles of the most active intellects with all the obstacles that for time and power have thrown in the way of their success; for the progress of no class has been more vigorously opposed, or more successfully pursued, than that of the men who have wrought the resources of the press. It is a gigantic engine, of unlimited power,—for evil as well as for good. It was, the other day, remarked by a bold philosopher, that of all the curses inflicted on civilization by mankind, none is equal in magnitude to the press. This, which seems a daring paradox is, like most other paradoxes, more extravagant in its aspect than in its reality, for it seems a natural law that tares will grow up with the wheat, in all the productions of human industry, ingenuity, or skill. Books and papers, endlessly multiplying, form so many stars to shed light in the intellectual world, and as their radiance increases, humanity is enabled to pursue more certainly its course towards perfect civilization; yet such is the weakness of our nature, that we value good things more when they are scarce than when they are abundant, and because knowledge lies around us scattered in mountains over the surface of the world, it is neglected by many, and by some despised, while before the age of printing, when knowledge lay hidden in gloomy mines, learning was revered and ambitious men consented to labour, as though in the bowels of the earth, in search of the coveted ore.

Whether our philosophy or the reader's patience be the most durable, is a point to be considered; but we intend at present to make no further call on either; but to link and weave together a number of the interesting anecdotes treasured up in the work before us. Mr. Knight Hunt has collected a mass of curious details. With an easy pen, he has in a graceful style recorded the progress of the newspaper press, from the 23d of May, 1622, when the first number of the earliest paper—The Weekly News—was published, to the present day. His book recommends itself by its abundant interest and its original character. Full of entertainment, and infused with the right spirit, it must secure for its author a familiar acquaintance with a very large class of readers.

On the 23d of May, then, in the year 1622, appeared the first newspaper. Before that time printed sheets of intelligence from the counties and from the continent had been occasionally circulated in London, but no regular record of events had been hitherto attempted. The infant power at first assumed, as was to be expected, a rough, a puny, and an incomplete form; but from its birth the rulers of the country possessed sufficient discernment to perceive that it was destined to work great changes, to spread truth and create an interest in politics, to link men together by a commonality of sentiments, to give them strength by union, and courage by exhortation. We therefore find persecution, in all shapes, employed, with ridicule and derision, to stunt the growth of the press; but hostility creates ardour, and the founders of this Fourth Estate were not to be subdued or disheartened. They printed books in secret, and others as privately read them. They were prepared by means of presses set up in the remotest chambers of large rural houses, where the work was carried on by stealth, and the printers were supplied with money, food and drink, by the master or the mistress of the place, without the knowledge of servants. Thus were embodied the speculations of earnest thinkers, and these curious establishments, scattered over England, gave birth to immense numbers of productions subversive of the feudal system. Flying sheets of intelligence or advice were during the civil war transmitted from province to province, sewn between the saddle flaps of riders who frequently knew not the dangerous nature of their mission, and where this was impossible, the wings of the carrier pigeon performed the service.

However, in spite of stealth and precaution these secret doings were noised abroad, and the authorities frequently made a victim of the unhappy printer. In the metropolis especially, the process was dangerous. An inquisition of the press was formed, spies were employed, censors overlooked all printed sheets, and parties of men patrolled the town at night, occasionally directed by an informer to the door of some unlucky patron of free opinions. In the time of Charles II. one Twyn, a printer of obnoxious books, was suddenly called up at midnight by a loud knocking at his door. After vainly endeavouring to destroy the offending sheets, he opened to the intruders. They guarded all the avenues to the house, searched it, collected the fatal evidence, hurried the poor wretch to prison, whence in a day or two he emerged to appear before Judge Hyde for condemnation. His punishment was death inflicted in a manner too ferocious to describe. Such were the means by which the king sought to make loyalty an article in the national creed.

Twyn's story is one of countless instances; of these, many are related by Mr. Knight Hunt, but we pass over the first volume of his narrative, interesting as it is, and push on to the description of the modern newspaper press. The fortunes of the living daily papers have been marked by great vicissitudes. The men who established them and gave them a position were often the most original characters. Some of a lively and brilliant genius; others of an indefatigable industry in scheming; others of an acute knowledge of public taste; but all possessed of that very peculiar class of abilities required to ensure the success of a newspaper. Before entering on the details of their fortunes, let us quote some curious statistics connected with the press of the present day. It will be seen that in spite of oppressive imposts, levied with the professed view of checking its growth, it has increased to an immense extent.

"During the last year, 1849, it has been estimated that the press sent forth, in the daily papers alone, a printed surface amounting in the twelve months to 349,308,000 superficial feet; and if to these are added all the papers printed weekly and fortnightly in London and the provinces, the whole amounts to 1,446,150,000 square feet; upon which the press has left in legible characters the proof of its labours.

"A summary of the British newspaper press, arranged according to the locality and to political bias at the end of the year 1849, offers the following results:—in London, 113 papers; in England, 223; in Wales, 11; in Scotland, 85; in Ireland, 101; in the British Islands, 14; general summary: liberal papers, 218; conservative, 174; neutral 155. The total number of journals of all shades of opinion being five hundred and forty-seven."

The Letters of Junius have given immortality to the name of the Public Advertiser, which preceded the Public Ledger, the oldest London paper now in existence. We have many curious particulars in connexion with this journal, and its system of theatrical intelligence illustrates a remarkable feature in the newspaper economy of that day:—

"Garriek was one of the shareholders in The Public Advertiser, a fact which has its significance in reference to the newspaper critiques in those great days of the theatre. At that time dramatic intelligence cost the journals much more than foreign news, and such was the interest taken in all theatrical events, that the newspapers had messengers whose duty it was to wait about the theatres to get the earliest possible copy of each new bill of the next day's performance. When these were got, the scouts ran off to the office; and who first delivered the then important sheet was rewarded with a shilling, or half-a-crown, according to the importance of the news he had secured."

From a notice of the names formerly given to newspapers in London,—The World, The Devil, Man, Old Maid, and Monitor, The Test, Prater, Contest, Humourist, Centinel, Crabtree and Busy Body, we pass to the sketch given in this work of the fortunes of the Morning Chronicle, the second brother among the living members of this great family. Unfortunately in this, as in all families, (or most,) there is much dissension, and still more jealousy, with very little consistency. The paper was started in 1769, under the editorship of its printer and proprietor, Mr. William Woodfall. It flourished but feebly until there came from Scotland James Perry, a man whose life had run a varied course, but whose abilities were of a high order. When young, he entered this metropolis without resources. Failing to procure a mercantile situation, he turned to the pen, and wrote, though without any prospect of success.

"There was at that time an opposition journal, published under the title of The General Advertiser, and being a new paper, it was the practice of the proprietors to exhibit the whole contents of it upon boards, upon different shop windows and doors, in the same manner as we now see the theatrical placards displayed. Perry being unemployed, amused himself with writing essays and scraps of poetry for this paper, which he dropped into the editor's box and which were always printed. Calling one day at the shop of Messrs. Richardson & Urquhart, booksellers, to whom he had letters of recommendation, he found the latter busily engaged, and apparently enjoying an article in the General Advertiser."

After Mr. Urquhart had finished the perusal, Perry put the usual question to him, whether he had heard of any situation that would suit him? to which he replied in the negative; at the same time holding out the paper he said,—

"If you could write articles such as this, I could give you immediate employment." It happened to be a humorous essay written by Perry himself. This he instantly intimated to Mr. Urquhart, and gave him another letter in the same handwriting, which he had proposed to drop into the letter-box. Mr. Urquhart expressed great satisfaction at the discovery, and informed him that he was one of the principal proprietors of the paper—that they wanted just such a person, and, as there was to be a meeting of the proprietors that same evening, he would propose Perry as a writer. He did so; and the next day he was engaged at a salary of a guinea a week, and an additional half-guinea for assistance to the London Evening Post, then printed by the same person."

Perry succeeded well in his new vocation. By assiduous industry and lively talent, he "wrote up" and "pushed" the paper into a large circulation, and by the commencement of the great French Revolution was enabled, with Mr. Gray, to purchase the Morning Chronicle. He wrote the gay and graceful, his partner composed the profound and serious articles, whereupon it was currently said the paper was sure to succeed, for it carried both sail and ballast. It carried a sting also, for two criminal informations were filed against Perry and his printer. On the first of these Sir John Scott was Attorney General, and prosecuted the case with rancorous zeal. He fancied he knew the temper of the jurymen, and especially counted on the vote of a gentleman who supplied the Dean and Chapter of Westminster with coals. That fellow, he thought, must decide for the crown; but when the jury withdrew, and the foreman observed that of course the verdict must be against the free-spoken editor, the coalman said, No,—the Attorney General had been abusive, but unable to prove his case. He should therefore vote for an acquittal. The other jurors argued stubbornly pro and con, until the coal-merchant pulled forth his night-cap, remarked that his mind was made up, and that he should enjoy a nap until the rest came into his views. At length they yielded; the Attorney General was defeated, and the Editor was at liberty. "You may be sure," says the narrator of this anecdote, "that Perry took his coals afterwards from this sturdy juror."

Campbell and Coleridge were contributors to the Morning Chronicle, and the latter, at the time when he enlisted into the light cavalry, sent a poem of a few lines to Perry, soliciting the loan of a guinea for a distressed author. He received it immediately, and was afterwards employed on the journal, but neither he nor Campbell ever shone as newspaper writers. They wrote slowly, and too feebly for the polemical columns of a daily paper. After them Black joined the staff in 1810, as a reporter. In 1819, about the period of the Manchester massacre, he wrote constantly for the Chronicle, and its sale rose to about four thousand copies a-day,—then considered a fair circulation. After Perry's death the paper sold for 42,000*l.* to the proprietors of the Observer, who disposed of it in 1834, for a much smaller sum.

"The Morning Chronicle," says our author, "must not be dismissed without remembering, that Sheridan speaks of it in his 'Critic'; that Canning linked it into one of his poems; that Byron honoured it with a 'Familiar Epistle'; that Hazlitt wrote for its columns some of the finest criticisms in our own or any other language; and that for it also were the first 'Sketches by Box' prepared."

Next comes the Morning Post, a fashionable paper, once celebrated for its advertising connexions with horse and carriage dealers. Its history is a striking example of the various fortunes that befall a daily journal. In 1795 it sold no more than three hundred and fifty copies, and was disposed of with house and printing materials for 600*l.* It was bought by Daniel Stuart, who quickly made much of his bargain. Different journals were then considered as famous for different classes of advertisements, though each took a variety of others, while it preserved its own distinction. The Morning Herald and The Times were patronised by auctioneers; The Morning Post by horse and carriage dealers; The Public Ledger by missionaries and merchants; The Morning Chronicle by booksellers. Perry sought to give his journal a literary character, and was careful to produce a striking display of book announcements.

This Stuart observed. The love of fame and money was gratified, he saw, by the show of advertisements. "Sixty or seventy short advertisements, filling three columns, by Longman one day, by Cadell & Co. another! Bless me, what an extensive business they must have!"

The auctioneers then, as now, stipulated to have all their advertisements printed at intervals en masse, that the public might be struck with a great idea of their extensive business; not dribbled out day by day, a few at a time. Stuart resolved to adopt the same plan, and exposes the stratagems of newspaper proprietors to produce a similar impression.

"They keep back advertisements, fill up with pamphlets and other stuff unnecessary to a newspaper, and then come out with a swarm of advertisements in a double sheet to astonish their readers, and strike them with high ideas of the extent of their circulation, which attracts so many advertisers. The meagre days are forgotten; the days of swarm are remembered."

Publishers, booksellers, and others swarmed in the office of the Morning Post, bringing their advertisements, and each desirous of displaying a cloud of announcements at its front page. The character and circulation of the paper had now given it the pre-eminent place, and Stuart was compelled to resort to a trick to refuse advertisements without offence.

"When a very long advertisement of a column or two came, I charged enormously high, that it might be taken away without the parties being able to say it was refused admission. I accommodated the booksellers as well as I could with a few new and pressing advertisements at a time. That would not do; they would have the cloud. 'Then,' said I, 'there is no place for the cloud but the last page, where the auctioneers already enjoy that privilege.' The booksellers were affronted, indignant. The last page!"

To resent this slight, the booksellers started opposition journals, and decoyed from the service of the Morning Post one of its "great guns," Mr. Lane. He was very serviceable to Stuart, who lamented his departure, as he was a clever, willing, and industrious assistant. He wrote long accounts, and printed them in large types, of the Corn Law riots in 1800, "while the Times and Herald had only a few lines in obscure corners in black."

The procession proclaiming peace, the ascent of balloons, great fires, boxing-matches, and interesting trials, were fully described, and the paper rose in prosperity under the influence of this careful management.

Coleridge wrote for the Morning Post; but the editor always found it a task of sore trial to force him to his work. He possessed talents of a brilliant order, but neglected them whenever a temporary fit of fortune made him superior to the world even for a day. In conversation he was particularly sparkling, and it was regretted that want did not oftener compel him to put forth his astonishing powers. One day, at a dinner-party, in company with Sir Richard Philips, the bookseller, he was dilating on some topic with unusual eloquence, when the knightly vender of books, enchanted with the conversation, came round behind his chair, and, tapping him on the shoulder, said, "I wish I had you in a garret without a coat to your back." "In something like this," says the vexed editor, "I had Coleridge; but though he could talk over every thing so well, I soon found he could not write daily on the occurrences of the day."

In a letter to Stuart we find him saying, that if his writing is particularly wanted he will send some, though he has a bad headache. "I will send you this evening three or four paragraphs, of seven or eight lines each."

We must refer to Charles Lamb's pleasant gossip for an account of these small contributions to a daily journal:—

"In those days every morning paper, as an essential retainer to its establishment, kept an author, who was bound to furnish daily a quantum of witty paragraphs.

Sixpence a joke—and it was thought pretty high too—was Dan Stuart's settled remuneration in these cases. The chat of the day, scandal, but above all, dress, furnished the material. The length of no paragraph was to exceed seven lines. Shorter they might be, but they must be poignant."

At the heels of the Post comes the Morning Herald, started on Wednesday, the first of November, 1780. Before it was a year old, a certain libel on the Russian ambassador entitled its publisher to a year's imprisonment, and the penalty of a hundred pounds. A fellow-sufferer was the printress of the Gazette, who being a woman, escaped the pillory, but was fined fifty pounds, and put in gaol for six months. Meanwhile the paper thrived. Bate, its editor, was a vigorous writer, and though a clergyman, entered warmly into the political discussions of the day, and other topics, being compelled on one occasion to answer for the meaning of a certain paragraph at the point of the sword:—

"The cause of quarrel arose from some offensive paragraphs that had appeared in the Morning Post, highly reflecting on the character of a lady, for whom Captain Stoney had a particular regard." An explanation was demanded, but was refused, and a duel took place at the Adelphi Tavern, Strand. They shut the door, and providing themselves with pistols, discharged them at each other without effect. They then drew swords, and fell upon each other, both being wounded. Bate's sword was bent against the Captain's breast bone; he called for time to straighten it; his antagonist consented, and they prepared to fight with unexhausted fury, when the alarm was given, and the angry combatants were parted. The Captain, having thus vindicated the lady's honour, married her in a few days.

On the first of January, 1788, appeared the first number of the colossal journal, the Times, once considered, and with justice, the leading paper in Europe. It was a continuation of the Daily Universal Register, of which 939 numbers had appeared. The system of printing adopted by John Walter, who established it, differed altogether from the common one. The metal was cast in whole words, instead of single letters in the usual mode, these words being placed side by side by the working printer, instead of leaving him to compose with single letters. "But practical difficulties arose, and many jokes were made at the expense of the new plan." It was said that the orders to the type-founder ran after this fashion:—"Send me a hundredweight made up in different pounds, of heat, cold, wet, dry, murder, fire, dreadful robbery, atrocious outrages, fearful calamity, and alarming explosion." Another hundred were to be made up of "honourable gentleman, loud cheers, gracious majesty, interesting female, and so on." Had the system continued to our day, the printer's chief occupation would have been to cast lawless violence, selfish demagogues, horrors of anarchy, royal dignity, and sanguinary democrats, with others of still less sense or significance. But, however printed, the Times progressed well. It professed itself a many-headed being, of the neutral gender, because the prospectus says, "we have no distinction of sex." It classes into several orders. "The heads of the Times:—The literary, the political, the commercial, the philosophical, the critical, the theatrical, the fashionable, the humorous and the witty. "The Political Head of the Times, like that of Janus, the Roman deity, is double-faced; with one countenance it will smile continually on the friends of Old England, and with the other will frown incessantly on her enemies."

The great journal could not refrain, in its preliminary address to the reader, from a joke at the expense of its contemporaries. Apologising for the shortening of its own name, it says, the alteration is not without precedents. "The World has parted with its caput mortuum, and a moiety of its brains. The Herald has cut off half its head, and has lost its original humour. The Post, it is true, retains its whole head and its old features, and as to the other prints, they appear as having neither heads nor tails."

At the period when the Times was considered a successful journal, with a circulation of three or four thousand, it occupied many hours to strike off the copies by the tedious process of the hand-press. Steam-power had been discovered, and was suggested as an aid. Of course the world laughed at the idea, for "to take off 5,000 impressions in an hour, was as ridiculous a conception as to paddle a ship fifteen miles, or to drag a train of carriages weighing a hundred tons, fifty miles, within that time." Walter, however, welcomed the suggestion, and by the aid of his ingenious assistants, succeeded, in spite of the pressmen's fierce opposition, in applying steam to the press. At six o'clock in the morning, on the 25th of November, 1814, the town was startled by the news, that the Times was at that very hour worked off by steam; that the great engine was casting forth its children at the rate of thousands in the hour!

From that day to this, improvements have followed each other, until four copies of the paper pass out of the machine in the space of one second.

The great exertions made, and the expenses incurred by the Times on occasions of importance have secured it its place among the journals of the day. One memorable instance is noticed by Mr. Knight Hunt:—

"It is now about ten years ago," he says, "that the then Paris correspondent of the paper (Mr. O'Reilly) received secret information of an enormous fraud that was said to be in course of perpetration on the Continent. The author of the plot was described to be an old officer, who had been a personal favourite of Napoleon, and who, by the aid of talents, great knowledge of the continental world, and a most polished exterior, had put in operation a mode by which the English bankers were to be robbed of a million, and which had, when O'Reilly was informed of it, fleeced them of 10,000*l*. The position of the accused parties, the great skill and secrecy with which the plot had been contrived, rendered it a hazardous experiment for private individuals to attempt the crushing of such a formidable conspiracy. But neither correspondents abroad, nor editors at home hesitated in their duty. The whole plan was exposed; but, to throw the swindlers on the wrong scent, the exposed was dated Brussels, instead of Paris. This is believed to have saved O'Reilly from assassination; for the French swindling genius who presided over this gigantic fraud had, it was said, seen enough of blood not to let a single life stand between himself and the realization of his plans. The Times exposed the robbery, and saved the bankers from farther loss, but were not allowed to pass scot free."

An action was brought against them. They defended it at a heavy cost, and gained a verdict. A subscription was opened to pay the expenses of the trial, but they declined it; and the 2,625*l*. which had been collected was expended in honorary tablets, in perpetuation of the memory of this great service; and two scholarships were founded, in Christ's Hospital and the City School, in Milk-street.

Other daily morning papers have since started, but none of them with success, except the Daily News. Of the evening journals—and especially of the Sun, the most important of them all—we have also accounts; when our author winds up with a brief view of the world within the precincts of a newspaper-office, and the general economy of a daily journal.

Mr. Knight Hunt, who is evidently very familiar with his subject, estimates at about 520*l*. the weekly cost of supporting a double daily paper, during the sessions of Parliament, or an average of about 25,000*l*. a-year, exclusive of paper and stamps. The expenses attending the expresses of intelligence brought by the overland mail are enormous. A courier once brought an action against the Times for unjust dismissal; when it was shown that his regular salary was 100*l*. a-year. Besides this, he received 60*l*. for every journey he made in sixty hours between Marseilles and Paris, 14*l*. for travelling thence to Boulogne in fourteen hours and a half, and 16*l*. for making the journey from Paris to Calais in sixteen hours and a half, with 2*l*. for every hour he saved out of the specified time. And all this expense to obtain a summary of the Indian news a few hours in advance of the regular mail! When this account reached Paris, the French editors thought the English were either madmen or magicians.

The method of telegraphing is described in a very entertaining manner, by a writer in one of the provincial journals quoted by our author. Suppose the West Indian and Mexican mail to have reached Southampton. The news travels along the electric wires, and is transmitted to the newspaper-office, perhaps, in the following form:—

"Great Western. Jamaica, 2. Cruz, 26. Million dollars. Dividends 50,000. Mosquito War ended. Antilles healthy. Havana, hurricane—100 ships lost. Crops good, Jamaica, rains. Sea covered, wrecks, plantations."

This appears flaming in a second edition:—

"ARRIVAL OF THE WEST INDIA AND MEXICAN MAIL.—IMPORTANT NEWS FROM THE WEST INDIES. DREADFUL HURRICANE AT HAVANNA. AWFUL DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY IN JAMAICA!" and beneath it, in conspicuous type, is an account, neatly written in the editor's office, of all the transactions indicated in the telegraphic report. Out of that skeleton the writer creates a detailed description,—picturing the blessing of wars being ended,—the desolation of the country after the tempest,—the frightful scene at sea,—the stranded vessels, the trees uprooted, the rivers cumbered with the wreck of the plantations, &c.; and all in flaming language, so that the innocent readers imagine the narrative was written, word for word, in Jamaica, and transmitted, syllable by syllable, along the electric wires, instead of being based on the unintelligible words we have quoted.

But we must close Mr. Hunt's book. If our readers are tempted to open it, we promise them great pleasure and much profit from its perusal. We have drawn from it some matter for their entertainment; but it contains more than would furnish material for a series of similar sketches.

In the publication before us, Mr. Townsend, (a gentleman already favourably known as a legal biographer,) has reproduced in a popular form some of the most remarkable trials which have occupied our judicial tribunals during the last thirty years. The reports are given in a condensed form, and are accompanied and illustrated by numerous explanatory comments. In the selection and arrangement of his materials, the learned editor has obviously consulted the taste of the general reader, and has endeavoured to make an interesting book for all classes. In his own words, it has been his object "to free the work from dry severity, by introducing the 'loci latiores' of the advocates, the salient parts of cross-examination, those little passages of arms between the rival combatants which diversified the arena, the painting of the forensic scene, the poetry of action of these legal dramas. He has sought to give the expressed spirit of eloquence and law, upon occasions which peculiarly called them forth, pruning what was redundant, rejecting superfluities, weeding out irrelevant matter, but omitting no incident or episode that an intelligent witness would be disappointed at not hearing."

A few words should be said concerning the title of the book and its applicability to the contents. By the words, "Modern State Trials," our readers must not imagine that these volumes are restricted to trials for political offences only. Mr. Townsend has chosen rather to accept the more liberal and popular definition of the title, and to include under it all criminal proceedings of great general interest which would be most likely "to command the attention of all members of the community, and to be read by them with pleasure and profit." The course he has adopted is justified by precedent, and approved by general convenience. In the voluminous collection of state trials commenced by Mr. Hargrave, in which some of the most valuable materials of history are to be found, many trials are inserted which have no reference to state offences, but which were considered of public importance and great general interest. Such are the various convictions for witchcraft, and the prosecution of Elizabeth Canning for perjury. Among the trials included in Mr. Townsend's volumes, those for high-treason and political misdemeanours form but a small proportion; but we have no hesitation in stating that the judicial proceedings which have been selected are those most likely to prove attractive to the reader, and to answer the purpose which the editor had in view.

In the ordinary incidents of an important trial in an English court of justice, there is much to excite and impress the spectator. The keen encounters of acute and subtle intellects, and the displays of practised actors on the forensic stage, are of themselves sufficient to prevent the attention flagging, and to keep every faculty on the stretch. We enter the crowded court where the life, the liberty, or the character of a fellow-being is at stake; we are awed by the decent solemnities of justice, and we watch with eager eyes the demeanour of all who are personally interested, or who are called to take part in the proceedings. We respond to the murmur of admiration which runs through the crowd when an honest witness gives his straightforward, manly testimony, in homely but appropriate language, and baffles every effort to browbeat and intimidate him. We are personally gratified at the exposure of some concocted falsehood; we are pleased to see an unprincipled knave, suborned to bear false witness, "pulled to pieces," amid the delighted roars of the auditory, till he descends discomfited from the witness-box, and sneaks out of court, too happy to escape further observation. With no slight interest do we watch the countenances of the jaded jurymen, or steal a side-long glance at the pale and agitated face of the culprit, and wonder within ourselves what is passing in his bosom. Superadded to the dramatic interest of the proceedings are the earnestness and reality which are wanting on the mimic scene; and although we are little prepared to defend the taste, we are scarcely surprised at the eager anxiety sometimes evinced by intelligent persons, even of the softer sex, to be present at the trials of notorious culprits, whose crimes have rendered them the temporary objects of morbid interest.

Next to being present at an important trial, we consider it one of the greatest intellectual gratifications to peruse an accurate report: and although much that interests the spectator cannot be embodied in any report, yet, thanks to the art of stenography, the shorthand writer's notes are generally a fair transcript, and present us with a tolerably truthful picture of what actually occurred. To return to Mr. Townsend's volumes, it appears to us that in these days of book-making, it is decidedly a happy idea to furnish the English public with a collection of modern causes célèbres in a compact and readable form. Apart from the temporary interest which they excited, they have a permanent and historical value, and contain much that will always interest and instruct.

(1) "Modern State Trials, revised, and illustrated with Essays and Notes." By William C. Townsend, Esq. M.A. Q. C. 1850.

The learned editor has not arranged his materials in any systematic order, chronological or otherwise. The first trial in the collection is that of John Frost, for high-treason, in 1839-40, and the second, that of Edward Oxford, for shooting at the Queen. Then follow the trial of James Stuart, Esq. before the High Court of Justiciary, at Edinburgh, for killing Sir Alexander Boswell in a duel, in 1822; and then, the trial of the Earl of Cardigan, before the House of Peers in full Parliament, for felony in shooting at Captain Tucket, (another duelling offence,) in 1841. The trial of Courvoisier, for the murder of Lord William Russell, comes next, and the extremely questionable conduct of his advocate is defended by the editor as being within the bounds of propriety and professional etiquette. We have no wish to cater upon the discussion of a question which has occasioned so much newspaper controversy, but we cannot help thinking that Mr. Phillips's true friends must regret the officious zeal which so recently forced the painful question upon public notice.

The trial of Daniel M'Naughton, for the murder of Mr. Drummond, which is next in the series, affords a remarkable proof of the superior humanity and discretion of the present age. It was proved by indubitable testimony, that the wretched man had committed the frightful crime under the influence of a fatal delusion, and he was properly acquitted. As his counsel, Mr. Cockburn, forcibly intimated, it would have been cruel and unjust to "visit one on whom God had been pleased to bring the heaviest of all human calamities—the most painful, the most appalling of all mortal ills—with the consequences of an act which most undoubtedly, but for this calamity, never would have been committed." Full time had been allowed to procure the necessary evidence respecting the state of the prisoner's mind, and all the discoveries of modern science were ingeniously adduced by his eloquent counsel to illustrate the nature of the mysterious malady under which he laboured. In the course of his eloquent address, Mr. Cockburn appropriately alluded to the beneficent changes which modern science had introduced in the treatment of the insane, and forcibly dwelt on the different forms of mental hallucination.

"It is known to all that it is but as yesterday that the system of treatment, which in past ages—to the eternal disgrace of those ages—was pursued towards those whom it had pleased Heaven to visit with the heaviest of all human afflictions, and who were therefore best entitled to the tenderest care and most watchful kindness of their Christian brethren—it is but as yesterday, I say, that that system has been changed for another, which, thank God! exists to our honour, and to the comfort and better prospect of recovery of the unfortunate diseased in mind! It is but as yesterday that darkness and solitude—cut off from the rest of mankind like the lepers of old—the dismal cell, the bed of straw, the iron chain, and the inhuman scourge, were the fearful lot of those who were best entitled to human pity and to human sympathy, as being the victims of the most dreadful of all mortal calamities.

This state of things has passed, or is passing fast away. But in former times when it did exist, you will not wonder that these unhappy persons were looked upon with a different eye. Thank God! at last, though but at last, humanity and wisdom have penetrated, hand in hand, into the dreary abodes of these miserable beings, and whilst the one has poured the balm of consolation into the bosoms of the afflicted, the other has held the light of science over our hitherto imperfect knowledge of this dire disease, has ascertained its varying character, and marked its shadowy boundaries, and taught us how, in gentleness and mercy, best to minister to the relief and restoration of the sufferer. . . .

"Science is ever on the advance; and no doubt, science of this kind, like all other, is in advance of the generality of mankind. It is a matter of science altogether; and we who have the ordinary duties of our several stations and the business of our respective avocations to occupy our full attention, cannot be so well informed upon it as those who have scientifically pursued the study and the treatment of the disease. I think, then, we shall be fully justified in turning to the doctrines of matured science rather than to the maxims put forth in times when neither knowledge, nor philanthropy, nor philosophy, nor common justice, had their full operation in discussions of this nature."

Contrast with the circumstances of this trial—the calm deliberation, and respectful reference to the discoveries of science,—that of Bellingham, the assassin of Mr. Perceval,—a parallel case.

"At five o'clock on the afternoon of Monday, May 11th, 1811, the Premier was assassinated by Bellingham in the lobby of the House of Commons; at the same hour on the following Monday, the dead body of the assassin lay exposed in the dissecting room! Within seven days he had been examined before the magistrate and committed to Newgate, a true bill had been found, he had been tried at the Old Bailey on the Friday, convicted, sentenced, and executed at eight o'clock on the Monday morning that succeeded the murder: a cruel, unrighteous, intemperate haste,—an eager thirst for retribution, not slaked certainly at the fountain of justice. The fervour of popular excitement and indignation, which did not admit of a calm and tranquil investigation into the state of the prisoner's mind, furnished unanswerable arguments for delay. The result of the trial might have been, probably would have been, the same; but the judicial disgrace and national opprobrium that accrued from this intemperate haste would have been averted. For the opinions of those best qualified to judge are still anxiously divided on the question, whether, under all the circumstances, Bellingham was a free agent, and responsible for his acts."

Mr. Bellingham had been a Liverpool merchant, trading to Russia, and had suffered a long imprisonment in that country for a debt incurred through some unfortunate mercantile speculation. He had claimed redress for the supposed wrong through the British ambassador at the Russian Court, who, finding that he had been treated according to the law of the country in which he had become a resident, declined to interfere. He was at last released, and returned to England burning with indignation. Regarding the British cabinet as responsible for his long imprisonment, he took his revenge by shooting Mr. Perceval, and then calmly surrendered himself to justice. His conduct at the trial is thus described:—

applied for a postponement of the trial, and read an affidavit of Ann Bellitt, averring in direct terms the insanity of the prisoner, which was known to several witnesses at Liverpool and elsewhere. He appealed to the justice and humanity of the Court to let the trial stand over till they could be subpoenaed to appear. The Attorney-General, Sir Vicary Gibbs, greatly to his discredit, resisted the application, and declared in his bitter style, that the prisoner had displayed a masculine understanding! The application was peremptorily overruled. Sir Vicary Gibbs, as if to exasperate their feelings, then stated to the jury a pathetic truth, 'that the crime had been perpetrated against a man who, if sufficient life had been allowed him, after he had received his death-wound, would have employed it in breathing a prayer to heaven for the forgiveness of his murderer.' The same mild spirit that would have uttered such a prayer would have anxiously desired the state of mind of his murderer to have been calmly investigated, that he might not be punished if he were irrational, and knew not what he did.

"Bellingham spoke for two hours, recapitulating his wrongs—six years' imprisonment in Russia; yet Lord Leveson afforded him no redress. He regretted that lord had not fallen by his hand instead of Mr. Perceval. [A murmur of disapprobation, we are told, ran through the court at this vindictive declaration.] He had given notice at Bow Street he would take justice into his own hand, when he was told he might do his worst. He was obliged to the court for their setting aside the plea of insanity. Whenever he should appear before the tribunal of God, he should be adjudged innocent of wilful murder."

It was proved by one of the witnesses that his father had died insane; but Chief Justice Mansfield "declared that he saw no reason whatever for supposing that the prisoner was an irrational and irresponsible agent," and the jury at once convicted him.

The trial of the great naval hero, Lord Cochrane, for a conspiracy to defraud the Stock Exchange, in 1814, is well described by Mr. Townsend, as one of the most painfully interesting proceedings in the records of our criminal jurisprudence. "After an anxious and repeated investigation," he says, "of all the documents and circumstances connected with this strange case, the editor has arrived at a firm conviction that the jury ought not to have convicted that gallant nobleman, whose uncle made him his dupe, and who lost all chance of an acquittal by the two cases being blended together." The defendants, eight in number, including Lord Cochrane and his uncle, Mr. Cochrane Johnstone, were charged with "causing persons, disguised as officers, to pretend that they had arrived at Dover and Northfleet with expresses from France, on the morning of Monday, February 21st, 1814, announcing the overthrow of Buonaparte, and the conclusion of the war." The principal agent in the hoax was a man named De Berenger, who, on the morning of the fraud, having just arrived in London from Dover with the pretended news, proceeded to Lord Cochrane's house, where he changed the disguise which he had worn on the journey. This was the strongest circumstance of suspicion against his lordship. Mr. Cochrane Johnstone was the "arch artificer" of the fraud, and his clearly proved guilt of course prejudiced his nephew's case. Party feeling then ran high; and Lord

Cochrane having interfered in politics with something of a seaman's heedlessness, was obnoxious to the ruling powers. This was painfully evident at the trial. The Chief Justice, (Ellenborough,) who presided, treated the defendants with marked severity, and he went so far as to force their counsel to address the jury for the defence after twelve o'clock at night,—an instance of judicial despotism almost without parallel. The counsel did not fail to represent to him the hardship of such a course, and the following dialogue ensued.¹

"With this evidence . . . closed the case for the prosecution. It was now past midnight; fifteen hours of a long summer's day had been exhausted, and counsel and jury must have been sinking from fatigue. Under these circumstances, the counsel gave a not unreasonable intimation of their wish for an adjournment.

"Mr. Serjeant Best. I wish to apprise your lordship that I think it will be necessary for the defendants to call witnesses.

"Lord Ellenborough. I should wish to hear your opening, and to get into the defendants' case if I can; there are several gentlemen attending as witnesses who, I find, cannot, without the greatest public inconvenience, attend to-morrow.

"Mr. Park. The difficulty we feel I am sure your lordship will feel as strongly as we do, the fatigue owing to the length of our attendance here; but we will proceed if your lordship desires it.

"Lord Ellenborough. I would wish to get into the case so as to have the examination of several witnesses, upon whom the public business of certain offices depends, gone through if possible.

"Mr. Park. I have undergone very great fatigue, which I am able to bear; but I would submit to your lordship the hardship upon parties who are charged with so very serious an offence as this, if their case is heard at this late hour, and then a fresh day is given to my learned friend to reply.

"Lord Ellenborough. It will not be a fresh day, when you will be here by nine o'clock, and the sun will be up almost before we can adjourn; I will sit through it if you require it rather than that.

"After this brief colloquy counsel succumbed without further murmur or question, a memorable proof of the iron sway with which Lord Ellenborough domineered over his court. A more firm and manly resistance would not have disparaged the counsel, and might have secured the indulgence. It would have saved one innocent client."

We have not space to analyse the evidence, but we think with Mr. Townsend, that Lord Cochrane's participation in the fraud was at least doubtful. All the defendants were found guilty, and the sentence passed on the hero of the Basque Roads, a naval commander second only to Nelson in skill and intrepidity, was vindictively severe. "He was sentenced to pay a fine to the King of 1,000*l.*, to be imprisoned in the King's Bench prison for twelve calendar months, and 'to be set in and upon the pillory, opposite the Royal Exchange, in the city of London, for one hour, between the hours of twelve at noon and two in the afternoon.'" A motion was, however, made in the House of Commons relative to the latter part of the sentence,

(1) It should be observed that at three o'clock in the morning, in the middle of the defendant's case, the court adjourned till ten, and the counsel for the prosecution had the great advantage of replying the next day, when the jury had been refreshed by a few hours' sleep.

and the ministers subsequently advised the Prince Regent to remit it, "the crime being too rare and too alien to the spirit of Englishmen to appear to them imperatively to require such an exposure."

The trial of the Wakefields for the abduction of Miss Turner, in 1827, was another cause célèbre, which excited unusual interest at the time. A young lady aged fifteen, at a boarding-school at Liverpool, was artfully decoyed away by strangers, under the pretence of a parent's dangerous illness requiring her immediate return home; and then inveigled into a Scotch marriage by the false representations of the criminal bridegroom. The childlike confiding innocence of the poor girl, and the heartless, unprincipled conduct of the conspirators, appeared in all the details of the nefarious scheme, and imparted to the trial a romantic interest. In order to prove the marriage, the Gretna priest was called as a witness. He was described as "a gentleman residing at Springfield, near Gretna Hall," and on his cross-examination, proved that he had been engaged "in the traffic of making this sort of certificates" eight-and-forty years. He was upwards of seventy-five years old, and previously to his becoming a "gentleman" had followed several occupations—that of a pedlar, or as he called it a "merchant," amongst others. He was thus re-examined by Mr. Scarlett, (afterwards Lord Abinger,) the defendant's counsel:—

"The re-examination of Mr. Scarlett, though clever and amusing, failed to set up this performer of what he called unregular marriages. 'It may be an unregular mode,' he said, sturdily, 'but it is right still.'

"You married these in the regular mode, did you?—I married them as many a hundred has been married before; and I have been in the courts both in Edinburgh and in the city of Dublin, and my marriages have always been held good.

"What form of words do you use?—Well, you come before me and say—

"No, I don't want to be married; but suppose any body did, I want to know what form of words are used. Do you make any declaration between the parties?—I ask them whether they take one another for man and wife before myself and two witnesses: that is the mode in Scotland.

"Well, when they say that, do you make any declaration, or what do you do?—Why they embrace one another, and so and so.

"Tell us what the 'so and so' is. I don't want to be married, but some of my friends here do, and they want to know the ceremony. What is the 'so and so?' what do you say?—After they take one another by the hand, I say, 'Now I declare you so and so.'

"What is it you declare? What are the words you use? You declare them what?—I declare them to be man and wife before the witnesses, and so and so: that is the Scotch rule."

The bridegroom and his brother, who assisted in the plot, though ably defended by the "thirteenth jurymen," (as Mr. Scarlett was commonly called,) were convicted of the conspiracy, and each sentenced to three years' imprisonment.

The trial of Mr. Moxon, the eminent publisher, on an indictment for blasphemy, in publishing a complete edition of Shelley's works, has been selected by Mr. Townsend, in order to introduce the splendid defence of

Mr. Serjeant Talfourd. Although, perhaps, too ornate and elaborate for the appreciation of a jury, the speech was worthy of the gifted advocate's high reputation, and deserves to be quoted as one of the most finished specimens of modern forensic oratory. The prosecution, it may be recollected, originated in the following circumstances: Mr. Henry Hetherington, a bookseller in the Strand, having been convicted of selling a blasphemous publication, and thereupon sentenced to four months' imprisonment, adopted the design of becoming in his turn the prosecutor of the various booksellers who sold the complete edition of Shelley's works, issued by Mr. Moxon. As the original publisher of the edition, Mr. Moxon resolved to bear the first attack, and his trial came on in the Court of Queen's Bench, in June 1841. The case having been opened, and the publication of the work proved, Mr. Serjeant Talfourd commenced his eloquent address, and thus impressively described at the outset the nature of the poems which had been selected for prosecution:—

"The passages selected as specimens of the indicted libel are found in a complete edition of Percy Bysshe Shelley, a work comprising more than twenty thousand lines of verse, and occupy something less than the three-hundredth part of the volume which contains them. The book presents the entire intellectual history—true and faithful because traced in the series of those works which were its events—of one of the most extraordinary persons ever gifted and doomed to illustrate the nobleness, the grandeur, the imperfections, and the progress of human genius, whom it pleased God to take from this world while the process of harmonising his stupendous powers was yet incomplete, but not before it had indicated its beneficent workings."

Having forcibly dwelt on the necessity of a liberal criticism of the productions of genius, and alluded to the bold, and, (judged by a narrow standard,) almost impious speculations of our greatest epic poet, the advocate thus proceeded to vindicate the prosecuted poems from any general tendency to inculcate principles of atheism or impiety:—

"If, however, these are considerations affecting the exercise of human genius on themes beyond its grasp, which we cannot discuss in this place, however essential to the decision of the charge, there is one plain position which I will venture to assert; that the poetry which pretends to a denial of God, or of an immortal life, must contain its own refutation in itself, and sustain what it would deny! A poet, though not one of the highest order, may 'link vice to a radiant angel;' he may diffuse luxurious indifference to virtue and to truth: but he cannot inculcate atheism. Let him strive to do it, and like Balaam, who came to curse, like him he must end in blessing! His art convicts him; for it is 'Eternity revealing itself in Time!' His fancies may be wayward, his theories absurd, but they will prove, no less in their failure than in their success, the divinity of their origin, and the inadequacy of this world to give scope to his impulses. They are the beatings of the soul against the bars of its clay tenement, which, though they may ruffle and sadden it, prove that it is winged for a diviner sphere! Young has said,—

"An undevout astronomer is mad;"

how much more truly might he have said, an atheist poet is a contradiction in terms! Let the poet take what range of associations he will—let him adopt what notions he may—he cannot dissolve his alliance with the Eternal. Let him strive to shut out the vistas of the future by encircling the present with images of exquisite beauty; his own forms of ideal grace will disappoint him with eternal looks, and vindicate the immortality they were fashioned to veil! Let him rear temples and consecrate them to fabled divinities; they will indicate in their enduring beauty "temples not made with hands, eternal in the heavens!" If he celebrates the delights of social intercourse, the festal reference to their fragility includes the sense of that which must endure; for the very sadness which tempers them speaks the longing after that "which prompts the eternal sigh." If he desires to bid the hearts of thousands beat as one man at the touch of tragic passion, he must present "the future in the instant,"—show in the death-grapple of contending emotions a strength which death cannot destroy—vindicate the immortality of affection at the moment when the warm passages of life are closed against it; and anticipate, in the virtue which dares to die, the power by which "mortality shall be swallowed up of life!" The world is too narrow for us. Time is too short for man; and the poet only feels the sphere more inadequate, and pants for the "All hail hereafter!" with more urgent sense of weakness than his fellows."

At the conclusion of this glowing speech, in which the lawyer and the poet put forth all his strength, the personal character of the defendant was thus slightly glanced at; and our readers will admire with us the exquisite taste and consummate art displayed by the advocate in this part of his address.

"It has been fairly conceded that Mr. Moxon is a most respectable publisher; one who has done good service to the cause of poetry and wisdom; and one who could not intentionally publish a blasphemous work without treason to all the associations which honour his life. Beginning his career under the auspices of Rogers, the eldest of a great age of poets, and blessed with the continued support of that excellent person, who never broke by one unworthy line the charm of moral grace which pervades his works, he has been associated with Lamb, whose kindness embraced all sects, all parties, all classes, and whose genius shed new and pleasant lights on daily life; with Southey, the pure and childlike in heart; with Coleridge, in the light of whose Christian philosophy these indicted poems would assume their true character as mournful yet salutary specimens of power developed imperfectly in this world; and with Wordsworth, whose works, so long neglected or scorned, but so long silently nurturing tastes for the lofty and the pure, it has been Mr. Moxon's privilege to diffuse largely through this and other lands, and with them the sympathies which link the human heart to nature and to God, and all classes of mankind to each other."

The trial of Mr. O'Connell, for conspiracy, in 1843, and that of Mr. Smith O'Brien, for high-treason, in 1848, occupy a considerable space in Mr. Townsends' volumes; and we may add that several other proceedings of great political interest are inserted, which will always retain a certain value from the light they throw on contemporary history.

Since this notice was penned, we have learned by the public newspapers that the learned editor of these volumes—distinguished by his private virtues no less than for his literary attainments—a scholar and a gentleman, as well as an able lawyer—has passed from amongst us, in the prime of life, widely and deeply regretted.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

Two small volumes of poetry, their respective natures differing widely as "Indus from the Pole," have lately come under our notice. The most important of these volumes, "Lays of Past Days," by the Author of "Provence and the Rhone," brings before us, for the first time in a collected form, sundry metrical facetiæ over which we have enjoyed many a hearty laugh in the pages of Blackwood, Bentley, and other magazines, while, together with these mirth-provoking stanzas, are to be found some longer poems, partaking more nearly of the ballad style, which evince (much as we rejoice in some of the comicalities,) a higher degree of artistic skill and true poetical feeling than the perusal of their lighter confrères had prepared us to expect. Of these graver pieces a ballad entitled "Sir Hugh the Forester" most won upon our admiration, from its terse style and harmonious though unpolished versification, and the manly, vigorous, frank manner in which the life-like characters work out the striking incident on which the chief interest of the tale depends. A most curious anecdote, founded on fact, is embodied in the "Squire's Dream," while equal scholarship and humour are to be found in the elegy of the poet Catnachus on Ægidius, and in the polyglot verses in praise of Mr. Harrison Ainsworth. In a species of prefatory dedication to Miss Mitford, the Author assigns as one of his reasons for "rushing into print," his "dislike to go down to posterity as a mere 'portrait of a gentleman' in the family picture-gallery. Thus, in order to figure in the family tree as decently as a good average dean or post-captain," and to prevent his being summed up by his possible great-grand-children as follows—

"He lived in Berkshire, and studied at Oriel, And of him we've really no other memorial,"—

he has collected his "disjecta membra" from the corners of periodicals into which fate had pitched them; rejoined the precious morsels; and a very good figure do we consider them to make when carefully stitched together, and "neatly bound in cloth."

The second work we proceed to notice, "A Dream of Tasso, and other Poems," by William Brailsford, although in every respect the complete antipodes of the volume we have just discussed, possesses much "modest merit" of its own. Its author, (for some time a contributor to "SHARPE,") is evidently a disciple of the modern school of poetry; but while his bold flights of imagination and delicate touches of pathos remind us not unpleasingly of parts of Tennyson and poor Hood, his good taste prevents his out-Heroding Herod by attempting to follow the meteor course of Mrs. Browning, or the Delphinian ravings of that prince of mystics, her most transcendental spouse. Among our especial favourites we may mention, "The Forsaken Home," parts of "The Dream of Tasso," "The Grave in the Village," "The De-thronement of Summer," and "The Lament of Ororic."

Mr. Brailsford has only to write carefully, and select good models for style and metre, to attain a very prominent place among the poets of the day. The good taste, religious feeling, and unexceptionable morality of this little volume render it a very fit book to place in the hands of young people who may be sufficiently advanced to appreciate it.

"Latter Day Pamphlets." Edited by Thomas Carlyle. The third of these remarkable publications is entitled "Downing Street."

Like its two predecessors, "Downing Street" seems to us to be in every way worthy the reputation of the Author; nor can we comprehend the reason of the violent objection, still less of the indiscriminating, vituperative outcries, raised against them in certain quarters of the literary world, from which something like justice, if not generosity, should be looked for. That the "Latter Day Pamphlets" should not be exactly to the taste of "the million,"—that they should, indeed, be caviare to it,—is not astonishing; but it is astonishing, and much to be regretted, that those whose task it is to teach "the million" should make such mistakes as they have done in the matter.

That they do not recognise in these addresses to the British nation, something more than a violent and altogether absurd tirade against the existing state of things; that they do not find in them anything but matter for contemptuous disapprobation or superficial laughter,—is unreasonable, and consequently, surprising, in men who ought to know better. Upon what principle can a thoroughly-understanding reader of "Sarto Resartus" and "The Past and Present" esteem these as the writings of a Philosopher and a Truth-Teller, and at the same time, thoroughly understanding the "Latter Day Pamphlets," inveigh against them, as the ravings of a lunatic, or the dangerous falsehoods of a passion-blinded partisan? We venture to assert, that Carlyle has said nothing yet, in his "Latter Day Pamphlets," which he has not said before in his other works, either positively or by implication, or which cannot be proved to be in accordance with them. In these he has only taken up certain points of his system of philosophy, and applied them with heart-stirring energy in the consideration of some very important political and social questions of the time. There is something uncandid, ungenerous, and ungrateful, in turning round to jeer at a man whom we have hitherto looked upon with reverence, as our superior, endowed by heaven with genius to teach us what truth he can discover on the earth,—there is something worse than ungrateful, we say, in turning round upon him, to jeer, or to question his sanity, or the purity of his motives, when he begins to say things which we find hard to understand, or unpleasant when understood.

We do not contend for the infallibility of this or any other genius; we, ourselves, do not hold Mr. Carlyle to be a genius of the first order; but that he has genius, such as few in this age possess, we think no one will deny, and we are ready to fight to the death in support of our belief in the "Sanity of true Genius." We cannot see any evidence in these "Latter Day Pamphlets," that Mr. Carlyle is "beside himself;" rather do we see that he "speaks forth the words of truth," and the most noble and ignoble Festuses would do well to lay aside their preconceived notions of what should and should not be spoken upon certain public questions of the day, and listen to what it shall seem fit to Mr. Carlyle to utter about them. A respectful hearing he is entitled to, from all cultivated persons, as a thinker and an honest man, whose will to tell the truth may, in their opinion, sometimes exceed his power of seeing it, but who will tell what "he troweth" if he speak at all.

In "Downing Street" there is less startling eloquence, less astounding, home-striking apostrophe than in "The Present Time" and "Model Prisons," and, at a first hasty reading, it appeared to us to be less brilliantly executed. The tone is quieter, but on a second reading, we are inclined to prefer it to the other two; much as we see to admire in them. It is not our intention to criticise the contents of this Pamphlet, but, for the benefit of those among our readers who may not have read it, we will subjoin a sample or two. Let them judge how much of falsehood and extravagant nonsense there is in these.

"In every ship, I say, there must be a seeing pilot, not a mere hearing one! It is evident you can never get your ship steered through the difficult straits by persons standing ashore, on this bank and that, and shouting their confused directions to you. 'Ware that Colonial Sand-Bank! Starboard now, the Nigger Question! Larboard, larboard, the Suffrage Movement! Financial Reform, your Clothing-Colonels overboard! The Qualification Movement, Ware-re-re Helm-a-lee. Bear a hand there, will you! Ir-r-r, lubbers, imbeciles, fitter for a tailor's shop-board than a helm of Government, Ir-r-r-r.' And so the ship wriggles and tumbles, and, on the whole, goes as wind and current drive. No ship was ever steered, except to destruction, in that manner. I deliberately say so, no ship of state either. If you cannot get a real pilot on board, and put the helm into his hands, your ship is as good as a wreck. One real pilot on board may save you; all the bellowing from the banks that ever was, will not, and, by the nature of things, cannot. Nay, your pilot will have to succeed, if he do succeed, very much in spite of said bellowing; he will hear all that and regard very little of it; in a patient, mild-spoken, wise manner, will regard all of it as what it is."

"True, nevertheless, it for ever remains, that intellect is the real object of reverence, and of devout prayer, and zealous wish and pursuit, among the sons of men; and even, well-understood, the one object. It is the inspiration of the Almighty that giveth men understanding. For, it must be repeated, and ever again repeated till poor mortals get to discern it, and awake from their baleful paralysis, and degradation under foul enchantment, 'That a man of intellect, of real and not sham intellect, is by the nature of him, likewise, inevitably a man of nobleness, a man of courage, rectitude, pious strength; who even, because he is, and has been loyal to the laws of this universe, is initiated into discernment of the same; to this hour a missioned of Heaven, whom if men follow it will be well with them; whom if men do not follow, it will not be well. Human intellect, if you consider it well, is the exact summary of Human Worth, and the essence of all worth-ships and worships is reverence for that same. This much surprises you, friend Peter, but I assure you it is the fact, and I would advise to consider it, and to try if you, too, do not gradually find it so. With me it has long been an article, not of 'Faith' only, but of settled insight, of conviction, as to what the ordinances of the Maker in this Universe are. Ah! could you and the rest of us get to know it, and everywhere religiously act upon it as our fortieth article, which includes all the other thirty-nine, and without which, the thirty-nine are good for almost nothing, there might then be some hope for us! In this world there is but one appalling creature; the stupid man considered to be the missioned of Heaven and followed by men."

And then we come to the main difficulty. "It is wisdom alone that can recognise wisdom." "Ay, there's the rub!" "Who is there that can recognise real intellect and do reverence to it, and discriminate it well from sham intellect, which is so much more abundant and deserves the reverse of reverence? He that himself has it." A melancholy fact.

"What method, then, by what method? ask many. Method, alas! To secure an increased supply of Human Intellect to Downing Street, there will be evidently no quite 'effectual' method but that of increasing the supply of Human Intellect, otherwise definable as Human Worth, in society generally, increasing the supply of sacred reverence for it, of loyalty to it, and of life and-death desire and pursuit of it among all classes, if we but knew such a 'method!' Alas, that were simply the method of making all classes servants of Heaven, and except it be devout prayer to Heaven, I have never heard of any method! To increase the reverence for Human Intellect or God's light, and the detestation of Human Stupidity or the Devil's darkness, what method is there? No method, except even this, that we should each of us 'pray' for it, instead of praying for mere scrip and the like; that Heaven would please to vouchsafe us each a little of it, one by one! As, perhaps, Heaven in its infinite bounty by stern methods gradually will? Perhaps, Heaven has mercy, too, in these sore plagues which are oppressing us, and means to teach us reverence for heroism and human intellect, by such baleful experience of what issue imbecility and parliamentary eloquence lead to."

Fortunately, as we believe, for thinking men in England, Mr. Carlyle is about the last man in the kingdom to abstain from speaking when he thinks fit to speak, merely because what he says may not meet with general approval. He can wait to be understood.

In the "New Downing Street," which is the title of the fourth of these pamphlets, we have further proof of this. It is, we think, the best of the set; the most satisfactory—the most complete. The stern, grim humour in the following passage, which deals an annihilating blow at the "dual individual" whom the Protectionists honour, will raise a hearty laugh in all well-constituted minds, because it is supremely funny and supremely just:—

"As for the Protectionist jargon, who in these earnest days would occupy many moments of his time with that! 'A costermonger in this street,' says Crabbe, 'finding lately that his rope of onions which he hoped would have brought a shilling, was to go for only sevenpence henceforth, burst forth into lamentation, execration, and the most pathetic tears. Throwing up the window, I perceived the other costermongers preparing impatiently to pack this one out of their company as a disgrace to it, if he would not hold his peace and take the market rate for his onions. I looked better at this costermonger. To my astonished imagination a star and garter dawned upon the dim figure of the man; and I perceived that here was no costermonger to be expelled with ignominy, but a sublime, goddess-born, dual individual, whom I forbear to name at this moment! What an omen! Nay, to my astonished imagination there dawned still fatal omens.' Surely, of all human trades ever heard of, the trade of owning land in England ought not to bully us for drink-money just now."

The "Stump Orator" is not so good as we expected to find it, judging only by the first part. The reason is, that there is no second part; no reverse of the picture given here. It is itself an eloquent piece of "Stump Oratory;" a something which is not true, because it is only half the truth; and is calculated to mislead and amaze weak minds. Because words have been misused, is that any argument in favour of total silence? Surely Mr. Carlyle has allowed his anger against vain and foolish talkers to carry him too far. There are "Stump Orators" truly; men who speak what will move the multitudes to their own purposes without any regard to the truth, or justice, or propriety of the things said; who speak only that they may show how well they can talk: there are also "Stump Writers," thousands of them, who do the same thing in print. But is, then, all eloquent speaking that moves the heart of a multitude, or of a select few, to be stigmatized as Stump Oratory? Were Isaiah and St. Paul—lower still, Demosthenes, Cicero, and Burke,—were they mere charlatans? Would their silence have been better than their speech? Not while man remains constituted as he is, can we believe that eloquent speech that comes from the heart and goes to it, is a thing to be despised or lightly spoken of—or that it should be spoken of at all without remembering that all the other God-given faculties of mankind would be well-nigh useless without it. A dumb human race would be, as far as we can judge now, not what we call human; it would be much more like brutal, since, by speech and its symbol, writing, all the acquirements of one generation are transmitted to the succeeding ones. As to the expression of thought in writing, Mr. Carlyle's argument, taken as it stands here, declares that Homer and Plato, Shakespeare and Goethe, would have done better not to write. We know well that Mr. Carlyle does not mean this, but he should "avoid all appearance of evil" by letting the whole truth appear. Having said many true things about the unprincipled abuse of words, he should have said the true things that are to be said in favour of the glorious gift of speech! A word spoken in season, how good is it! We wish Mr. Carlyle would dilate a little on that theme. The depreciation of oratory, and passionate writing in general, scarcely comes well from so great a master of the art of word-wielding. Having entered this protest against the pamphlet, as a whole consideration of the subject, we must assure our readers that they will find here an admirable view of one side of it; a side which requires careful looking at, in these days. The following sentence is worth pondering on, as a truth not well recognised. "Do you want a man not to practise what he believes?—then encourage him to keep often speaking it in words."

PREFACE.

IN bringing to a conclusion another Volume of SHARPE'S LONDON MAGAZINE, the Editor begs to return his own thanks and those of the Publishers, for the continued support that has been afforded them, amidst so numerous a crowd of competitors. It is truly gratifying that hardly a single complaint has reached them, either in regard to the tone of the Magazine, the character of the contributions, or quality of the Engravings with which the Work is adorned. On one subject alone has any dissatisfaction been expressed by the Subscribers, namely, the irregular appearance of the "Story of a Family," and its final disappearance (for such it proves to be) from the pages of the Magazine. The Editor can only assure his Subscribers, that it has been entirely out of his power to prevent these mortifying occurrences; that the neglect in question was not his own; and that he was never informed of the Authoress's intention to leave the story in its present state, or he should have used every endeavour to prevent so unpleasant a conclusion.

The Editor appeals to his pages for a proof of his intention to maintain those principles, which originally obtained so fair a standing for SHARPE'S MAGAZINE, and to render it safe and acceptable reading for the Family Circle; and can assure his friends that every exertion shall be made to render the next Volume superior in interest to the present.

FURNESS ABBEY.

OUR way lay along a lane overshadowed with trees through the remaining part of the valley, in the immediate vicinity of the Abbey, not an unfitting prelude to that solitude which the royal thirst for spoil, not reformation, had created around us, and but for which the venerable walls of the abbey had been now entire, dedicated to some useful purpose. The luxuriant foliage, sheltered from the sea winds by the hills, grew more dense as we proceeded; the ash seemed to predominate in all the greenness of hue so peculiarly its own, and so refreshing to the vision. A situation so well adapted for the contemplative spirit, for the mind "commencing with the skies," could not be found. Sequestered, solemn, tranquil, and heart-soothing, the predominant gloom was in perfect keeping for ushering us to the wrecks of the past, and the sepulchres that lay beneath their neglected fragments; it was the "lodge in the wilderness," the "boundless contiguity of shade"—that was Cowper's aspiration.

At length the vista of foliage disclosed before us a venerable gateway, consisting of a fine Gothic arch partially concealed among the overhanging branches, built of a red-coloured stone abounding in the neighbourhood, and overspread in some places with ivy. We never saw an arch applied to a similar purpose that united grace with strength so effectively, but simple and unornamented. Passing beneath, immediately within on the left side appears what has been the lodge of the outer porter, built with great strength, having massy ribs in the arched roof; and a little further on upon the right, are barns and stables, which once belonged to the abbey. Opposite these stands on the left the remains of the Eleemosynary, the place where strangers were entertained, and an old building, which is now used for a farmhouse, once most probably the manor house, erected out of the ruins of the abbey. Directly in front is an open space covered with the natural turf, at the extremity of which, stretched across the full expanse of the vale, rise the noble ruins of the church, the northern side of which, for its entire length, first presents itself to the view—a melancholy memorial of departed greatness, majestic in decay, beautiful in desolation. The choir, nave, and belfry, with the northern transept, rent and ruined, still exhibit walls in some places between fifty and sixty feet high. Not far from the east end, are the remains of a porter's lodge, that was the entrance of the inner inclosure, between which and the transept are the graves of the fathers, whose tombstones were recently discovered. The last, thanks to the Earl of Burlington, the owner of these fine ruins, still rest over the ashes where they were originally placed. Near this spot the broken arches and shattered walls to the southward have a striking effect, and from the eastern end the window, rising nearly to the roof and descending almost to the ground, affords a noble view of the interior, looking westward, terminated by the massy belfry, the walls of which are of vast thickness, relieved by the dark wood beyond, and on the southern side exhibiting windows overhung with foliage; here broken arches and shattered buttresses are crowned with vegetation in picturesque wildness, its fresh colours smiling upon the decay which sustains the festoons with which it has connected the rents of time, mocking the greyness of centuries with ornaments that survive but for a summer. The choir has been lately cleared of rubbish, as well as the entire level of the church, in doing which several effigies from monuments were discovered, as well as the tombs of the fathers on the outside, already mentioned. These effigies are of marble, and are preserved by wooden coverings. Over the great east window, some of the glass of which is preserved still in Windemere church, so high as to be beyond the reach of mutilation, stand the busts of King Stephen and his queen in excellent preservation, they having been the great benefactors to the abbey in 1127. These busts appear to have suffered little from time, being most probably carved of a different stone from that used in the other parts of the building. The south transept has an entrance into two chapels on the east side and into the vestry. A door from the dormitory opens into one of these chapels, by which the monks entered the church at night, and another door in the south-east corner of the nave leads into the cloisters, of which there are very unimportant remains. The chapter-house, refectory, and a suite of apartments that extended as far as what is supposed to be the school-room, many of which have little of the walls remaining above the foundations, must have been, when perfect, most extensive and commodious, if not magnificent, since from the north transept to the school-room, which last is entire, measures 430 feet, the length of the building at right angles with the transepts of the church. The simple but solid workmanship in the arches and the strength of the masonry, are not more striking than the deficiency of the materials in durability. The kitchen and offices had very pure running water beneath them, over which an arch was turned for a considerable width, with here and there openings for access; the whole plan may be easily traced, although the appropriation of some of the outbuildings it may be difficult to decide upon. The trees which surround or grow out of the walls add much to the impressive effect, by causing numerous changes of light and shade, often overshadowing windows through which the eye takes in dark arches and intervening lights, with bits of exquisite beauty for pictorial effect. In some places, where through arched windows others of massy proportions cross them, and the light comes flashing between, the effect is not only solemn but grand. A row of broken pillars, a range of windows little injured, an arch with beautiful and massive regularity, or groins of most exact execution, all catch the attention. The finest perspective is from the east window to which we before alluded, the best position for the spectator in this perhaps the first of British monastic ruins. From thence the labours of man under the wasting of time are seen in a union of effect highly picturesque; and the pride of humanity is more humbled by the lesson, than it ever was by the words uttered before the blazing altars once standing there, declaratory of the vanity of earthly things; these, visible and tangible, echo to thoughts, not to words, that have become trite from repetition. To these noble apartments must have repaired all the "pride and circumstance" of monastical authority and of religious duty. Great hospitality, large alms, devout exercises, and monastic laws; and all these having passed away, we can only meditate over their memorials, and regret, in place of enriching court sycophants and a tyrant's power, some less questionable application had not been made of their spoils.

Both round and pointed arches occur in this building, as well as Saxon and Gothic pillars. The whole was constructed with great solidity, the cement being more durable than the stone; but we were struck with the decay of this material in some of the arches, where water has most probably been the agent, while the cement remains unaffected by its action. The chapter-house roof was entire as late as the middle of the last century. This room measures sixty feet by forty-five, the roof was supported by a double row of columns, which divided it into three aisles of fourteen feet each in width; and it is the only apartment that, admitting some little share of ornament, infringed upon the severe simplicity of this noble edifice elsewhere. The roof of the school-house is the only one entire in the large extent of the ruin. The centre tower rested upon four arches, supported by a like number of pillars richly clustered, while the whole was closely surrounded by a wall, which left only the western end of the building and the northern side of the church open as far as the north-western corner of the northern transept, where the entrance door was close to the western angle, and the wall beginning near it was continued, after a small turn, to the inner lodge, which stood at the entrance of the burying-place of the abbots. There, upon removing the rubbish, their memorials were recently discovered, lying over the remains they were designed to record; objects of as much interest as the abbey ruins themselves. From the lodge the wall ran southward, and terminated near the school-house, and the area of the quadrangular court in front of the cloisters measured 338 feet by 102. There was yet an outer wall, which enclosed monastery, mills, fish-pond, and gardens, circumscribing a space of sixty-five acres; from the site of which there are noble views. The labour in producing such an establishment as that of Furness, with the gardens and granges, must have been enormous, for the spot was an uncultivated wild when the monks settled there. The gardens were generally kept in order by their own hands; and it is a singular proof of the lapse of the people in the districts round Furness into agricultural barbarism, at least after the ruin of the place, that marl pits opened by the monks may be still seen on all their granges near the abbey, the use of which was unknown in Furness until a few years ago, having been lost, nor was it credited that wheat had ever been grown there until of late years, though it was constantly harvested by the monks and their tenantry, until Henry VIII. rendered the neighbourhood again a desert.

Such is the state of this remnant of the most noted Cistercian house in England, and thus it vanished, despite its charters from twelve kings, and many Papal bulls in its favour. Its revenues, that fed numbers of poor persons, became the prize of crowned avarice, and the poor were turned out to perish. Nor was the fate of the abbey inmates much better; the last abbot, Roger Pyle, had no choice but to surrender his high trust or be hanged, as most of the principals of such institutions were, who would not declare that they surrendered them "voluntarily," and add their belief that Henry VIII. was God's viceregent upon earth in place of the Pope. Pyle was recompensed by the rectory of Dalton, worth 33*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per annum, and was thus destined to live in the midst of the melancholy wrecks of what it had been his lot to govern, and the toil of many ages to accumulate.

AN ADVENTURE NEAR THE LAKE OF GERS.

FROM THE FRENCH.

FROM Sixt, the pedestrian can enter the valley of the Arve, by crossing a chain of high mountains which extend between Cluses and Sallenche. This passage, however, is scarcely ever taken but by the contrabandists or land smugglers, who abound in that part of the country. These bold and desperate men, after stocking themselves at Martigny in the Valais, make their way, loaded with enormous weights, over the almost inaccessible hills, and thus descend into the interior valleys of Savoy; whilst the douaniers, honest folks! keep good guard on the more habitable frontiers of the country.

These douaniers, or custom-house officers, are a worthy class of gentlemen, who sport a uniform, have always very dirty hands, and a pipe in their mouth. Sitting in the sunshine, they doze away their time until a carriage happens to pass,—the driver of course only taking that road, for the simple reason that his vehicle contains no contraband articles.

If an unfortunate tourist be in it, their business at once begins.—“Monsieur has nothing to declare?”—No!—and the next moment, regardless of this laconic and very definite reply, they tear open the trunks and portmanteaus, and thrust their before-mentioned not over-delicate hands, amongst all the mysteries of the traveller's wardrobe; much to the detriment of the clean linen and cambric handkerchiefs;—and the state pays them for these useful services, a thug droll enough!

The contrabandists are a set of fellows armed to the teeth, and always disposed to welcome with a musket-ball a douanier who should venture to intrude upon the roads which they reserve for themselves. Happily, the douaniers, of course ignorant of this circumstance—who would for a moment doubt it?—not being geologists enough, nor sufficiently ardent admirers of nature, to care to fatigue themselves and injure their boots on the rugged and break-neck paths of the mountains, keep away—and thereby show their wisdom.

I have often been bothered by these douaniers. My travelling items, shirts, and toilet paraphernalia, have had the honour of being acquainted with the agents of almost every government, absolute or otherwise, from Sicily to Sweden; but no prohibited article was ever found amongst them. I have also been introduced, against my will it must be confessed, to the contrabandists—witness the fatal day when I took it into my head to walk from Sixt to Sallenche, across the mountains of which I have already spoken. I had the road pointed out to me, before I started, by my landlord at Sixt. An hour before arriving at the summit of the mountain, I should reach, he said, a little lake, called the Lake of Gers: beyond which I should have to follow a ridge of rocks traversing a plain of frozen snow, and then to descend towards the woods which crown on the side of Sallenche the cascade of the Arpenas.

Thus instructed, I set forth on the morning of a fine autumnal day; and after mounting rapidly for three hours, I discovered the little lake, confined within its green and mossy banks. Sitting down upon its edge, I began, after the example of Narcissus, to contemplate my image in its sparkling waters; but not with the same results: for I saw myself quietly satisfying the cravings of hunger, rendered doubly keen by the exercise and mountain air, with the wing of a plump chicken!

Besides my own image, I saw also in the lake, the reversed shadows of the surrounding peaks, the dark pine forests, and floating clouds, and all the panorama of nature around me; not omitting from the picture two crows, which, soaring high in air, appeared in this sunlit mirror to be flying in the profound depths of the antipodes. Whilst I was amusing myself thus, and dreaming away my time—suddenly, the head of a man, or of a woman it might be, or of an animal of some other genus, but at least of something possessing life, seemed to me to be popped over the ridge of the mountain up which I was next about to clamber. I raised my eyes instantly to catch a view of the object itself, but I saw nothing; so that, attributing this moving phenomenon to some undulation on the surface of the water, I recommenced my journey; tolerably well persuaded that I had the field to myself. Nevertheless, being equally inclined to believe that I really had seen something, I stopped every now and then to look about me; and when I began to draw near the spot at which I fancied I had seen the head, I kept as clear as I could of certain black-looking rocks that lay in my path, and walked with redoubled circumspection.

My host at Sixt, in giving me the instructions concerning my road, had related a little history, the scene of which was laid in the rocky hollow through which I was now passing. This is, I think, the time to tell it:—

“Eighteen contrabandists, each laden with a sack of Berne gunpowder, were toiling through it one hot summer day. The last of the rank (they were marching in single file) felt that his load was becoming lighter, and he was already about to congratulate himself upon the fact, when he began ingeniously to reflect that the decrease of weight was perhaps at the expense of the powder. It was but too true! He turned round, and perceived a long train of the combustible article marking the track they had taken. This was not only a loss, but it might also prove a clue to betray their march, and thus seriously compromise their safety. He therefore called out, ‘Halt!’—and, at this command, the seventeen others sat down comfortably upon their sacks, to take a turn at their brandy flasks and wipe their faces.

“Meanwhile the ingenious gentleman retraced his steps as far as the commencement of the train. This he reached after a walk of two hours, and he immediately set fire to it with his pipe, in order to destroy all traces of their road. Two minutes afterwards he heard a magnificent explosion; which, reverberating along the sides of the mountains, rolling down the valleys, and reascending by the narrow defiles, caused in him a wonderful surprise and admiration. The seventeen sacks, connected to the train, had blown up into the air, taking with them the seventeen fathers of families sitting thereon!”

Concerning this story, I remark two things:—first, that it is an alarming one, and no doubt true, because proved by tradition and by the rocky hollow which is still existing, as any one may go and see for himself. We must, indeed, consider it to be as much an established fact as that the passage of Hannibal was made by the Little Saint Bernard. For how do they prove to you the truth of this latter? Let us see!—These learned guides commence by pointing out a white rock at the foot of the mountain; after which, they inform you that this was the rock which the Carthaginian dissolved in vinegar!

Secondly, I remark that in this history seventeen men perish; but, observe well! there remains one to tell the tale. This, if I do not deceive myself, is the model to be followed by all good novelists; for, in a battle, a shipwreck, a catastrophe of any kind, where few perish, there is no excitement—and where all are killed, there is an end of the thing at once! But where one only, in the midst of a terrible disaster, escapes to carry home the news, we have sufficient horror and exciting interest to satisfy the most fastidious admirers of the marvellous.

But to return to my own adventure. It began now to get very warm in my apparently undisputed territory, although at this elevation, the heat is always tempered by the rarefaction of the air; besides which, the beauty of the scenery which we have under our eyes, captivates the soul, and makes us forget those little inconveniences which, in an uninteresting plain, become sometimes so intolerable. In looking back, I saw at a little distance the icy dome of Mount Bicet, and I fancied that I saw also, and still nearer to me, something moving behind the last of the pines I had just passed. My imagination being upon the alert, I immediately pictured to myself a pair of legs belonging to the before-mentioned head, and thereupon continued to journey onwards with increasing circumspection.

Unfortunately, I am very nervous! I am no hero, I hate danger, and like nothing better than perfect security! The sole idea, that in a duel one is forced to see the point of a sword facing one's right eye, has always been sufficient to render me very prudent, and of a somewhat obtuse susceptibility, in spite of my temper which is naturally quick, and my pride which is easily affronted. And this affair might be worse than a duel! It might be an attempt upon my purse or my person, or upon both at once,—a frightful calamity, and no one left to tell the tale! When this thought came into my head, it drove all other reflections out of it, and at length compelled me to hide myself amongst the rocks, in order to observe, from a place of safety, what was passing in the rear.

I had kept watch for about half-an-hour—it is very fatiguing to keep watch!—when a man of sinister appearance ventured to steal out from behind the pines. He gazed intently and for some time in the direction of the rocks amongst which I was concealed, and then clapped his hands twice. At this signal two other men appeared; and all the three, each lifting upon their shoulders a large and well-filled sack, pushed quietly forwards, relighting at the same time their pipes. They soon arrived in the vicinity of my hiding-place, where they halted, and sat down upon their sacks, precisely as did the seventeen unfortunates, but luckily their backs were towards me.

I had plenty of time to take my observations. These gentlemen appeared to me to be very well armed. They had among the three a carbine and two pistols, without reckoning the sacks of dangerous obesity, which my imagination, faithful to its historical remembrances, did not fail to fill with Berne gunpowder. I was already trembling at the bare thought of some unlucky train, when one of them, getting up, placed upon his sack his lighted pipe. At this sight

I gave up all for lost, and, squeezing myself as closely as possible against the rock, upon the shelter of which I reckoned just enough to prevent myself from calling out with fright, I waited the explosion.

The smuggler who had thus terrified me went a little way off, and clambered up to a higher part of the mountain, from whence he examined carefully the road they were about to take; after which, returning to his companions, "I see nothing more of him," said he. "All the same," replied the other; "that rascal will be enough to betray and sell us." "And I wager," interrupted the third, "it is for that purpose that he has hastened on in advance. A douanier in disguise, I tell you! He stopped below there, like a hound off the scent, staring about him, here, there, and everywhere. Why did we not put him out of the way, without any one being the wiser for it, in that snug little corner? The dead alone tell no tales."

"Thus it happened that old Grognon did not tell any," replied the first speaker. "Close by, at the bottom of the cliff there, is the hole in which his bones are whitening. The cunning knave! When we caught him, in order to look like a traveller only, he threw away his carbine. But this was of no use. His trial was soon made. Lameche tied him to a tree, and Peter finished him by sending a ball through his temple; and the merry dog forgot to call out till all was over—Grognon, say your prayers!"

A frightful laugh followed these horrible words; when the same man getting up to give the signal for departure, suddenly caught sight of me in my hiding-place, and cried out, "Parbleu! we have found the bird in its nest—here is our gentleman!" The other two, at these words, jumped up in great haste, and I saw, or fancied that I saw, a thousand pistols pointed at my head.

"Gentlemen!" I stammered out, "gentlemen, you deceive yourselves. Allow me to explain. I am the most honest man in the world"—they began to frown. "Take away, I beg of you, your pistols, which may go off without your intending it! I am an author, a man of letters, altogether a stranger to douaniers, married, the father of a family! Lower then, I beseech you, these weapons which prevent me from collecting my ideas; and pray continue your road without troubling yourselves about me! I have an abhorrence of custom-houses; I am even much interested in your calling. You are brave and honest men, carrying abundance amongst the victims of an odious law. Gentlemen, I have the honour to wish you good day!"

"Stop!" replied the most ill-favoured of the three, in a gruff voice, "you are here as a spy upon us!"

"Not at all, not at all; I am here for the purpose of—"

"Watching us and selling us! you are known. We saw you below there peeping and peering—"

"At the beautiful scenery, my worthy gentlemen! nothing more."

"At the beautiful scenery, indeed? and this corner in which you were crouching,—was that, tell me, to gather simples? A losing trade you were following there. These mountains belong to us; bad luck to those who would track us here,—say your prayers!”

He raised his pistol; I fell flat upon my face. The other two approached him, apparently to intercede, and the three spoke together a few words in a low tone; after which, one of them, placing without ceremony his load upon my shoulders, gave me a kick and cried, “forward!” It was thus that I found myself obliged to take part in a contraband expedition. It was for the first time in my life, and I have always since taken care that it should be the last.

It seemed that my fate had just been decided in their secret council, for these men did not trouble themselves any more about me. They walked in silence, carrying by turns the two remaining loads. Several times I again tried to prove to them my innocent intentions; but their practised eye pleaded more in favour of the truth of my words, than all the protestations in the world could have done. The only thing that looked doubtful to them was my having walked so cautiously, and looked so frequently about me, when I had reason to believe myself alone; but I explained away this suspicious circumstance, by acknowledging the apparition that had struck me whilst I was looking into the little lake.

“It is enough!” said the ill-looking one. “Innocent or not, you are able to betray us. March; we shall soon be at the forest, where we will settle your business for you!”

Any one may judge of the dubious and dreadful sense that I attached to these words; and thus, during the half-hour's walk before we reached the neighbouring forest, I had ample time to form a good idea of the anguish endured by a criminal on being led to the scaffold. It is worthy of all pity, I assure you. Still, I had in my favour, my innocence in the first place, and then the chance of meeting some one; without reckoning that which was always open to me, to precipitate myself, sack and all, into a very convenient abyss which yawned upon our right. The first of these chances did not present itself, and I did not fancy the other; so that, we arrived without hindrance at the wood. There these gentlemen cased me of my burden, and tied me tightly to a strong larch-tree; after which, instead of finishing me as they had served Grognon, they said, “We require twenty-four hours of security, amuse yourself there till our return, and to-morrow in repassing we will set you free, trusting to your gratitude to keep you discreet;” so saying, they took up their sacks, and left me.

Never did Nature appear to me to wear so beautiful and so joyous an aspect as at that moment, and, singular fact! my larch-tree did not incommode me in the least. Twenty-four hours seemed to me but a minute, and these men must be, I thought, assuredly very honest fellows, a little rough in their manners perhaps, from necessity, but otherwise estimable enough, and sufficiently well acquainted with the usages of society. Life was really restored to me, and after a few minutes, a powerful sensation of joy succeeding the most pitiable emotions, I felt almost about to swoon away; when I recovered myself, the tears were flowing down my cheeks, tears of gratitude for this mercy of heaven.

I will not, however, mingle with the recital of this, after all, ludicrous adventure, an account of the movements which thus agitated my heart. Suffice it to say, that I rendered thanks to the all-protecting Providence a thousand times, and with all the fervour of my soul.

My thoughts now wandered to my family, and becoming impatient to embrace again my children, after so great an escape, I first began to perceive the inconvenience of having a larch-tree attached to one's person. It was, however, two o'clock in the afternoon and I had only twenty-three hours to wait!

The spot in which I was located, was wild and lonely in appearance, not far below the line of the unmelting snows, and rarely passed by travellers; although in regard to this latter circumstance, if one had really passed, I believe that, in these first moments, penetrated still by a profound respect for my persecutors, who could not be a great way off, I should have begged of him to let me alone, and not to approach me. Nevertheless, towards four o'clock my respect had diminished in the direct ratio of the squares of the distances, and, at the same time, my larch-tree began to make my back ache in a strange manner, whilst I could see nothing but the rat in the fable that could possibly set me free. Suddenly, however, a countryman, or labourer, evidently a native of the district, came in sight.

This native was himself of a very “fabulous” appearance. He had a hat without a crown to it, coarse leathern breeches, no stockings, and, under his nose, a kind of black forest arising from the immoderate use of snuff, no doubt contraband.

Instead of obeying me, he stopped short, and regaled himself with an enormous pinch.

The peasant of Savoy is more cautious than inquisitive. He never hurries himself, nor even stretches out his arm, but when he sees clearly what he has to reach. Neither does he interfere in any affair, without being assured, that, by doing so, he will not bring himself into trouble with the authorities, nor get into quarrels with his neighbours, nor into any scrape whatsoever; otherwise, he is the best fellow in the world, and this I say seriously, having tested the truth of it on many occasions.

My native was then one of the best fellows in the world! but why was this man tied to a tree? that did not seem clear to him. He might have been placed there by the authorities, or, as he reasoned, “for some purpose or another.” Therefore, before he came forward, he wished to examine me a little.

By-and-by he called out, smiling graciously, as though I had been there for the pleasure of a walk:—“It is very charming weather to-day, very charming!”

"Come and set me free, instead of talking about the weather, you stupid fellow."

"You will be set free soon enough. Have you been there long?"

"Three hours or more, so be quick, and get to work!"

He took two steps in advance.

"You are quite sure you were fastened there by rogues?"

"Yes! yes! I will tell you all about it, but first let me loose."

He took three more steps towards me, and I believed that the end of my tribulation was at last arrived, when he whispered in a mysterious tone:—"Tell me, were they any of the contraband gentlemen?"

"Exactly so, you have hit it! Those rascals have tied me to this larch until they pass again to-morrow."

These words had a prodigious effect upon the native. He retreated in horror, and appeared about to leave me there; when, not being able to restrain my anger, I abused him, and called him all the names that I could think of, treating him as the lowest of the low; whilst he, without being at all moved by my reproaches, said very quietly, in retreating still farther:—"Have a little patience, you will be set free soon enough!" Then, increasing his pace, he disappeared in turning a corner of the footpath; and I sent my maledictions after him.

I now scarcely knew what to think. My situation seemed to me to be aggravated by what I had said to this man; who might compromise my safety with the contrabandists, if, indeed, he were not himself one of the gang. My spirits thus began to fall again terribly; and I should almost have given way to despair, but for the gambols of two squirrels, which afforded me a little distraction. These pretty, and usually timid animals, believing themselves to be alone in the wood, darted about with the most graceful movements; and, pursuing each other from tree to tree, surprised me by the agility of their bounds, and the elegant playfulness of their manœuvres. As I made a part of my tree, one of them descended heedlessly along my body, in order to climb a neighbouring larch; the other one springing also upon it, and following its comrade from branch to branch until they reached the top; where, all of a sudden, they remained motionless, as with one accord. This made me conjecture, that, from their elevated position, they perceived some one approaching; and I was not deceived.

A stout man appeared, followed by the native of the black forest. The stout man had three chins, a face like the full moon, a small eye, (and I thought, unfortunately for myself, a very prudent one,) a pointed hat, and a coat with long tails reaching to his heels. When he came in sight of me, he stopped; and settled himself into a scrutinising attitude.

"Who are you?" I cried.

"The syndic of the commune," replied he, without advancing a single step.

"Well then, syndic of the commune! I summon you to set me free; or to make this assistant do so, who is cramming himself with snuff at your side."

"You will be loosened soon enough! said both of them at the same time; the syndic adding, "explain to me the reason of your being there."

Instructed by experience, I took care to say no more about the smugglers. "My story," replied I, "is a very simple one. I have been attacked and robbed by brigands, who have tied me to this tree; and I insist upon being instantly loosened."

"Ah, here is an affair!" said the syndic,—"brigands, do you say?"

"Yes, brigands! I crossed the mountain with a mule which carried my portmanteau, and they have robbed me of both."

"Ah, here is an affair."

"Most certainly, it is an affair! and now that you know all about it, come forward and set me free. Allons!"

"Ah, here is an affair!" again replied he, instead of advancing. "Let us see! this will take a good deal of writing—"

"Loosen me at once, blockhead! What have I to do with your writings?"

"Have patience! We must take down the depositions, do you see, according to law."

"You can do this afterwards. Untie me at once!"

"It is not possible, my good sir! I should be acting wrongly—we must fill up the forms first, and set you free afterwards. I will send in search of witnesses, of whom I must have at least two to sign their names. It will take a little while to get them, you know, and then there will be their time to pay for; but Monsieur has the means." Then, turning to the native, he said:—"Go down to La Pernette's house at Maglan; she will tell you where to find her husband the notary, you will then seek him out, and bid him come up here; after which, you will run on to St. Martin, where you will seek Benaiton the churchwarden, who is sure to be there, because he rings to-day for Chozet's wedding; and tell him to come up also. Likewise remind the notary to bring his ink-stand, as our ink was all spilled last Tuesday: and, moreover, let him bring some stamped paper with him. Go, my boy! and use all diligence,—with liberal employers one reckons afterwards, and loses nothing by it. Go! and in passing Veluz, tell Jean-Marc that his mare has the glanders, and they have fired it; but that the autumn will bring it round again,—Go!"

"Let him go to the —! and Jean-Marc, and his mare, and you also, wretches without humanity!—but stay! untie me, and I will give you each a louis d'or."

At this proposition, the native, who had already started upon his errand, stopped short, and looked wistfully at the other; "but the syndic replied:—"You will pay for the writings and the expenses, and afterwards, if you choose, you can make us a little compliment and be as generous as you please without any one finding fault with you for it; but an attempt to bribe me from my duty, even by piling louis d'or on louis d'or, will serve you nothing. Know that our family has held the post of syndic of the commune from father to son, since the time of Antoine-Baptiste, my ancestor, and before a blemish shall fall upon our name, the Arve shall cease to flow. Then turning to the boor, who still lingered, "Begone with you!" he cried, "and fulfil your mission;" after which, he added, in quitting me, "and you, sir, have patience! I will endeavour to get you a mug of wine to comfort you in the interim."

Thus was the dreadful, though praiseworthy honesty of this good man, as inimical to my hopes as his respect for legal forms had been. I remained again alone, and this time, being certain that I should not be set at liberty until the following morning, I tried to make up my mind to the idea of having the larch-tree for a bedfellow. Fortunately the evening was warm, and the air delightfully serene. The sun, already on the decline, penetrated with softened beams horizontally into the forest, and projected the lengthened shadows over the verdant and mossy ground. The hawks which I had seen at intervals hovering high above my head, had now disappeared; but a few crows still crossed from time to time, winging their way up the valley of the Arve to regain their nightly resting-places; whilst the snow-peaks around me, losing little by little their roseate hues, seemed passing from the activity of life, into the stillness of tranquil sleep. This calm of the twilight—this sight of nature enveloped in dim and floating shadows, and ebbing into the night,—exerts upon the soul a secret power, soothing all our troubles and our restless thoughts by the charms of a soft and pleasing melancholy. In spite of my situation, I was not lost to these impressions. My heart, deeply moved, traced back all the events of that stormy day; and remembering the anguish of the morning, enjoyed with greater happiness the sweet tranquillity of the evening hour, reassuring itself with the hope of a certain, if not of an immediate deliverance.

By the last gleam of the sinking sun, however, I saw appear at the edge of my horizon several dusky forms; which gradually drawing nearer, resolved themselves into the semblances of men, women and children; in fact, the whole population of a village. These figures being placed between me and the sun, I did not at first perceive my syndic amongst them; he was, nevertheless, there, and with him came also the curé, attracted by the noise of my adventure. The visit of this ecclesiastic reanimated my hopes; for I trusted to turn whatever christian virtues might be in him to the purpose of my speedy liberation.

He was very old and infirm, and mounted slowly. "Ah!" cried he, as soon as he came within hearing, "those wretches have swathed you, Monsieur, most villanously! I have the pleasure to wish you good evening."

The friendly tone and open countenance of the good old man caused me inexpressible joy. "Villanously, indeed!" I replied, "but excuse me, Monsieur le curé, if by their fault I be not able to take off my hat to you in returning your salutation. May I speak to you for a moment, alone?"

"We should first, I think," returned he, "set you at liberty; you will then be able to speak to me at greater ease. Be quick then, Antoine!" he added to the syndic, "and cut me these cords; that will be the readiest method of undoing them."

I loaded him with expressions of gratitude, which, believe me, came truly from my heart. Antoine took out his knife, and was already about to cut my bonds, when the native, who coveted the rope, pushed him aside, and fastening upon the knot with his teeth, quickly loosened it;—and in a few minutes I was again free.

The first thing I did, was to seize the hand of the curé; and in the transport of my joy I embraced him repeatedly. Very shortly, however, I began to experience an agonizing pain in all my aching limbs; and, incapable of walking, I was obliged to sit down upon the grass. Antoine then made his appearance, with his flagon of mountain wine, which restored me greatly; whilst the curé sent off one of his parishioners to fetch his mule, in order to take me to the village. After giving his orders, he returned, and said, "I am now ready to listen to you;" and all my wondering beholders, men women and children, formed a circle around us. A deep silence succeeded; during which, the sun, like a globe of fire, casting its last radiance upon the group, dipped and disappeared behind the peaks of the neighbouring hills.

I related my adventure minutely from beginning to end. The atrocious murder of Grognon filled the minds of the honest people with the greatest horror; and when I had repeated the cruel pleasantry which occasioned so much merriment to the smugglers, Grognon, say your prayers,—the good curé and his parishioners crossed themselves simultaneously, in the midst of a profound and respectful silence. Moved at this sight, and feeling an uncontrollable desire to associate myself in some way with this spontaneous act of devotion, I took off my hat, and remained uncovered. The villagers seemed surprised, and the old man, after standing gravely for a moment, without appearing to notice what I had done, said—"Continue, I pray you, and let us hear the end of your story." This was soon told; and I did not forget to mention the excessive prudence of the native, nor the praiseworthy honesty of the syndic.

"It is well!" said the curé; then addressing his parishioners, he added: "My flock! listen to me. You tremble before these bad men, and thus embolden them by your cowardice to dare so much: and, what is worse, some of you, I fear, profit by their illegal commerce. Do you see, now, André, to what your filthy mania for snuff, and this disgraceful custom of consuming it beyond your means, has led you. Your nose is gorged while you have no stockings, and your clothes are in rags; but beyond all this, you buy your tobacco of those who defraud the government, and thus to avoid embroiling yourself with these wretches, you are afraid to liberate a fellow-creature in pain and trouble. Think you, should a christian have such fears? But know, André, that those murderers will groan in everlasting flames, and I cannot answer for those who have dealings with them; believe me, my boy! take less snuff, and purchase it lawfully. As for Antoine, he only did his duty, and did it well too; the forms of law alone prevented him from doing that to which his own wishes prompted him."

The good curé in uttering these last words, tapped Antoine kindly on the shoulder; who, proud of receiving this approbation before all the village, comforted himself with a droll appearance of dignity and satisfaction, holding his empty flagon in one hand, and his pointed hat in the other.

During this discourse, the mule arrived. They helped me upon it, and as we descended, I turned round and took leave of my larch-tree. The syndic held the bridle; the worthy curé chatted at my side; and the villagers brought up the rear: and thus this picturesque procession moved on in the clear but fading twilight. In the course of a few minutes, I was snugly housed in the pleasant though humble abode of this good old curé, who, excusing himself for an instant, called out to Martha, his old housekeeper, to get ready a fowl as soon as she could, and to bring him the key of the cellar.

We supped together tête à tête; he regaling himself upon his fruit and bread, whilst I devoured the fowl; and finally, after we had enjoyed a bottle of old wine, which he opened in honour of my company, I took leave of him for the night, with many expressions of regard, to seek upon my welcome couch the repose I so greatly needed.

The following day I descended to Maglan. My intention had been to have visited Chamouny; but after this rough adventure, I turned my back for a time upon the mountains, and hastened to regain my home at Geneva, by the shortest road.

THE LITTLE HERO OF HAARLEM.

At an early period in the history of Holland, a boy was born in Haarlem, a town remarkable for its variety of fortune in war, but happily still more so for its manufactures and inventions in peace. His father was a Sluicer—that is, one whose employment it was to open and shut the sluices, or large oak-gates which, placed at certain regular distances, close the entrance of the canals, and secure Holland from the danger to which it seems exposed, of finding itself under water, rather than above it. When water is wanted, the sluicer raises the sluices more or less, as required, as a cook turns the cock of a fountain, and closes them again carefully at night; otherwise the water would flow into the canals, then overflow them, and inundate the whole country; so that even the little children in Holland are fully aware of the importance of a punctual discharge of the sluicer's duties. The boy was about eight years old when, one day, he asked permission to take some cakes to a poor blind man, who lived at the other side of the dyke. His father gave him leave, but charged him not to stay too late. The child promised, and set off on his little journey. The blind man thankfully partook of his young friend's cakes, and the boy, mindful of his father's orders, did not wait, as usual, to hear one of the old man's stories, but as soon as he had seen him eat one muffin, took leave of him to return home.

As he went along by the canals, then quite full, for it was in October, and the autumn rains had swelled the waters,—the boy now stooped to pull the little blue flowers which his mother loved so well, now, in childish gaiety, hummed some merry song. The road gradually became more solitary, and soon neither the joyous shout of the villager, returning to his cottage-home, nor the rough voice of the carter grumbling at his lazy horses, was any longer to be heard. The little fellow now perceived that the blue of the flowers in his hand was scarcely distinguishable from the green of the surrounding herbage, and he looked up in some dismay. The night was falling; not, however, a dark winter-night, but one of those beautiful, clear, moonlight nights, in which every object is perceptible, though not as distinctly as by day. The child thought of his father, of his injunction, and was preparing to quit the ravine in which he was almost buried, and to regain the beach, when suddenly a slight noise, like the trickling of water upon pebbles, attracted his attention. He was near one of the large sluices, and he now carefully examines it, and soon discovers a hole in the wood, through which the water was flowing. With the instant perception which every child in Holland would have, the boy saw that the water must soon enlarge the hole through which it was now only dropping, and that utter and general ruin would be the consequence of the inundation of the country that must follow. To see, to throw away the flowers, to climb from stone to stone till he reached the hole, and to put his finger into it, was the work of a moment, and to his delight he finds that he has succeeded in stopping the flow of the water.

This was all very well for a little while, and the child thought only of the success of his device. But the night was closing in, and with the night came the cold. The little boy looked around in vain. No one came. He shouted—he called loudly—no one answered. He resolved to stay there all night, but alas! the cold was becoming every moment more biting, and the poor finger fixed in the hole began to feel benumbed, and the numbness soon extended to the hand, and thence throughout the whole arm. The pain became still greater, still harder to bear, but still the boy moved not. Tears rolled down his cheeks as he thought of his father, of his mother, of his little bed, where he might now be sleeping so soundly; but still the little fellow stirred not, for he knew that did he remove the small slender finger which he had opposed to the escape of the water, not only would he himself be drowned, but his father, his brothers, his neighbours—nay, the whole village. We know not what faltering of purpose, what momentary failures of courage there might have been during that long and terrible night; but certain it is, that at day-break he was found in the same painful position by a clergyman returning from attendance on a death-bed, who, as he advanced, thought he heard groans, and bending over the dyke, discovered a child seated on a stone, writhing from pain, and with pale face and tearful eyes.

"In the name of wonder, boy," he exclaimed, "what are you doing there?"

"I am hindering the water from running out," was the answer, in perfect simplicity, of the child, who, during that whole night, had been evincing such heroic fortitude and undaunted courage.

The Muse of History, too often blind to (true) glory, has handed down to posterity many a warrior, the destroyer of thousands of his fellow-men—she has left us in ignorance of the name of this real little hero of Haarlem.

ORNITHOLOGIA POETICA.

BY H. G. ADAMS.

THE EAGLE—Aquila Chrysaetus.

"BIRD of the broad and sweeping wing,
Whose home is high in heaven,
Where wide the storms their banners fling,
And the tempest clouds are driven;
Thy throne is on the mountain top,
Thy fields the boundless air,
And hoary peaks that proudly prop
The skies, thy dwellings are."—PERCIVAL.

It is thus that one of the most imaginative and polished of American poets commences his noble ode to the EAGLE; than which we know of nothing much finer in the way of lyrical composition; and, indeed, we should scarcely imagine it possible, throughout the whole range of poetry, ancient and modern, to make such a selection of descriptive passages wherein the grand and the beautiful are harmoniously blended, of sublime images, and of lofty similitudes, as may be found in the poetical allusions to this Imperial Bird—this Lord of the Realms of Air, and Monarch of the whole Feathered Creation. A few of these passages we propose placing before our readers, and perhaps, it will be better for us, in order to the preserving of some kind of arrangement, to take one of the best popular histories of the bird, (say Mudie's,) and let the text of that form the framework of the pictures which we here intend to present, and which, or we shall sadly lack the power of discrimination, for there are ample materials at command, will be an embodiment of magnificent grandeur and sublimity, as regards natural scenery; of power, and elevation, and wide range of thought; of richness of imagination; and most perfect command of language, and of rhythmical numbers:—

By these the poet-painter shadows forth
Forms full of beauty and of majesty;
And o'er them throws the glowing, lively tints
Of his imagination, like the sun
Gilding, irradiating all around.
No green leaf quivering in the sunshine there,
With tuneful-throated warbler flitting by;

No rock that towers aloft until it seems
To pierce with jagged edge the azure dome,
Where, as upon a throne, the eagle sits,
And proudly glances o'er his wide domain;
No fleecy cloud with silver edge that floats
Above the mountain tarn, o'er whose dark face
Its bright reflection passeth like a smile;
No primrose peeping o'er a river's brim,
As striving to obtain, though but a glimpse
Of that which nourish'd and refresh'd its roots,
And with low-murmur'd music hail'd its growth,
Even from the first hour of its perfumed life;
No form of earth, or air, inanimate
Or full of motion, but suggests some thought,
Quickens some nobler impulse, or excites
Some hope divine, or lofty aspiration.

Let us now turn to MUDIE, than whom we cannot have a much better guide in this matter, and who, with respect to eagles generally, tells us that "in every age they have been the most celebrated of rapacious birds; and, in so far as power, strength, daring, and grandeur of situation are concerned, they deserve their celebrity. They frequent more lonely and secluded places than any of the others; they nestle on more wild, elevated, and inaccessible rocks; they rise much higher and range much farther; and their stoop, when they come down on their prey from a great elevation, is perhaps the grandest display in the whole action of animated nature." And how finely is all this illustrated in those words of inspiration uttered by the patriarch Job!—addressing his Lord and Maker, he asks,—

"Is it at thy voice that the eagle soars?
And therefore maketh he his nest on high?
The rock is the place of his habitation.
He abideth on the crag, the place of strength;
Thence he pounces upon his prey.
His eyes discern afar off.
Even his young ones drink down blood;
And wherever is slaughter, there is he."

And we are reminded by the latter words of this paraphrase, of the prediction uttered by our Saviour to the unbelieving Jews:—"Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together;" (Matt. xxiv. 28),—meaning, as most commentators agree in thinking, to say, that wherever those unfaithful dealers with God were, there should their enemies the Romans, who bore figures of eagles on their standards, be, to fill them with fear and dismay, and to destroy them as the pitiless eagle does his quarry. We may here very appropriately quote the fine lines of Mrs. Barbauld:—

"The royal bird his lonely kingdom forms
Amid the gathering clouds and sullen storms:
Through the wide waste of air he darts his sight,
And holds his sounding pinions poised for flight;
With cruel eye premeditates the war,
And marks his destined victim from afar;
Descending in a whirlwind to the ground,
His pinions like the rush of waters sound;
The fairest of the fold he bears away,
And to the nest compels the struggling prey."

The allusions to the eagle in Scripture are very numerous, and they all have reference to it as an emblem of strength, and swiftness, and keenness of sight; of power and dominion, and loftiness of station. "Strong is thy dwelling, and thou puttest thy nest in the rock," said the prophet Balaam, predicting of the Kenites, (Numb. xxiv. 21.) To the Israelites it was said—"The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from afar, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth." (Deut. xxviii. 49.) David in his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, exclaimed, "They were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions," (2 Sam. i. 23,) thus associating the acknowledged king of the beasts with that of the birds. Job describes the rapid flight of time by saying, "My days are passed away as the eagle that hasteth to his prey," (Job ix. 26;) and Solomon could not more appropriately tell of the vanishing nature of earthly treasures than in these words, "Riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle towards heaven." The prophet Obadiah thus addresses Moab: "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord," (Obad. v. 4;) and Jeremiah, in a similar strain, pronounces the doom of Edom: "O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, that holdest the height of the hill: though thou shouldst make thy nest high as the eagle, I will bring thee down from thence, saith the Lord." (Jer. xlix. 16.) This bird retains its vigour to a very great age. One that was kept in confinement at Vienna lived until it was 104 years old; and there was, and still is, perhaps, a popular notion in some countries, that at certain periods it renews its plumage, and therewith its youthful strength. Thus, in Ps. ciii. 5, David says of the Lord, addressing his soul, "Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things; making thee young and lusty as an eagle;" and again, in Isaiah xl. 31, an allusion of the like kind occurs.

Cyrus, King of Persia, is compared by Isaiah (xlvi. 11,) to "a ravenous bird," and this, it appears, should have been translated more specifically as an Eagle. Now Xenophon and other historians state, that the Golden Eagle with expanded wings was the ensign of the Persian monarchs, long before it became that of the Romans; and it seems likely that the Persians borrowed it of the Assyrians, on whose banners it was emblazoned until after the fall of Babylon: well might the prophet proclaim to the children of Israel, when the measure of their iniquity was full, that the Babylonian monarch should come up "as an eagle against the house of the Lord," (Hos. viii. 1;) and well might many of the Jewish seers and holy men of old, when speaking of the enemies of their country, and the instruments of the Lord's vengeance, do so under the similitude of an eagle, likening the armies which they led to the mighty wings of the king of birds; as in the case of Ezekiel, who denominates Nebuchadnezzar "a great eagle, with great wings." This prophet also alludes to the king of Egypt in precisely similar terms; and, speaking of the powerful wings of the bird, we are reminded of a very beautiful figure of speech employed by Moses, when he represents Jehovah as saying to his chosen people, "Ye have seen what I did to the Egyptians; how I bore you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself." (Exod. xix. 4.)

Apuleius, and many other ancient authors, might be quoted to show how universally celebrated was the eagle for those qualities, which were held in highest estimation by the heathen world, such as courage, and strength, and power and dominion; the bird was, and is, the very prototype of one of those heroes of antiquity, whose daring spirits and great physical powers led to the attainment of the highest points of earthly greatness and grandeur, where they sat enthroned like demigods, or from whence they descended with a fell swoop upon the selected victim of their rapacity, for whom there was no chance of escape. It is a grand, a stately image, that of this royal bird, sitting thus apart in lone and unapproachable majesty, and it takes the imagination captive:—

"Wakeful he sits, and lonely and unmoved,
Beyond the arrows, shouts, and views of man;
As oftentimes an eagle, ere the sun
Throws o'er the varying earth his early ray,
Stands solitary, stands unmovable
Upon some highest cliff, and rolls his eye
Clear, constant, unobservant, unabash'd,
In the cold light above the dews of morn."

As Landor describes his Count Julian;—a magnificent picture, we say, for the imagination to dwell upon, but scarcely one which the heart delights to contemplate; it is too abstract, too cold, too statuesque; about it and the surrounding scenery there are all the elements of grandeur, of greatness; but it stirs not the gentler and kindlier feelings of our nature; it touches no chord of sympathy or affection; it seems more ideal than real; more a thing to be wondered at, and, perhaps, admired for its stately beauty, than to be loved and cherished as a living, breathing, rejoicing, suffering creature. Who shall wonder that the ancient fabulists ascribed to this bird the office of bearing the thunderbolts of Jove; with an eye so keen and steady, with a wing so broad and sweeping, with an aim so swift and sure, and a home that seemed the very birth-place of the rushing winds and the vollied lightnings? Who shall wonder that the scalds and bards of Scandinavia invoked, and almost worshipped it, as a creature of unearthly power and intelligence, in words something like those put by Scott into the mouth of "Norna of the Fitful Head:—

Stern eagle of the far north-west;
Thou that bearest in thy grasp the thunderbolt;
Thou whose rustling pinions stir ocean to madness;
Thou the destroyer of herds, thou the scatterer of navies;
Amidst the scream of thy rage,
Amidst the rushing of thy onward wings:
Though thy scream be loud as the cry of a perishing
nation;
Though the rushing of thy wings be like the roar of ten thousand waves;
Hear, in thine ire and thy haste,
Hear thou the voice of the Reim kennar!"

Nor can it be a matter of surprise that a bird so powerful and majestic, should have been the chosen emblem of several of the most warlike nations of antiquity—the symbol, at once, of their strength and rapacity; it well might be fancied that the fierce, insatiable creature emblazoned upon their banners, would flap its huge wings, and utter its wild scream of delight at the sight of the gory feast spread out upon the battle field:—

“ When in his airy course
The famish'd eagle hears
The dying groan :
The dying groan revives
His weaken'd frame ;
He stops his rapid flight,
And feasts his hungry eye
With human gore ;”

says Dr. Sayer in his “ Sketches of Northern mythology ;” and again:—

“ The famish'd eagle screams
And asks his wonted food ;
No more shall Harold's arm, Prepare the feast of slain.”

thus expressing the prevalent idea of the bird in the old rude times of lawless violence, as one of slaughter and bloodshed. With Æschylus it was “ the winged hound,” the minister of the vengeance of a remorseless deity; he makes Hermes, speaking to Prometheus, chained to the rock, say:—

“ ———— but then of Jove
The winged hound—the sanguinary eagle,
A daily guest unsummon'd shall devour
Voraciously a portion of thy flesh,
And on thy liver's dark food revel long.”

And when the all-conquering legions of imperial Rome went forth upon their dread mission of universal conquest, there was a peculiar fitness in their bearing aloft, and ever in the van, the figure of this mighty bird of prey, the lord and tyrant of the realms of air, from whose presence all other birds fly, as the jays are said to have done in the sarcastic reply given, according to Macaulay, (see “ Lays of ancient Rome,”) to the herald of the Latins, when he comes to threaten war upon the seven-hilled city:—

“ Then spake the Consul Aulus,
He spake a bitter jest:—
‘ Once the jays sent a message
Unto the eagle's nest:—
Now yield thee up thine eyrie,
Unto the carrion-kite,
Or come forth valiantly and face
The jays in deadly fight,—
Forth looked in wrath the eagle;
And carrion-kite and jay,
Soon as they saw his beak and claw,
Fled screaming far away.’ ”

An emblem, we say, of power, and strength, and dominion, has this bird ever been considered from the days of Homer downward, nay, from an earlier period than this,—witness the Old Testament bards and prophets, whom we have quoted; and following the examples set by the Assyrians and Romans, we find in modern times that the Russian, and the Prussian, and the French, and other warlike nations, have adopted the figure of the bird as their symbol and representative, and a most appropriate one, it must be confessed, for the latter people especially, and the daring and ambitious spirit in whose deeds and mighty projects of conquest they so gloried:—

I saw an eagle day by day,
With talons sharp and bloody beak,
Go swooping o'er the land to prey
Alike upon the strong and weak;
He rode upon the howling blast
Rejoicing in the power to kill;
His wings a death-like shadow cast,
His scream with fear each breast did fill;
At length, chain'd to a rock, he died—
What did the people then? why him they defied!

Apropos to this part of our subject we may relate an anecdote, found in “ Campbell's Letters from the South of Africa:”—“ Not a tent, not an Arab, not a camel was to be seen; every living thing seemed to have fled from before the French, except a majestic eagle, that hovered over the troops, and you would have thought exulted in hearing the military band. What a glorious fellow he was! I see him yet in my mind's eye, towering up to the topmost heaven, then dropping plump down till his shadow was pictured on the sunny ground: at times he would shoot before us, turning his crested head and splendid eyes completely back over his shoulders; anon he would wheel in elliptic circles, or turn vertically, as if in sport, on his yard-wide wings. How, said I to myself, can Frenchmen under arms see an eagle towering over their trumpets without certain reminiscences? And I was not mistaken; looking round, I saw more than ordinary expression on all their Gallic faces; it was a grave, and not gay expression; but it was, to my imagination at least, strongly intelligible. I said to an officer, at whose side I was riding,—‘ Is it merely my fancy, or do the soldiers look at that bird with peculiar admiration?’

“ ‘ Pauca verba,’ he replied, ‘ this is no place for making remarks, but you are perfectly right that the eagle is producing a sensation.’

“ In spite of this caution I kept behind, and observed to an elderly sergeant of cavalry,—‘ That is a noble bird up there.’

“ ‘ Oui!’ he answered, emphatically; ‘ l'aigle vaut mieux que le coy.’ ”

The North American Indian considers an eagle's plume the fittest badge and ornament that a warrior can wear, and the “ pale faces,” who have taken possession of the land, whose boundless prairies and mighty forests once owned him as their lord and master, have also chosen this bird as their national emblem, and sung to it such strains as these:—

“ Bird of Columbia! art not thou
An emblem of our native land;
With unblench'd front and noble brow,
Among the nations doom'd to stand;
Proud like her mighty mountain woods,
Like her own rivers wandering free,
And sending forth from hills and floods
The joyous shout of liberty!”

The whole of the poem, by C. W. Thompson, from which these lines are taken, is very fine, and we would quote on, but it seems to us that there arises an indignant protest, and a cry of anguish and despair, from the enslaved population of the southern states, which mars their effect, and makes the noble bird to which they allude appear like the very personification of tyranny and oppression—cruel, and bloodthirsty, and relentless, as the fates themselves are pictured in the Grecian drama, even as Young describes it:—

“The towering eagle soars from human sight,
And seeks the sun in her untiring flight;
High on some mountain crag she dwells alone,
And proudly makes the strength of rocks her own;
Thence wide o’er nature takes her dread survey,
And with a piercing glance marks out her prey;
Her young she feasts with blood, and hovering o’er
The unslaughter’d host enjoys the promis’d gore.”

We have asserted, that in the whole range of poetry nothing can be found, in the way of description and imagery, finer than in those passages which relate to the Eagle; and, although it is scarcely necessary for us to justify this assertion by numerous quotations, even had we space for them, for all readers of poetry will at once acknowledge its truth, yet a few of them, in addition to those already quoted, we must give; and first let Percival, a stanza from whose ode to the Eagle headed this chapter, describe how GENIUS awoke from the slumber in which sloth and sensuality had bound him:—

“Hark! his rustling plumage gathers
Closer to his side;
Close as when the storm-bird weathers
Ocean’s hurrying tide.
Now his nodding beak is steady,
Wide his burning eye;
Now his open wings are ready,
And his aim, how high!
Now he curves his neck, and proudly
Now is stretched for flight;
Hark! his wings—they thunder loudly,
And their flash—how bright!
Onward—onward—over mountains,
Through the rack and storm,
Now, like sunset over fountains,
Flies his glancing form.
Glorious bird, thy dream hath left thee—
Thou hast reached thy heaven—
Lingering slumber hath not rest thee
Of the glory given;
With a bold, a fearless pinion,
On thy starry road,
None to fame’s supreme dominion
Mightier ever trode.”

What a glorious piece of imagery have we here, and all through the poem of some ten stanzas it is equally fine; the analogy is beautifully commenced, and as beautifully carried out. See, what a lofty pitch the author takes at starting; it is thus he addresses the slumbering spirit of Genius:—

“Thine was once the highest pinion
In the midway air;
With a proud and sure dominion
Thou didst upward bear,

Like a herald, winged with lightning
From the Olympian throne,
Ever mounting, ever brightening,
Thou wert there alone.

Where the pillar’d props of heaven
Glitter with eternal snows,
Where no darkling clouds are driven,
Where no fountain flows—
Far above the rolling thunder,
When the surging storm
Rent the sulphury folds asunder,
We beheld thy form.

O what rare and heavenly brightness
Flow’d around thy plumes,
As a cascade’s foamy whiteness
Lights a cavern’s glooms!
Wheeling through the shadowy ocean,
Like a shape of light,
With serene and placid motion,
Thou wert dazzling bright!

There! we could not help it, for the life of us; the only wonder is that we did not give the entire poem. Tell us not after this that our Yankee brothers are wanting in imagination. Why, Shelley himself has scarcely produced any thing finer; perhaps that glorious image in his song of the Cloud has a little more of the sublime about it, what think our readers?—

“The sanguine sunrise, with his meteor eyes,
And his burning plumes outspread,
Leaps on the back of my sailing rack
When the morning star shines dead.
As on the jag of a mountain crag,
Which an earthquake rocks and swings,
An eagle, alit, for a moment may sit
In the light of its golden wings.”

Has Spenser anything to equal this in all his rich gallery of imaginative pictures, “The Faerie Queene?” we think not. He thus describes Sir Artegall, the personification of justice, flying to the rescue of Sir Terpin from the clutch of the Amazon Radigund:—

“Like to an eagle in his kingly pride
Soring through his wide empire of the aire,
To weather his brode sails, by chaunce hath spide
A goshaue, which hath seized for her share
Upon some fowle, that should her feast prepare,
With dreadful force she flies at her bylive;
That with his souce which none endure dare,
Her from the quarry he away doth drive,
And from her griping pounce the greedy prey doth rive.”

And speaking of this author brings us back again to Shelley, who in Spenser’s own majestic measure (see Revolt of Islam) has given us so beautiful a description of a combat between an eagle and a serpent—representatives of two antagonist principles:—

“A course precipitous, of dizzy speed,
Suspending thought and breath; a monstrous sight!
For in the air do I behold indeed
An eagle and a serpent wreathed in fight;—
And now, relaxing its impetuous flight,
Before the aerial rock on which I stood,
The eagle, hovering, wheel’d to left and right,
And hung with lingering wings over the flood,
And startled with its yells the wide air’s solitude.

A shaft of light upon its wings descended,
And every golden feather gleam'd therein—
Feather and scale inextricably blended,
The serpent's mail'd and many-coloured skin Shone through the plumes; its coils were twined within

By many a swollen and knotted fold, and high
And far the neck receding lithe and thin
Sustain'd a crested head which warily Shifted and glanced before the eagle's steadfast eye."

And so the strife goes on through several more of these fine Spenserian stanzas, which we cannot well quote here—

"Wile baffling wile and strength encounter'd strength
Thus long but unprevailing:—the event
Of that portentous fight appear'd at length:
Until the lamp of day was almost spent
It had endured; when lifeless, stark, and rent,
Hung high that mighty serpent, and at last
Fell to the sea, while o'er the continent,
With clang of wings and scream, the eagle past, Heavily borne away on the exhausted blast."

Not always, however, is the lordly bird victorious in the struggle, even with much meaner enemies than that which he is here described as overcoming, as the following incident, related by Brown in his "Anecdotes of Quadrupeds," will show:—

"A group of haymakers, while busy at their work in Chapelhope meadow, at the upper end of St. Mary's Loch (or rather of the Loch of the Lowes, which is separated from it by a narrow neck of land,) saw an eagle rising above the steep mountains that enclose the narrow valley. The eagle himself was, indeed, no unusual sight; but there is something so imposing and majestic in the flight of this noble bird, while he soars upwards in spiral circles, that it fascinates the attention of most people. But the spectators were soon aware of something peculiar in the flight of the bird they were observing; he used his wings violently, and the strokes were often repeated, as if he had been alarmed and hurried by unusual agitation; and they noticed, at the same time, that he wheeled in circles that seemed constantly decreasing, while his ascent was proportionably rapid. The now idle haymakers drew together in close consultation on the singularity of the case, and continued to fix their attention on the seemingly distressed eagle, who rose perpendicularly, until he was nearly out of sight in the concave recess of the blue ether. In a short time, however, they were all convinced that he was again seeking the earth, evidently not as he ascended, in spiral curves; his descent was like something falling, and with great rapidity. As he approached the ground they plainly perceived that he was tumbling like a shot bird, the convulsive fluttering of his wide and powerful pinions but slightly impeding the rapidity of his descent, until he fell at a small distance from the men and boys of the party, who naturally ran forward, highly excited by the strange occurrence. A large black-tailed stoat ran from the body as they came near, turned with the usual nonchalance and impudence of the tribe, stood up upon its hind-legs, crossed its fore-paws over its nose, and surveyed its enemies a moment or two (as they frequently do, when no dog is near), and bounded into a willow bush. The king of the air was dead; and, what was more surprising, he was covered with his own blood; and upon further examination they found his throat cut. It was clear that the stoat must have been the regicide."

Doubtless the great king of birds, elevated on his lofty granite throne, or hovering on outspread wings far up in the blue sky, had seen the little animal, when it looked but like a moving speck upon the earth, and pounced upon it forthwith, expecting an easy prey, such as old Homer speaks of, when, alluding to Menelaus, he says:—

"—The field exploring with an eye
Keen as the eagle's—keenest-eyed of all
That wing the air, whom, though he soar aloft,
The leveret 'scapes not, hid in thickest shades,
But down he swoops, and at a stroke she dies."

But it was no timid hare, nor bleating lamb, nor other harmless creature, that he clutched in his relentless talons; and when he soared again to seek his cyrie on the rock where, perhaps, his mate and clamorous little ones were awaiting their mid-day meal, he took with him a foe fierce and bloodthirsty as himself, and far more lithe and subtle, so that it was enabled to pierce the throat of its gigantic captor, and bring him gasping and struggling in the death throes to earth again, never more—

"Lord of his own imperial sky,
In virgin 'pride of place,'
To soar where others could not fly,
And hardly dared to gaze."

The Eagle and Dove by Goethe, the Swan and the Eagle by Schlegel, and a hundred other poems in which this majestic bird is a prominent object, must be familiar to our readers: indeed, we can scarcely take up the works of any poet, ancient or modern, in which he is not apostrophised, or described, or introduced as an image or illustration; it is therefore with peculiar fitness that the classic Gray, addressing Poesy, says;—

"Perch'd on the sceptred hand
Of Jove, thy magic lulls the feather'd king,
With ruffled plumes and flagging wing,
Quench'd in dark clouds of slumber lie
The terrors of his beak and lightnings of his eye."

Tennyson, the prince of dreamers, beheld the bird that waited by the throne of Jupiter, and bore his thunderbolts, conveying the blooming Hebe,—beauty and strength thus fitly symbolized—on some errand, doubtless, of gracious import.

"Flush'd Ganymede, her rosy cheek
Half buried in the eagle's down,
Sole as a flying star shot through the sky,
Above the pillar'd town."

With some it is an emblem of liberty, and who shall say that it is not an appropriate one? Wordsworth, addressing the "Montain nymph," says:—

"If unreprieved the ambitious eagle mount
Sunward to seek the daylight in its fount,

Bays, gulphs, and Indian wealth shall be Till the world perishes, a field for thee."

And L. E. L.—we shall never know her by any other name—pictures a home for it such as only the spirit of freedom can inhabit :—

"Not in a close and crowded atmosphere
Does life put forth its noblest and its best,
'Tis from the mountain's top that we look forth,
And see how small the world is at our feet.
There the free winds sweep with unfetter'd wing,
There the sun rises first, and flings the last
The purple glories of the summer eve;
There does the eagle build his mighty nest,
And there the snow stains not its purity."

To us there is no more melancholy sight than to behold a naturally free fearless creature, like this, "cribb'd, cabin'd, and confined," as it sometimes is in private and public collections of birds and animals: there it sits, moping and blinking, the very image of fallen majesty; every now and then subjected to the indignity of being stared, and wondered at, and perchance poked with a stick or umbrella to make him more "lively," as if a living thing, so formed and endued, could be other than sullen and sorrowful under such circumstances. But what says Leigh Hunt?—

"The poor eagles and vultures! The very instinct of this epithet shows what an unnatural state they must have been brought to. Think of eagles being commiserated, and called 'poor!' It is monstrous to see any creature in a cage, far more any winged creature, and most of all such as are accustomed to soar through the vault of heaven, and have the world under their eye. Look at the eyes of these birds here, these eagles and vultures! How strangely clouded now seems that grand and stormy depression of the cyclid, drawn with that sidelong air of tightness, fierceness, and threat, as if by the brush of some mighty painter. That is an eye for the clouds and the subject-earth, not for a miserable hencoop. And see, poor flagging wretches! how they stand on their perches, each at a little distance from one another, in poor stationary exhibition, eagles all of a row!—quiet, impaired, scrubby; almost motionless! Are these the sovereign creatures described by the Buffons and Mudies, by the Wilsons of ornithology and poetry, by Spenser, by Homer? Is this the eagle of Pindar, heaving his moist back in sleep upon the sceptre of Jove, under the influence of the music of the gods? Is this the bird of the English poet,

'Soaring through his wide empire of the air,
To weather his broad vane?'

"Wonderful and admirable is the quietness, the philosophy, or whatever you choose to call it, with which all the creatures in this place, the birds in particular, submit themselves to their destiny. They do not howl and cry, brutes though they be; they do not endeavour to tear their chains up, or beat down their dens, they find the contest hopeless, and they handsomely and wisely give it up."

No thanks, however, are due to him or those who placed the poor birds in such unnatural confinement; we should be quite inclined to join in the denunciation of J. S. B. (Tail's Magazine), who thus addresses a caged eagle in the Zoological Gardens of London:—

"Him I denounce who did prepare
Thy bonds: what title he may bear
I reckon not—he did sin.
If from his stock more than thy share
Thy noble thrift did win,
He had the right, by force or snare,
Where thou wert found, to sell thee there;
But so to bar thee in,
To rob the wingful of his wing,
To chain thee here—the mountain-king,
I say, it was a sin!"

But, bless us! where is Mudie all this time? telling, in his own eloquent and picturesque way, all about the nature, instincts, haunts, and habits, of the royal bird—THE GOLDEN EAGLE! and his scarcely less noble and powerful congeners the SEA and FISHING EAGLES, (Falco albicilla and haliaetus;) we, the while, paying no more attention to him than if he had never been introduced, or rather, used as a means of introducing our subject. But it is all the fault of those plaguey poets; once let them begin, and your matter-of-fact naturalist has no chance of being listened to. However, n'importe: we are not writing chapters for a new natural history, nor getting up another edition, with additions, of "Goldsmith's Animated Nature," and therefore, to such of our readers as may wish for more precise information on the subject of our paper, we would say,—Is it not written, and well written, in the Book of British Birds, or, to be more exact, in "The History of the Feathered Tribes of the British Islands," by Robert Mudie? We have been obliged to omit much that might very properly have been included under such a title as that which heads our paper—many graphic pictures of the Royal Bird and its haunts, both in prose and poetry we have passed over somewhat unwillingly, because the hard-hearted editor or proprietor of this miscellany, would not consent to add a supplementary sheet to the present number for our especial delectation. He insists upon variety, forsooth, and tells us that his periodical is not "The Zoologist," nor "The Ornithologist," nor any other ologist whatever, but "A Magazine." Well, be it so, we bow to his decision; but some day see if we don't have a volume, a thick one, too, all to ourselves, and then we will tell such a tale about the eagle! Before concluding here, however, we must find room for Thomson's fine lines:—

"High from the summit of a craggy cliff,
Hung o'er the deep, such as amazing frowns
On utmost Kilda's shore, whose lonely race
Resign the setting sun to Indian worlds,
The royal eagle draws his vigorous young,
Strong pounced and ardent with paternal fire.
Now fit to raise a kingdom of their own,
He drives them from his fort, the towering sent
For ages of his empire; which in peace,
Unstain'd, he holds, while many a league to sea
He wings his course, and preys in distant isles."

PARISIAN HOUSEWIFERY IN OLDEN TIME.

In the fourteenth century, that period when baronial rapine and feudal tyranny were giving place to a tolerant and regular system of law and order, there lived a writer in the good city of Paris who penned a manuscript treatise on Domestic Economy, as the modern phrase has it, "in all its branches," to which he gave the title Menagier de Paris; "Householder, or housekeeper of Paris." This manuscript, which bears date 1393, has been published very recently by a society of bibliophiles in Paris,¹ and we think that the glimpse of manners, customs, and modes of thinking prevalent more than four hundred years ago, afforded by an outline of the contents, will be acceptable to our readers.

The writer treats principally of the duties of women, and he follows Xenophon's example, by putting his sentiments and opinions into the form of a dialogue, but in which he is one of the interlocutors, and the other his young wife. Being, as he says, somewhat advanced in years, he discourses with his youthful and docile companion about all that a discreet and prudent housewife ought to know and to practise in the management of a household, not only for herself, but for her daughters, also, should she have any, and her female friends.

The inequality of age between the speakers adds a peculiar charm to the counsels which the senior addresses to the junior. In common with other writers of that period, he uses the term "dear and comely sister" in addressing his partner, and his lessons are characterised by a tone of gravity and indulgent disinterestedness. Although near the end of his own life, he desires that his wife may be happy after him; that she may become more submissive, perfect, and loving, not on his account, for what she does for him is already enough, as he tells her almost at the commencement of his prefatory observations. "Know, dear sister, that all which you have done since we were married until now, and all that you shall do in good intention, pleases me, has pleased, and will please me. For your youth excuses you from being very wise, and will excuse you still, in all that you shall do with good intent, from my displeasure. And know, that I take not displeasure, but pleasure in that you cultivate roses, tend violets, and make garlands; and also in your dancing and singing, and desire truly that you continue it among our friends and our equals; and it is but fitting and decorous thus to pass the age of your feminine adolescence, withal desiring not, nor permitting you to repair to the festivals and dances of grand seigneurs, for that is neither becoming in you, nor becoming to your estate nor mine. And as for the service which you offer willingly to pay to me more largely than what you now render, did you know how, or if I teach you, know, dear sister, that it well suffices me, when you perform for me such services as do your good neighbours for their husbands, who are our equals and of our estate. And the more you know the more honour will you have, and the more praises will your relations and myself also have, and others near whom your were brought up."

After this paternal style of opening his subject, the sage writer goes on to say that his instructions will form three parts or "distinctions," thus enumerated:—1. The general duties of wives. 2. The practical and technical understanding of what concerns the profit of housewifery. 3. The games and pastimes proper to women of middle estate. The first of these only is complete, the second and third being fragmentary; it is, however, not devoid of interest, and enlightens us as to what was considered proper for a woman of that day to know and practise.

The lesson begins with the young wife's "morning waking," by furnishing her with a formula of prayers, among which is one to the Virgin of most angelic sweetness; at the same time the Mentor cautions his gentle partner that "praying without devotion is sending a message without words." Then follow good counsels concerning "dress and attiring," after which he goes with her into the town, or to church, watching well her mien and deportment, and counselling her to listen attentively to the mass, and to confess devoutly; "for you ought," he says, "to remember that you are speaking to God; the priest but lends his ear." This leads to a dissertation on the seven capital sins and their opposite virtues, and the young wife is admonished to be chaste, and "loving to her husband, be it I or another." This part of the lesson is supported by examples drawn from history—Sara, Rebecca, Rachel, Susannah, Lucretia. Next, she is "to be submissive to her husband," and here again the advice is strengthened by instances of disobedience. Afterwards, "to be careful of the person of her husband, because after a woman hath lost her first husband, commonly she findeth not in her estate a second to her liking, and thus remains long time astray and disconcerted." Then she is "to silence her husband's secrets and conceal his faults;" and last, "to maintain good patience towards her husband, and if he be angry and molest you, complain not to your friends and others, but retire to your chamber, weep softly in low voice, and make your complaints to God."

The grave adviser now adduces examples of temptation to which women have been subjected, and of dissimulation on their part. "It is ill done," he adds, "thus to vex and deceive one's husband, for a woman ought always to incline to promote her husband's pleasure when he is wise and reasonable; and sifting her husband craftily and hiding malice by a cloak of diligent endeavours, this also is ill done; for with her husband a woman ought never to act with craft and malice, but plainly and roundly, heart to heart." Further on he discourses on a higher order of duties. "Meroy," he observes, "has seven branches: the first is, to give to eat and drink to the poor; the second, to clothe the naked; the third, to lend to the poor in their need, and pardon them the debt; the fourth, to visit the sick; the fifth, to shelter the poor; the sixth, to visit the sick in prison; the seventh, to bury the dead. And all these things you ought to do for the love of God only, and without vain glory."

In the second distinction we come to the practical duties of housewifery. There is a recommendation to "diligence, perseverance, and regard to labour," followed by a sort of gardening almanac, in which the young wife is taught "to understand, for pastime, a little tillage and gardening; to sow, and plant, to graft in the season, and to have roses in winter." This is succeeded by judicious counsels with respect to the choice and governance "of pages, servants, and chambermaids of the house;" and here we are initiated into more minute details, which show us what was expected from a respectable citizen's wife at that period. "When you shall have known," says the didactic husband, "by dame Agnes the beguine, or by maître Jehan the steward, that the chimney fires are every where covered, give your people time and repose for their limbs. And having provided beforehand that they have each one far from their bed a tinned candlestick, in which to put the candle, and made them to be instructed to put it out wisely with their mouth or hand before they got into bed, and not with their shirt." From this we may infer that domestics were in the habit of flapping out the candle with their shirt after they were in bed; and it is pretty certain that whatever may have been the provision for the master, neither snuffers nor extinguishers had as yet come into use for the servants.

In this place the old citizen forgets his wife for a time, while he instructs maître Jehan the steward how "to manage horses, as much those for the plough as for riding;" then he returns to his former subject, and gives his pupil a lesson in marketing; the prices and preservation of provisions; number of dishes, and order of service, according to the season, and quantity of the guests. He would have his wife competent as a chief maître d'hôtel, able to understand the office of butcher and poulterer, to devise dinners and suppers, to order a marriage feast, and command meats and dishes; and further, she must not be ignorant of "soups, salads, roast of flesh and fish, by-dishes, fries, stuffings, sauces, spices, and beverages, as well for table as for the sick." This part of the subject is dilated upon with much unction, notwithstanding that the author somewhere previously says, "If a man provided with two ears, two nostrils, two eyes, has, however, but one mouth, it is that he may soberly eat and speak withal;" and, "to eat once a-day is angelic, twice a-day is human, but three, four, or more times is the life of beasts and not men." In strange collocation with this we find a recipe "for writing a letter that no one shall see except by warming the paper." Another, "to preserve the teeth," and "to make sand for the hour-glass." Under the head meat there is an account of the slaughter-houses of Paris, the annual consumption of meat by the city, by the king, queen, and their family, and the dukes of Orleans and Berry.

The art of epicurism had made marvellous progress at that day, and noted cooks of later times have done little more than vary what their predecessors discovered. There is the same endless variety of dishes, by the same names, as now tempt the hungry or dainty visitor to Paris; the spelling of the terms only is a little changed. Amid all the vicissitudes that the metropolis of France has witnessed, the nomenclature of the restaurateur's art has scarcely altered since the fourteenth century.

We may conclude our review by another quotation, which shows that the science of personal comfort was also pretty well developed. Speaking of a husband's cares and occupations, the writer says, "Has he to go and come, to run hither and thither, in rain, wind, snow, hail; one time wet, another time dry; one time sweating, another time shivering; ill-fed, ill-lodged, ill-warmed, ill-bedded. All this harms him not, insomuch that he is comforted by the hope that he hath in the cares that his wife will take of him; of the ease, the joys and pleasures she will prepare or cause to be prepared; to be unbooted by a good fire; to have the feet washed, and to put on clean shoes and stockings; to feed and drink well; to be well served and be-sirred; and to bed with clean sheets and kerchief, well covered with good furs, and the next day, new gowns, linen and vestments."

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION OF 1801.

PART I.

THE annals of despotic governments present a series of unique dramas never played on more legitimate arenas, for the actors are amenable to no human laws, and must depend entirely upon their own individual strength. A man of great native power can play his part well, but he must have foresight, perception, courage, decision; must be his own privy-council, parliament, general, and prime minister. He requires also personal beauty and personal strength. Peter the Great possessed all these requisites, and he succeeded—for the effects of his sway are still seen. Peter III. was not capable of such a rôle—he perished. His consort was calculated to be the head of a despotic state, and the pupil of Voltaire was unscrupulous—her game was a brilliant one—but if she did not fear God, she feared her son. His hereditary rights clashed with her acquired ones, and she dreaded the bow-string he was destined to feel. Maternal tyranny injured the sensitive mind of Paul, which the immense burden of empire crushed; yet the moral perception of Paul was sufficient for a constitutional ruler. Russia, however, required the talents of Peter the Great, or Catharine. The brain of Paul became distempered, and his mental infirmity took the shape of tyranny. A stern, hard, barbarous tyranny is less aggravating than one which condescends to petty detail. Without possessing the faults which stained his mighty ancestor, or the crimes which disfigured the atheist, Catharine, Paul became the most unpopular sovereign who ever ruled in Russia. To describe the series of melo-dramas that led to the revolution which put an end to his reign and life, seems the readiest way of illustrating that game of despotism which the infirm, but well-meaning Paul played so ill, and which terminated in the dismal tragedy of 1801.

The lamentable cry uttered by Catharine II. after a death agony of thirty-seven hours, proclaimed Paul Autocrat of all the Russias. At that cry the empress and the imperial family, falling at the feet of their sovereign, were the first to salute him Emperor of Russia. Paul raised them, with assurances of imperial favour and paternal tenderness. Their example was followed by the courtiers, the great civil and military officers, and the nobility according to their several degrees of rank, and the guards on duty at the palace. Those who had lately arrived from Gatchina, the old residence of Paul, came to swear fidelity to the sovereign whom they had watched like a prisoner; but to whom they had never rendered the honour due to the heir of the imperial crown.

In a moment the apartment in which the great Catharine had just expired echoed with the word of command, the sound of arms, the creaking of heavy boots, and the jingle of spurs. The next day Paul was proclaimed Emperor of Russia, and his eldest son, Alexander, was recognised, by the title of Czarewicz, as the heir-apparent of his throne.

Paul came to the throne after five-and-thirty years of exile and contempt, and at the age of forty-three years found himself supreme master of an empire which the evening before had been his prison. During these years he had suffered much and learned much. He took his seat upon the throne with his pockets full of rules for his future conduct; nor was this all: in his haste to reduce these regulations into practice he disregarded time and order, opposition to everything that had been done by his mother being his only fixed principle of action. Yet one, at least, of the acts of the new monarch was certainly beneficent and noble.

Among the victims of Catharine's ambition was a man whose very name sheds a lustre on the country that gave him birth, and the sovereign who restored him to liberty. Kosciusko was at that time a close prisoner in the house of Count Anhalt, whither Paul went in person to announce to the patriot Pole "that he was free."

In the first moments of surprise the Polish general scarcely comprehended the blessing he had received from the emperor, or at least his feelings found no words, and before he had recovered his amazement his benefactor was gone. The hero, still suffering from the effects of his unhealed wounds, was unable to make use of his recovered freedom, owing to extreme debility; but he remembered his omission with regret, and ordered himself to be carried to the palace to express his gratitude. He obtained the interview he sought, and made his appearance before the emperor and his empress, with his head bound up, and his person disfigured with scars. He refused the estates and presents offered him in Russia by his generous liberator; but accepted one hundred thousand roubles, with the permission of living in Switzerland, where he remained till his death; for if Paul was magnanimous in his gifts, the illustrious Pole was equally so in receiving them. The emperor, in fact, gave like a great sovereign, and Kosciusko received his favours like a free man. Soon after this action, from which many persons erroneously presaged a noble reign, the time approached for the funeral of the great Catharine, which Paul resolved to solemnise with those of his murdered father. For five-and-thirty years the name of Peter III. had never been uttered at St. Petersburg but in whispers. In the Convent of St. Alexander Niewski, an aged monk opened the tomb and uncovered the bier of the unfortunate grandson of Peter the Great; Paul knelt down before the august remains of his father, and, withdrawing the glove from his skeleton hand, kissed it many times. Long and fervently did the pious son pray beside that bier on which reclined the dishonoured relics of his sire, to whom he then decreed a sumptuous funeral as an atonement for more than a quarter of a century of neglect and contumely. The bier was then removed to the centre of the church, where the usual services of the Greek ritual on such occasions were for the first time performed.

These posthumous rites were strangely opposed to the religious opinions of the deceased emperor, whose firm attachment to the doctrines of Lutheranism had alienated the affections of his subjects, and had enabled the atheist Catharine to play her regicidal game under the mask of devotion to a faith she had outwardly embraced for the sake of worldly advantages.

This fact, though not cited by our author, was the leading cause of the revolution which dethroned the grandson of Peter the Great, though Paul, educated in the national religion, naturally employed her offices while paying these solemn duties to the remains of his father. But the new emperor did not confine his filial affection to these unavailing honours; he sought out his father's ancient friends, and among them, the aged Count Nugern Hernberg, his faithful adherent, for whose obscure retreat he caused diligent search to be made.

Paul received the old veteran in an apartment in which he had caused his father's portrait to be placed.

"I have sent for you here," said he, "in the presence of this portrait of my father, that at least this image may bear witness how tenderly and gratefully I receive his faithful friend." He then took him in his arms, passed the ribbon of the order of St. Alexander Niewski round his neck, conferred on him the highest military rank in the kingdom, and charged him to appear in the same uniform, and to hold the same office near the bier of the late emperor as he had been accustomed to do during his reign.

Upon the same platform in the citadel, the biers containing the mortal remains of Peter III. and Catherine II. were placed, and during eight days, the murdered sovereign and his regicide consort lay side by side, and all who approached to kiss the pale hand of the empress, were required to render the same homage to the bier of Peter, upon which the imperial crown was placed. Of the ghastly vigils previously kept by the actual murderers of the Emperor Peter, in the church of St. Alexander Niewski, Dumas has not spoken, although it was the most extraordinary scene ever witnessed in a cathedral, with the exception of the coronation of Inez de Castro, some centuries earlier. Unable to bring to a scaffold the destroyers of his father,—for even the power of an autocrat has its limits,—the moral justice of Paul devised a punishment to which that of death seemed light. He compelled the regicides to watch every night the remains of the sovereign they had murdered; and to do him honour, when lying dead, whom they had cut off and consigned prematurely to the tomb, was the expiation he exacted from them. They were compelled by the rigid rule not of an imperial sentence, but a courtly ukase of etiquette, to look not only upon the bier, but upon the man himself taken from the darkness and silence of the grave to punish them.

They were all attired as chief mourners, and three, perhaps, were really so, for their countenance betrayed deep horror and remorse. Gregory Orloff went mad, Alexis trembled—Count Bariatinsky fainted; but Count Zuboff, associated with the guilty group as a salutary warning by which he profited very little, alone appeared unmoved. His only crime then consisted in being the last lover of Catharine; but did Paul, in appointing his future murderer a place at this ceremonial, feel no foreboding presentiment, that that daring nobleman was destined to become his own future regicide, or was this association with conspirators and murderers, the spark which consumed the allegiance Count Zuboff had lately sworn to his sovereign? He looked calm, rigid, and unmoved upon the conscience-stricken prince in a swoon beside that bier, the convulsed features of the low-born Orloffs, and the motionless remains of the murdered emperor. The church hung with black, the solemn midnight hour, the mental horror of these chief mourners, had little effect upon the firm nerves of a haughty young man whose birth had occurred long after that tragedy had been acted. Could those who contemplated the singular scene have pierced the veil that shrouded his feelings, they would have found, perhaps, in the depth of his heart, the vow which offered up Paul as another victim by the military aristocracy to their hatred of absolute power.

In the infliction of this punishment upon the surviving murderers, in crowning the bier of his father, and in seeing the parents united together in death, whom murder, conspiracy, and a long usurpation had separated for five-and-thirty years, the mental powers of a sensitive mind were overwhelmed. That act of filial reverence and love had shaken the fibres of a brain already burdened with the cruel jealousy of a mother and an hereditary tendency to disease. "At the feet of the double tomb, the new sovereign laid down," remarks Dumas, "his wisdom and magnanimity. The promise of a great reign was never realized by him."

A thousand strange ordinances in the state continually were issued relative to court etiquette of the most teasing and vexatious nature. The army and navy had new uniforms every day; Paul was once more a child, and his soldiers and sailors were his dolls. Three hours were consumed daily by the military autocrat in the parade. The fire in his brain made him brave the cold with his head uncovered, and his person undefended by the warm furs in general use. He stood between his two eldest sons, who like himself, were compelled to brave the wintry weather of the coldest capital in the world, hatless and cloakless; but they were shivering and regarding with forced respect their imperial father, who, with one hand behind him, held in the other a formidable cane, with which he used to indicate the time to be used in the regulation of the military step, continually using the Russian numerals, raz (one), два (two), till the parade was concluded. The only consolation his sons could feel, was in the deep and feeling sympathy of all the bare-headed officers and soldiers who shared personally the horrors of these parades. Russian soldiers are, however, often victimized by their commanders-in-chief, and Paul, who loved his playthings excessively, was always considering some new plan for their protection. White plumes would expose them too much in the field; he assigned them black with a yellow edge. His paternal care even descended to their gaiters, and that officer always obtained promotion who appeared in the new uniform, in the morning, the emperor had ordered the evening before. It would be no easy matter to follow the changes the emperor continually effected in the army and state. His next step was to compel his people in general to adopt his own notions in costume.

An imperial ukase issued by the Emperor Paul compelled every man in his dominions to abandon the usual round hat, and to adopt a queer three-cornered chapeau which the ingenuity of the Russian autocrat had invented for the disfigurement of his male subjects and himself.¹ Now this horror of a hat was alone sufficient to have caused a dozen revolutions in civilized countries; but the Russians only sighed and complied with the ukase. What, however, was their compliance in the eyes of a despot! Another ukase directed that all foreigners should wear the obnoxious covering. Those who considered a queer three-cornered unfashionable hat as a lesser evil than a long walk to Siberia with no hat at all, grumbled and provided themselves with that prescribed by the emperor. Paul considered this reformation had secured his reign, for the Jacobins of Paris wore round hats. He ordered himself to be driven about St. Petersburg, to see his new ukase enforced by the police, who, assisted by some Cossacks, stood at the corners of every street to remove from the heads of strangers the obnoxious round hat anathematized by the imperial ukase. Paul seemed indeed to have commenced in good earnest his despotic reign. He was in the height of his glory, enjoying in idea the plenitude of his power, when he perceived an Englishman crossing the quarter of the Admiralty in the prohibited hat; for the sturdy islander, who considered the imperial ukase as an encroachment on his national liberty, thought proper to wear one after his own liking, without any regard to the commands of the emperor.

Paul stopped his carriage, and directed his aide-de-camp to deprive that contumacious insular of the covering he wore to insult him in his own capital. The aide galloped off to fulfil the mandate of his master; but seeing the Englishman wearing a three-cornered hat, concluded the emperor was mistaken, and returned to report that the manner of the Englishman was respectful, and his hat of the legitimate form. Paul thought his eyes had deceived him; he took up his lorgnette, and beheld again the identical round hat. The officer, then, had dared to deceive him. He ordered him under arrest, and despatched another aide-de-camp to compel the impertinent insular to yield up his detestable chapeau. There was the Englishman in the queer-looking three-cornered hat. The aide brought back the same report; Paul applied the lorgnette to his eye and saw once more a round hat, and sent the unfortunate aide to join his comrade. A general officer whose perceptive powers were greater than those of the ill-starred messengers, offered to undertake this difficult mission. He rode towards the Englishman, upon whose hat he kept his eyes fixed, and had the satisfaction to see it suddenly assume a triangular form. He prudently brought the magician back with him to the emperor, that he might himself explain its mechanism to his master.

In fact, the Englishman had ordered a hat to be constructed on an ingenious plan, which at once combined his own notions of freedom with the arbitrary enactments of the imperial ukase. A spring inside elevated or depressed the crown, and expanded or folded up the corners, and made the chapeau assume by turns the interdicted or legal form. Paul, who was highly amused at the idea, dismissed the Englishman very courteously, and permitted his countrymen to wear their hats after their own fashion.

His next ukase was of a more annoying kind; every person in his capital was to kneel down on the ground as soon as his carriage appeared in sight, and death or exile was decreed to those who dared resist the absurd mandate. The haughty Russian prince was levelled at once to the humblest slave by this odious regulation. In the winter season, when the streets were clean, the command was only a degradation; but an early thaw rendered it a serious inconvenience, for the Russian capital then became dirty, and in the dirt Paul chose every body to kneel. Ladies were not exempted from this penance, and the sight of a Russian princess and her little family kneeling in the mud was a very common spectacle during the continuance of this odious ukase. The streets were deserted the moment the imperial carriage was seen. The people fled from the presence of their sovereign, as if the plague had suddenly swept off the swarming population of the second commercial city in the world.

Some attempt was made one evening by a young and beautiful bride of high rank, in her white and silver tissue dress, to escape the ukase by ordering her coachman to turn down a bye street upon the approach of the autocrat's coach; but alas! it had been seen, and her coachman got a caning, and herself a command to alight and pay her homage.

Our titled lady cast her eyes on her lovely spotless dress and the streets, which were ankle-deep in mud; she sighed, but women are fruitful in expedients, so, divesting her fair form of a costly sable cloak, she flung it upon the ground, and knelt upon that rich carpet, in order to preserve her glittering dress from the dirt. Paul, displeased at her attempt to evade the law, commanded the cloak to be removed, and the lady to perform her homage on the bare ground. In the eyes of ladies, human despotism could go no farther.

These ridiculous comedies ushered in a dark tragedy. Paul saw himself universally detested. His infirm brain alienated from him the love and devotion of his people, who did not, perhaps, attribute his vagaries to their true cause. The autocrat saw himself the object of universal hatred, and became alarmed for his personal safety. He exiled and disgraced those he suspected, and his capricious temper made those he loved and trusted, distrust and fear him. His political conduct annihilated the commercial relations between England and Russia, and his sudden predilection for France concluded his fate. To restore the national prosperity of Russia, it was determined by the military aristocracy to dethrone Paul, for though they were not merchants, they were the owners of the merchandise, and a war with England would prove fatal to their wealth. But independently of these considerations, the nobility beheld the sword of Damocles suspended over their heads, and themselves exposed to the capricious tyranny of a despot, in whom malady took the shape of crime. Frank, generous, and naturally confiding, Paul became jealous, cruel, and inaccessible to pity. He distrusted his wife, he was suspicious of his children. Only two persons shared his confidence—a Turkish slave who was his barber, and his prime minister, Count Pahlen. The barber held the safest post; but the count knew that his life and freedom depended upon the breath of a madman. A bolder or more unscrupulous statesman never existed than this Russian noble, who, descended from an ancient family, united to the military frankness of the soldier, the astuteness often mingled with Asiatic blood. The bond that united Paul to him originated in gratitude; he had received from Pahlen, when governor of Riga, the respectful homage due to the heir of the Russian Empire,—an attention Paul had not forgotten. Catherine would not have forgiven the Major-General this courteous reception of her son, if he had not been patronized by Zuboff. Pahlen acted from policy, and Paul rewarded him with his full confidence and favour. Zuboff was in exile when the powerful prime-minister determined to make him an instrument in dethroning his master. He placed no confidence in the attachment of the emperor, and had already laid down his plans; but, to carry them into effect, it would be necessary to recall his former patron. Paul, he was aware, would be invulnerable to all entreaty upon that point. The Turkish barber could obtain anything of his master, and the artful minister wrote to Zuboff, to advise him to demand of the favourite domestic the hand of his daughter in marriage. Count Zuboff, a man of ancient lineage, haughty temper, and eminent talent, did not refuse to play the lover, and the next courier from Germany brought a proposal for Ma'amselle Kintaisoff, to the infinite astonishment and delight of her parvenu parent, who laid the letter and himself at the feet of the emperor, and pathetically entreated him to recall his destined son-in-law, and give his consent to an alliance so flattering to his pride. "Let him return then," replied the autocrat, "for it is the first wise thought that ever entered that madman's head;" and these fatal words sealed the fate of Paul. Zuboff returned to pay his pretended addresses to the lady, and under that veil the conspiracy was effectually concealed, and gathered strength daily. Pahlen, the soul of the plot, dexterously avoided affording the slightest proof that he formed its head, and upon its success or failure would alone depend whether he threw his weight on the side of the conspirators, or on that of Paul. He himself forwarded to Paul a list containing the names of the conspirators, through an unknown channel, and warned him of the perilous position in which he was placed.

He received, in return, a summons to attend the emperor in the palace of St. Michael, which that unfortunate sovereign had strongly fortified. Paul was traversing his bed-chamber with rapid strides, muttering terrible imprecations to himself; he fixed his eyes upon the calm and unmoved countenance of the prime-minister, and accosted him with these abrupt words, taking him by the arm with a sudden movement that betrayed his own feelings without discomposing the iron nerves of the count, "Were you at St. Petersburg in 1742?"

"Yes, I was," quietly replied the minister, who was fully aware that his master's agitated question related to the assassination of Peter III.

"What part did you play in the tragedy of that year?"

"That, please your majesty, of a subaltern officer in the ranks of his regiment. I witnessed a catastrophe in which I took no share."

"Well," remarked the emperor, "they want to re-act that tragedy to-day;" and he turned his eyes full of distrust upon the prime-minister, whom he still held by the arm.

A start, the slightest tremour or change of complexion must have betrayed the guilty conspirator to his injured sovereign; but Pahlen showed no emotion, but quietly replied, "I know they do, for I am one of the conspirators."

"What! are you then privy to the plot?" rejoined the distressed and agitated prince.

"Yes, in order to insure your personal safety."

"I have received a list of their names," said the emperor, putting one into Pahlen's hand, who coolly placed the counterpart of the paper in that of Paul.

"You see the documents are alike; but in both, your majesty, three names have been omitted."

In a voice hoarse with emotion, Paul replied, "You must mean my wife and my two eldest sons."

"Respect, sire, will not permit me to reveal their august names;" and he bowed his head.

The agonized husband and father cast a fearful look round the room, which was large and completely square, with the door facing the chimney, and two windows looking upon the court below. Directly opposite to the windows stood the bed, and, at the foot of the bed, a concealed door communicating with the apartment of the empress. Beyond this portal a trap-door was contrived in the floor, which could be raised by the slightest pressure made by the heel of the boot. This trap-door opened upon a stair-case, which communicated with the corridor, and made instant flight from the palace perfectly practicable. The palace of St. Michael was, besides, very strongly fortified, vigilantly guarded, and completely inaccessible from without. In taking these precautions Paul had forgotten that the foes of despotic sovereigns are to be found within—not without—the walls of their palace. Some impression of this kind thrilled upon the brain of the unfortunate autocrat, for he turned his eyes suspiciously upon the private door which led to the empress's apartment. His terrible agitation contrasted strangely with the imperturbable tranquillity of the cold and cruel statesman. "I understand the allusion," remarked Paul, still keeping his eyes fixed upon the door. "You wish to tell me that the Empress, the Czarewitz Alexander, and the Grand Duke Constantine are implicated in this conspiracy against my life."

"Sire, the law only regards those it can venture to punish," replied Pahlen, emphatically.

"The law regards every one alike, Count," said Paul, the dignity of the sovereign overcoming the anguish of the husband and father. "Crime, because the criminals are found in an exalted station, ought not therefore to remain unpunished. Go, Pahlen, and arrest instantly the Grand Dukes. To-morrow they shall depart for Schlussembourgh. As for the Empress, I will take charge of her myself. In regard to the other conspirators, that is your business."

"Sire," rejoined the astute Pahlen, "give me a written order, and, however lofty the heads to be struck may be, or however exalted those to be arrested, I shall obey."

"Good Pahlen!" rejoined the emperor. "Thou art the only faithful servant left me. Watch over me, Pahlen, for I see that every body about me wishes my death, but thee." He signed two orders, for the arrest of his sons, and for that of the conspirators, and placed these documents in the treacherous hand of the Count, who made no delay in seeking out the other conspirators, whom he knew he should find at the house of Count Zuboff.

"Every thing is discovered," said he: "Behold the order for your arrest. There is not a moment to lose. This night I am governor of St. Petersburg—to-morrow I shall be in prison—What do you mean to do?"

There was no time for hesitation, for the scaffold and Siberia stared the conspirators in the face. They agreed to meet that night at the house of Count Talitzen, colonel of the regiment Preobrajenski; but still they required an augmentation of number, and therefore it was determined to increase their strength by adding to the conspiracy those who had lately been arrested on frivolous pretences by Paul. Thirty officers of high birth and military rank had been degraded by the emperor, and sentenced to exile for faults for which a slight reprimand would have been sufficient punishment.

The Prime Minister ordered a dozen trains to be in attendance at the different prisons wherein these injured men were confined, and hurried to meet the Czarewicz Alexander.

LIFE AND POEMS OF GEORGE CRABBE.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

WE are tempted to make a few observations on the Life and Poems of the Reverend George Crabbe, and though there are open to us no peculiar sources of information, and we can but recall incidents that have been read, and read with interest, by most of his admirers, we trust that the topic we have chosen may find favour in our readers' eyes. Among the verse-writers of the last generation, the Poet of the Poor, the author of the "Village" and the "Register," occupies a prominent place as a man of marked and original genius: a mannerist, it is true, but still a poet of high pretension, and not undeserving of the distinction accorded him by a brother bard, in the emphatic line which described him as "Nature's sternest painter, yet her best."

His life—so calm and dignified at its close—has been rendered interesting by the narrative of early struggles, which are worthy of being recorded with those of Chatterton and Goldsmith, for the warning and instruction of the literary aspirant, and haply for the timely encouragement of "some forlorn and shipwrecked brother," who, pondering over the strange story, may, in his uttermost desolation, "take heart again."

On Christmas eve, 1754, Crabbe was born at Aldborough, at that time a mean and miserable fishing-town, on the coast of Suffolk. His father, who is described as "a man of strong and vigorous talents," and "skilful in business of all sorts," then filled the office of collector of the salt duties, or Salt-master, in that port. He had a large family, of whom George was the eldest. The mind of the poet derived enduring impressions from the scenery amidst which his childhood was passed. The graphic minuteness with which he has depicted the harsh features of the Suffolk coast and the amphibious inhabitants of his native town, and the indifference which he evinced in after life to the grandest and most beautiful features of inland scenery, would seem to imply that the withered commons and slimy marshes which were familiar to him in early years, had a peculiar charm and attraction, which suited the character of his genius, and harmonized with his tastes and feelings. His childhood was not on the whole a happy one. His father, though a man of considerable intellect and kindly disposition, was passionate and overbearing. The inhabitants of Aldborough were a rough and curious race, with whom the shy and thoughtful boy had little in common. In the poem of the Village, they are thus characteristically described:—

"Here joyless roam a wild amphibious race,
With sullen woe display'd in every face;
Who far from civil arts and social fly,
And scowl at strangers with suspicious eye."

His father participated in the sea-faring habits of the place, and possessed a share in a fishing-boat, but the future poet had little aptitude for such pursuits. "The Salt-master," observes Crabbe's biographer,¹ "often took his boys out a-fishing with him; and sorely was his patience tried with the awkwardness of the eldest. 'That boy,' he would say, 'must be a fool. John, and Bob, and Will, are all of some use about a boat; but what will that thing ever be good for?'" However, the father was pleased with the way in which the quiet lad took to his books. He was first sent to a dame's school, and as soon as he had learned to read, he eagerly devoured every book which came in his way. This bookish propensity induced his father to send him first to a school at Bungay, and afterwards to one of higher pretensions at Stowmarket, kept by a Mr. Richard Haddon. It had been resolved that he should follow the profession of a surgeon, and for that purpose it was considered desirable that he should acquire the rudiments of a classical education. After leaving school he returned home, to wait till an opening could be found for him as a doctor's apprentice. In the interval he had ample time to wander about the coast, and to indulge in the solitary musings which he has depicted as characteristic of a poet's youth.

"I loved to walk where none had walk'd before,
About the rocks that ran along the shore;
Or far beyond the sight of men to stray,
And take my pleasure when I lost my way;
For then 'twas mine to trace the hilly heath,
And all the mossy moor that lies beneath.
Here had I favourite stations, where I stood,
And heard the murmurs of the ocean-flood,
With not a sound beside, except when flew
Aloft the lapwing, or the grey curlew. . . .
When I no more my fancy could employ—
I left in haste what I could not enjoy,
And was my gentle mother's welcome boy."

(1) Life of the Rev. G. Crabbe, by his Son. 1835.

A situation was at length found for him in the village of Wickham-Brook, near Bury St. Edmunds, and he departed thither with a heavy heart. After a tedious journey across the country, the first sound which reached his ear, on arriving, with a melancholy face, at his new home, was the loud laughter of his master's daughters, who gazed with gusto on his woe-begone appearance, and boisterously shouted—"La, here's our new 'prentice!" His master united the occupation of a farmer to the responsible duties of his profession, and the apprentice "was made the bed-fellow and companion of the plough-boy!" After about three years of this sort of life, he was transferred by agreement from the custody of this rustic professor of the healing art, to a Mr. Page of Woodbridge. The change was in all respects most desirable, and had an unforeseen but important influence on his future life. At Woodbridge he made the acquaintance of several young men of his own age, and of kindred tastes, and amongst others that of a surgeon named Levett, who introduced him to Miss Sarah Elmy; with whom he fell violently in love, and to whom, after many eventful years had intervened, he was at last united. He had already been a copious writer of verses, but his passion inspired him with a new theme, and stimulated his poetical ambition. Whilst at Woodbridge he published a poem entitled "Inebriety," a thin quarto, price one shilling and sixpence, in which his early bias to the style of Pope is curiously shown.

In the following paragraph from the preface to this maiden essay, a truth which is ever present to the author's mind is gracefully expressed:—

"The World! how presumptuous, and yet how trifling the sound. Every man, gentle reader, has a world of his own, and whether it consists of half-a-score or half-a-thousand friends, 'tis his, and he loves to boast of it. Into my world, therefore, I commit this, my Muse's earliest labour, nothing doubting the clemency of the climate, nor fearing the partiality of the consoriums."

However much the poem might have satisfied those who formed at that time the young poet's world, the sale was very trifling, and there is little doubt that it was a losing speculation.

In the same year in which Crabbe published his first poem he completed the term of his apprenticeship, and returned to Aldborough. But his home was now thoroughly unhappy. During his absence his father had grown more violent and imperious; spent his evenings in the alehouse, and treated his wife—a meek-spirited, uncomplaining woman—with a harshness that roused the son's resentment. Unseemly quarrels, also, frequently occurred on another score. The Salt-master's affairs were not over prosperous, and he was unable to furnish his son with the means of pursuing his professional education in the metropolis; but, more than this, he insisted that he could not be maintained at home in idleness. Accordingly, he required him to assist in the drudgeries of the warehouse; and on the Slaughden quay the young surgeon might be often seen, sorely against his will, piling up cheeses, and butter-casks. At length an effort was made to send him to London; and, with a slenderly-furnished purse, he embarked in a trading sloop for the great metropolis, with the avowed purpose of "picking up a little surgical knowledge as cheap as he could." For eight or nine months he lived with some Aldborough people in Whitechapel, in the pursuit of this laudable object; but his funds being then exhausted, he was compelled, to return to his native town, where, after a brief interval, with small qualifications, and still smaller hopes of success, he started as a surgeon. Apart from his imperfect knowledge of his profession, he had, in fact, little aptitude for it. "Ready sharpness of mind," says his son, and biographer, "and mechanical cleverness of hand, are the first essentials in a surgeon; and he wanted them both, and knew his deficiencies far better than any one else did." But he persevered for some time, sustained by his attachment to Sarah Elmy, whom he had frequent opportunities of seeing, and who cheered and encouraged him with the delicate tact of a loving and high-minded woman. In the meanwhile he pursued his literary avocations, and his desk was filled with verses. His profession continued to grow more distasteful to him, and he was haunted by the vague hope of finding elsewhere a more profitable and congenial avocation. At last, on one gloomy day toward the close of the year 1779, during a stroll on the Marsh Hill, "a bleak and cheerless part of the cliff above Aldborough," he made the desperate resolution that he would proceed to London with his poems, and venture all. He had not then heard of Chatterton, whose miserable fate might have warned him from such an enterprise; his knowledge of the world was small, his ambition and self-reliance great. To the vast "brick desert" where Johnson in his days of poverty had felt the frequent pangs of hunger, and Goldsmith had wandered a homeless man, the poor Aldborough apothecary resolved to direct his steps, without a friend to guide or assist him, and, with as little apparent chance of success, as the fresh-water sailor who should venture, in a fragile vessel, without chart or compass, on the broad Atlantic.

His friends in vain endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose, and of course refused to furnish him with funds for the journey. He accordingly applied to Mr. Dudley North, whose brother had been a candidate for the representation of Aldborough, who sent him five pounds. On the receipt of the money, he gathered together his worldly substance, took an affectionate leave of his friends, and embarked again, in a trading sloop, for the modern Babylon.

He had but one acquaintance in London to whom he made known his arrival, and this was the wife of a linen-draper in Cornhill, named Burcham, who had been the early friend of Miss Elmy. The cordial welcome of this kind-hearted woman, and her equally kind-hearted husband, prevented him from feeling at first the loneliness of his situation. He did not disclose his plans, but they suspected the real object of his journey to London, and warned him of the dangers and difficulties that awaited the literary adventurer. He now, for the first time, heard of Chatterton, and the fate of the "marvellous boy" must have damped his ardour, and cast a temporary gloom over his sanguine spirit. For the purpose of being near his friends, he took lodgings, in the house of a hair-dresser, named Vickery, near the Royal Exchange, and then diligently set to work to correct and transcribe the poetical pieces he had brought with him to London. He practised from the first the strictest frugality; his only extravagance being the purchase of a fashionable tie-wig, which he deemed necessary for his station. With a dogged stoicism he avoided every place of amusement, and solaced himself, occasionally, with the cheap indulgence of a stroll in Hornsey Wood, with his Ovid or Horace in his pocket. But as every incident of his daily life, during the first three months of this miserable period, is noted down in "The Poet's Journal," a diary which he kept for Miss Elmy, it will be most convenient to refer to that simple and authentic narrative of his struggles, as we proceed in our narrative.

On the 21st of April, 1780, he thus commences this interesting record. "I dedicate to you, my dear Mira, [Miss Elmy's poetical name,] this journal, and I hope it will be some amusement. God only knows what is to be my lot; but I have, as far as I can, taken your old advice, and turned affliction's better part outward, and am determined to reap as much consolation from my prospects as possible; so that whatever befalls me, I will endeavour to suppose it has its benefits, though I cannot immediately see them." On the 25th of the same month, glancing, as many another adventurer has done, down the advertising columns of a newspaper, his attention was attracted by an announcement which yielded a glimmer of hope. "Reading the Daily Advertiser of the 22d, I found the following:—'Wanted an amanuensis of grammatical education, and endued with a genius capable of making improvements in the writings of gentleman not well versed in the English language.' The opportunity seemed a good one, and an appropriate note was despatched to the advertiser's address by a porter, who returned with an answer that 'the person should call in a day or two.'" The next entry, dated April 27th, gives the sequel. "Called on Mrs. Brooke, from whose husband or servant in the shop, I had the intelligence that the gentleman was provided—twelve long miles walked away, loss of time, and a little disappointment, thought I:—now for my philosophy. Perhaps, then, I reflected, the 'gentleman' might not have so very much of that character as I at first supposed: he might be a sharper, and would not, or an author himself, and consequently could not, pay me. He might have employed me seven hours in a day, over law or politics, and treated me at night with a Welsh rabbit and porter. It's all well; I can at present buy porter myself, and am my own amanuensis. N.B. Sent my poem to Dodsley, and required him to return it to-morrow, if not approved, otherwise its author would call upon him." Mr. Dodsley's reply was received the next day; a true bookseller's note, civil but decidedly unfavourable. But the poor poet was not yet wholly discouraged. "Once more, my Mira," he says, "I'll try, and write to Mr. Becket: if he fails me!—I know not how I shall ever get sufficient time to go through my principal design; but I've promised to keep up my spirits, and I will. God help me!" On the same date, he says that "he finds himself under the disagreeable necessity of vending or pawning some of his more useless articles." On the 10th of May, having been for some days buoyed up with a vague hope of better things, he notes down the result of his appeal to bookseller Becket. "Mr. Becket says just what Mr. Dodsley wrote, 'Twas a very pretty thing, but, sir, these little pieces the town do not regard: it has merit,—perhaps, some other may.' 'It will be offered to no other, sir!'—'Well, sir, I am obliged to you; but,' &c.—and so these little affairs have their end. And are you not disheartened? My dearest Mira, not I! The wanting a letter from you to-day, and the knowing myself to be possessed but of sixpence-farthing in the world, are much more consequential things." His spirits indeed did not fail him in his adversity, for in the same entry he continues thus:—"We are helped, I am persuaded, with spirits in our necessities. I did not, nor could, conceive that, with a very uncertain prospect before me, a very bleak one behind, and a very poor one around me, I should be so happy a fellow; I don't think there's a man in London worth but fourpence-halfpenny—for I've this moment sent seven farthings for a pint of porter—who is so resigned to his poverty." On the 16th of May, troubles seemed to be thickening round him. "Oh, my dear Mira," he writes, "how you distress me: you inquire into my affairs, and love not to be denied,—yet you must. To what purpose should I tell you the particulars of my gloomy situation; that I have parted with my money, sold my wardrobe, pawned my watch, am in debt to my landlord, and finally, at some loss how to eat a week longer." Some of the mischances of poverty, and its ludicrous expedients to keep up appearances, as told in this part of the Journal, may provoke a smile. May 20th, the following incident is recorded:—"It's the vilest thing in the world to have but one coat. My only one has happened with a mischance, and how to manage it is some difficulty. A confounded stove's modish ornament caught its elbow, and rent it half away. Pinioned to the side, it came home, and I ran deploring to my loft. In the dilemma, it occurred to me to turn tailor myself; but how to get materials to work with, puzzled me. At last I went running down in a hurry, with three or four sheets of paper in my hand, and begged for a needle &c. to sew them together. This finished my job, and but that it is somewhat thicker, the elbow is a good one yet."

On the 21st of May we find that he had resolved on writing a letter to Lord North; and the same entry contains the melancholy statement that "his last shilling became eightpence yesterday."

The humiliating expedient which in his abject poverty he was induced to pursue, was perhaps scarcely worthy of an independent mind; yet having regard to his painful struggles and urgent necessities, his small knowledge of the world, his integrity, and good intentions, it would be prudish to visit him with censure. As a last resort he proceeded to address several eminent individuals, whose station and reputation pointed them out as likely to become the patrons of a friendless poet. It was a course which many men of loftier pretensions and sterner virtue have in the bitterest straits of poverty scorned to pursue, and we cannot wholly approve it; but it will be seen that the letters he indited were simple, dignified, and true, and utterly free from cant and adulation. No success having attended his application to Lord North, he next applied to the Earl of Shelburne, enclosing a copy of verses. The letter is inserted in the journal to Mira, and is full of manly and pathetic eloquence. It commences thus:—"Forgive, my Lord, a free, and, perhaps, unusual address; misfortune has in it, I hope, some excuse for presumption. Your Lordship will not—cannot—be greatly displeased with an unfortunate man, whose wants are the most urgent; who wants a friend to assist him, and bread." After relating his unsuccessful application to Lord North, he concludes with this strong appeal:—"My Lord, I now turn to your Lordship, and entreat to be heard. I am ignorant what to ask, but feel forcibly my wants—patronage and bread. I have no other claim on your Lordship, than my necessities—but they are great—unless my muse, and she has, I am afraid, as few charms; nor is it a time for such to flourish: in serener days, my Lord, I have produced some poetical compositions the public might approve, and your Lordship not disdain to patronise."

The poor poet was again doomed to disappointment. His communication was disregarded; and he next addressed himself to Lord Chancellor Thurlow; "but," says his son, "with little better fortune. To the first letter, which enclosed a copy of verses, his Lordship returned for answer a cold polite note, regretting that his avocations did not leave him leisure to read verses," and of a second application he took no notice at all. This apparent neglect was, however, as we shall see, afterwards nobly atoned for; for notwithstanding his rough exterior and repulsive eccentricities, Thurlow was endowed with a noble nature and generous disposition. Meanwhile, his situation became every day more critical; his distresses more appalling. Heartsick and lonely in the great metropolis, his spirits at length gave way, and he must have keenly felt what he has so well expressed in his poem of the Library :—

"Hard is his fate who builds his peace of mind
On the precarious mercies of mankind;
Who hopes for wild and visionary things,
And mounts o'er unknown seas with vent'rous wings."

How he lived at all is a mystery. His landlord, Mr. Vickery, treated him, it is evident, with great consideration, and his kind friend Burcham furnished him with an occasional meal. His journal to Mira was discontinued, as we have before intimated, after three months of his residence in London; perhaps it became too painful for him to record his daily troubles and keen vexations, and in the absence of any record, we can only guess at the extent of his misery and privations.

At length, early in the year 1781, a "propitious influence" induced him to address a despairing appeal to the great statesman whom he ever afterwards regarded as the kindest, best, and greatest man of his generation,—whose ear was open to every cry of distress, whether proceeding from the oppressed and down-trodden natives of a distant dependency, or from a poor stranded adventurer in this London wilderness—the generous and noble-hearted Edmund Burke. Spirit-touching, and very piteous, was the poor poet's address to the great politician; but we question whether many men in Mr. Burke's position, immersed in public business, and beset with daily applications, would not have put it aside as an ordinary begging-letter. That great man, however, with the just and rare discrimination which resulted from an uncommon knowledge of mankind, saw at once that Crabbe was no common applicant for charity. He read with interest the detail of his sufferings; they were so truthfully and intelligently penned that he could not doubt. The letter is too long to be quoted entire, but we cannot pass it over without making a short extract. Having portrayed his early hopes, struggles, mistakes, and disappointments, his pressing exigencies and abject poverty, the friendless poet thus concluded his appeal to the statesman :—

"You will guess the purpose of so long an introduction. I appeal to you, sir, as a good, and, let me add, a great man. I have no other pretensions to your favour, than that I am an unhappy one. It is not easy to support the thoughts of confinement; and I am coward enough to dread such an end to my suspense.

"Can you, sir, in any degree, aid me with propriety? Will you ask any demonstrations of my veracity? I have imposed upon myself, but I have been guilty of no other imposition. Let me, if possible, interest your compassion. I know those of rank and fortune are teased with frequent petitions, and are compelled to refuse the requests even of those whom they know to be in distress; it is, therefore, with a distant hope I ventured to solicit such favour; but you will forgive me, sir, if you do not think proper to relieve. It is impossible that sentiments like yours can proceed from any but a humane and generous heart.

"I will call upon you, sir, to-morrow, and if I have not the happiness to obtain credit with you, I must submit to my fate. My existence is a pain to myself, and every one near and dear to me is distressed in my distresses. My connexions, once the source of happiness, now embitter the reverse of my fortune, and I have only to hope a speedy end to a life unpromisingly begun; in which (though it ought not to be boasted of) I can reap some consolation from looking to the end of it."

Some verses were enclosed with the letter, which Mr. Burke perused, and acting instantly on the impulses of his generous nature, he appointed a day and hour for an interview with the author. With trembling anxiety, but, we may imagine, with confident hope and many pleasing anticipations, the poor adventurer knocked at the door of Mr. Burke's mansion. He was ushered into his presence, received with unexpected kindness, and finally dismissed with assurances that left him no room to doubt that a bright future had dawned upon him. The readiest mode to aid the young author, thought Mr. Burke, was by the publication of his poems; and he accordingly selected the Village and the Library from other compositions, and read them, in his most impressive manner, to Dodsley, the publisher. The bookseller did not feel much confidence in the success of the verses, but admitted their excellence. The publication of the Library was at last decided on, and Dodsley generously promised that all the profits should be appropriated to the author.

Burke's kindness did not stop here. He had found, as he told Sir Joshua Reynolds, that his new protégé "had the mind and feelings of a gentleman;" and in order to give him leisure for study, he invited him to his seat at Beaconsfield, lavished on him every attention, and laid plans for his future life. "It was in the course of one of their walks," says the poet's son and biographer, "amidst the classical shades of Beaconsfield, that Burke, after some conversation on general literature, suggested by a passage of the Georgics, which he had happened to quote on observing something that was going on in his favourite farm, passed to a more minute inquiry into my father's early days in Suffolk than he had before made, and drew from him the avowal, that, with respect to future affairs, he felt a strong partiality for the church. 'It is most fortunate,' said Mr. Burke, 'that your father exerted himself to send you to that second school; without a little Latin we should have made nothing of you; now, I think we shall succeed.'" After this conversation, Mr. Burke, continues the biographer, "though well aware of the difficulties of obtaining holy orders for any person not regularly educated, exerted himself to procure the assent, in this instance, of Dr. Yonge, the then Bishop of Norwich; and in this, backed by the favourable representations of Mr. Dudley North and Mr. Charles Long, he was eventually successful."

The transition which Crabbe had made from poverty and neglect to comfort, consideration, and congenial society, was sudden and unforeseen, and has no parallel in literary history. His heart was filled with gratitude and pious thankfulness. In after life, he could not speak of Burke's kindness to him without tears in his eyes. He was at once introduced to the distinguished and intellectual circle by whom the statesman was surrounded; amongst others, to Fox, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Dr. Johnson. By the latter he was at first received with a growl, but afterwards treated with substantial kindness. The Lord Chancellor Thurlow invited him to breakfast, soon after the publication of the Library, and at parting put into his hand a £100 bank-note, at that time a most acceptable present.

In December 1781, Crabbe was ordained by the Bishop of Norwich, having passed a creditable examination; and immediately prepared to officiate as a curate in his native town. With a swelling heart he took leave of his generous patron, and eminent associates; nor did he omit to bid a kind adieu to the linendraper in Cornhill, at whose hospitable table he had so often sat, when without the means of purchasing a meal. Arrived at Aldborough, he received the congratulations of his friends, who now commended the imprudent step they had before so emphatically condemned. The father gloried in the unexpected success of his bookish son, and confessed that he had underrated his abilities. But one gentle voice the poet missed, whose lightest word of sympathy and congratulation would have gladdened him more than all; one approving smile which fondly and fervently he had hoped would have beamed upon him in the day of his triumph and success, was wanting to complete his happiness. His mother, the poor meek woman, whose heart would have leaped with joy at his good fortune, who would have gloried in his fame, as only a mother could, had died during his absence. The feelings which such a loss inspired, have been beautifully delineated in his poem of "The Parish Register:"—

"Arrived at home, how then he gazed around,
In ev'ry place, where she, no more, was found;—
The seat at table she was wont to fill;
The fire-side chair, still set, but vacant still;
The garden-walks, a labour all her own;
The latticed bower, with trailing shrubs o'ergrown;
The Sunday-pew she fill'd with all her race—
Each place of hers was now a sacred place;
That while it call'd up sorrows in the eyes,
Pierced the full heart, and forced them still to rise."

While officiating as a curate in his native town, the poet was subjected, it seems, to many annoyances. The good people of Aldborough were mystified and surprised by his strange good fortune, and many ill-natured rumours were invented and circulated to account for his success. It was, therefore, with no small delight that Crabbe accepted the post of domestic chaplain to the Duke of Rutland, procured for him by the never-tiring kindness of his benefactor Burke. He immediately exchanged his humble quarters at Aldborough for aristocratic apartments in Belvoir Castle; and whilst residing there, in 1783, he published his poem of the Village.

In this poem were displayed all his most striking excellences. Without any affectation of originality, there was a freshness and vigour in his conceptions which took the reader by surprise. It is worthy of remark, that whilst carefully discarding the conventional images and affected phraseology that marked the common-place poetry of the age, in the mechanism of his verse, he followed the popular models, and scrupulously adhered to the fashionable standard. We need not remind our readers that the great writers who had immediately preceded him, had used the metre of Pope with singular success:—Johnson, in his masterly imitations of Juvenal; Churchill, in his coarse but vigorous satires, and finally Oliver Goldsmith, in the "Traveller" and the "Deserted Village." It is possible that the latter poem might have suggested to Crabbe a delineation of rural life of a somewhat different complexion; and in many of his descriptions there is much of the manner of Goldsmith. The poem had been sent to Dr. Johnson, who honoured it with his corrections, and heartily approved of its manly sentiment. The Doctor was undoubtedly pleased with its orthodox form, as well as with its originality and truth. Earnestness and reality were rare virtues in the verse-writers of the day; and many of the respectable readers of poetry must have been startled by the originality of Crabbe's delineations. His Village was no pastoral paradise. He depicted the manners of country people not as they might, or as they ought to have been, but as they were. He did not subscribe to the notion that happiness and contentment were always to be found in the rural cottage, or that the rustic's life was one round of cheerfulness and comfort. His great object was to convince the sentimentalist that there was another side to the picture:—

"Yet grant them health, 'tis not for us to tell,
Though the head droops not, that the heart is well;
Or will you praise that homely, healthy fare,
Plenteous and plain, that happy peasants share?
Oh! trifle not with wants you cannot feel,
Nor mock the misery of a stinted meal;
Homely not wholesome, plain not plenteous, such
As you who praise would never deign to touch."

The description of the parish poor-house—such as parish poor-houses used to be—with its putrid vapours and walls of mud, is, perhaps, the most powerful sketch in the poem; but it is too familiar to bear quotation. As a specimen of his forcible satire, we cannot, however, forbear inserting his portrait of the village apothecary—a sketch from life:—

"Anon, a figure enters, quaintly neat,
All pride and business, bustle and conceit;
With looks unalter'd by these scenes of woe,
With speed that, entering, speaks his haste to go;
He bids the gazing throng around him fly,
And carries fate and physic in his eye;
A potent quack, long versed in human ills,
Who first insults the victim whom he kills;
Whose murderous hand a drowy bench protect,
And whose most tender mercy is neglect."

At the latter end of the same year in which this successful poem was published, Crabbe was married to his early love, Sarah Elmy, in the parish church of Beccles.¹ Amidst all the discouraging circumstances of his early life, the ardour of their attachment had never cooled; and for many a long year their wedded life was blest with all the felicity which such sincere and well-tried affection deserved.

In 1785 was published the poem of the "Newspaper," which can scarcely be said to have added much to Crabbe's reputation, and from that time for twenty-two years, his muse was wholly silent.

In this interval, he held successively several church preferments, and sedulously devoted himself to the duties of his profession. In the society of his wife and children,—a simple and unassuming country clergyman,—he pursued the even tenor of his way, undisturbed by visions of literary fame. In the discharge of his duties, he evinced a Parson Adams-like simplicity, which showed how foreign to his character was every species of affectation and pretence. Perhaps some of his parishioners might have thought him occasionally wanting in dignity, and too careless of the proprieties of his profession. His son observes that "he had the most complete exemption from fear or solicitude," (whilst officiating as a minister.) "'I must have some money, gentlemen,' he would say, in stepping from the pulpit. This was his notice of tithe-day. Once or twice, finding it grow dark, he abruptly shut his sermon, saying, 'Upon my word, I cannot see; I must give you the rest when we meet again.' Or he would walk into a pew near a window, and stand on the seat and finish his sermon, with the most admirable indifference to the remarks of his congregation."

Although the Village and the Library had taken their place amongst English classics, their author was almost forgotten by the reading public, when in 1807 he published "the Parish Register," with some minor pieces. The new poems were received with the applause they merited: all the peculiar excellences of the Village were displayed in the Register in still higher perfection; and it was evident that time had matured and strengthened the poet's powers. There was the same wonderful talent for minute description—the same singular adherence to the literal and prosaic truth, blended with a profounder pathos, and still deeper insight into human nature. His former poems contained no description equal in solemn and terrible effect, to his sketch of the Village Infidel in the first part of the Register:—

"His, a lone house, by Dead-man's Dyke-way stood;
And his, a nightly haunt in Lonely wood;
Each village inn has heard the ruffian boast
That he believed 'in neither God nor ghost';
That when the sod upon the sinner press'd,
He, like the saint, had everlasting rest;
That never priest believed his doctrines true,
But would, for profit, own himself a Jew,
Or worship wood and stone, as honest heathen do;
That fools alone on future worlds rely,
And all who die for faith deserve to die."

His command of quaint and vigorous language, and terse, epigrammatic expression, were never more fully displayed than in his description of the dwelling-place of the ancient maiden, whose death is recorded in the third part of the "Parish Register." We quote it as a specimen of his excellence in another style:—

"Down by the church-way-walk, and where the brook
Winds round the chancel like a shepherd's crook;
In that small house, with those green pales before,
Where jasmine trails on either side the door;
Where those dark shrubs, that now grow wild at will,
Were clipt in form, and tantalised with skill;

(1) So called from its fine old church, (Beata Ecclesia.)

Where cockles blanch'd and pebbles neatly spread,
Form'd shining borders for the larkspurs' bed;—
There lived a lady, wise, austere, and nice,
Who show'd her virtue by her scorn of vice;
In the dear fashions of her youth she dress'd,
A pen-green Joseph was her favourite vest;
Erect she stood, she walk'd with stately mien, Tight was her length of stays, and she was tall and lean."

We will make one more extract from the "Register," and we trust our readers will pardon the length of the quotation. The portrait of Isaac Ashford,—an honest, manly English labourer, has always appeared to us not merely the most successful of Crabbe's delineations, but one of the most beautiful sketches in the whole range of our poetical literature. We doubt whether the bard of Auburn himself has written anything which leaves a more pleasing impression on the mind, or which from its tranquil beauty and manly sentiment is more worthy of citation.

"Next to these ladies, but in nought allied,
A noble peasant, Isaac Ashford, died.
Noble he was, contemning all things mean,
His truth unquestion'd and his soul serene:
Of no man's presence Isaac felt afraid;
At no man's question Isaac look'd dismay'd:
Shame knew him not, he dreaded no disgrace;
Truth, simple truth, was written in his face;
Yet while the serious thought his soul approved,
Cheerful he seem'd, and gentleness he loved;
To bliss domestic he his heart resign'd,
And, with the firmest, had the fondest mind.

If pride were his, 'twas not their vulgar pride,
Who, in their base contempt, the great deride;
Nor pride in learning, though my clerk agreed,
If fate should call him, Ashford might succeed;
Nor pride in rustic skill, although we knew
None his superior, and his equals few:
But if that spirit in his soul had place,
It was the jealous pride that shuns disgrace;
A pride in honest fame, by virtue gain'd,
In sturdy boys to virtuous labours train'd;
Pride in the power that guards his country's coast,
And all that Englishmen enjoy and boast;
Pride in a life that slander's tongue defied—
In fact, a noble passion, misnamed pride.

He had no party's rage, no sect'ry's whim;
Christian and countryman was all with him:
True to his church he came; no Sunday shower
Kept him at home in that important hour.

I feel his absence in the hours of prayer,
And view his seat, and sigh for Isaac there;
I see no more those white locks, thinly spread
Round the bald polish of that honour'd head;
No more that awful glance on playful wight
Compell'd to kneel and tremble at the sight;
To fold his fingers, all in dread the while,
Till Mister Ashford soften'd to a smile;
No more that meek and suppliant look in prayer,
Nor the pure faith (to give it force) are there:
But he is blest, and I lament no more,
A wise, good man, contented to be poor."

In the "Borough" (published in 1810, for the poet was now encouraged to proceed,) the reviewers discerned "greater beauties and greater blemishes," than in any of the former poems. The "Tales in Verse," 1812, and the "Tales of the Hall," 1819, were still more popular; and amongst a select few, at least, Crabbe was regarded as one of the greatest poets of his age. His productions did not at first obtain a very wide popularity; for they wanted the glare and glitter which attract a certain class of verse readers; but they gradually grew upon public estimation, and, as a test of their worth, it may be mentioned that Mr. Murray was induced to give him for the "Tales of the Hall," and the remaining copyright of his previous poems, the munificent sum of 3,000*l*. He was not a rapid writer; indeed, it is probable, since he abstained from it so long, that he felt severely the task of composition. "He fancied," says his son,—and these small particulars are always interesting—"that autumn was, on the whole, the most favourable season for him in the composition of poetry; but there was something in the effect of a sudden fall of snow that appeared to stimulate him in a very extraordinary manner. It was during a great snow storm, that, shut up in his room, he wrote almost currento calamo his Sir Eustace Grey."

We have not enlarged upon Crabbe's striking poetical virtues, without being sensible of his faults; but, as a great critic¹ has observed, his faults are obvious and prominent, and "are all on the surface of his writings." His bald and homely phraseology has been excellently parodied in the "Rejected Addresses." The poet himself confessed that the young men "had done him admirably;" though, he added, "it is easier to imitate style than to furnish matter." Our readers will readily recall some lines of this famous imitation; e. g.—

"John William Richard Alexander Dwyer
Was footman to Justinian Stubbs, Esquire;
But when John Dwyer listed in the Blues,
Emanuel Jennings polish'd Stubbs's shoes," &c.

That he committed many sins against good taste cannot be denied; that he is frequently formal, flat, and prosaic, and that he dwelt too much on repulsive and disagreeable subjects—all this is admitted. Like the too faithful portrait-painter, he offends by over minuteness, and rigid truth.

"His verse from Nature's face each feature drew,
Each lovely charm, each mole and wrinkle too."

The distinguished wit who with such success parodied his style, conferred on him the nick name of "Pope in worsted stockings;" and the ludicrous appellation was enrolled amongst the happy sayings of the day, and gladly seized on by the numerous opponents of his poetical creed. But his merits are too great to suffer from a few admitted errors. His virtues were all his own; and as long as originality and genius are admired and revered, he will hold a distinguished place among the poets of the last generation.

In the latter portion of Mr. Crabbe's life he appears to have entered more into general society. He made frequent journeys to London, where his genius and fame secured him admission into all the literary and distinguished circles. In 1822 he paid Sir Walter Scott (who had always been a genuine admirer of his poems,) a visit, at Edinburgh. Mr. Lockhart has recorded a curious and characteristic anecdote connected with this visit. "Mr. Crabbe," he says, in a letter addressed to the poet's son, "had, I presume, read very little about Scotland before that excursion. . . . I believe he really never had known, until then, that a language radically distinct from the English, was still actually spoken within the island. And this recalls a scene of high merriment which occurred the very morning after his arrival. When he came down into the breakfast parlour, Sir Walter had not yet appeared there; and Mr. Crabbe had before him two or three portly personages all in the full Highland garb. These gentlemen, arrayed in a costume so novel, were talking in a language which he did not understand; so he never doubted that they were foreigners. The Celts, on their part, conceived Mr. Crabbe, dressed as he was in rather an old-fashioned style of clerical propriety—with buckles in his shoes, for instance—to be some learned abbé, who had come on a pilgrimage to the shrine of Waverley; and the result was, that when, a little afterwards, Sir Walter and his family entered the room, they found your father and these worthy lairds hammering away, with pain and labour, to make themselves mutually understood, in most execrable French. Great was the relief, and potent the laughter, when the host interrupted their colloquy with his plain English 'Good-morning.'"

Tranquil and placid were the last years of the poet's life, but they present few incidents for the biographer. At length, on the 3d of February, 1832, in the 78th year of his age, he breathed his last, full of years and honours, at Trowbridge in Wiltshire, of which parish he had been nineteen years the rector. His life must, on the whole, be pronounced a fortunate instance of the union of rare talents with high principle and amiable manners; and few of our modern poets have, to the writer's mind, a greater claim on the respect and regard of Englishmen than George Crabbe.

WINNING THE GLOVES.

BY J. M. W.

THE gay, pageant-loving queen, Anne of Denmark, had arranged a grand archery festival at the palace of Hampton Court, for the special delectation of the Spanish ambassador and his suite. The prizes were numerous, and, for the most part, of considerable value; but the one reserved for the best shot was esteemed a perfect marvel of costliness, and withal of the rarest fancy. It was a small pair of gloves, made of some rich silken fabric, of a pale blue colour, elaborately embroidered with seed-pearl by the hand of the queen herself. Whether the gems or the queen's handicraft gave this said pair of gloves its greatest value in the eyes of the young lords and ladies who contended for the prize, I will not venture to say, but it was very evident to all observers that each strove very hard to win it;—the young ladies for themselves, the young lords for some chosen one of the heart, or some Cynthia of the minute, to whom they had been pleased to devote themselves. Great was the astonishment and small the approbation in that brilliant assembly of competitors, when the beautiful gloves were awarded to a mere stripling who had but recently been enrolled among her majesty's pages, who had, for the first time, been called upon to exhibit his skill in archery, and had done the thing so effectually as to distance all rivals and to gain the loud applause of the spectators.

"Who is he? what is his name?" was uttered in accents of curiosity, as strongly marked as the courtly breeding of the well-dressed crowd would allow.

Further questions being asked, further information was elicited, to the effect that Master Laurence Raby was "frae the north countree," (like most other importations to court at that period of English history,) that he was a relative of the Earl of Westmoreland, in whose household he had been educated, and by whose interest he had obtained his present place.

"He is a fair stripling," said the Lord Percy, "and like to thrive at court. I wonder what work my Lord of Westmoreland hath set him to do here."

"If it be to play the spy on his fair daughter," replied the old Countess of Shrewsbury, glancing her keen eyes towards the Lady Alice Fane, "I'll warrant ye he'll do the work passing well. Saw you ever his face turned from her, save when he fitted the arrow and took aim for these same marvellous gloves? He hath learned archery from Dan Cupid, I fear."

"Nay, but Cupid should have taught him cunning, too," said Lord Grey, smiling. "The Lady Alice hath set her heart strongly upon these gewgaws, and hoped to win them, for she draws the best bow among the damsels. If it had not been for that arrow of Master Laurence's, which bettered her best, the gloves would have been hers. Look you now! See how she knits her fair brows, and turns disdainfully away as he approaches!"

The old countess smiled grimly as she watched young Laurence Raby stand for a moment irresolute, with his eyes fixed on the coveted prize, as he held it in his hand, and then look after the retreating figure of the Lady Alice Fane, as she disappeared among the crowd.

"You are right, my lord. The poor boy hath lost more in love, this bout, than his winnings in archery are likely to make him amends for."

"What if he present the gloves to his mistress?" asked Lord Percy.

"He!" laughed the old countess. "Poor child! he is dying to give them to her. It was for her he won them, you may be sure; and yet will he never have the courage to address her in a fair embroidered speech, and ask her gracious acceptance of the prize, as an accomplished courtier, like my Lord Percy, would do, with so much ease." And the three old people laughed at the youth with that melancholy gaiety which is born of regret that we have lost what we laugh at.

It was later in the day; the evening banquet in the palace was over; the queen and her guests were dispersed, some throughout the galleries and chambers, and others in the beautiful gardens, which then, as now, formed one of the great attractions of this royal residence. It was a pleasant sight to see the courtly groups sweeping over the soft grass, or along the broad alleys, with their jewelled dresses flashing in the light of the setting sun. Here and there stately dames might be seen reposing upon benches beneath the trees, with half-a-dozen gay cavaliers around them; some lying at their feet, sunning themselves in a shower of bright down-cast looks; others erect, as if overwhelmed with a sense of their dignity as man; bending, with lofty condescension, over their companions, and allowing themselves to inspire a tender passion which they meant to return at their convenience; but just that moment it seemed too much trouble to them to fall in love with any face, however fair. Here and there the soft sounds of a lute, and the still sweeter song of the human voice, was heard among the groups; and through the beves of young girls peals of silvery laughter rang round clearly, as they glided to and fro over the terraces and lawns, or fed the fish in the basin with delicate morsels crumbled by the fairest hands in the world. If Watteau had been there, he would have made a dozen of his best pictures from the aspect of the gardens on that particular occasion. Indeed, all nature there, animate and inanimate, was nature à la Watteau.

But nature of another kind might have been detected by the discerning eye that followed two of the fairest ladies of the court, as they stole away from the groups in the more public part of the gardens to enjoy a tête-à-tête in a secluded grove, where the overshadowing trees shut out the sunlight, but imprisoned the evening breeze, which seemed as if it could not get away from that leafy labyrinth. The Lady Alice Fane and her chosen friend, Isabelle Liddell, moved on, in silence, till they were out of the sound of the gay crowd. The latter then spoke:—

"Alas! alas! So you will not forgive poor Laurence Raby for winning the gloves for you?" and she glanced archly at her companion.

"Winning them for me! How do I know that he won them for me? Besides, I preferred winning them for myself. To think, indeed, that Master Laurence should be a better shot than I! Why, I taught the boy! A year ago, at Raby Castle, we used to practise archery every day, and Master Laurence had much ado to hit the target's outer ring at twenty paces—while I was the best shot in the company, except my father."

"One may learn much in a year, with a fair motive," quoth Isabelle, sagely.

"I do not choose to be outdone by Laurence Raby. Besides, Isabelle, to tell you a piece of female truth, I sorely coveted those gloves, and made sure of the prize till that awkward boy marred my good arrow by splitting it. The colour of the gloves, and their exquisite embroidery, (her majesty's own work, too,) are just in accordance with my new suit of sapphire taffeta, which my lady mother has caused to be made for me against the day of the prince's marriage; and now I have lost those beautiful gloves! I will never forgive him!"

"Not if he give you the gloves?" suggested the pretty Isabelle.

"Give them to me!" laughed the displeased lady. "Nay, that were a pretty tale: Alice Fane was obliged to Laurence Raby to win a pair of gloves for her at the queen's archery! May I never draw bow again if that would be believed at Raby? No, no. Were he to be bold enough to offer them, I should be obliged to refuse, for very shame at my defeat. I marvel at his audacity in shooting better than myself. These boys, these boys!—how soon they think themselves men!" and the mature lady of seventeen summers shook her graceful head, while a smile curled her lip.

They moved on through the grove—Isabelle peeping here and there among the trees, as if on the look-out for something or somebody—Alice Fane, with preoccupied mind, looking straight before her with those violet-blue eyes which had pierced the heart of her cousin, Laurence Raby, more than two years before. With what object was that unclouded young mind filled? Alas, for the dignity of human nature! I am obliged to confess that it was not with her young lover, (though she guessed him to be such,) nor with vexation that she had not distinguished herself as the best shot of the day, that her mind was filled at that moment; it was with something that romantic persons would deem below the consideration of a heroine.

"Isabelle, Isabelle!" said she, stopping suddenly, "Was ever anything so provoking as to lose those exquisite gloves? My sapphire taffetas will not be complete without them. I have half a mind to set my maid Bridget to steal them from the malapert youth. He cannot wear them, you know. His hand is bigger than my two together. And if he does not give them to me, I know not to what lady in the court he would think of giving them."

"To me, perhaps," said Isabelle. "Why not? I like Master Raby. I would not scorn his pretty present."

"Present!" and the Lady Alice coloured slightly. "I tell you, Isabelle, I do not want them as a present—I want them as a prize. They should be mine, by right."

"Stay!" and Isabelle laid her hand suddenly on her friend's arm—"I was right; and he did wander hitherward to conceal his chagrin at your displeasure. See there!" and she pointed through an opening in the trees to the marble base of a large vase, whereon reclined the offending youth, Laurence Raby. "As I live, he is asleep! See! the book has dropped from his hand; and there are the beautiful blue gloves peeping out from the opening of his tunic. Now, Alice, I will be generous. I want those gloves quite as much as you do; but I will give them up to you, if you choose to win then now with a little kiss; but, if you do not condescend to do so, I vow by St. Cuthbert, who hated women and kisses and fine gloves, that I will win them myself, and you shall never see them on your own pretty hands."

The girls were but girls, and terribly in need of amusement. They looked at each other and laughed, and then glanced at the insensible youth. Lady Alice was moved, by a slight expression of sadness on his comely features, to whisper, "Poor boy!" then her eye rested on the portion of a pearl-broidered glove, which hung out from the breast of the sleeper.

"It is but one little touch of his cheek—besides, he is my cousin, Isabelle! and—and—I will have those gloves."

They came nearer—Alice bent forward, but ere she could touch the cheek with her lips, she was obliged to retreat again, lest she should betray herself by laughing outright. At last the deed was accomplished; but not without Master Laurence's cognisance, for he opened his eyes widely enough upon the blushing Alice; found words enough to say in his own defence for having won the gloves from her in the morning which she had now fairly won from him in the evening. He took them from his bosom, and laid them in her hands with as pretty a speech as my Lord Percy himself could have manufactured. Laurence Raby had improved wonderfully in many things besides archery during the past year, as Isabelle Liddell asserted. The gloves were won, as my reader may see in the accompanying picture; but whether fairly or not I cannot undertake to say. My private opinion involves Master Laurence and Mistress Isabelle in something like a well-grounded accusation of conspiracy and collusion; but I am not bound to promulgate it. Certain it is that Lady Alice Fane won the gloves, and wore them in the sight of the whole court on the day of the marriage of Prince Charles with the very Parisian princess, Henrietta Maria.

A VISIT TO THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

POTMUS, RIVER HORSE, OR HIPPOPOTAMUS

AMPHIBIUS.

BY ARACHNOPHILUS, F.L.S.

AFRICA is a curiously rich continent; we could quote Latin (and Greek too) in proof, only we fear that this practical age cares rather for Saxon. We leave learning to the Times and Penny Cyclopædia, to Mr. Birch, Mr. Vaux,¹ Mr. Broderip, and others. It is interesting to know that Anacreon noticed the chanting Cicada tibicen, and has addressed a world-known ode to it, and that Shakspeare loved

"Oxlips and the nodding violet," much as other men. The Times lately had a valuable chronological history of the Potmus² from before the days of Job, and the Penny Cyclopædia has another, so we forbear telling our readers what the Patriarch records of Behemoth, and what old coins say, and what hieroglyphical history spells; and advise them to go straight, on foot, by omnibus, by cab, or by railway, to the Zoological Gardens, and see this marvellous production of Africa—in its case, that great land is no "Arida nutrix."

There is no mistake about the Potmus being fat—none whatever of its loving water—not a doubt that it is the most singular (we wish it was not single, but mated) quadruped—beast, mammal—that has yet been imported. As for the Giraffes, we remember we thought them once—fourteen years make a difference—truly marvellous; now we only think them seraphic;³ so familiar are we with their fine heads, graceful necks, angelic eyes and mildness, spotted body, and delicate manners and movements;—that Potmus, "rollocking" among water; in its play (think of a seven foot sow being fond of a joke), snaps at its keeper, with its comical, as yet toothless, mouth and alligator-like muzzle, but takes care not to touch him; think of its curious eyes, projecting and retractile,⁴ the bend of its mouth, its flat head, its small ears, its obesity,⁵ its well-greased skin. We heard a paper read on its perspiration, and could not help winking wickedly, lest the writer had got hold of lard instead of the sudorifics of potmus. It was, however, at the Society's Rooms, on Tuesday last; the Secretary was in his seat, and the president looked as solemn as a salmon fisher, or the author of the History of British Fishes; so the philosopher must have had some of its real sweat,—we should say, sensible perspiration, only the first word is shorter.

We mean to return to the Potmus, and have his autobiography in hand; it will tell of his birth, parentage, and education, give a statistical table of the number of cows and goats he required to keep him in milk; what he thought of Cairo and Mahomedanism in general; what he thought of the Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, Straits of Gibraltar, Bay of Biscay, Chops of the Channel, and of steam boats, the Ripon particularly; what of his fellow voyager, the great Nepaulese Prince, with a terrifically long name; what of Buddhism; what of the secretary and officers who waited on him at Southampton; and what of Albion's coast in general, and of Regent's Park in particular, and the comparisons the Potmus drew between his tank and the Nile; what of the Fellows of the Society, and of us gentlemen of the press who were invited on Monday and Tuesday to inspect; and what of the Public, that "great fact," whose shillings and sixpences he is invited over to draw. There is a moral in the Potmus, which Esop could have written, and which, some day, when we are in the mood, we may entertain.

get animals, and plants, named shortly, in common language at least—e.g. ox, cow, bull, horse, mare, cat, dog, &c., oak, beech, ash, box, grass, rose, &c., gold, lead, &c.; our Saxon ancestry, as an able writer in the Athenæum has shown, did so.

(3) Xiraffa means angel, seraph.

(4) A paper will be written on this subject, and the muscular development of the eye.

(5) Cæzute would have written fatness, but this polished age prefers obesity, and the word really sounds better.

(1) Mr. Vaux wrote an article on the Chronology of the Potmus, which appeared in the Times.

(2) The mode in which a Saxon child, known and related to Arachnophilus, pronounces what Londoners are beginning to call "Hippopotamus;" let us try and shorten these long words, and

These Zoological Gardens are pleasant places, with their Tasmanian pursed tiger-wolf, their comical erect tailed Warthogs, (Phacochærus æthiopicus). We love "ugliness," for amiability and friskiness often accompany it—these boas, iguanas, lizards, asps, &c. &c. these beautiful flowers—those fragrant hawthorns—those dry walks—those delighted children—we hope the Government will some day buy them (the gardens) and throw them open to the public. They (children and gardens) made us on Monday, glad, and gladdened the faces of thousands, many of whom "Elia," the "gentle Charles," would have recognised as "lone sempstresses, and hard-working mantua-makers and milliners."

Lord John!! increase the innocent pleasures of the people! Give them open gardens, more Kews, more Regent's Parks, more Edinburgh Botanical Gardens, more British Museums, and, with God's blessing, less money may be wanted for houses of correction, for transport-convict ships, and for policemen and soldiers to keep down chartist mobs. Poor men, had they innocent, cheap, or gratuitous pleasures, would, perhaps, prefer Potmuses to pot-houses, and Kew Gardens to crying and corrupting democrats. May the museum, public library, and public parks movement prevail.

Victoria Park pitted against the Eagle Tavern; Battersea Park versus the Red house; Copenhagen Park, Islington, versus the "White Conduit;" and Salford, Ipswich, Canterbury, Newcastle, and Elgin Museums, pitted against Robert Owen, Socialism, and Madame Tussaud's "Gallery of Horrors!"

We subjoin a short sketch of the natural history of the Potmus, referring to Dr. Smith's work, and any of the numerous popular histories of mammalia, for further particulars.¹ Many of our readers know that the Potmus attains a large size, as they are familiar with the large stuffed specimen in the British Museum. This, though at least fourteen feet long, is by no means one of the largest. Our excellent friend, Dr. Burchell, whose two quarto volumes, of the rarest interest, contain many particulars regarding Potmus, mentions that three bushels of vegetable matter were taken from the stomach and intestines of a half-grown specimen; if this be true—and there is no reason to doubt it—the commissariat department of the Society must look well to their provisions. During the day, this large beast keeps in the water; Warwick told us yesterday, that at such times their nostrils alone are above the surface; at night, they are active and feed. The flesh is very excellent and wholesome, resembling pork; the fat lying immediately under the skin is particularly prized by the South African epicure. Dr. Smith tells us, the Dutch call it, Zee Kow speck, or Sea Cow's speck. Where the Hippopotamus amphibius abounds, it is easily shot: the Rev. Henry Methuen says, that a good shot has only to direct his gun at its nostrils; the wound prevents the poor creature keeping under water, and its death soon follows, when two or three sportsmen are present.

The flesh sold, when Mr. Warwick was in South Africa, for from threepence-halfpenny to fourpence a pound. Butchers' prices vary at the antipodes, somewhat as they do here, and "in the matter of the speck," Dr. Smith neglects not to say, that the aristocratic feeders of Capetown, some of whom have the privilege of being our readers, "do not disdain to use their influence with the country farmers, to obtain a preference." Bribery and corruption are not confined to reformed Parliaments, and we hope that our colonists will not create a rebellion because they have been over-reached "in the matter of sea cow's speck." We might add long histories of the Potmus, but want space. Our friend in the gardens evinced a resolution of character on his way to England, worthy of Behemoth, who "drinketh up a river, and hasteth not, he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth." We reserve an account of his preventing interference with what he deemed his comforts on his voyage in the Ripon, for the autobiography which will be written in imitation of Gilbert White's (of Selborne) autobiography of the tortoise, quoted by Mr. Jesse, in one of the series of the "Gleanings," meanwhile read Job, chapter xl. verses 15 and onwards, ye who say that Behemoth is a crocodile, and let the first verse answer you,— "he eateth grass as an ox."

The Potmus now in the Zoological Gardens, was caught when a very suckling, in July or August, 1849, at the Island of Obaysch, somewhat under 2,000 miles above Cairo. He lived in that city of the Caliphs for several months, drinking milk enough not only to drain several cows and goats, but sufficient, we guess, to appal, if not to exhaust, some milkman in Islington, inferior to Rhodes, the milkman of that "merry" suburb. If not loved, he was at all events respected, and on his debarkation for Alexandria, was attended by a levee of "ten thousand spectators," who were pressing forward so curiously, that a paper before us says, that "the intervention of a strong body of the Pasha's troops" (from a colonel to the private) was required to keep back the people.

The Council of the Zoological Society in general, and the unwearied Secretary in general and in particular, would be glad even with Gibbon's deduction to let the Potmus be seen "for a consideration," every lawful day. We strongly urge our readers to lose no time in making themselves familiar with Behemoth's physiognomy, and can recommend Dr. Andrew Smith's graphic account of Hippopotamus amphibius, in the illustrations of the Zoology of South Africa, only beseeching them, if they won't follow little Saxon Helen Elizabeth, and Arachnophilus in

(1) Since writing the above, we have seen a very graphic sketch by Professor Owen, in the June number of the Annals and Magazine of Natural History, addressed to our worthy friend, Richard Taylor, Esq.: it contains the observations of a lynx-eyed man.

(2) Gibbon (see his "Decline and Fall"—any edition), might have annotated as follows: "When a captain in the Surrey Militia, the papers announced that 7,000 volunteers from the adjoining counties met in 'battle array' I counted them, and found there were hardly 3,500. A similar deduction must be made in the Newspaper's report from Cairo."

calling him Potmus, at least not to call the fat curious beast Hippopotamus.

P. S. We have not succeeded in catching the name of the great Nepaulse Prince, nor of any of his Buddhist followers. It was longer, however, than Hippopotamus, at least twice as long, and Hippopotamus is twice the length of Potmus. VIVAT HIPPOPOTAMUS—Long live the Potmus.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ANNIE GRANT FALLS INTO DIFFICULTIES.

LEWIS had accompanied Frere to the Palæontological, and had added to the circle of his acquaintance those mysterious beings the "relations of the earlier Zoophytes." When the lecture was over, Frere, who had an order to admit two into the House of Commons, took Lewis with him to hear the speaking. The debate proved interesting; the premier addressed the house at length; a well-known satirist rose to reply to him, remarking on various points in the speech with much talent and more ill-nature, and the minister was again on his legs to answer his opponent, when Lewis, glancing at his watch, discovered to his annoyance that it was considerably past eleven; and aware that General Grant had a particular objection to his servants being kept up late, communicated this fact to his companion, and wished him good night.

"What! can't you stay and hear ——'s answer?" was the reply; "and then I'd come away too."

Lewis explained that the thing was impossible, and Frere continued,—

"Well, what must be must, I suppose, and, as my hearing ——'s reply is another inevitable necessity, I must e'en say Good night, so schlafen sie wohl."

Lewis grasped his proffered hand, and leaving the gallery, started on his homeward route. As he approached Charing-cross, his attention was attracted by the restlessness of a magnificent horse, which, in a well-appointed cab, was waiting at the door of one of the houses. As he slackened his pace for a moment to ascertain whether the efforts made by a diminutive cab-groom to restrain the plunging of the fiery animal would prove successful, the house door was flung open, and a gentleman, apparently in headlong haste, sprang down the steps so recklessly, that he missed his footing, and would have fallen, had not Lewis caught him by the arm in time to prevent it. As the person he had thus assisted turned to thank him, the reflection of the gas-light fell upon his face, and Lewis recognised Lord Bellefield, though his features were characterised by a strange expression which Lewis had never observed in them before. Drawing back, he bowed coldly, and was about to pass on, when Lord Bellefield exclaimed,—

"Stay one moment, Mr. Arundel; I have been forced to leave the Opera-house suddenly: the Countess Portici and Miss Grant are in my father's box, and I have promised to return to see them home, but am quite unable to do so;—you would oblige,—that is, I am sure General Grant would wish you—"

"Will your lordship favour me with the loan of your pass-ticket?" interrupted Lewis, shortly.

As Lord Bellefield complied with this request, Lewis remarked that his hand trembled to such a degree that he could scarcely grasp the ivory ticket.

"You will tell the Countess that it was impossible for me to come to them," continued his lordship, hurriedly; then, passing his hand across his eyes, as if he were half bewildered, he sprang into the cab, and, seizing the reins, drove off at a furious pace in the direction of Westminster Abbey.

Lewis gazed after him for a moment in surprise, then, turning on his heel, walked rapidly to the end of the Haymarket, hoping to reach the theatre before the Opera should be concluded. In this expectation he was however disappointed, for, when he gained the Opera Colonnade, he perceived, from the crush of carriages, and the bustle and confusion which was going on, that the opera was over. Hastily pushing through the crowd, he endeavoured to find the box Lord Bellefield had indicated, but to one as little acquainted as was Lewis with the intricacies of the Opera-house, this was no such easy matter; first, he ran up considerably too high, and in his eagerness to retrieve this error, he descended as much too low; and even when he had attained the proper level, he more than once took a wrong turning. At length he caught a box-keeper, who, on being shown Lord Bellefield's ticket, volunteered to conduct him to the box he was in search of. Lo, and behold, when they reached the spot, the door stood open, and the box was tenantless!

In order to explain how this awkward and embarrassing result had been brought about, we must beseech our reader's patience while we resume the broken thread of our narrative where we relinquished it at the end of the last chapter.

Scarcely had Lord Bellefield quitted the box five minutes, when the attendant opened the door, and Augustus Travers made his appearance. He was very humble and courteous, and all he said to Emily with his tongue, might have been printed in the Times the next morning without affording matter for the most arrant gossip to prate about; but the language spoken by his eloquent blue eyes was of a very different character. He told her vocally that he had been travelling in the East since they had last parted; that he had been unwell, had felt restless and unsettled; that he had found it impossible to remain contentedly in any place, he had become a citizen of the world, a wanderer over the face of the globe; he had only returned to town during the last week, and had no notion she had left Italy—dear Italy!—and here his eyes said—"that country which your presence made a paradise to me," just as plainly as if his tongue had spoken the words, in fact, they said it more plainly, for his tongue appeared to consider it fashionable to speak English with a slight lisp, which occasionally rendered his meaning indistinct; "but when he saw her"—continued his tongue—"he could not resist coming up to her box to see whether she had quite forgotten all her old friends;—and here his eyes resumed, that his faith in her was so strong, that nothing, neither absence nor aught else, could in the smallest degree shake it.

Then Emily replied, that she was always delighted to see any old friend, but that she really was quite shocked to find him looking so ill; which observation she uttered with particular tenderness, because, not being aware that he had played French Hazard till five o'clock on the previous morning, she accounted for his pale looks by the romantic hypothesis that he was dying for love of her. And so they continued to converse in an under-tone, apparently much to their mutual satisfaction, while Annie, having bowed coldly when she was introduced to the fascinating Augustus, of whose presence there she greatly disapproved, pretended altogether to ignore him, and turn her attention solely to the opera: and so time ran on, till, looking at her watch just as the baritone singer was approaching, with suicidal intentions, the (imitation) marble tomb supposed to contain the corpses of his tenor and soprano victims, but which really was tenanted by a live carpenter, who, in a paper cap and flannel jacket, was waiting till the fall of the curtain should enable him to carry away the entire mausoleum, Annie perceived that it was past eleven, and, glancing at Emily, reminded her in dumb show that Lord Bellefield might be momentarily expected. This intelligence Emily, in a low tone, communicated to her friend, who smiled, to show his white teeth, and replied, that "Bellefield and he had met at Baden and had become wonderful friends again;" despite which assurance Emily still urged his departure, and he still lingered on till the opera came to an end, and Lord Bellefield had not made his appearance. Being Saturday night, there was no ballet, and the house began to empty rapidly.

"What can possibly have become of your brother, Emily?" exclaimed Annie, who, disliking the whole situation most particularly, was fast lapsing into that uncomfortable state of mind familiarly termed "a fuss."

"If you will allow me, I shall be delighted to see you to your carriage," insinuated Gus.

"Thank you, but I am sure my brother will be here directly," returned Emily; "he would be extremely annoyed to find that we had gone without waiting for him. Pray do not let us detain you."

But of course Gus would not go; "he should be wretched unless he knew they were in safety; he saw they were anxious, he would ascertain whether Lord Bellefield had returned; there might perhaps be difficulty in getting up their carriage,"—and so he left the box, promising to return instantly.

"What are we to do, Emily, if Bellefield does not come?" exclaimed Annie, pressing her hands together much as the prima donna had done, when, some quarter of an hour since, she had ejaculated at the very tip-top of her lofty voice "Addesso Morir!"

"What are we to do, you silly child?" replied Emily laughing, "why, walk down stairs, to be sure, and allow Gus to take care of us till we can find the carriage. Is not he handsome? poor fellow!"

Before Annie could urge her dislike to this scheme, Travers returned, bringing with him a good-looking shy boy, embarrassed by a perpetual consciousness of his extreme youth and his first tail-coat.

"I can see nothing of Lord Bellefield," began Gus; "it is evident something must have occurred to prevent his return. Let me introduce my brother Alfred," he continued, addressing Emily, "he was a naughty little boy in pinafores when you saw him last—and now what will you do? every one is going or gone."

"Oh wait a minute longer; I'm sure he will come," urged Annie.

"Really we cannot," returned Emily; "we shall get shut up in the Opera-house all Sunday, if we don't take care."

"Which would be dreadfully wicked—a most terrific climax of depravity," simpered Gus. "Seriously," he continued, "you must accept my arm, though I am sorry the alternative should be so very disagreeable to you." These latter words he spoke in such a tone that Emily alone could hear them, for which he obtained a reproachful tender and upbraiding glance, with a view to which reward he had probably uttered them.

"Come, Annie, we positively must go," exclaimed her cousin impatiently.

"Alfred, why don't you offer Miss Grant your arm," chimed in Gus, drawing Emily's within his own; thus urged, poor Annie, sorely against her will, accepted Alfred's trembling arm, and quitted the box—Emily and Augustus Travers following. As they descended the stairs, a slight confusion occurred: an Irish gentleman had lost his hat, and wanted to return to look for it, a measure against which a stout old lady, to whom he was acting as escort, vehemently protested, while an obsequious boxkeeper was vainly endeavouring to understand the locality in which the embarrassed Irishman imagined he had left the missing article. While Annie and her juvenile protector were manoeuvring to get past this group, Augustus Travers paused, saying in a low tone to his companion—"Let them precede us; I must speak two words to you in private, and if I lose this opportunity, I may never have another. Emily, if you value my peace of mind, I entreat you do not refuse."

A large party, composed chiefly of young men, was descending at the moment, so that Emily's reply was inaudible, but when, having got in some degree clear of the confusion, Annie looked back for her Chaperone, Travers and the Countess were nowhere to be seen. Horrified at this discovery, Annie stopped abruptly, exclaiming, "Oh, we have missed Mr. Travers and my cousin! we had better turn back."

The boy glanced quickly round, and as he porceived the truth of her assertion, a meaning smile passed across his features. All traces of it had however vanished ere he replied—"They must have turned down the other staircase, but it will bring them out at the same place as this would have done, we shall meet them at the bottom;" then, as his companion still hesitated, he continued—"I can assure you it is so; we should only lose them if we were to return."

Half convinced by this argument, and completely frightened by the party of young men, who, talking and laughing, were rapidly following them, Annie suffered herself to be hurried on by her companion till she reached the foot of the staircase: here she paused and looked anxiously around for her cousin and Travers—they were nowhere to be seen. Annoyed, distressed, and frightened, she turned to her companion, exclaiming—"They are not here, you see; what are we to do?"

"Wait, I suppose," returned the boy, who seemed puzzled and vexed. "This is a nice trick of Master Gus's," he continued, in a half soliloquy. "He ought at least to have given me a hint what to do."

Before Annie could inquire what he imagined his brother's intentions might be, a fresh incident diverted, and, from its disagreeable nature, soon wholly engrossed her attention. The crush-room, as it is called, where she was now standing, was occupied almost entirely by men, who, broken up into parties of four or five, were pacing up and down, waiting for their friends to join them, or standing in groups, canvassing the various merits and demerits of the different performers. To one or two of these coteries Annie soon became an object of especial notice.

"Do you see that girl?" whispered a pert youth with light curls and a turned-down collar, "isn't she a regular stunner, eh?"

"Ya'as, dev'lish pwitty, ra-ally," drawled a moustachioed puppy, staring through an eye-glass at the object of his admiration. "Aw—I wonder who she possibly ca-an be. I actually don't know har."

"I suppose she's standing there to be looked at," returned the first speaker; "her juvenile gullant can't get her along at any price, it seems."

"Ra'ally, it were almost worth while to relieve him of his charge," drawled moustachios; "he seems particularly incompetent to fulfil it, not—aw—equal to the situation,—ha! ha!—"

"Why don't you volunteer, Spooner, if you think so," urged a third speaker.

"Na-o, I don't do that sort of thing—I'm—aw—quite a reformed character," was the reply; "but if you wa-ant a leader for such a forlorn hope—aw—here comes your man."

As he spoke, a tall, distinguished-looking individual, with much watch-chain and more whisker, who looked forty, but might be a year or two younger, lounged up to the group, and, showing his teeth, with a repulsive smile, inquired, "What are you young reprobates grinning about, eh?"

We were only saying it was a pity that young lady had not a more efficient protector, and advising Spooner to volunteer, Sir Gilbert," was the reply.

"Who are the parties?" inquired the last comer, screwing a glass into the corner of his eye. A moment's inspection served to elucidate the mystery; and, removing the glass, with a contemptuous smile he added—"The boy is little Alfred Travers, who has just left Eton; he's evidently waiting for his brother, who, I've a notion, has more strings than one to his bow to-night; as for the damsel, noscitur a sociis. We'll play Master Gus a trick for once in his life. Come with me, Forester; I may want you to bully the boy." Then turning on his heel he advanced towards Annie, and saluting her with a low bow, began,—

"This is a most unexpected pleasure! I had no idea you were here to-night: where have you hid-den yourself this age?" then, perceiving that, confused by this address, and uncertain whether he might not be some acquaintance whose features she had failed to recognise, the young lady was completely at a loss how to reply, he continued, "I see that you have been cruel enough to forget me; while I, on the contrary, have carried your lovely image in my heart, and time has failed to efface even the shadow of a charm. But let me be of use to you. Have you a carriage here, or will you allow me to place mine at your disposal? The house is becoming deserted—let me escort you. Stand aside, young gentleman," and, as he spoke, he advanced towards her, offering his arm.

But Annie, having recovered from her first surprise, felt convinced that the person addressing her was a total stranger, and, drawing back in alarm, she said to her companion in a hurried whisper,

"Indeed, I do not know that gentleman—there must be some mistake—pray let us get away."

Thus urged, the boy drew up his slight figure to its full height, and turning to the individual in question, said haughtily,

"You are mistaken, sir; I must trouble you to allow us to pass."

"It is you who mistake jest for earnest, young man," was the contemptuous reply; "the lady and I are old friends; she is merely trying to tease me by pretending to have forgotten me. This gentleman" (and he glanced at his companion) "will explain the matter to you." Then again offering his arm to Annie, he continued, "Really, if you persist in your silly joke we shall have the carriage drive off."

Confused by his pertinacity, Alfred Travers glanced at his trembling companion, and reading the truth in the terrified expression of her face, his boyish chivalry took fire, and anxious to vindicate his title to be considered a man, he exclaimed, angrily,

"Stand back, sir, and let us pass; do you mean to insult the lady?"

The person he addressed, Sir Gilbert Vivian, was a roué Baronet who, having been a man about town for the last sixteen years, and having long since lost all the good character he had ever possessed, and acquired a reputation of a diametrically opposite tendency, was scarcely a person to stick at trifles, laughed as he replied,

"Do you hear that, Forester? This good youth accuses you of insulting the young lady—hadn't you better give him a lesson in civility?"

As he spoke, he made a significant gesture, which the other responded to by exclaiming,

"Insult the lady! what do you mean, you young cub, eh?" and grasping him by the arm, he twisted him roughly round, thereby separating him from Annie.

"Take that, and find out," was the thoroughly school-boy answer, as, bounding forward, the ex-Etonian administered to his antagonist a ringing box on the ear.

This, save that the blow was more skilfully applied, and rather harder than he had calculated upon, was just the result Forester had anticipated. Seizing the struggling boy by the collar, he declared he would give him in custody for an assault, and, despite his resistance, dragged him from the spot in a pretended search after a policeman. Availing himself of the confusion, the Baronet placed himself by Annie's side, and bending over her, said,

"It's no use waiting for the fascinating Augustus, I can assure you; he has other game in view to-night, and can't come; so for once you must allow me the honour of acting as his deputy,—'pon my word, you must," and as he spoke he attempted to take her arm and draw it within his own.

Poor Annie! distressed, confused, and frightened, the desertion, or rather capture, of the boy, her only protector, had increased her alarm twenty-fold, and now the renewed persecution of the Baronet brought her fears to a climax, and attempting to withdraw her hand from his grasp in a very agony of terror, she exclaimed,—

"Oh! where is Emily? will nobody help me?" and burst into a flood of tears.

At this moment a tall figure interposed between them, and the Baronet's wrist was seized with such a vice-like grasp that he uttered an exclamation of mingled rage and pain, and dropped the little hand of which he had unjustly possessed himself, as though it had been a red-hot cinder, while Annie, uttering a cry of delight, sprang forward, and clasping the arm of the new comer, clung to it as some drowning wretch clings to the plank which shields him from the rushing waters that threaten his destruction.

Lewis, for he it was, (as every reader above the unsuspecting age of four-and-a-half has of course ere this discovered for himself,) understanding at a glance the outlines of the situation, and intuitively divining much of what Annie must have gone through, pitied and sympathized with her so deeply, that the anger he would otherwise have felt against the man who had insulted her was completely conquered by the stronger feeling which absorbed him, and his only thought was how best to soothe and tranquillize the frightened girl who clung to him.

"Do not tremble so," he said kindly, "you have nothing more to fear. I will not leave you for a moment till you are again at home, and in safety. Lean on my arm, you tremble so that you can scarcely walk"—and half leading, half supporting her, he drew her away from the scene of her disasters, and passing through the crowd of loiterers whom the scuffle between Forester and Alfred Travers had attracted to the spot, he conducted her towards the nearest exit.

So quietly and suddenly had all this taken place, that ere Sir Gilbert Vivian had left off rubbing his wrist, or thoroughly realized the sudden frustration of his scheme, the object of his insolent attentions was almost out of sight. Irritated at his failure, and urged on by the scarcely suppressed laughter of those who had witnessed his defeat, he muttered an oath, and turning on his heel, followed hastily in the track of Annie and her deliverer. Coming up with them just as they reached the entrance leading into the colonnade, he tapped Lewis smartly on the shoulder, saying angrily,

"A word with you, sir, if you please; I wish to ask what you mean by your impertinent interference. Who the d—l are you, I should like to know?"

A flush of anger passed across Lewis's brow, and he was about to make a reply which would scarcely have tended to bring the matter to an amicable conclusion, when an almost convulsive pressure of the arm on which Annie hung, recalled his self-control, and drawing himself up with a stern dignity which bespoke an apt pupil in the school of General Grant, he fixed his piercing eyes upon the Baronet as he answered. "You have already, sir, acting probably under some mistake," (and he laid a strong emphasis upon the last word) "subjected this lady to an amount of fright and annoyance which should secure the forbearance of any one moving in the society of gentlemen. Should you wish to call and apologise to her father, for your share in this unlucky adventure, I shall be happy to explain to him or to you the part I have taken in the affair. There is my address,"—and without waiting farther parley, Lewis handed him his card, and drawing Annie gently forward, passed on. As they reached the entrance, a gentleman, coming hastily the other way, nearly ran against them. Looking up, Annie perceived it to be Augustus Travers, who, recognising her, exclaimed—"I have left the Countess Portici in the carriage and was returning to seek for you, Miss Grant. She is much alarmed at having missed you." The only reply Annie made to this speech was by a slight inclination of the head, and pressing hastily forward, she passed on. As Lewis assisted her into the carriage, she, for the first time, spoke. "You will come with us," she said, eagerly; "remember you have promised not to leave me." Then catching sight of Augustus Travers, who had followed them, a new idea struck her, and she continued, "Tell that gentleman I am afraid his brother has become involved in some difficulty on my account; he had better go back and look for him." Lewis did as she wished him, and then sprang into the carriage, which instantly drove off, leaving the discomfited dandy to accomplish his mission as best he might.

CHAPTER XL.

A TÊTE À TÊTE, AND A TRAGEDY.

A PARTY more silent than the trio occupying General Grant's carriage, never drove from the door of her Majesty's theatre. Annie, delighted to find herself once again in safety, leant back amidst cloaks and cushions, to recover as best she might the effects of the terror she had undergone;—somewhat to her surprise and displeasure, Emily, without uttering a word by way either of explanation or condolence, also threw herself back among the cushions, and arranging a fold of her mantle so as to conceal her face, appeared unconscious of the presence of her companions. To this silent system they scrupulously adhered till they reached Conduit Street, when Emily exclaimed in a quick eager tone of voice, "Where are they going? tell him to drive to Berkeley Square directly."

Lewis, to whom this speech was addressed, let down the window and gave the coachman the requisite order, and in less than five minutes the carriage stopped at the house occupied for the season by the Countess Portici. The servant let down the steps, and Lewis springing out, assisted the countess to alight; as she did so, she turned her head, and saying hurriedly, "Tell Miss Grant I shall see her to-morrow," entered the house and the door closed after her. Lewis delivered his message as the carriage drove away.

"I think she is very unkind not to have said she was sorry for having missed me, and I'll never go out with her again," was Annie's petulant reply. "And Lord Bellefield, too," she continued, vehemently,—for she had by this time reached that stage of recovery, when, tracing back her alarm to its first causes, it became a relief to her to pour forth her wrongs, and in Lewis she felt sure of a prudent and sympathizing auditor—"it is all his fault, for deserting us in such a shameful way."

"You are not perhaps aware that, meeting me accidentally, his lordship despatched me to you as his substitute," returned Lewis.

"Did he intend then to have come back himself, if you had been unable to act as his deputy," inquired Annie quickly.

"He told me it was impossible for him to do so," was Lewis's reply.

"Then if he had not happened to meet you by mere chance, he would have left us to find our way to the carriage as best we could. How shameful! just imagine what would have become of me, if you had not arrived when you did? I believe I should have died of fright." She paused, then added, in her usual gentle winning voice—"I must again plague you with my thanks, Mr. Arundel; you are fated always to render me services for which I am unable to make you any return; except by my sincere friendship," she continued timidly.

"And that is a reward for which a man might——"

began Lewis, 'passionately. He was going to add "gladly die," but he checked himself abruptly, and if Annie could at that moment have seen his face, she would have been scared at the expression of despair by which it was characterised, changing instantly to a look of the sternest resolution, as he continued in a calm grave voice, "I mean, that your uniform kindness and consideration have overpaid any trifling service I may have been fortunate enough to render you."

"Did Lord Bellefield give any reason for being unable to return to us?" inquired Annie after a pause. Lewis replied in the negative, and Annie resumed, "Papa will be waiting for us—he never goes to bed till I come home. You must tell him all you know of what has occurred, Mr. Arundel; and pray make him understand clearly how much Lord Bellefield is to blame in the matter."

"Of course, if general Grant asks me, I must say exactly what I have done and why I did it," returned Lewis, gravely, "but—may I indeed use the privilege of a friend, and venture for once to advise you?"

"Oh yes, pray do," rejoined Annie, eagerly, "I shall be so much obliged to you. I dare say I am going to do something very foolish."

"From my acquaintance with your father's high and chivalrous character," continued Lewis, "I feel sure that the facts with which I must make him acquainted will incense him greatly against Lord Bellefield, and as the General is, from temperament and education, a man of action, his resentment is almost certain to lead to some practical results. Now just at present you are naturally and justly angry with your cousin; but young ladies' anger is seldom of a very vindictive description, yours least of all so, and when after frowning him into penitence, you have graciously forgiven him, will not a serious rupture with the General be a source of annoyance (to use no stronger word) both to you and to Lord Bellefield? All that I would recommend," continued Lewis, seeing that Annie bent down her head and made no reply, "would be, not what the lawyers term suppressio veri—I would not for the world have you conceal anything; but much depends upon the spirit in which a tale is told, and I am anxious to save you from the subsequent regret which yielding to a momentary impulse of anger may cost you."

"Tell me plainly what it is you think my father would do?" inquired Annie, abruptly.

"I think—pardon me if speak too freely—I think the General would resolve to break off the engagement which Mr. Leicester long since informed me existed between yourself and Lord Bellefield; and it was to save you the pain such a resolve might cost you, that I ventured to offer you my advice."

"You are mistaken," replied his companion, hurriedly, "such an arrangement as you refer to, may have been, perhaps still is contemplated; but the idea was always distasteful to me, and anything which would preclude the possibility of farther reference to it, would be to me a subject of rejoicing rather than of regret. You may think it strange in me to speak thus openly to you; but I am sure my confidence is not misplaced, and—and I am most anxious my father should understand clearly the insult (for I consider it no less) my cousin has to-night offered me."

Whether the information thus communicated was a source of pain or pleasure to her auditor, we must leave the reader to conjecture for himself, as when Lewis next spoke, his manner was calm and grave as ever.

"There is one possibility," he said, "of which you must not entirely lose sight: there may have been some urgent necessity for Lord Bellefield's presence elsewhere,—some sufficient reason for his apparent neglect, which he will only have to mention, in order alike to disarm your indignation and that of General Grant."

"Really, my cousin appears to have secured a most able advocate," returned Annie, with the slightest possible shade of annoyance perceivable in her tone. "I was scarcely prepared to find you so zealous in his cause."

Lewis's face grew dark as he replied in a low deep voice—"While I live, Lord Bellefield shall always meet with the strictest justice at my hands! Justice!" he continued, bitterly, "it is a god-like principle, and sculptors have symbolized it well—the blinded brow, to show the stern singleness of heart; the scales, to weigh the merits of the case; and the keen sword, the agent of a sudden and complete retribution."

He spoke in a tone of such deep and concentrated feeling, that Annie, as she listened to his words, trembled involuntarily. With the keenness of a woman's instinct she appreciated the intensity of the feeling and the power of the will that was, for the time, able to control it. For the time!—in that phrase lay the secret of her prescient terror.

Lewis was too much engrossed by the strength of his own emotions to perceive the alarm he had excited; nor was it till they reached the corner of Park Crescent, that he again spoke:—

"How did you contrive to become separated from the Countess Portici?" he inquired. "You were absolutely alone amongst those people,—were you not?—when I came up?"

Scarcely had Annie informed him of the circumstances which led to her desertion, when the carriage stopped.

"The General wishes to see you before you retire for the night, Miss Grant," insinuated the aristocratic butler, as, leaning on Lewis's arm, Annie entered the paternal mansion.

"Where is my father?" she inquired hastily—"in the library?"

Receiving an affirmative answer, she continued, turning to Lewis: "You must come with me; remember your promise!—I by no means consider myself safe till this interview is over."

Lewis smiled assent, his unnatural stiffness of manner seemed to have disappeared like magic the moment their tête-à-tête was over, and Annie was again restored to the protection of her own home.

The General appeared in high good humour:—"You are late, you dissipated puss!" he said, as Annie entered. "Ah! Mr. Arundel," he continued; "I did not know you had been of the party. What have you done with Emily and Bellefield, Annie?"

"Emily is safely at home," was the reply; "she would not come farther than Berkeley-square; as to my cousin Bellefield, he must answer for himself, if he is not irrecoverably lost; he chose to leave us to take care of ourselves;—we have had an adventure, and I should have died of fright, if Mr. Arundel had not come to my assistance like one of the good geni in the Arabian Nights Entertainments.—But I must go to bed, or aunt Martha will be implacable; she always examines Lisette on oath as to the precise moment at which she finally leaves my room. Mr. Arundel will tell you the whole history much better than I can,—so good night!" and, casting a glance, half arch, half imploring, but wholly irresistible, at Lewis, she glided out of the apartment, and was gone ere the General had sufficiently "come at" the meaning of her speech to attempt to detain her.

Fixing his eyes on Lewis, with a look of sublime perplexity, which bordered closely on the ludicrous, he exclaimed, "Pray what is the meaning of all this, Mr. Arundel!—Can you explain to what my daughter alluded?"

Thus called upon, Lewis was forced to narrate the adventures of the evening, with the details of which the reader has been already made acquainted.

The General heard him attentively, though his brow grew dark as he proceeded; he listened in silence, however, till Lewis began to describe the scene in the crush room at the Opera-house, when he became so much excited that he sprang from his seat and began pacing the apartment with impatient strides. At the mention of Sir Gilbert Vivian's impertinent behaviour, he exclaimed—

"A scoundrel!—I remember when he was broke upon parade for insolence to his commanding officer:—I hope you knocked him down, Sir!"

"I felt strangely tempted to do so," replied Lewis, "but he had several of his friends with him, so that I should have been certain to get into a disagreeable squabble; and in that case what would have become of Miss Grant?"

"Very true, sir; very true," returned the General hastily; "next to courage, coolness in action is the greatest attribute in a soldier,—that is to say, in a gentleman—and I honour your forbearance for such a cause. Shake hands, sir!" and, suiting the action to the word, General Grant crossed the room, and, seizing Lewis by the hand, shook it warmly.

At this unusual display of feeling, Lewis's pale cheek flushed, and he continued his narration to the point when he handed Sir Gilbert Vivian his card. Here he paused, and continued in an embarrassed tone of voice: "I dare say he will take no notice of this,—but if he should—of course I am aware that the affair must be left entirely in your hands, and that it is Lord Bellefield's privilege to—to defend—that is, to chastise any insult offered to Miss Grant: but, as you have so kindly signified your approval of my conduct in the affair hitherto,—if you could reward me by allowing me to go out with this scoundrel——?”

This was a request so thoroughly after the General's own heart, that, as he listened to it, his little bright eyes danced and sparkled with satisfaction, which he had much difficulty not to express in words; but his moral obligations, as a disciplinarian and the father of a family, came across him, and he replied, “Duelling is a practice alike subversive of military discipline, and contrary to the dictates of religion; it is one, therefore, against which I have always—that is, for many years past—felt obliged to set my face. Until Lord Bellefield has afforded me some perfectly satisfactory explanation of his extraordinary conduct, his intercourse with this household must entirely cease; a man who could thus neglect his trust is the last person to whom I should dream of committing the honour of—ahem!—my family. As to this Sir Gilbert Vivian, from what I have heard of him, he is beneath the notice of a gentleman—quite a contemptible character; the fact of his annoying my daughter proves this. If it were not so, I vow to Heaven I'd fight the man myself on Monday morning.” And, finishing with this consistent remark his tirade against duelling, the General resumed his peripatetic exercise, much to the detriment of the library carpet.

When Lewis had completed his recital, his auditor again “took the chair,” and, leaning his head on his hand, remained pondering the matter for some minutes in silence; at length he said, “Did Lord Bellefield give you any possible clue to the reason why he could not return to the Opera-house?”

“He said nothing, sir, to throw any light upon the matter, but when I accidentally met him, as I have already mentioned, he appeared much agitated, his features were unusually pale, and characterised by an expression—I should almost say of horror.”

“Have you any knowledge of the house he was leaving? Why do you hesitate?”

“I will tell you frankly, General Grant,” returned Lewis, drawing himself up, and meeting the General's scrutinizing glance with a clear steadfast gaze. “For some time past, Lord Bellefield and I have not been on good terms together—since I have lived beneath your roof he is the only person who has treated me ungenerously, or caused me to feel the full bitterness of my dependent situation. Respect for you, and a sense of my own position, have prevented my resenting his lordship's conduct as under other circumstances I might have done, but enough has passed between us to prove that we regard each other with no very friendly feeling.”

“I was not at all aware of this—you should have told me this sooner, Mr. Arundel. I allow no one to be treated discourteously in my house,” interrupted the General, hastily.

“I should not have mentioned the fact now, sir,” replied Lewis, calmly, “had I not been anxious to explain to you why it is in the highest degree repugnant to me to be forced by circumstances to appear as Lord Bellefield's accuser, and thus lay myself open to the suspicion of being actuated by malicious motives.”

“No one who knew you would imagine that, sir,” returned the General; “but the truth should always be spoken, regardless of consequences, and you must yourself perceive how important it is that I should form a just estimate of Lord Bellefield's conduct in this affair.”

Lewis paused a moment in reflection, and then replied, “The part I have taken in this business was none of my own seeking, nor do I see that I am bound by any obligation of honour to withhold from you the only other fact of which I am aware in regard to the matter. I do happen to know the character of the house from which Lord Bellefield was coming out, for as I walked down to the Palæontological Society this afternoon with my friend, Richard Frere, he pointed it out to me as a gaming-house of some notoriety.”

The expression of the General's face, when he became aware of this unfortunate little fact, grew so stern, that an artist, wishing to paint some Roman father sacrificing his son, would have given all the small change he might have about him, for one glimpse of that inflexible countenance. Suggestive, however, of evil as was this circumstance, the whole affair appeared wrapped in such a veil of mystery that neither General Grant nor Lewis could, as they that night lay awake revolving the matter in their anxious minds, arrive at any satisfactory hypothesis by which to account for Lord Bellefield's extraordinary behaviour. The following paragraph, which appeared in several of the Sunday papers, and was reprinted in the Morning Post of Monday, was the first thing that tended to enlighten them—it was headed “APPALLING SUICIDE.

“As our columns were going to press, we received intelligence of one of the most awful catastrophes which has ever been our melancholy duty to record; we refer to the untimely decease of Captain Mellerton,—of the —th foot, who perished by his own hand, in a notorious gambling-house, not far from Charing Cross. As far as we have been able to ascertain the facts of the case, the unfortunate young gentleman, who was adjutant of the —th, lost a considerable sum of money (it is said 12,000*l.*) to Lord B—f—d, a nobleman of sporting notoriety, at the first Newmarket meeting. Being unable to meet so large a call upon his finances, he was induced in an evil hour to speculate with some of the regimental money committed to his charge, intending to replace it by the sale of an estate in Yorkshire; and having thus satisfied the demands of his noble creditor, he was on Saturday last unexpectedly called upon to send in his regimental accounts. In this extremity we have heard it rumoured that he was induced to apply to Lord B—f—d, as the only person on whom he had the slightest claim; but, if we have not been misinformed, the appeal was vain, and, urged to desperation by this failure of his last hope, the unfortunate young man repaired to the gaming-house in which the rash act was committed, played deeply, and when fortune again declared against him, drew a loaded pistol from his breast, and before the bystanders were aware of his design, terminated his existence by blowing out his brains. Captain Mellerton was the eldest son of the Honourable H. Mellerton, of Harrowby Park, Beds., and was shortly to be married to Miss A— D—, daughter of Sir C— D—, the wedding day being fixed immediately after the commencement of the recess."

NOTICES OF BABYLON, NINEVEH, AND PERSEPOLIS.¹

THE discoveries of Dr. Layard on the banks of the Tigris, and the knowledge that he is still labouring successfully in the same field, have awakened, and still maintain, a feeling of the most lively curiosity. Until thus recently stimulated, however, there existed but faint and vague ideas in the public mind respecting the great capitals of the Asiatic empires. The descriptions of travellers, "few and far between," were almost unknown to the mass of readers, published as they were in costly and inaccessible folios, and the names of Babylon, Nineveh, and Persepolis awakened but dim and undefined associations in connexion with sacred or profane history. But with the acquisition of a collection of sculptures, tangible evidences of the importance and interest of this new field of research, has naturally arisen an earnest wish for further information. The light that has burst suddenly forth from unburied Nineveh, gleams over the whole field of Asiatic antiquities, and is reflected back from the monuments of Egypt; new relations and connexions are constantly unfolded, and thus a succinct and compendious account of the ruins, as well as of recent speculations and researches concerning them, scattered through many voluminous productions, has become a great desideratum with the inquiring part of the public; a desideratum, we are happy to say, admirably provided in the work before us. It is of course a compilation, but prepared by one who, himself an accomplished scholar, has devoted the leisure of years to the study of a favourite subject, patiently explored every source of information, and has, moreover, enjoyed the advantage of personal intercourse and correspondence with the principal travellers and scholars who have taken it up. Thus furnished for the task, Mr. Vaux has laboriously compressed for our instruction into one small octavo, all the essential facts in the history of the empires of Assyria and Persia, and, beginning with the earliest pilgrims to the sites of their ruined greatness, has also followed down the stream of travel and research, terminating with a copious account of the recent discoveries of Dr. Layard, and of the inquiries of Major Rawlinson into the arrow-headed inscriptions. The work is in truth most elaborately and conscientiously executed, and rendered more interesting and intelligible to the public by the addition of a series of excellent engravings. Having thus characterised this well-timed and really valuable production, we shall not vainly endeavour, in the scope of a brief article, to travel over the immense field of its subject, but, enjoying the permission of the publishers of the work to make free use of its illustrations and contents, shall present to our readers a few selections explanatory of Babylon, Nineveh, and Persepolis, which may serve to convey to them a somewhat clearer and more distinct idea of the principal ruins of those great cities, than they have probably been able as yet to attain.

"At the earliest periods to which our records ascend," says Mr. Vaux, "we find Babel or Babylon mentioned as a city already existing, the beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod, though apparently not owing its foundation to him. It was, probably, the earliest town in which there was a large and settled people, and from it the first rudiments of civilization spread over the surrounding nations. Much of its early splendour is no doubt attributable to its remarkable geographical advantages: in a position nearly central, the chief city of a land watered by two of the finest rivers in the world, Babylon must have been very early in history the foremost state of Western Asia, and the natural centre for receiving and transmitting onward the international commerce of Asia. Between the Indus on the east, and the Mediterranean on the west, it was the central mart for such eastern luxuries as found a ready market in the west; at no great distance from the Persian Gulf, and in its great river possessing all that was necessary for inland traffic, it would be the natural place at which the seafaring nations of India were admitted to the heart of Asia, and afforded the readiest means of communication with those who dwell on the Euxine or Caspian shores. Thus favoured by nature, it was long the central point where the merchants of nearly all the nations of the civilized world assembled, and such through all its changes it continued till the operation of external causes changed the course which Asiatic commerce had hitherto pursued. Neither the sword of the conqueror, nor the untiring hand of oriental despotism could ruin, though for a time they might diminish, its prosperity; and it was only when the enterprise of Europe found a path across the ocean to India, and the commerce of the world became a sea trade instead of a land trade, that the royal city on the banks of the Euphrates finally decayed.

"But not alone her position, unrivalled as it seems to have been for carrying on a commerce with the whole world, was Babylon indebted for her greatness. Her people seem to have known full well how they could best assist the beneficent intentions of nature. The very soil they dwelt on, and the river which fertilized their lands, had their respective disadvantages, and the peculiar geological formation of their country, which was one vast alluvial basin of dried mud, like the generality of steppe regions, afforded them no stone wherewith they could exercise their architectural genius. The vast waters of the Euphrates roll on to the sea in a slow and sluggish tide, between banks so low that the least increase from the melting snows of Armenia would, but for artificial embankments, be ever causing an overflow. Emulating their kindred tribes in Egypt, the Babylonians had to wrest their lands from the invasion of the flood and the dominion of the waters; and an impulse was thus directly given to the progress of civilization and of arts which made them no less celebrated than their Egyptian brethren. Hence a variety of canals and lakes, some of extraordinary size, which were used to draw off the superfluous waters of the great river, and those remarkable constructions of baked and unbaked bricks which, from the earliest historian to the latest traveller, have been the wonder and admiration of the world.

"Yet, full of interest as would have been the Babylonian history during the earlier stages of its existence, it is not a little remarkable how entirely after its first appearance Babylon vanishes from the page of history. The Jewish annalists had, as we have already mentioned, no inducement to mention her; the Babylonian chronicles have long since been wholly lost; and the accounts of Herodotus and Ctesias, though, on the whole, doubtless true, hardly admit of accurate chronological arrangement. Their historical myths rest almost exclusively on the names of Semiramis, Ninus, and Belus, suggesting indeed a strong probability that great conquerors had arisen in this part of Asia before the origin of the Babylonian-Chaldean Empire, and had founded two separate kingdoms whose deeds have been preserved under the one name of the Assyrian Empire, yet omitting many important facts which the student of history would gladly have preserved from oblivion.

"With this slight sketch of the early history of Babylon it will be perhaps well to take next in order that of its great rival, and long superior in military power, NINEVEH.

"It is indeed by no means easy to keep the story of the two towns separate and distinct, as there was a great resemblance between them, not only in their structure but in their extent and population.

"The Greeks and Romans give no account of Nineveh which can be considered satisfactory, and so great a variety exists between the different reports which have been handed down to us, that it is not easy to deduce from them any one consistent account. The entire overthrow of the city preceded the first of the Greek historians by more than a century, and from the time of its destruction it appears never to have been, like its sister city, rebuilt.

"Unlike Babylon, though well placed for land-commerce, its position, at above four hundred miles from the Persian Gulf, did not render its continuance so necessary to the purposes of the world; while, at the same time, it could never have been the centre of that trade which made Babylon so great, and its power so enduring. Yet, though inferior to Babylon in length of duration, as perhaps in early greatness, it is remarkable that, during the great blank of Babylonian history to which we have alluded, Nineveh was supposed, by all the classical writers at least, to have been the chief and ruling city, and a long succession of kings has been given to her. Their ignorance, however, of the geography of the country is curious, inasmuch as no two authors agree as to the exact position of this once illustrious city.

"The ancients seem to have had a more just idea of its magnitude than of its position. Thus Strabo considers it to have been much larger than Babylon. Diodorus speaks of the immense structure of its walls, and states that Semiramis erected a tomb in its centre for Ninus and herself; and Eustathius, in Dionys. Perieg., confirms this view; there is also a distich in the Anthologia, attributed to Antipater, which seems to confirm this view. Jonah calls it a city of 'three days' journey,' but whether this means in circumference or diameter is uncertain; the idea of its magnitude is further confirmed by Nahum in his description of its overthrow."

"It has been argued repeatedly that the description of the size of Babylon, given by Herodotus and other ancient writers, must be greatly exaggerated, and that no city could ever have existed similar to that which they describe. Now it must be borne in mind (as Heeren has remarked), that the great cities of Asia were constituted in a manner wholly different from those of Europe. They generally grew up from the camps of Nomad chieftains, who fixed their abode in the countries they conquered, and gradually exchanged their warlike camps for peaceful abodes. The encampment of a chieftain near an existing city soon became itself a new city, which eclipsed the splendour of the old one. The plan of the camp was regularly followed out, and its square form and regular intersection of streets was generally preserved. The close streets of our continental towns afford a striking contrast to the scattered mansions of many eastern capitals surrounded by extensive gardens, which occupy more than half the whole area. Quintus Curtius says of Babylon, 'that the buildings of the city do not reach the walls, but are at the distance of an acre from them, neither is the whole city covered with houses, but only ninety stadia; nor do the houses stand in rows by themselves, but the intervals that separate them are sown and cultivated, that they may furnish subsistence in a case of siege,' and Marco Polo describes a city within the confines of China which he calls Taidu, and which was built by Kublai Khan the successor of Genghiz Khan, in a manner somewhat similar. This city was twenty-four miles in circumference, no one side being longer than the other, but each six miles. The streets were all built in exact lines, so that a person standing at one gate of the wall could see the opposite. The sections of the building were also square, and in every part were large palaces surrounded by spacious courts and gardens. The ancient city of Moscow in like manner contained within its walls a large extent of garden ground, and Mr. Franklin has noticed that the Puranas assign to the celebrated Indian city of Palibothra an extent of not less than seventy-five or eighty miles."

"It may be interesting to mention in what way the different accounts which remain to us speak of the taking of Babylon. That in Scripture is the shortest: we are simply told that Belshazzar, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, was engaged in giving a feast to a thousand of his lords, when he was alarmed by observing a hand writing on the plaster wall of his palace, in characters which he could not decipher. His wise men were called in, but equally failed; and at length Daniel, having been sent for at the suggestion of the queen, interpreted the meaning of the unknown writing, and prophesied the immediate destruction and division of the empire by the Medes and Persians. The narrative adds, that 'In that night was Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain, and Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old.' Herodotus (I. 177), in his account of the proceedings of Cyrus, gives some additional details. He states that Cyrus, after the conquest of Upper Asia and Asia Minor, turned his arms against the Assyrians, and invested Babylon, the residence of the kings of that country subsequent to the destruction of Nineveh. He describes at length the size and peculiar structure of that city, and the great works to which we have alluded, which he attributed to Semiramis and Nitocris, at an interval of five generations from one to the other, and adds, that it was against the son of the latter, whom he calls Labynitus, that Cyrus was now marching. He mentions his arrival, with his army, on the banks of the River Gyndes, and the drowning of one of the sacred white horses, which induced him to delay his advance during the whole summer, till, by drawing off the waters, he could make the stream fordable even for women. Having crossed the Gyndes, he tells us that Cyrus advanced upon Babylon at the commencement of the following spring, and engaging the Babylonians near their city, beat them and drove them within their walls. Having in vain attempted to take the city by a regular siege, he changed his operations into a blockade, placed one division of his army at each end of the town, where the Euphrates enters and where it flows out of it; and, leaving orders with his best troops that they should force their way into the city as soon as the river should become sufficiently shallow, he employed the remainder, and least effective part of his force, in draining the river, by means of a canal which led into the great lake above the town. By this means, the Persians entered and took the city, the inhabitants being the more careless of their defences, as the day on which they entered happened to be one of their festivals."

"We come now to the consideration of what may be called the present state of Babylon, and to a more particular examination of the remains, which still exist on the banks of the Euphrates below Baghdad, and which traditionally have been held to represent the once mighty 'Queen of the Nations.' As might have been expected, few sites have been so much visited by travellers, or so often described. Yet few excavations have been made there as yet; and the best accounts we have are but of the superficial view of the mounds, with a description of gems, cylinders, bricks, and fragments of inscriptions which have been picked up on the spot, or gathered from the Arab peasantry of the surrounding villages. It is hardly too much to hope, that, ere long, a brighter light may be thrown upon the obscurity which now veils these ancient ruins, and that extensive researches may be conducted on the same principle which has been pursued so successfully by M. Botta and Mr. Layard. The mounds, which occupy different parts of the great plain, admit of excavation no less than those of Nimrud; and we can hardly doubt that the results of similar excavations, even if not so interesting as those obtained by Mr. Layard, will set before us the records of the days of Babylonian greatness, hardly less curious and valuable.

"The traveller who in modern days has devoted most time and patience to the illustration of Babylon and its ruins, and to whom we are indebted for the best exertions, and the most connected narrative of them, is Mr. Rich, who, during many years which he passed at Baghdad, as British resident, had great facilities and opportunities for the task he undertook. A very complete account of his labours was published about ten years ago by his widow. It contains an account of his journey to Babylon; two memoirs which he wrote on the ruins, the first of which was published at Vienna in the Fundgruben des Orients, in the year 1811; and a paper on the topography of Babylon, by Major Rennell, originally read before the Society of Antiquaries, and printed in the Archæologia."

After narrating the earliest visits to Babylon, Mr. Vaux proceeds to the account of Rich. The ruins of the city are scattered for miles over an immense plain, through which flows the river Euphrates, and they chiefly consist of enormous mounds of vitrified brick, of which the principal is the celebrated Birs Nimrud.

"On the ninth of December, Mr. Rich made an expedition to the Birs Nimrud. He found vestiges of mounds all round it to a considerable extent, and the country traversed by canals in every direction. The soil round it is sandy. Close to the Birs, or at about a hundred yards from it, and parallel with its southern front, is a high mound, almost equal in size to that of the Kasr. 'The Birs,' says he, 'is an enormous mound. At the north end it rises, and there is an immense brick wall, thirty-seven feet high, and twenty-eight in breadth, upon it. This wall is not in the centre of the north summit of the mound, but appears to have formed the southern face of it. The other parts of the summit are covered by huge fragments of brickwork, tumbled confusedly together; and what is most extraordinary is, that they are partly converted into a solid vitrified mass. The layers are in many parts perfectly distinguishable; but the whole of these lumps seem to have undergone the action of fire. Several lumps of the same matter have rolled down, and remain partly on the side of the mound, and partly in the plain. The large wall on the southern face of the summit is built of burnt bricks, with writing on them, and so close together, that no cement is discoverable between the layers. Small square apertures are left, which go quite through the building, and are arranged in a kind of quincunx form. Down the face of the wall the bricks have been separated, leaving a large crack. On the side towards the mound of Ibrahim Khalil, the mound slopes gradually down, and up nearly half its height is a flat road running round this part of it, twenty of my paces broad. From this, the mound slopes more gradually to the plain or valley between it and the mound of Ibrahim Khalil, and is worn into deep ravines or furrows, like the Mujelibé. On the other, or north face of this pile, it slopes down more abruptly at once into the plain, with only hollows or paths round it; the road before mentioned, which from that part appears to surround the building, losing itself before it reaches this. On the north-west face, where it also slopes down into the plain, are vestiges of building in the side, exactly similar in appearance and construction to the wall on the top, with the holes or apertures which are mentioned in the description of that. At the foot of all is, seemingly, a flat base of greater extent, but very little raised above the level of the plain. The whole sides of the mound are covered with pieces of brick, both burnt and unburnt, bitumen, pebbles, spar, black stone; the same sand, or limestone, which covers the canal at the Kasr, and even fragments of white marble. No reeds were to be seen in any part of the building, though I saw one or two specimens of burnt bricks which evidently had reeds in their composition, and some had the impression of reeds on their cement. I saw also several bricks which were thickly coated with bitumen on their lower face. In the lowest part of the mound, opposite Ibrahim Khalil, the mounds are most evidently composed of unburnt bricks, the layers being in great measure visible. This would lead one to suppose that it was not originally part of the great pile, were not specimens of this kind of bricks found in it also.' 'The circumference of the base—not the low one—is 762 yards. The whole height of it from this measured base to the summit of the tower or wall is 235 feet; but there can be no doubt that it was much higher. The form is more oblong than square. I found the longest side to be 248 of my paces.'"

"Sir R. K. Porter paid two visits to the Birs Nimrud, and, the second time he was there, encountered some objects which he had not expected. 'On this my second visit to Birs Nimrud,' says he, 'while passing rapidly over the last tracks of the ruin-spread ground, at some little distance from the outer bank of its quadrangular boundary, my party suddenly halted; having descried several dark objects moving along the summit of the hill, which they construed into dismounted Arabs on the look out, while their armed brethren must be lying concealed under the southern brow of the mound. Thinking this very probable, I took out my glass to examine, and soon distinguished that the causes of our alarm were two or three majestic lions, taking air upon the heights of the pyramid. Perhaps I never had beheld so sublime a picture to the mind, as well as to the eye. These were a species of enemy which my party were accustomed to dread without any panic fear; and while we continued to advance, though slowly, the hallooing of the people made the noble beasts gradually change their position, till in the course of twenty minutes they totally disappeared.' 'Wild beasts of the desert,' says Isaiah, speaking of the utter fall of Babylon, and the abandonment of the place, 'shall lie there; and the houses shall be full of doleful creatures; owls shall dwell there; and dragons shall cry in the pleasant places.'"

In a previous review of Dr. Layard's work, we gave so full an account of his discoveries at Nineveh, that we shall here content ourselves with presenting a few of the more remarkable sculptures disinterred from the mounds, illustrative of the manners and customs of the ancient Assyrians.

Our first selection is the representation of a lion hunt, justly considered by Mr. Layard, from the knowledge of art displayed in the treatment and composition, the correct and effective delineation of men and animals, the spirit of the grouping, and its extraordinary preservation, as probably the finest specimen of Assyrian art in existence. Nor perhaps less interesting is the following.

"One of the most remarkable slabs is one which terminates a victorious procession; it represents the castle and the pavilion of the conqueror. The ground plan of the former is represented by a circle divided into four equal compartments, and surrounded by towers and battlements. In each compartment there are figures evidently engaged in culinary occupations and preparing the feast; one is holding a sheep, while the other is cutting it up; another appears to be making bread or boiling a caldron. Various bowls and utensils stand upon tables and stools, all of which are remarkable for the elegance of their forms. The pavilion is supported by three posts or columns; on the summit of one is the fir-cone, the emblem so frequently found in the Assyrian sculptures; on the others are figures of the Ibex or mountain goat. They are designed with great spirit and carefully executed. The material, probably silk or woollen stuff, with which the upper part of the pavilion is richly ornamented, is clearly shown, and an edge with a fringe of fir-cones alternating with another ornament, which generally accompanies the fir-cone in the embroidery of dresses and in the decoration of rooms. Beneath the canopy a groom is currycombing one horse, while other horses, picketed by their halters, are feeding at a trough. An eunuch stands at the entrance of the tent to receive four prisoners, who with their hands tied behind them are brought to him by a warrior with a pointed helmet. Above this group, but on the same slab, are two singular figures, uniting the human form with the head of a lion: one holds a whip or thong in his right hand, and grasps his under jaw with his left. The hands of the second are elevated and joined in front. They wear under tunics, descending to their knees, and a skin falls from their heads over their shoulders to their ankles. They are accompanied by a man clothed in a short tunic, and raising a stick with both hands."

As a specimen of the sculpture, on a larger scale, we cannot do better than select the following admirable cut representing the king, from the North-West Palace, Nimroud. We regret that our limits will not allow us to dwell more at length upon this part of our subject. Suffice it to say, that the reader of Mr. Vaux's work will find, besides numerous other engravings, a succinct account of all the recent researches on the banks of the Tigris.

Of PERSEPOLIS and its ruins but very misty ideas are generally entertained.

"The approach to this capital of ancient Persia," says Mr. Vaux, "as the traveller crosses the vast plain of Merdusht, is described by every one who has had the good fortune to visit it, as magnificent in the extreme. The clearest, and most spirited, that we have met with, is that of the author of 'Rough Notes of a Rough Ride from the East.' 'We were in our saddles,' says he, 'at the first streak of day, and ere the sun's rays had gilded the few surviving capitals of Chehel Minar, its tall white columns stood before us in naked majesty at the foot of the bare and dreary ridge of mountains which bounds the wide alluvial plain of Merdusht. No other work of man was visible, except a few tents of wandering Eelyauts—specks in the distant horizon. There stood in stately solitude the pride of ages, which appear almost fabulous from their distance; of empires nearer by five centuries to the time of Noah than to ours, and of which no trace remains; but here are sufficient to verify the narrations of their splendid existence, and to show that in some arts, and those among the noblest, our vaunted march of intellect is but an idle boast; indeed were it not for the models we imitate—the more servilely the better—this "march" would most certainly be a countermarch. As it is, where is the modern city which will have such a glorious wreck as this after its ephemeral, though perhaps more utilitarian, existence has passed away?"

"Yet, wonderful as are the remains which still exist, it is doubtful whether we know with accuracy what was the original name of this celebrated place. We know that after the establishment of the empire by Cyrus, he and his immediate descendants divided their residence between Babylon, Susa, and Ecbatana. Cyrus himself seems, chiefly, to have resided at Babylon and Susa, and, as he did not live more than eight years after he became master of the whole empire, it is doubtful whether he could have spent much time at Persepolis, or have added much to its splendours. From Strabo and Diodorus we find, that the Greeks usually called the city Persepolis, and Xenophon demonstrates its locality by mentioning, that it was at no great distance from the frontiers of Media. But, whether the Persian monarchs passed much of their time at Persepolis or not, it is certain, that their sepulchral repose was found among the caves of these their native mountains. Here we still find tombs, by universal tradition, the Tombs of the Kings; and the most authentic historians testify that their remains were transported thither.

"Still less can we form any certain conjecture respecting the origin of the architectural art still visible in these ruins. Sir R. K. Porter, who has given the fullest description of them, considers that they bear a strong resemblance to the architectural taste of Egypt; and when we recollect the history of Egypt during the Persian times, there is some ground for imagining, that the columns of the Nile may be found upon the plains of Persia. Forty years before the conquest of Babylon, we know that Nebuchadnezzar overran the whole of Egypt, and, loading his army with the spoil of the country, returned in triumph to Babylon. When Cyrus, subsequently, annexed Babylon to his empire, and brought away with him the treasures and artisans of that city, Babylon naturally yielded the lessons it had learnt from Egypt to the Persian conqueror. Cambyses, the successor of Cyrus, subdued Amasis and Psammenitus, and, following the example of Nebuchadnezzar, transported from Thebes the precious ornaments of the city of the Hundred Gates; bringing, also, with him six thousand Egyptian captives, who were, probably, employed in the works he was constructing in his own kingdom. Future princes pursued a similar course, and adorned their capital with the riches of the countries they conquered, till at length, in the words of Curtius, 'Persepolis became the glory of the East, and no other existing city could be compared to it.'

"Diodorus Siculus has preserved a description of it, which will be found to tally remarkably with the present position and state of the ruins. 'A triple wall,' says he, 'surrounded the place. The first wall was sixteen cubits in height, defended by parapets, and flanked with towers. The second wall was in form like the first, but twice in elevation. The third wall was a square, and cut in the mountain, being sixty cubits in height. It is defended by palisades of copper, and has doors of the same of twenty cubits high. The first wall is to inspire awe, the second for strength, and the last for the defence of the palace. To the east of this, about four hundred feet distant, is the spot called the Royal Mountain, containing the Tombs of the Kings. Here the rock is hollowed out into several chambers, to gain the entrance to which the coffins are hoisted up by machinery; no other way of ascending to them exists.' At the present time, the ruins stand on an immense artificially-levelled platform, facing the cardinal points, measuring on the south 802 feet, on the north 926, and on the west 1,425. This platform has evidently been cut down from the rock, and abuts on the hill, which no doubt Diodorus meant to imply by the name of the 'Royal Mountain.' On the level of the platform appear several mounds and stony heaps, marking three distinct lines of walls and towers, the situation and direction of which can be easily traced. It is over this part, that the fighting was probably most severe, when the Arabs took the city in A.D. 642, at the close of the reign of Yazdigird, the last of the Sassanian princes, as innumerable quantities of arrow-heads have been found from time to time along the ruins, at the walls above, and also over the ground below, and on the tops of the remaining walls of what has been called the palace. The irregularity of the shape of the palace is probably due to the nature of the ground. The level, on which the building stands, is now exceedingly uneven, owing to the accumulation of the fallen ruins: on the northward, considerable masses of the native rock show still marks of the original hammers and other implements, with which the higher pieces were hewn down to the level required. Beyond the space of the artificial platform, the rock protrudes itself in vast abrupt cliffs, bearing traces of the pick-axe: in some, too, of the cavities, the progress of a quarry is still visible: part of the rock remains hewn through, and completed slabs are lying ready for removal.

"It is probable that the vast pile was never finally completed. 'It was a costly gem,' says Sir R. K. Porter, 'to which every succeeding hand thought it could give an additional polish.' The stone which has been used for this building is dark grey marble; it is cut into gigantic square blocks, and in many cases exquisitely polished; and, though unaided by mortar, the separate stones adhere so closely, that, when first completed, the terraced platform must have appeared as part of the solid mountain itself, levelled as a foundation for the columnar edifice erected on it. The apparent height of the platform from the ground is much lower now, than in the time of Diodorus. The encroachments of ruins and vegetation have thrown up heaps and hillocks against its sides, making rough slopes where once were smooth perpendiculars. The present height varies from twenty to thirty feet, but there can be little doubt that, were the bases of the wall cleared out, we should obtain fully twenty feet more in height. The three sides towards the plain are each supported by a similar wall, and on the fourth side, where the rock advances upon the plain, it has been scarped perpendicularly. The levelled plain within the wall consists of a series of terraces, one rising beyond the other; the first or lowest embraces the whole length of the southern face, and is in width one hundred and eighty-three feet. The second contains the whole central area; the third and most elevated has been entirely covered with buildings, and was probably the most magnificent of the whole. Along the edge of the lowest terrace, large masses of stone remain in different places, which look like the fragments of a parapet wall; they are worked with the same colossal strength and gigantic proportions with the rest of the edifice. On the edge of the third or highest terrace, are marks apparently showing the former existence of a strong range of railing or palisades. They occur at the top of the flight of steps, which connects this terrace with the one beneath, and Niebuhr thinks that the stones, which formed it, have been removed to other buildings and towns, as Shiráz.

"The ascent from the plain to the great levelled platform is by one vast double flight of steps, the finest perhaps in the world, which rise to the north and south with a very gentle ascent, and emerge from the flat space, which has been gained from the face of the valley, over a slope of accumulated ruins and rubbish. The entire height is forty-five feet, the width of each step twenty-two, its height three inches and a half, and the whole number of them fifty-five. The blocks of marble, which have been used in their construction, are gigantic, and some are so large as to allow of ten or fourteen steps being cut into its solid mass. The size of the base which they cover is sixty-seven feet by twenty-two. On ascending the first flight, an irregular landing-place presents itself of thirty-seven feet by forty-four, from whence springs a second flight formed of forty-eight steps and covering fifty-nine feet by twenty-two. A couple of corresponding staircases terminate, on the grand level of the platform, by a landing-place, which occupies sixty-four feet. The ascent of the steps is so gradual, that Sir R. K. Porter and other travellers mention, that they constantly rode up the staircase on horseback. It is curious, that this splendid staircase is not in the centre of any one of the faces, but, so much to the contrary, that, while it is 961 feet from the south face, it is only 208 feet from the north.

"Having ascended the staircase and reached the platform, the first thing, which meets the eye, are two masses of stone work, which probably formed an entrance gateway for foot-passengers, as its narrowness (only thirteen feet) precludes the idea, that it could have been intended for horses or carriages. The pavement is laid with slabs of polished marble of gigantic size. Beyond the two first portals are two columns, and then again two more portals. On the front of the portals are basso-relievo figures of animals (which Mr. Morier calls sphinxes), those on the first facing outwardly, and those on the second inwardly towards the mountain.

"Sir R. K. Porter, who has studied these animals with much care, and whose beautiful and accurate drawings greatly enhance the value of his book, proves that they represent colossal bulls. Their heads, chests, and forelegs occupy nearly the whole thickness of the walls, the bodies being left in relief. A pedestal, of five feet cut out of two blocks, raises them five feet above the level of the platform. At a considerable height above the animals are three compartments, containing arrow-headed inscriptions. As the upper part of the walls is now wholly ruined, we have no means of judging how the figures were terminated, but, there is enough left of them, for there to be no doubt as to what they were originally. The heads are indeed gone, but the cloven foot, and the strong outline of the form make it quite certain, that the perfect figure represented a bull. Round the necks of these 'bucolic sentinels' are collars of roses, and over the cheek, neck, shoulders, back, and ribs, is a decoration resembling short curly hair, delineated with great skill, and executed with great beauty. Their proportions are excellent, and their colossal size gives them a remarkable air of grandeur. Though much injured, the resemblance between the bulls at Persepolis, and those lately found at Khorsabad and Nimroud, is very evident, and the inference seems irresistible that, for this portion of the sculpture-art, the early Persians are indebted to the still earlier Assyrians."

Our limits must unfortunately prevent us from giving even a condensation of Mr. Vaux's copious account of these magnificent remains, and of others in their neighbourhood. Nor can we dwell upon the successful endeavours of Major Rawlinson to decipher the arrow-headed characters upon the monuments. For these and other interesting topics, we must refer the reader to the volume itself, which, as a cheap and compendious, yet scholarlike epitome of all that has been written upon these topics, is certainly without a rival, and is certain to become a standard work of reference.

SELECTIONS FROM BACON'S "APOPTHEGMS."

QUEEN ANNE BULLEN, at the time when she was led to be beheaded in the Tower, called one of the king's privy-chamber to her, and said unto him, "Commend me to the king, and tell him that he hath been ever constant in his course of advancing me; from a private gentlewoman he made me a marchioness; and from a marchioness a queen; and now, that he hath left no higher degree of earthly honour, he intends to crown my innocency with the glory of martyrdom."

His majesty James I., king of Great Britain, having made unto his parliament an excellent and large declaration, concluded thus: "I have now given you a clear mirrour of my mind; use it therefore like a mirrour, and take heed how you let it fall, or how you soil it with your breath."

His majesty, in his answer to the book of the Cardinal of Evereux, who had in a grave argument of divinity sprinkled many witty ornaments of poesy and humanity, saith: "That these flowers were like blue, and yellow, and red flowers in the corn, which make a pleasant show to those who look on, but they hurt the corn."

My Lord of Leicester, favourite to Queen Elizabeth, was making a large chace about Cornbury-park; meaning to enclose it with posts and rails: and one day was casting up his charge, what it would come to. Mr. Goldingham, a free-spoken man, stood by, and said to my lord, "Methinks your lordship goeth not the cheapest way to work." "Why, Goldingham?" said my lord. "Marry, my lord," said Goldingham, "count you but upon the posts, for the country will find you railing."

The lord-keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon, was asked his opinion, by Queen Elizabeth, of one of these monopoly licences. And he answered, "Madam, will you have me speak the truth? Licentiâ omnes deteriores sumus: We are all the worse for licences."

A friar of France, being in an earnest dispute about the law salique, would needs prove it by Scripture; citing that verse of the Gospel; Lilia agri non laborant neque nent: "The lilies of the field do neither labour nor spin;" applying it thus,—that the flower-de-luces of France cannot descend, neither to the distaff, nor to the spade: that is, not to a woman, nor to a peasant.

Sir Nicholas Bacon, being appointed a judge for the northern circuit, and having brought his trials that came before him to such a pass, as the passing of sentence on malefactors, he was by one of the malefactors mightily importuned for to save his life; which, when nothing that he had said did avail, he at length desired his mercy on account of kindred. "Prithee," said my lord judge, "how came that in?" "Why, if it please you, my lord, your name is Bacon, and mine is Hogg, and in all ages Hogg and Bacon have been so near kindred, that they are not to be separated." "Ay, but," replied Judge Bacon, "you and I cannot be kindred, except you be hanged; for Hogg is not Bacon until it be well hanged."

Sir Walter Raleigh was wont to say of the ladies of Queen Elizabeth's privy-chamber and bed-chamber, "that they were like witches, they could do hurt, but they could do no good."

"There was a minister deprived for inconformity, who said to some of his friends, "that if they deprived him, it should cost an hundred men's lives." The party understood it as if, being a turbulent fellow, he would have moved sedition, and complained of him; whereupon, being convented and opposed upon that speech, he said his meaning was, "that if he lost his benefice, he would practise physick, and then he thought he should kill an hundred men in time."

Master Mason, of Trinity College, sent his pupil to another of the Fellows, to borrow a book of him, who told him, "I am loth to lend my books out of my chamber, but if it please thy tutor to come and read upon it in my chamber, he shall as long as he will." It was winter, and some days after the same Fellow sent to Mr. Mason to borrow his bellows; but Mr. Mason said to his pupil, "I am loth to lend my bellows out of my chamber, but if thy tutor would come and blow the fire in my chamber, he shall as long as he will."

In Flanders, by accident, a Flemish tiler fell from the top of a house upon a Spaniard, and killed him, though he escaped himself; the next of blood prosecuted his death with great violence; and when he was offered pecuniary recompense, nothing would serve him but lex talionis: whereupon the judge said to him, "that if he did urge that sentence, it must be, that he should go up to the top of the house, and then fall down upon the tiler."

Whitehead, a grave divine, was much esteemed by Queen Elizabeth, but not preferred, because he was against the government of bishops: he was of a blunt, stoical nature: he came one day to the queen, and the queen happened to say to him, "I like thee the better, Whitehead, because thou livest unmarried." He answered, "In troth, madam, I like you the worse for the same cause."

Rabelais tells a tale of one that was very fortunate in compounding differences. His son undertook the same course, but could never compound any. Whereupon he came to his father, and asked him, what art he had to reconcile differences? He answered, "he had no other but this: to watch when the two parties were much wearied, and their hearts were too great to seek reconciliation at one another's hands; then to be a means betwixt them, and upon no other terms." After which the son went home, and prospered in the same undertakings.

In chancery, at one time, when the counsel of the parties set forth the boundaries of the land in question, by the plot; and the counsel of one part said, "We lie on this side, my lord;" and the counsel of the other part said, "And we lie on this side:" the Lord Chancellor Hatton stood up, and said; "If you lie on both sides, whom will you have me to believe?"

Alonzo of Arragon was wont to say, in commendation of age, "that age appeared to be best in four things: old wood, best to burn; old wine, to drink; old friends, to trust; and old authors, to read."

† Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, in a famine, sold all the rich vessels and ornaments of the church, to relieve the poor with bread; and said, "There was no reason that the dead temples of God should be sumptuously furnished, and the living temples suffer penury."

A lover met his lady in a close chair, she thinking to have gone unknown, he came and spoke to her. She asked him, "How did you know me?" He said, "Because my wounds bled afresh;" alluding to the common tradition, that the wounds of a body slain will bleed afresh upon the approach of the murderer.

A gentleman brought music to his lady's window. She hated him, and had warned him often away; and when he would not desist, she threw stones at him. Whereupon a gentleman said unto him, that was in his company, "What greater honour can you have to your music, than that stones come about you, as they did to Orpheus?"

Dr. Johnson said, that in sickness there were three things that were material; the physician, the disease, and the patient: and if any two of these joined, then they get the victory; for, Ne Hercules quidem contra duos. If the physician and the patient join, then down goes the disease; for then the patient recovers: if the physician and the disease join, that is a strong disease; and the physician mistaking the cure, then down goes the patient: if the patient and the disease join, then down goes the physician; for he is discredited.

Aneas Sylvius, that was Pope Pius Secundus, was wont to say; that the former popes did wisely to set the lawyers a-work to debate, whether the donation of Constantine the Great to Sylvester, of St. Peter's patrimony, were good or valid in law or no?—the better to skip over the matter in fact, whether there was ever any such thing at all or no.

From "Certain Apothegms of Lord Bacon, first published in his 'Remains.'"

Queen Elizabeth, seeing Sir Edward ——— in her garden, looked out at her window, and asked him in Italian, "What does a man think of when he thinks of nothing?" Sir Edward, who had not had the effect of some of the queen's grants so soon as he hoped and desired, paused a little; and then made answer, "Madam, he thinks of a woman's promise." The queen shrunk in her head; but was heard to say, "Well, Sir Edward, I must not confute you." Anger makes dull men witty, but it keeps them poor.

When any great officer, ecclesiastical or civil, was to be made, the queen would inquire after the piety, integrity, and learning of the man. And when she was satisfied in these qualifications, she would consider of his personage. And upon such an occasion she pleased once to say to me, "Bacon, how can the magistrate maintain his authority when the man is despised?"

Sir Francis Bacon was wont to say of an angry man, who suppressed his passion, "that he thought worse than he spake;" and of an angry man that would chide, "that he spoke worse than he thought."

The same Sir Francis Bacon was wont to say, "that those who left useful studies for useless scholastic speculations, were like the Olympic gamblers, who abstained from necessary labours, that they might be fit for such as were not so."

He likewise often used this comparison: "The empirical philosophers are like to pismires; they only lay up and use their store. The rationalists are like the spiders; they spin all out of their own bowels. But give me a philosopher, who, like the bee, hath a middle faculty, gathering from abroad, but digesting that which is gathered by his own virtue."

PRIDE AND IRRESOLUTION.¹

IF "to raise the genius and to mend the heart," be the proper office of the dramatist, it is not the less, surely, the proper office of the tale-teller or novelist. In the one case, as in the other, it is common enough to see the duty of this high calling neglected, slighted, quite overlooked, and sometimes defiantly warred against, and instead of having dramas and novels in a league with all good angels that watch over man, we find them helping the powers of darkness to do their accursed work in his heart; instead of attempting "to raise the genius" of the young by the exhibition of intellectual and moral energy and fortitude, striving steadily for an immortal crown, they too often dazzle the mental vision by a display of spasmodic, explosive tour de force, to gain possession of a wreath of artificial roses and theatric tinfoil, the extreme worthlessness of which is hidden amid the pervading blue-light of excitement and false sentiment. That such productions will not "mend the heart," but rather mar it if it be sound, and increase the disease if it be unsound, is clear enough to a discerning judgment.

Perhaps the best praise that can be awarded to the work we have now to present to our readers is, that its object is to mend the heart, and to elevate and sanctify our views of, and conduct in life. This is done, not by showing that virtue is profitable in the way of happiness, but by showing that virtue is fair, is lovely; ay, the fairest, loveliest thing on the earth; that those only are truly miserable who cannot see that truth, and live according to it:—and that virtue is also wise. This new series of the "Discipline of Life" is, therefore, as regards its general moral tendency, of a similar character to the first series, which we noticed in these pages about two years ago. It will be remembered that the authoress in question is Lady Ellinor Ponsonby, a new writer in the department of fiction, and that while she has peculiar, distinctive merit, she belongs to the same class as Mrs. Marsh.

"Pride and Irresolution" is the general title given to these three volumes; a title which we cannot altogether approve, because it does not indicate as well as a title ought to indicate, the contents of the work. We have here two tales, each occupying about a volume and a half, the first of which is called "Susan Greville, or Irresolution;" the second, "Ada Mowbray, or Pride." Both these tales are good, but "Susan Greville" is the more interesting, and incomparably the more touching of the two.

We will not accuse the authoress of a determination to look on the dark side of things; to paint the trials of life too gloomily; for we do not believe any such perverse determination can exist in a mind which, like hers, is full of vital religious faith; but we remark in these tales, as in the former ones, that she is more at home in the delineation of trial and suffering, in the analysis of pain, than in painting the bright colours, and revelling in the warm sunny joys of our earthly existence. There is no gloom, no discontent, no misanthropy in these pages; but they are, for the most part, sad and full of melancholy. There is no satire in the first tale (unless, indeed, aunt Janet be looked upon as a satirical delineation), and very little in the second. There is nothing that can be called plot in either; each is a simply constructed tale, and has the rare merit of being within the bounds of fictional probability. But "Susan Greville" is the more natural and life-like of the two. Each tale is made to depend more upon character than upon incident, and more upon the conflict of passion within the hearts of the personages than upon its dramatic display. There is not much dialogue, and what there is, though appropriate and far from dull, is not brilliant. The style throughout is easy and fluent, without being highly finished, or careful. We would recommend to the writer a little more attention to the niceties of style; as one who writes so well without effort, may well afford the pains to write better. The affecting story of "Susan Greville" is founded upon the old, ever-new fact, that a love unworthily placed "is not, and it cannot come to good;" but the fault of character in Susan's lover is not properly called Irresolution, it is want of principle.

Susan is the granddaughter of old Mr. Greville of Keevor Hall, who makes her his heiress. By a clause in his will, a marriage is arranged by the old man, between her and her cousin Julian Greville, the only child of old Mr. Greville's second son. At the beginning of the story Susan has a little brother, who dies. As a means of showing the heroine's character to the reader, we will quote the following scene between her and her dying brother. Susan is about ten years of age at this period. The person who tells the story is a mysterious and puzzling inmate of the Keevor Hall family. All that the reader learns of him is, that he is an old gentleman, and that his name is Grantley.

"There was little beauty in either of the children. Their skins were pale and sallow; and their brown hair was cut close round their temples. Their eyes were very dark, but without any peculiar beauty of size or brilliancy, and beneath the under lid of each there was that deep black mark which speaks so painfully of weakness and ill-health. And yet there was something in the appearance of both the children which could not fail to attract the attention of all except the very determined admirers of beauty. There was in their countenances a very remarkable expression of earnestness and intensity, which, although speaking of acquaintance with thought and suffering, and therefore painful to see at so early an age, excited feelings of anxious and lively interest. In addition to this there was—but it was more on the face of the girl than of the boy, (in him there was something of restlessness)—a look of tranquillity and serenity which I had never seen on any countenance before. She might look sorrowful, she might be suffering pain of body or of mind, but it was still the same, the expression never varied. It was as if an angel of peace continually hovered over her, and covered her with his wings, or, as Coleridge has beautifully expressed it, 'It (peace) lay on her countenance like a steady unshadowed moonlight.'

"Don't read any more, Susan," said the little boy, with a sigh, 'I can't listen any longer.'

"Susan put down her book, and turned her eyes sorrowfully and inquiringly upon her brother.

"Oh Susan! I do feel so very, very ill," he said, with another sigh; 'I think I get worse every day.'

"Can I do anything for you, Charley?" asked the little girl, with her earnest pitying look. 'Are you in very great pain?'

"No, not pain; at least, not great pain. Sometimes I wish it was pain; I think I could bear it better. I am so tired—my bones ache so—I seem to ache all over;" and he moaned and turned restlessly on his couch.

"You have been lying here so long: let me lift you up a little while. There now! Is that better?" and with the handiness and gentleness of an experienced nurse, she pulled up and arranged the cushions which were supporting him.

"Yes, that is better. Sit down again, Susan. Yes, I feel quite comfortable, now. But, Susan," he continued, after a short silence, during which the little girl had taken up her work, 'I don't think this can go on much longer. Do you know, Susan, I think that I shall very soon die.'

"There was a quick sorrowful glance from the little girl, but no exclamation, no answer.

"I don't think I mind, Susan. Dying! I wonder what dying is! I wonder what it is like! I wonder if it is very painful! What do you think, Susan? Do you think it is very painful to die?"

"Mamma says we shouldn't think about death in that way, Charley," said the little girl, in her soft sad voice. "She says, when the angel of death comes to fetch us away to happiness, that we should go and not be afraid."

"I shan't be afraid, Susan; I am sure I shan't. I think I shall be very glad to go only for one thing."

"Again the earnest glance from the little girl; but no question.

"I don't mind leaving Keever, Susan; I don't mind their putting me in the ground by poor grandpapa, because, I know, I shan't stay there,—shall I, Susan? I know I shall fly away and see more beautiful things than any we have here; but, Susan, I can't die and go away from you,—I can't be happy, unless you are with me—I don't care for beautiful things, unless you see them, too."

"The little girl never raised her eyes—the tears were blinding them, but she worked away quickly and nervously at her work. After a moment, she said in a low, faltering voice, 'Don't, Charley, don't; mamma says it is not right to speak like that.'

"Why isn't it right, Susan? It's quite, quite true. I don't think I could be happy even in heaven, unless you were there. Shall you be happy without me when I go away and leave you alone?"

"Such a look from the child—such a quivering smile was her answer! The little boy had now worked himself up into an excitement of feeling; he now went on, in a voice whose tenderness would have melted a heart of stone, 'What shall you do, Susan, when I am dead? I often think, and think, and I can't fancy you without me. You never do anything but take care of me, and nurse me, and try and make me happy. What shall you do, Susan, when you have no one to take care of any more?"

"The poor little girl struggled hard to restrain herself, but in vain. Oh! Charley, Charley, don't—please, don't. I know I shall be able to bear any thing that comes, but don't talk of it now,—please, don't,—I cannot bear it now.' And in a perfect passion of grief, she laid her head down upon the couch, while the boy, almost with a look of pleasure, stroked her dark hair with his small wasted hand.

"It was at this moment that I came in from the garden, at the open trellised window. The little girl raised her head, and her eyes,—and my eyes, in the same instant, fell upon a deep red stain on the couch where she had laid her face. I was about to make an exclamation of surprise and alarm; but with instant self-possession, she held her finger to her lips, to command,—gentle as it was, I felt it as a command—to command my silence; then, moving and arranging the folds of the shawl, she got up and left the room, merely saying, as she passed me and held out her little hand,—'Will you amuse Charley, while I go away for a little while? I shall soon be back.'"

The little girl who is thus affectionate, calm, and self-possessed at so early an age, is not likely to grow up into an ordinary woman. The authoress has shown great knowledge of human nature in the arrangement of external circumstances around Susan Greville; they are precisely those that are best adapted for the fostering of such a character. Her father is gentle, affectionate, weak, and entirely dependent upon his nearest relatives for thought and action; her mother is a steady, strong-minded, deeply affectionate, quiet, undemonstrative lady, of the old school, whose life is ordered in all things according to her principles of right. Upon his wife Mr. Greville depends to transact all business, and to manage his estate with his bailiff; to her mother Susan looks for guidance in childhood, and support in youth; and her mother's great object is to make Susan self-dependent, self-controlled. She gives her a sound education, but is not careful (as she should have been) to cultivate her taste, and to give her those feminine accomplishments which would be likely to make her attractive in the eyes of her betrothed. Julian is diametrically opposed to Susan by nature, and by nurture his qualities, too, acquire fresh strength. His mother was an Italian, and he has inherited her impulsive, ardent temperament. He is gay, mercurial, with keen susceptibility, and a strong love for art, especially music. He is very handsome, and gifted with that charm of manner common to natures like his. He and Susan grow up without any personal intercourse. Julian spends his time, under his fond and admiring father's direction, in travelling about the sunniest countries of Europe. Susan spends hers beside her mother, in the uninterrupted retirement of Keever Hall. When she is seventeen, and Julian about one or two-and-twenty, they meet. Julian, by this time, has lost his father, and Susan her mother, whose place in the household she fills admirably, even to the management of the accounts with the bailiff, and the direction of a miniature farm. But she cannot paint, or sing, or do any of the hundred pretty things that fill up the list of modern accomplishments.

"Now, George, this is what I call wisdom," said Julian Greville, as he stepped into the chaise that was to convey them to Keever, about three weeks after his accident;—"I wrote to Mr. Greville, to say we should arrive at six. Now, by my wise management, and by tearing myself out of bed an hour earlier than usual, we shall arrive at Keever at four."

"And what is the object of the falsehood?" said plain matter-of-fact George Vivian.

"What! Why who but you, George, would have to ask such a question? Do you think it nothing to escape the formal first introduction?—Oh! I know you English well. If you can make a man look awkward, you will do it. But I am not going to submit to anything of the sort, and so I wisely arranged my present plan. You think I don't know the manners and customs of this country of yours; but I have been here long enough to be aware that you have a sort of enjoyment in putting people out of countenance on such occasions as the present. I happened to be witness to a little matrimonial arrangement that took place at Mr. Prim's, between Susannah Prim and the under-master. Oh! if you had but seen the endeavours of Mr. Prim and Mrs. Prim, and the friends of the Prim's, to make the unfortunate couple look like fools; the formal announcement, the healths that were drunk, the sly witticisms, &c. &c. Susannah bore it very well; women have wonderful pluck sometimes; but poor Parker!—His unfortunate face did not recover the blushing of that day, so long as I had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and I have no doubt it bears the traces still. No, George, such scenes are not lost upon me. I profit by experience."

"And so all Englishmen are like Mr. Prim? You are complimentary to me, I must say, Julian."

"Why, George, you are just such another, with less wit perhaps, but even more formality. If I was, now, going down to Landover to marry your daughter, I know exactly how it would be. I will describe the scene to you. I should arrive in my chaise-and-four punctually at five o'clock. You would be standing on the steps to receive me. I should jump out rather hastily; but you would come stately down and give me welcome. There would be a short inquiry after my health, and then you would say 'Let me lead you to my daughter.' I don't know how the leading would be conducted, whether we should proceed hand in hand or not; but lead would be the word, I know. Well, you would lead me through the entrance-hall, by a long line of staring servants, into a dark, dreary, old-fashioned drawing-room, fitted up with carved oak and red damask, and there we should find Judith seated at her embroidery. You would precede me to the window, and you would say, 'Judith!'—Why, George, you are perfectly devouring my romance; you shall not have another word; never, never will you know how I shall greet your Judith."

"What a strange being you are, Julian," said George Vivian, fixing his eyes with some curiosity on his companion. "If I felt that on the events of this day, the whole happiness of my life depended, as I fear you have determined to make yours depend, I could not joke as you do."

"Because your mind is a strange one, far stranger than mine. You allow one idea to absorb it wholly, and that must become oppressive. I have a thousand ideas on one subject, and so none can weigh very heavily. I assure you, George, I am quite as much, perhaps more, occupied with wondering what I shall first say to Miss Greville, than I am with hopes or fears for my future life. Besides, you know you like a quiet life, and so anxiety is tedious to you, but to me novelty and excitement are life and spirit, whatever they are caused by—pleasure or pain."

"The journey to Keevor, which was a long one, was performed in the time allotted by Julian. It was just four o'clock when they turned abruptly down the hill, which overlooked the valley in which Keevor was situated. It lay before them in all the brightness of the sunshine, and the luxuriant verdure of June, and Julian surveyed the scene with the enraptured eye of an artist. 'This is beautiful, George! This is a valley worth fighting for!' as King William is said to have exclaimed on some occasion; it is as bright as Italy, and as fresh as Paradise."

"An abrupt turning took them from the high-road into a shady lane, at the end of which an old ivy covered gateway proclaimed that they were at their journey's end."

"I do believe we are at Keevor, George!" cried Julian, as the post-boys smacked their whips, and swept through the arch at full speed, and I am quite unprepared,—I had no idea we were so near. This arrival is an awful thing! would it were done! I feel horribly nervous! actually, there's the house! Ah! George, I wish you were in my position, and then you would not look so irritatingly demure. Here we are! as passing through another old archway, they stopped at the door of the house."

"A servant stood in the entrance; no bells were rung or notice given, and before Julian had time to think, the door of the long drawing-room was thrown open, and he was in Susan's presence."

"She was alone, seated, as usual, in the recess of the window, endeavouring by the occupation of her fingers to steady her excited mind and restless expectation. Julian stood for a moment irresolute; but Susan, accustomed to act promptly and decidedly, put down her work-frame, came quietly forward, and held out her hand to each; then sitting down, half with words, half with a movement, begged them to sit down also. So far she had acted without thought; but when she found herself seated opposite to Julian, whom she recognised, at once, from his strong likeness to the childish portrait on which her eyes had so often rested, something of consciousness returned, and showed itself not ungracefully in her downcast eyes, and in the slight nervous movement of her fingers."

"Julian was the next to speak, and to make some apology for being earlier than the time he had mentioned; and, in answer to this, Susan said she would call her father; and left the room."

"I like your Judith," said Julian, turning to George Vivian, with a smile, after some minutes' consideration; 'but didn't I tell you how much more pluck women have than men? I assure you I did not know what to say or do when I came into the room, and I humbly thank you for all the assistance you gave me. I really beg you will exert yourself, George, for I feel so extremely bashful, that I have quite lost the use of my intellect.'"

Susan is not beautiful, but, like all heroines in novels who are not beautiful, she is "something than beauty dearer." She is pale and fragile-looking, quiet and graceful in her movements; in short, a person whom it might be very possible to meet a hundred times in society, and think nothing about, and with whom you could not live a month in the quiet atmosphere of a country home without loving. People unstable, infirm of purpose, like Julian Greville, are apt to attach themselves to earnest-minded, sober, undemonstrative people. Julian soon loves his cousin after his nature, not with a steady enduring love like hers,—that he is not capable of,—but he loves her; and she? hearts like hers do not fritter themselves away, they are given wholly and for ever; and hers becomes the property of her cousin. His showy and attractive nature, so essentially inferior to her own, gets dominion over her, but not to the extinction of the lofty principles acquired in her youth. Susan's character is now to be tried in the furnace of love; love misplaced, indeed, but sincere and passionate. Poor Susan returned Julian's love, while she did not see the far purer and higher love which was burning for her in the breast of George Vivian, Julian's half-brother. He is kept in the background, as such characters are in life—they do not make themselves prominent, but they do not on this account escape the sorrows of the heart. The following conversation between Susan and Julian, after his first hasty declaration that he loves her, will show the two characters advantageously.

"He was not like the same person from whom she had parted an hour before; then, his countenance had been all playfulness and gaiety, now it was dark and troubled. His hair was in disorder, his brows were knit and bent, and his eyes, their laughing light extinguished, had an expression of gloom and melancholy. Susan had never seen him thus before; but it was a transformation by no means uncommon to Julian; it was a transformation which thought always produced in him. So long as he lived in the present moment, and in the excitement of the moment, he was all lightness and gaiety; but if once he looked upon the mind within, if once he meditated upon himself, the lightness of his nature was gone. Restless, troubled, and ungoverned, he became terrified at the picture of his own heart. The few words he had that morning spoken, had decided his destiny, and what all George Vivian's warnings and remonstrances had failed to do, those few words had done; they had awakened his mind to consideration on the step he had taken; they had opened his eyes to the responsibilities he had invited; they had roused his imagination to dwell on the hopes and fears, the clouds and sunshine of his future life. It is often thus. The words of others are without us, and, however forcible they be, may pass over us as but the sound of 'a lovely song,' and make no impression; but our own words are from within, and once spoken, they arouse the consciences, though, perhaps, when they have set their seal too late.

"It was not that Julian repented of the step he had taken; but what he had done lightly, now weighed heavily; and the very act of thinking, of pondering on his actions, had tossed and disordered his mind, and had brought on one of the gloomy and desponding fits to which an excitable nature is at all times subject.

"Not here, Susan, not here," he said, as he met her. "I cannot talk to you here. Let us go to the wood."

"She walked by his side in silence. His thoughts were of himself—hers were all of him. In one moment, in the one glance at that troubled countenance, she had passed, at once and for ever, from girlish shyness, from trembling love, from youthful hopes, from romantic dreams, to the deep, strong, unselfish devotion which characterizes the love of a wife or a mother.

"They reached the wood. He drew her hand within his arm, and held it there; then began—

"Susan, I hate this engagement. I wish it had never been. I love you,—I must always have loved you; but for myself, I cannot bear to think that love is not freely given; that duty, that love for your father commands it. I need a strong love, Susan; I wish to be loved for myself alone. Tell me, tell me truly, is your love free? If there had been no engagement, should you have loved me still? He looked anxiously in her face, and she hastened to answer him.

"I think I must if I had dared." It was the full expression of what she felt.

"Dared, Susan! Ah! you do not know me!" He pressed her hand, held it faster, then went on in a tone of great feeling. "It was needful that I should ask you if you truly loved me; for a light love, a light fancy, will not do for me. It will be a hard task and a heavy one, to be my wife, and not all happiness. You have not seen me, you have not known me as I am. I am as variable—he stopped and smiled; even then, though strongly and deeply moved, a poetical quotation was natural to him—

"As variable as the shade
By the light quivering aspen made."

Never at rest, never at peace; always excited, sometimes sad and dreary, as I feel now. And worse than this; there have been moments when I have felt; moments so dark and despairing that there has been to me no truth on earth, no faith in Heaven. Do not shrink from me, Susan. You must know all, you must be ready to bear all. I need to be loved; I need to have one who will cheer me, who will cling to me; who, even if my restless wandering heart strays from perfect right and perfect truth, will still bear with me. Will you, Susan, can you be such a one to me? Will you never, never forsake me?

"I will never, never forsake you," said the soft, firm, earnest voice at his side. He started as he heard her—started at the depth of devotion expressed in the voice that spoke. He had told her that he loved her; but all his thoughts, all his feelings, all his words had been of himself. Not once had he recalled the vow which he must make, the promise to love her, to cherish her until death should them part.

"Do you indeed so love me, Susan?" he said, bending down to look in her face. "Is it possible that you can already so love me?" As Julian spoke, a mist fell from Susan's eyes. Her position stood before her in its clear colours. The force of the engagement, Julian's hasty decision, the rapid growth of her own love. Till now his words and her own ready response had seemed but natural in her eyes. She was not easily excited or carried away; her life had been too early saddened for that; but the very fact that excitement was unusual to her, had made her more completely under its influence now. The fascination that hung upon all that Julian said and did; the attention of which she was now, for the first time, the object; the new life that was opening upon her; all the interest of her position, had conspired to blind her, and to place her under the influence of that illusion and delusion that excitement brings. She, prone as she was to deep thought, had not considered the difficulties or strangenesses of her position. But now her eyes were opened. "Is it possible that you already love me?" The words fell heavily on her mind, not for her own sake, but for Julian's. She, perhaps, had been easily won; but for her there was no more doubt or fear; easily, it might have been, but won she was, wholly and for ever; but he, did he love her?

"I feel that you may doubt me," she said, looking up with a deep blush, but firmly and steadily—"I feel that you may, perhaps, despise a heart so easily won. But these thoughts and feelings are not new to me. They are but the fulfilment of the hopes of two long years. And if I have been easily won," she added, with a touching smile, and unconsciously expressing something of Juliet's sentiment, "believe me, I shall not be easily shaken."

"I know it, Susan," he said tenderly,—and her manner would indeed have given the most doubting confidence—"I feel 'it now; you love me and you will bless me."

"But, Julian," she said, stopping in her walk, and looking gravely at him, while she disengaged her hand from his arm,—are you sure of yourself. Are you free? If it is strange that I should love you, is it not stranger that you should love me?—you, who have seen the brightness of the world, while I have so little, so very little to win your love."

"So little! Susan," he cried earnestly, "so little—you who are loved and must be loved by all who come near you!"

"But as your wife, Julian. It is not a light thing to be bound together for life. Consider before it is too late. You said you hated this engagement. Let there be none; you know there is none if your will is not free. You can know me but little as yet."

"Stop, Susan," he said, "if you do not wish to make me miserable. You have said you loved me—why will you now try to cast me away? Do I not know you? Do I not know that you are an angel?—Do I not hear your voice fall like music?—Do I not feel that it blesses me as my mother's voice blest me once?"

"And so they were betrothed to each other. * * * I watched Susan very anxiously that evening. Her countenance puzzled me. We had attained the wishes of years; and she, if I had read her rightly, should have been blest, most blest; but was she so? She was more full of thought than usual, and once, as she sat over her embroidery frame, I fancied that her brows knit, and that the peace which reigned over her face was for a moment dispelled. I have since thought that it was the weight of responsibility which weighed heavily upon her. A human being's happiness is an awful thing to take in trust; and it is not the consciousness of our own love that can lighten the burden, or our own desire to bless. There are such things as vain endeavours and ineffectual efforts; there are smiles which are not responded to, soft words which fall powerless, without the magic to soften or to cheer. Till now, Susan's powers had never failed; why did her heart sink within her now? I suppose an answer might readily be found. There are inward powers which measure love, and unconsciously show where the balance is wanting. Julian's words of love were more, much more than Susan's, but she knew who loved most, on whom, therefore, the burden of responsibility would lie; and already, strong and self-reliant as she naturally was, something of the dread of failure was stealing over her mind."

Our authoress's talent is well displayed in the masterly sketch of Julian. He is not made to appear contemptible to the reader, though his weak points are all set down and commented on, his conduct analysed, and found to be utterly unworthy of Susan's lover; yet that indescribable charm which such men have, for women, in real life, is preserved in the printed page. The reader feels it, and though he pronounces his conduct unstable and weak, yet he loves him while he condemns. Such a character, ably kept up, will invariably make a tale interesting, because it calls forth many feelings in the reader's mind, while it keeps up an incessant action and reaction among the rest of the dramatis personæ. But, we admit, that it is a difficult thing not to make a man of this kind despicable, when his character is set down in black and white; in real life, so few persons see beyond the surface of the man's nature, that he is generally admired and liked because the surface is admirable and likeable. Susan is a sweet, deeply-affectionate, strong-principled girl, and Julian really loves her, but there is in him an inability to be steady, or satisfied, or consistent, even in his affections, and the reader is by no means surprised to find this versatile hero half in love with somebody else, before very long. This is an orphan cousin, a beautiful, accomplished, musical young lady, who is domesticated in Keever, with whom he has many tastes in common. Susan is willing to yield him up, believing that he really loves Florence Vere, and that he deceives himself when he assures her that, though Florence moves his fancy, she has his heart. Julian persuades her into a renewal of their engagement. The duets and singing cease, and poor Florence, who has already lost her heart to the brilliant Julian, is neglected again. Of course Julian's conduct depends upon the turn of a feather, not upon his own will; and soon after he has convinced himself that it is Susan only whom he loves, we find him engaged in the following scene:—

"He opened the door, and there, in the low window-seat, Miss Vere was sitting. She was partly dressed for a walk; but her bonnet was lying on the ground beside her, and the large plaid shawl which she had put on to defend herself from the cold wind, was falling from her shoulders. Her face was buried in her hands, and there was an abandon in her whole attitude and appearance that spoke of extreme unhappiness.

"She had not heard the opening of the door, and as Julian paused and looked at her, a pang of sorrow and remorse shot through his heart. It is one of the causes that has made his character so full of warning, that he was as frequently led astray by his good and kindly feelings as by his more selfish ones. He had not learned—how many need to learn!—that there is a higher guide of right and wrong than even the best and warmest feelings we possess. While he stood and gazed upon her, two voices made themselves audible within. There was one which reproached him for his past conduct, for the selfishness which had led him, for his own momentary relief and amusement, to gain her affections, which called upon his pity and compassion, and desired him who had caused her sorrow to endeavour to comfort her.

There was another, and this was the loudest voice—he could not say he was unwarned—which said clear and distinct, 'Depart, for the office of comforter is not for you—compassion from you will be a false compassion, tainted in its source, and, therefore, fatal in its effects.' He paused, irresolute.

"Suddenly Miss Vere raised her head, pulled her shawl over her shoulders, and laid her hand upon her bonnet. As she turned she saw him. The day was dark, and he did not observe her tear-stained cheek; but he saw that the instant she perceived him, her head was averted with a quick, he thought an angry movement. The struggle of voices which had made him pause, died away within, and it was a mere hasty impetuous movement which led him to her side.

"'Florence!' he said.

"She did not answer him by word or look.

"'Florence!' he cried, more imploringly; every resolution so lately made, the feelings of but an hour before, fading away under the influence of sorrow, pity, remorse—I know not what besides.

"She did not answer, and he bent forward and saw her tears.

"He drew nearer—'Florence, are you unhappy?' he cried.

"'What is it to you if I am?' she said at last in a tone of deep sadness. 'What is it to any one? I am alone.' And she buried her face in her hands again.

"'Nothing to me! ah, Florence! you cannot think it. Nothing to me! If I might—if I dared! Oh! Susan! how much do you cost me!'

"The words were scarcely pronounced before he would have given the world to have recalled them; not even at that moment were they the true expression of his mind. But our words—alas! alas! they cannot be recalled.

"One instant's silence followed the exclamation—it was broken by a sound as of a fall. Julian turned, hurried to the door, and a piercing shriek brought Florence to his side. The words he had said, had been heard by other ears than hers.

"Susan had been reading the evening service to her father. When she had finished, he became drowsy, and falling into a quiet sleep, Susan left him to go in search of Florence. She had a purpose half-formed to talk to her of what had lately passed—to advise her—gently to draw from her, if circumstances allowed it, her own thoughts, feelings, wishes. She had a power of reaching the hearts of others which few could resist.

"It was a kind of ante-room, which led from the drawing-room to the library. Susan entered it and approached the door, which Julian had left ajar. Her hand was upon it when those excited passionate accents—'Nothing to me! Ah, Florence!' fell upon her ear. Startled and shocked, she was drawing back; but one of those fearful beatings of the heart, so well known in childhood, fixed her to the spot. She made a faint exclamation, unheard amid those wilder words, and pressed her hands tightly upon her heart; but every tone of Julian's voice reached her ear. With a deep gasp for breath, she drew back, but at the first step she fell on the floor. When Julian reached the door, she was lying in the ante-room, her eyes closed, her cheek deadly pale, and slowly from her lips was issuing a stream of blood. It is impossible to picture the scene that followed. The unfortunate young man knelt by the side of his betrothed bride, and in imploring, despairing accents, called upon her name. Regardless of all beside, regardless even of hope for her, he held her cold hand, and again and again, in a voice heart-rending in its agony, pathetic in its imploring tenderness, besought her to look up and forgive him; and still while he knelt, the stream of life was ebbing fast away."

The tale does not end here, as the reader may perhaps imagine. Susan hovers a long time between life and death, but at length she recovers. Florence Vere has left the house. Julian has gone away, with the steady George, and out of the way of temptation, supported by a firm-minded friend, and under the influence of sorrow, Julian remains virtuous; all his fine intellectual, and winning moral qualities come out into action. He returns to Keevor, and once more under the soothing and strengthening influence of Susan's character, he cannot bear the thought of giving her up. Susan, having reason to believe that she cannot live many weeks, and desirous of making Julian as happy as she can while she lives, and anxious that the long-cherished wish of their family should be fulfilled, promises to marry him. They are married, and Julian is all that a man should be, till he is once more tempted. Florence marries a man whom she had twice refused, and comes, as Lady Mortimer, to live in the neighbourhood of Keevor. A very slight circumstance calls into play Susan's gentle firmness in trying to warn Julian against the sin which too easily besets him; he resists, and in her delicate state of health, the excitement is too much for her; she again ruptures a blood-vessel, and dies within a few hours. Julian and George Vivian, we are told, live and remain fast friends; become better men, in consequence of their early connexion with the single-minded, pure-spirited Susan. What becomes of Lady Mortimer we are not told. Aunt Janet is a clever sketch of a sharp, cutting, lively old maid.

"Ada Mowbray" is another domestic tale, in which the old axiom, that "pride will have a fall," is duly illustrated. We do not like this tale so well as the other, because the character of Ada Mowbray, in which the interest is made to centre, is exaggerated and far from beautiful. Such inordinate pride could scarcely, we think, be united to so high a degree of good sense and general philosophic spirit as we find in Ada; at all events, her pride is so great as to make her cold and repulsive; and we think the reader is not likely to care much for her moral improvement, or to sympathise in her misfortunes. Her mother is an admirable sketch. Mrs. Mowbray is just what people call an ordinary woman, and is therefore a very difficult one to put into a book with anything like effect. Miss Austin might be proud to have created Mrs. Mowbray, the unpretending, gentle, commonplace woman, who is afraid and proud of her beautiful, haughty, accomplished daughter. This tale has more variety than the other, and it is not improbable that many persons may differ from ourselves, and like it to the full as well as "Susan Greville." Our limits will not allow us to make some quotations from Ada Mowbray, and an account of the tale itself, unillustrated by quotation, would be unfair to its merit, which is considerable. If we had not seen its companion we might, perhaps, have esteemed this the more, but it is but right to say that "Susan Greville" is so complete, harmonious, and heart-stirring a work, that few stories of its class, in the present day, would not lose by comparison with it. It has some of the first requisites of a work of art; it is evidently told to work out one great idea, and the simplest materials are used to put it clearly before the reader's mind. This is no light praise, and we look with much pleasure for another series of "The Discipline of Life" (which discipline is various enough,) from the pen of this authoress.

THE LAYS OF THE SCOTTISH CAVALIERS.

BY M. A.

"To be a poet, is indeed very difficult," said Imlac. The truth of the observation is so evident, that the appearance of a real poet among us, may be considered a national boon. Nor is this too much to say, when we reflect on the high chivalrous spirit which the minstrel can inspire, and on the tenderness and purity that emanate from the feelings which it is his province to cherish. With this impression, we have read "The Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers;" and our feelings during the perusal were such as we have not enjoyed for a long time. Macaulay's "Ancient Lays" and Motherwell's poetry did not gratify us more,—perhaps scarcely so much as Aytoun's "Lays;" in Scotland, we are sure they must soon rank with its most popular minstrelsy, for they chime in with those emotions, associations and sympathies of the Scottish people, which time can never wear away. We look forward with hope, to other "lays" from the same gifted minstrel. Mr. Aytoun has made choice of spirit-stirring subjects, and they have lost nothing of their interest and vividness in his hands: his descriptive powers are of the highest order, and he has portrayed his scenes and actors with such magic skill, that as we read, we felt ourselves in the midst of them. It is difficult to make a selection from the eight lays which the volume contains; they abound in so many beauties. The scene of his first is in Edinburgh, just as the disastrous news from Flodden is brought in. Nothing can be more finely described than the return of Randolph Murray, before the fate of the battle has been communicated,—the multitudes thronging about him, asking how it went, and imploring news of their dear ones,—his ghastly looks,—his want of power to speak, and his merely raising up the riven banner in reply, is as fine as anything we have met with in painting or in poetry. His appearance before the elders of the city is equally affecting:—

"Then in came Randolph Murray;
His step was slow and weak,
And, as he doff'd his dinted helm,
The tears ran down his cheek:
They fell upon his corselet
And on his mailed hand,
As he gazed round him wistfully,
Leaning sorely on his brand.
And none who then beheld him
But straight were smote with fear,
For a bolder or a sterner man
Had never couch'd a spear.
They knew so sad a messenger
Some ghastly news must bring;
And all of them were fathers,
And their sons were with the king."

The inquiry of the brave old provost for his only son, who had gone to the battle, cannot be read unmoved; nor can Randolph's touching answer:—

"Right bitter was the agony
That wrung the soldier proud:
Thrice did he strive to answer,
And thrice he groan'd aloud.
Then he gave the riven banner
To the old man's shaking hand,
Saying,—'That is all I bring ye
From the bravest of the land!
Ay! ye may look upon it—
It was guarded well and long
By your brothers and your children,
By the valiant and the strong.
One by one they fell around it,
As the archers laid them low,
Grimly dying, still unconquer'd,
With their faces to the foe.
Ay! ye well may look upon it—
There is more than honour there,
Else, be sure, I had not brought it
From the field of dark despair.
Never yet was royal banner
Steep'd in such a costly dye;
It hath lain upon a bosom,
Where no other shroud shall lie.
Sirs! I charge you, keep it holy,
Keep it as a sacred thing,
For the stain ye see upon it
Was the life-blood of your king!"

The burst of agony with which the news of the death of their king is heard, has a most thrilling effect as described by the poet; and the way in which the devoted loyalists lose sight of their individual sorrows, in lamentations for their sovereign, is extremely fine; we would gladly give every word of the Lay, did our limits permit,—but the mournful silence which succeeded the vehement expressions of grief is so true to nature, that we cannot pass it over. After the provost's melancholy address, it goes on:—

"So he ended, and the others
Cared not any answer then;
Sitting silent, dumb with sorrow,
Sitting anguish-struck, like men
Who have seen the roaring torrent
Sweep their happy homes away,
And yet linger by the margin,
Staring idly on the spray."

Without suggesting any ideas of imitation, many of the stanzas in "The Execution of Montrose," reminded us of Scott. The descriptive passages could not be surpassed, and have been very rarely equalled; the appearance and bearing of Montrose as he was borne to prison, are finely given in the sixth stanza:—

"But when he came, though pale and wan,
He look'd so great and high,
So noble was his manly front,
So calm his steadfast eye:—
The rabble rout forbore to shout,
And each man held his breath,
For well they knew the hero's soul
Was face to face with death.
And then a mournful shudder
Through all the people crept,
And some that came to scoff at him,
Now turn'd aside and wept."

The description of the execution is equally striking, and in exact accordance with the authentic records:—

"He mounted up the scaffold,
And he turn'd him to the crowd;
But they dared not trust the people,
So he might not speak aloud.
But he look'd upon the heavens,
And they were clear and blue,
And in the liquid ether
The eye of God shone through:
Yet a black and murky battlement
Lay resting on the hill,
As though the thunder slept within—
All else was calm and still.

The grim Geneva ministers
With anxious scowl drew near,
As you have seen the ravens flock
Around the dying deer:
He would not deign them word nor sign,
But alone he bent the knee;
And veil'd his face for Christ's dear grace
Beneath the gallows-tree.
Then radiant and serene he rose,
And cast his cloak away:
For he had ta'en his latest look
Of earth, and sun, and day.

A beam of light fell o'er him,
Like a glory round the shriven,
And he climbed the lofty ladder
As it were the path to heaven.
Then came a flush from out the cloud,
And a stunning thunder-roll,
And no man dared to look aloft,
For fear was on every soul.
There was another heavy sound,
A hush and then a groan;
And darkness swept across the sky—
The work of death was done!"

Mr. Tytler's narrative is quoted in the little preface to "The Heart of the Bruce," and the circumstance which furnished the armorial bearings of the Douglasses is particularly noticed. Douglas, faithful to his trust, carried the heart of his master about him; it was to be laid in Scotland, and he kept it in a casket, which he wore suspended about his neck. In an action near Andalusia, he was engaged in a hot pursuit after the Moorish cavalry, but was overpowered in endeavouring to rescue Sir William Saint Clair of Roslin, who had fallen into the hands of the enemy. In the contest he took the casket containing Bruce's heart, and cast it before him, and exclaimed with a loud voice, "Now pass onward as thou wast wont, and Douglas will follow thee or die." He was left dead on the field, but his friends found his body and the casket, and carried both to Scotland. The heart was laid in Melrose, and the remains of Douglas deposited with his fathers in their own burial-ground in Douglas. The bloody-heart surmounted by a crown, has been their emblem ever since. The stanzas of this Lay brought to mind some of the fine old ballads.

"There lies, beside his master's heart,
The Douglas stark and grim;
And woe is me I should be here,
Not side by side with him!"

The world grows cold, my arm is old
And thin my lyart hair,
And all that I could boast on earth
Is stretch'd before me there.

O Bothwell banks ! that bloom so bright
Beneath the sun of May,
The heaviest cloud that ever blew
Is bound for you this day."

The graphic pen which has given such surpassing interest to the Lays, has not been less happy in the short prefaces and notes which have been given. The vindication of Claverhouse prefixed to "The Burial March of Dundee," is strikingly earnest; he appeals to the writings of his contemporaries in favour of one who, he is convinced, has been sorely maligned; "They describe him as one who was stainless in his honour, pure in his faith, wise in council, resolute in action, and free from that selfishness which disgraced the Scottish statesmen of the time." "No one dares question his loyalty," adds Mr. Aytoun, "for he sealed that confession with his blood." The portrait of Claverhouse too, is a silent witness in his favour; "When we look at it," Mr. Aytoun says, "and survey the calm melancholy and beautiful features of the devoted soldier, it appears almost incredible that he should ever have suffered under such an overwhelming load of misrepresentation." There is indeed a calm melancholy expression of countenance, which tells of purity and holiness of thought. How unlike the stamp which the malevolent passions, and the sensual vices are sure to leave on the features; no calm melancholy is ever seen there, a revolting expression of desperation alone speaks of troubled feelings. The Lay concludes with a fine apostrophe to the warrior:—

"O thou lion-hearted warrior !
Reck not of the after time :
Honour may be deemed dishonour,
Loyalty be called a crime.
Sleep in peace with kindred ashes
Of the noble and the true,
Hands that never fail'd their country,
Hearts that never baseness knew.
Sleep !—and till the latest trumpet
Wakes the dead from earth and sea,
Scotland shall not boast a braver
Chieftain than our own Dundee !"

With the recollection of Scott's fine lines on the massacre of Glencoe fresh in our minds, we turned to Aytoun's lay of "The Widow of Glencoe;" and it lost nothing by the remembrance. Always happy in presenting a picture of the scene which interests him, our poet opens the Lay with the following beautiful lines:—

"Do not lift him from the bracken,
Leave him lying where he fell—
Better bier ye cannot fashion :
None beseems him half so well
As the bare and broken heather,
And the hard and trampled sod,
Whence his angry soul ascended
To the judgment-seat of God !
Winding-sheet we cannot give him—
Seek no mantle for the dead,
Save the cold and spotless covering
Shower'd from heaven upon his head.
Leave his broadsword as we found it,
Bent and broken with the blow
That, before he died, avenged him
On the foremost of the foe.

Leave the blood upon his bosom,
Wash not off that sacred stain ;
Let it stiffen on the tartan,
Let his wounds unclosed remain,
Till the day when he shall show them
At the throne of God on high,
When the murderer and murder'd
Meet before their Judge's eye !"

The spirit is well sustained throughout the Lay. The tenderness with which the bereaved widow recurs to happy times, is exquisitely touching—

"—I found him lying murder'd
Where he woo'd me long ago !"

The preface to the next lay, "The Island of the Scots," is full of interest—King James's parting scene with the Scottish officers who had in his emergency insisted on serving as common soldiers, with the resolution of proceeding to Perpignan to join two other Scotch companies. The king burst into tears, when he saw "these brave men reduced, through their disinterested and persevering loyalty, to so very humble a condition;" he was powerfully affected as he addressed them. "The company listened to his words with deep emotion, gathered round him, as if half repentant of their own desire to go; and so parted, for ever on this earth, the dethroned monarch and his exiled subjects." The taking of the Island, the last exploit of this devoted band, is the subject of the Lay. Their plunging into the Rhine, and the indomitable courage of these heroes are admirably portrayed. Seldom have we read such an affecting passage as that which speaks of their farewell of Scotland:—

"And they had bent the knee to earth
When every eye was dim,
As o'er their hero's buried corpse
They sang the funeral hymn ;
And they had trod the pass once more,
And stoop'd on either side,
To pluck the heather from the spot
Where he had dropp'd and died ;
And they had bound it next their hearts,
And ta'en a last farewell
Of Scottish earth, and Scottish sky,
Where Scotland's glory fell.
Then went they forth to foreign lands,
Like bent and broken men,
Who leave their dearest hope behind,
And may not turn again !"

The success of the daring exploit brought nothing to the conquerors but the admiration and thanks of France, who reaped all the advantage without sharing the danger. The blighted hopes and saddened feelings of these dauntless men are beautifully touched on in the following lines:—

"And what cared they for idle thanks
From foreign prince or peer ?
What virtue had such healed words
The exiles' hearts to cheer ?
What matter'd it that men should vaunt
And loud and fondly swear,
That higher feat of chivalry
Was never wrought elsewhere ?
They bore within their breasts the grief,
That fame can never heal—
The deep unutterable woe
Which none save exiles feel.

Their hearts were yearning for the land
 They ne'er might see again—
 For Scotland's high and heather'd hills,
 For mountain, loch, and glen—
 For those who haply lay at rest
 Beyond the distant sea,
 Beneath the green and daisied turf
 Where they would gladly be."

In the name of "The Island of the Scots," which that land has borne ever since, the fame of these dauntless exiles still lives.

"Charles Edward at Versailles, on the anniversary of Culloden" is the next Lay; it bears in its very title a deep interest, for time has not extinguished the feelings with which his followers burned. He and Mary Stuart are indeed rare instances of those who continue to be objects of personal attachment long after their career is run. We may venture to say, that no Scotchman, even at this distance of time, faithful though he be to the ruling dynasty, can hear the name of "Prince Charley" without feeling his blood tingle, and his sympathies excited for the ill-fated prince whose engaging qualities, bravery, and misfortunes made him so dear to his adherents. In the preface to the Lay, the personal attractions of Charles Edward, his dauntless bearing, the disastrous issue of the battle on which his fortunes were staked, his wanderings, and his hair-breadth escapes, all are spoken of with the deep feeling which such a romantic tale was sure to excite in one of Mr. Aytoun's cast. How the Prince was loved and revered in his fallen fortunes, is touched on in the following brief passage:—

"Although a reward of thirty thousand pounds (an immense sum for the period) was set upon his head—although his secret was known to hundreds of persons in every walk of life, and even to the beggar and the outlaw,—not one attempted to betray him. Not one of all his followers, in the midst of the misery which overtook them, regretted having drawn the sword in his cause, or would not again have gladly imperilled their lives for the sake of their beloved chevalier."

The poem opens with a vision of the lost battle; and all the details as they pass before him are given in passionate exclamation by the Prince. His love and heart-yearnings towards Scotland burned in his bosom till his last moment, and are very touchingly expressed in the following lines:—

"Let me feel the breezes blowing
 Fresh along the mountain-side;
 Let me see the purple heather,
 Let me hear the thundering tide,
 Be it hoarse as Corrieveckan
 Spouting where the storm is high—
 Give me but one hour of Scotland—
 Let me see it ere I die!"

The anecdotes given in the preface and notes to this poem are peculiarly interesting, and cannot be read without exciting tender commiseration for one so gifted and so unfortunate as Charles Edward. It seldom happens that the most unfortunate are without some solace, something which to a certain degree blunts "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune;" but it was not so with him; domestic life afforded none of those tender sympathies which can assuage the most bitter grief; during his long and weary wanderings, "he was lost sight of by his friends, and even by his father and his brother," and an unfortunate marriage increased his unhappiness. It was thus, utterly deprived of the consolations which would have been congenial to his noble nature, that he sought at times to lull care by indulgences to which he would never have resorted under less adverse circumstances.

The following and the last of the Lays, "The Old Scottish Cavalier," tells of the good Lord Pitsligo, who has, it is said in the preface, "just title to be called the last of the old Scottish Cavaliers." He was in his sixty-seventh year. When Charles Edward landed in Scotland, he espoused his cause, believing it a righteous one, and the example of this pious and excellent old man had great effect; "for when he who was so wise and prudent declared his purpose of joining Charles, most of the gentlemen in those parts of the country who favoured the Pretender's cause, put themselves under his command, thinking they could not follow a better or safer guide than Lord Pitsligo." When drawn up and about to commence the expedition, "the honourable nobleman their leader moved to the front, lifted his hat, and looking up to heaven pronounced with a solemn voice the awful appeal, 'O Lord, thou knowest that our cause is just,' then added the signal for departure, 'March, gentlemen.'" After Culloden was lost, he became a fugitive for ten years. Sometimes, disguised as a mendicant, he encountered those who were searching for him, and on one occasion he guided them to the spot where they supposed he was concealed. At length he was tacitly permitted to return to the society of his friends without further notice or molestation; he lived to a great age, and as Mr. Aytoun quotes from his biographers, "calm and full of hope, the saintly man continued to the last with his reason unclouded, able to study his favourite volume, enjoying the comforts of friendship, and delighting in the consolations of religion, till he gently fell asleep in Jesus." We need scarcely add that the stanzas are fine. The story concludes thus:—

"Oh! never shall we know again
 A heart so stout and true—
 The olden times have pass'd away,
 And weary are the new:
 The fair white rose has faded
 From the garden where it grew,
 And no fond tears save those of heaven,
 The glorious bed bedew
 Of the last old Scottish cavalier,
 All of the olden time!"

We cannot come to the concluding line without expressing a hope that this is not the last lay of the minstrel, and if we might express a wish which perhaps seems to savour of censure, it would be, that Mr. Aytoun in his next offering of song should adopt a greater variety of measure. If our space permitted, we should gladly enter into the merits of the miscellaneous poems, but having so largely dwelt upon the beauties of the Lays, we must satisfy ourselves by saying that they are not unworthy of a place in the same volume.

RESIDENCE IN A LEVANTINE FAMILY.¹

THE land of the Pharaohs requires few adventitious circumstances to awaken an interest in its favour. The strong links of association, the recollection of its former greatness, of the events of which it has been the scene, are sufficient to render Egypt a constant and fruitful topic of discussion. To this circumstance may be perhaps traced the fact, that whilst much is said, little is in reality known of the manners and customs of the varied population it contains. Persons are content to view it as a spot full of noble associations, containing mysterious and unexplained curiosities, boasting more extraordinary monuments of the past than any other land upon earth, and records of a people whose ambition has been to leave to posterity, startling rather than useful mementos of generations that have gone before. Travellers, again, are rather satisfied to describe the grander objects which meet their attention, than to enter into minute narratives of the domestic life of the inhabitants of a country, the social condition of which must have many and curious revelations to make. Every one who has read at all about this mysterious land, with its trackless deserts, its hot winds, its dangerous interior, knows something of the pyramids, the sphinx, Cleopatra's needle, the Arab's tower, and the majestic Nile, with all of which dim associations are connected, and concerning which, accounts the most various have been written, and the wildest tales disseminated. It is more than probable, however, that generation after generation will pass without further elucidating the important question:—For what purpose and to what end were the pyramids built? Many and constant speculations are being made upon the subject with little or no benefit either to the public or those engaged in the investigation. It suffices that the pyramids stand, and in all probability will continue to stand, an immortal record of the past grandeur of the land of the Pharaohs. They are one of those creations which the cupidity or mischievous nature of man has not yet ventured to destroy, and from their size and position, are fortunately not exposed to the absurd and puerile fanaticism of those, whose chief ambition on visiting foreign countries is to destroy all they contain of beauty by breaking off pieces of temples and statues, in order to gratify their insane partiality for relics and portions of famous monuments of departed grandeur which should be imperishable. The writer of the volume before us, however, has nothing to do with any of these subjects. He went to Egypt with totally different views from most of those who have preceded him; viz., to examine into the actual condition of the people, —little, if at all, understood in this country. Discarding from his mind all vulgar prejudice and absurd tendencies, he resolved to ingratiate himself with the people, and by mixing among them to learn the true condition of their domestic life, and by penetrating below the dull strata of ignorance and superstition, to discover their secret motives to action, and lay bare the well-springs from which many of their curious customs proceed.

On approaching the city of Alexandria from the sea, our young traveller was actuated by many varied emotions, but by none stronger than his determination of realizing more vividly than had as yet been done a picture of Oriental private life, and it may readily, therefore, be supposed that his eagerness to plunge at once into the as yet scaled mysteries of Alexandrian society was by no means slight. We shall not linger with our author upon the topographical description of the city, but follow him into speculations more interesting to our readers. Like all other travellers, on first landing, Mr. Bayle St. John proceeded to an European Hotel. He soon, however, became fatigued with the monotony of its life, and early sallied forth to seek for something new.

He now gave way to the ardent desire which every one experiences upon setting his foot for the first time in a new country, to investigate everything, to grasp all things at once, and to run frequently from one object to another, fearful only of suffering something to escape. Although conscious that he was not merely hurrying through its streets as a passing traveller, yet it was with something of careless rapidity that he at first sped from one wukalah to another, and darted in and out the principal streets, gazed at the mosques and minarets, strolled in the gardens and villages, glancing at the Pasha's palace and harem, and suffered his attention for a time to linger upon the busy Marina, &c. The construction of Alexandria, its harbour, its fortifications, its straggling appearance, constituted so many objects of interest, and furnished employment for some days. His imagination then took another course. Quitting the more external aspect of the city, he penetrated into bazaars, bye streets, and narrow alleys of Alexandria, where he was often assailed with showers of abuse by the natives, who vented their dislike of the Feringhi by spitting on the ground over which he had passed, and shouting out their hostility in no very measured terms, in their own language, happily not then understood by Mr. St. John, who was, however, exceedingly amused at the specimens of life he beheld. In the course of his first two or three days' peregrinations he alighted upon various novel traits of character. He found himself in imagination transported into the midst of the lower orders of Irish; and while listening to the abuse of an old dame who, in order to gratify her revenge upon a young man who had offended her, was for a quarter of an hour endeavouring to scratch his face, fancied himself in the isle of Erin with a shower of broad brogue and shillelahs rattling about his ears.

No sooner, indeed, was the approach of the traveller and his guide perceived, than windows and doors were occupied in a moment; little children rushed out, clapping their hands, and in the whining tone natural to the inhabitants of the East, chanted forth the words; "Oh! Christian, creeping dog, you have taken the bread out of our mouths." Nothing daunted by his reception, Mr. St. John proceeded with his investigations, which appear to have yielded for the first two or three days nothing more interesting than the fact, that the women are very assiduous in hunting in their children's heads, and that an old Turk made a galley-slave boy hold down his ear, while he bit it savagely. On another occasion, he beheld a venerable-looking old beggar holding a child's hand, and deliberately pounding its little fingers with a heavy stick. Such traits of character were in no wise calculated to impress our traveller with a favourable idea of the people with whom he was about to mingle. The most obvious of their customs, too, are calculated to repel rather than attract. What could be more repulsive to our feelings than his account of the funeral of a soldier?—

"What a confused murmur of human voices! Look at that crowd rushing pell-mell out of yon narrow lane! First come a group of boys, ragged, and merry-looking, and dirty, screaming at the top of their voices, hustling and shoving each other about as if just escaped from school; then follow some twenty or thirty men, with red caps, red shippers, red shawls, white trousers, blue jackets, and sallow faces, all struggling forward and swinging their bodies to and fro; after this there is an interval; and afterwards, staggering along, come a group of men, carrying a bier, with a turban hanging on one of the front corners. I now know that I am witnessing a soldier's funeral, and not a bacchanalian sortie. A crowd of women, in their blue skirts, hurry along behind, uttering piercing shrieks. It is an ill-managed, undignified affair, like almost all Muslim funerals. Sometimes young boys, bearing copies of the Koran covered with brightly embroidered rich veils, go before the bier."

The appearance of Alexandria is not, as our readers are probably aware, at all times inviting. It is only at certain hours of the day that the thoroughfares and bazaars wear an animated appearance. Then, however, the strange mixture is infinitely amusing. Two or three ragged Bedouins, with old matchlocks strung upon their shoulders, or spear shafts in their hands, may here be seen, working their way along the streets and alleys, or waiting for the women who have dropped into the rear. Maronite and Greek priests, with black robes, and rimless hats, and strange looking Greeks in their jaunty tarbooshes, twisting their long moustachios, and rustling their white petticoats or loose trousers, peaceable Levantines, sly Jews, oily Copts, and all sorts of Europeans under all sorts of head-dresses, camels, bad horses, good mules, and excellent donkeys, jostle along together. Then there is the strange mingling of voices, the shrill cry of the seller, the veiled beauties, who, with flashing eyes, jostle along with sail-like trousers expanded to catch the wind, the varied goods exposed for sale in the bazaars; and towards evening, from lofty minarets, the call of the muezzin to prayer echoes dreamily through the streets, awakening every one to a recollection of the fact that Allah is great, and must be worshipped.

Mr. Bayle St. John, fortunately for the success of his future proceedings, met with a valuable friend with whose precise occupation, it is true, he was not acquainted. Shrewd suspicions, in fact, crossed him that some secret political employment had drawn him to Alexandria. Be this as it may, however, it did not behoove our author to make any very strict inquiries into this fact; suffice it, that the mysterious stranger constituted the key which unlocked the closed doors of Levantine life. Discovering Mr. Bayle St. John's object to be not to skim over the upper surface of Alexandrian society, but to penetrate lower into its depths, he offered to introduce him at once into its circle. Starting from their residence, therefore, one morning, they penetrated through a labyrinth of narrow, tortuous streets, and speedily arrived at their destination—an irregularly constructed house, through whose gateway they passed; and, after meeting with various obstructions in the shape of heavy doors, they were admitted into a court, crossing which, they wound again down various galleries, rooms, corridors, &c., and were at length ushered into a hall, where they were welcomed by a stout lady in the Levantine costume, who was afterwards destined to figure greatly in the drama of our author's Eastern life. She received them most politely, though it was evident that, in accordance with Eastern manners, some considerable confusion had preceded their admission. The room was filled with people, all of whom started up, on the entrance of the Englishmen, with the exception of the son of the lady of the house, who was ill. One dark young beauty had been unceremoniously sent out of the apartment, much against her own inclination, but there still remained a saucy little Levantine, who, in spite of protestations from her jealous husband and prudent friends, resolved to gratify her curiosity, and at the same time display her beauty. This strange assemblage of turbaned men and gracefully attired women, with their brilliant colour, and sparkling eyes,—the constant handing about of pipes, sherbet, and coffee,—the peculiar mannerisms of the people, their uprisings and sitting down, their exclamations and gesticulations,—must have struck curiously enough upon the sight of our young Englishman, suddenly, as it were, transported from the still but polished coldness of our English drawing-room; and with this unintelligible, deeply superstitious, and ignorant race he felt he was henceforth to associate, if he desired to become acquainted with them profitably to himself and others. After some hours spent very pleasantly in this society, Mr. St. John returned and employed himself in investigating the political condition of the people, into which it is not our intention to enter. Our time and space will be sufficiently employed in following closely in the domestic track.

After the proper time had, as he imagined, elapsed, Mr. Bayle St. John thought of paying another visit to his Levantine friends, and, accordingly, proceeded to the house of Sitt Madoula, the name of the lady. He arrived, and, on reaching a certain door, and in imitation of his friend, called out "Beyt! Beyt!" several times, without receiving any answer, the slaves being engaged in some other portion of the long straggling house, in their customary siesta. The son, however, who lay sick, had heard the sound of his voice, and, though unable to rise, shouted as loudly as his condition would permit, and not being able to succeed, strove, by throwing his shoes at a large water-bottle which stood upon the table, to raise an alarm. His new friend scolded him very much for having deferred his visit so long, and he was assailed with questions like the following;—Where did you go yesterday? Why did you not come? What have we done to you? From these anxious inquiries he inferred that they expected him to call every day, which was, in fact, the case. These questions are not mere forms, but the result of a genuine hospitality, in which the Oriental character is never deficient, whatever may be the vices and follies which otherwise disfigure it.

Since his last visit the Sitt had become a widow, and was dressed in the ordinary mourning costume of the family. On her head was a tarboosh encircled with a small turban of crape, her hair was dishevelled, and the profuse mass of braid and gold ornaments which had decorated her head on her first introduction to the stranger, had given place to a large black cotton bag. Observing the glance of involuntary inquiry which her visitor cast at her, she burst into tears, and explained her position. Her grief, however, was somewhat mitigated by the fact that she had twice before been in the same condition, and had probably never known that cold aching of the heart, consequent upon the loss of one linked with the dearest hopes and associations of life. She appears, however, from the whole of Mr. St. John's narrative, to have been a very superior woman of her kind, with better and purer notions than they are in general remarkable for possessing, besides many desires to escape from the subserviency of the priesthood to which the Easterns are so universally subject. She seems to have imbibed higher views than her neighbours, though there was much in her character and manners calculated to strike harshly upon the feelings of an Englishman. The inconceivable confidences into which an Oriental woman will enter with a perfect stranger are very startling, but long usage will render the most sensitive and delicate ear accustomed to this mark of friendship. The Sitt Madoula had evidently a great fancy for her now constant guest, and, ere long, a formal proposal was made to him to enter her house, nominally as a lodger, but in reality on a perfect footing of freedom with the whole family, composed of the following members:—There was the Sitt herself, and the fair Wardy or Rose, the niece of Madoula, who had lived with her from a child, and regarded her almost in the light of a mother. It was not to be supposed that the first few opportunities the young Englishman had of gazing upon this Oriental beauty were thrown away. It was by no means a disagreeable light cast upon his otherwise monotonous existence, although he was far from regarding her in the light in which her intriguing friends and relations had speedily the kindness to place her. He confesses, however, to the following:—

"The beautiful things of this earth are made to be admired, and, in spite of ourselves, we direct our homage towards them. How many of those who read these pages could have defended themselves from a slight emotion when this graceful girl came and presented them with coffee, waited until they had drunk it, and then slightly pressed their hand with the sweetest tips in the world as she took back the empty cup! For my part, I confess; that as long as I enjoyed the privilege of strangers, I always burnt my throat in my eagerness to get to the bottom—not, like Le Vaillant's Narcissus, because there was a lump of sugar-candy there—but because of the delicate salate that was to succeed."

There was, again, the little girl Hennenah, a noisy creature, six years old, dressed in a bag and jacket and red cap, with a mass of uncombed hair hanging over her brows; towards this child Sitt Madoula, who seems to have been in every respect a tender mother, evinced the deepest affection. She rooked it to sleep at night in a cradle of carved oak, and frequently, in a censer of burning coals, burnt some leaves of strong pungent odour, which she fondly imagined, stealing round the infant's couch, would render its slumbers easy, and drive away all evil spirits from around it. The mosquito curtains were then fondly folded over the bed, and she quitted it in perfect security that it was safe for that night at least.

There is still the son Iskender to mention, the delight of his mother, and toward whom, though full grown, she displayed the same officious but tender affection, watching him to bed at night and tucking him in, without which care she would not believe that his sleep would be pleasant. This young man proved to be by no means a disagreeable companion, and, though not taking perhaps a very prominent part in household proceedings, was still regarded as the representative and director of all things.

Such, with occasional visitors, were the persons with whom our traveller found himself destined to associate at home. At first some affectation of reserve was kept up, but this speedily wore off, and Mr. Bayle St. John was fully admitted at all hours and times to unlimited intercourse with the family, even in presence of the Sitt's relations, who regarded her with some wonder for her insane partiality to an infidel and heretic. The following is his own account of his first supper with the family.—

"Halil Aclin, whom I have already mentioned, and who, from having been a servant in the house, had become a small shopkeeper in one of the bazaars—alias, in the language of the country, a merchant—came in to supper, and we three—I, he, and Iskender, sat down at a little round table crowded with mezes: soup in a pie-dish in one corner, a bowl of melochiyeh (a glutinous kind of herb) in the middle, a plate of Kababs or small pieces of mutton boiled on skewers; here a dish of rice, there, flat cakes of bread thrust into every vacant place, with numerous limes, which are squeezed over every mess; three clean plates, one knife, four forks, two spoons; glasses placed on chairs by our sides with some extra dishes; Sitt Madoula stumping about on her stilt-like clogs, to see that everything was right; Wardy standing in the doorway with a water-cooler resting in the palm of her hand, ready to give us drink, and caressing the beams of her bright eyes upon us; Ali lazily squatting down in the gallery outside; Henna the Mad endeavouring to make himself generally useful. Such were the elements of the scene as I remember it. I must not forget that Halil was famous as an enormous eater, and that the great joke at table was to count and exaggerate the number of bread-cakes he devoured. A few words of grace were rapidly uttered before and after the meal, during which water was the only drink. The Levantines eat very fast, start up as soon as they have done, and have water poured over their hands, which they also sometimes rub with lemon juice. Iskender had been brought up to abhor tobacco, and almost to abstain from coffee. He was a peculiar instance. The Sitt generally took one or two shisheks, or water-pipes, every day. After supper I retired to the Deewan, or raised part of the room, and sitting down on the divan, had a pipe brought to me—of course without a mouthpiece, it being a house of mourning. I had determined to conform as much as possible to their customs, and to live with them as they lived, sharing in their tribulations and joining in their amusements. In about half-an-hour, having despatched their meal as usual in the kitchen, Sitt Madoula and Wardy retired to their sleeping apartments; Ali had gone out, Hanna was asleep, and the black girls were chattering on the housetop, their favourite place. Iskender and Halil now produced their paper lanterns, and we started to see the fun."

The feast of the Ramadhan was now approaching, and it was in order to witness some of the excitement incident to this ceremony that the two young men sallied forth. A stranger would naturally imagine the period to be one of general rejoicing for some grand victory, instead of one of fasting and lamentation. The greatest activity prevails throughout the streets, which, in general, at night wear a lonely and deserted aspect, and are sheathed in dense gloom save where the brightening influence of the moon's rays silvers a few patches of the irregular line of houses, or sparkles round the graceful minaret of some mosque or kiosk. Very few wayfarers are encountered, save those whom accident or business has drawn out to stroll through the tortuous streets, and the narrow alleys, with lanterns in their hand, flashing out from the darkness like a star. The night wanderer through Alexandria must, in general, be satisfied to gaze upon the innumerable objects of nature. The shops are, of course, shut, the bazaars closed. Here and there a pile of ruins and half finished houses rises in the moonlight; then narrow alleys diverge on all sides, and lead the eye through darkness to small vistas opening upon some little square in front of a mosque; a broken line of irregularly built houses straggles to the right and left, with their terraced roofs broken up by kiosks or sheds, while balconies and windows project overhead and break the otherwise bare front of the dwellings. In the native quarter of the town, at very rare intervals, a small oil lamp sparkles with its faint glow-worm like light, and swings in the breeze with a melancholy creaking before the gateway of some large house. At the corner of most of the streets, however, sits a watchman, sometimes with a light, but mostly without, from whom on wandering about at night you are greeted with a gruff request to acknowledge the unity of God—"Waheo"—in other words, declare that you are a friend. On this occasion, however, a far different spectacle presented itself, the shops were thrown open, the gayest merchandise displayed, the bazaars crowded. Every gallery or minaret and mosque was lighted with lamps, the coffee-houses were thronged with visitors, all engaged in preparing themselves to undergo their rigid fast, the effects of which, however, soon make themselves visible upon their countenances, in the shape of a shade of paleness deeper than ordinary, and a careworn expression of countenance. The evening is anxiously anticipated and a muezzin is stationed upon the most lofty minaret, who, the moment he perceives the sun sink into its watery bed, unfurls a flag and gives notice that all may solace themselves for their long abstinence with refreshing food. Tables are spread in the larger houses, while the lower orders immediately fly to their pipes, take a cup of coffee, and then proceed to a more substantial breakfast; for such it must be called. The night is, indeed, turned into day: some receive an assemblage of dervishes; others, more profane, indulge in musical parties with singing, and even dancing girls. Criers perambulate the streets, the bazaars are densely thronged with a mass moving hither and thither, or assembled in groups to watch the performances of buffoons, who collect in crowds so dense that the watchmen are sometimes compelled to disperse them with great straps, with which they make a regular attack upon them, striking about in the most indiscriminate manner—avoiding, however, the respectable-looking men, but showering their wrath upon the women and boys.

"One fugitive dame, in her hurry, overthrew a Levantino merchant, to the great detriment of his snow-white turban and silk robes, and receiving as she sprawled over him a rather unseasonable volley of blows, turned round in wrath upon her pursuer, whom she anatomised verbally with most extraordinary volubility—cursing his head, and his eyes, and his beard, and his tongue, and so forth; and then taking him genealogically, and falling foul of his father and mother, his grandfather and his great-grandfather. Having reached the last point—"yennahl abugid-dak!"—she came to a pause; and shortly afterwards I saw her again, an amused spectator of the atrocious contortions of the Dancing Tailor."

During the continuance of the Ramadhan it happened that the Pasha returned from his visit to Constantinople, and a grand illumination was given, which somewhat diversified the otherwise monotonous features of the long fast, continuing three nights, during which the city was one blaze of light. Not a single house remained unilluminated, and no expense was spared to render the scene as brilliant as possible. From the palace of Ras-et-tin to the Rosetta Gate, a distance of several miles, was one splendid waving line of lamps, hung in diversified forms, while every villa and garden was illumined in the most gorgeous style. There were vases, giving forth a deep red flame, enormous crescents, stars and devices, rows of verdant arches with coloured lanterns, long avenues of flowery shrubs blazing with light, fountains that sparkled in the intense glare of thousands of lamps, trees of fire, along with everything else that could combine to render the scene one of Oriental romance. The glancing of lights in the distance, the movements of solitary women in white cloaks, like shrouds amongst the tombs, along with the bustle of penons moving to and fre, coming and going to the fairs or bazaars, crowding round some dervish, or phantasmagoria, or dancing buffoons, with a noise that was quite stunning, rendered the scene infinitely amusing. The constant murmurs of salutations passing around, every Muslim considering it a duty to ask after his friends' health each time he passes.

Nothing could be better calculated than the scenes we have described to render a residence in Alexandria one of deep interest to a stranger, newly arrived. The Ramadhan, however, being over, Mr. Bayle St. John devoted himself to a survey of more private Levantine life. By this class, it must be understood, that our author means the Arab Christians, whether of Syrian origin or not, preserving, with slight modifications, their own manners, which definitively bear a great resemblance to those of the Muslims. It is to this class that Mr. Bayle St. John chiefly devotes his attention, though, as he informs us, he could with ease write a volume upon every particular feature of Eastern life.

Shortly after his instalment in his new home, he had an opportunity of witnessing the gradual struggles into maturity of a little line of shops recently built opposite his windows. The monthly rent was thirty piastres, or six shillings, paid in advance. The description is so admirable that we will not venture to curtail it, even at the risk of giving a somewhat lengthy extract to our readers.

"One of them was taken by a barber, who came and installed himself, with his basins, ewers, razors, &c. in a small box; the next was soon occupied by a general dealer, who exhibited two or three pounds of candles, a large earthen jar of samne or clarified butter, a small jar of honey, half a cask of preserved olives, some white cheese, and so on; next door a coffee shop was soon opened, provided with two shishahs or superior kind of water-pipes, three gozohs or cocoa-nut water-pipes with straight cane tubes, a few chibouks, a brazier with utensils for cooking and serving coffee. The adjoining shop remained unlet for some time. At length, one morning, I observed it to be open, and a worthy gentleman, in long robes and ponderous turban, busily occupied in arranging a few glass bottles, earthenware plates, basins, &c. on a couple of shelves—the whole to the value of about forty piastres or eight shillings. These, however, were not all his riches, for he presently opened a packet, and exhibited upon a handkerchief, spread on the floor of his shop, two pieces of calico, some yards of common prints, a couple of ordinary shawls, and a few tobacco pouches. These last articles, as I afterwards learned, had been obtained on credit from a man who, on the strength of this circumstance, came every afternoon and sat three or four hours with his debtor. The poor old gentleman accordingly thought it his bounden duty to dissipate the little anticipated profit, in tobacco and figans of coffee from the neighbouring shop. On one occasion, moreover, I actually heard him cry out, 'Ya betaa hommuz!' that is, O belonging to chick peas! equivalent to seller of peas! The cry was addressed to a girl who was passing by with a great bundle of the green plant upon her head, but fortunately was not heard. I took great interest in watching the progress of this Taggar or merchant, as he called himself. For the greater part of the time, he sat perfectly alone in his shop, gravely stroking his beard and trying to look indifferent, but anxiously watching for a customer. The street, however, was a new one, and not much frequented then. He waited in vain—customers came not. Now and then, when a solitary woman was passing, he would timidly hail her with the customary, 'Aeez al, ya hint! Taail, ya, ayni! What do you want, O girl? come, O my eyes! but the general answer was that nothing was wanted. I once saw a party of women, evidently on a shopping expedition, stop in the middle of the street, to call out, Andak Shash. Have you any muslin? No! Have you any silk? No! Have you any gauze? No! The poor fellow had none of these fine things, and the party proceeded to the more wealthy bazaars."

Day after day admitted the Feringhi into closer habits of intimacy with the Levantine family. The Sitt regarded him with more and more affection, while the son looked upon him in the light of a friend. He was freely admitted to a knowledge of their domestic life, accompanying Iskender to the bazaar, and sitting with his shishak upon the carpet, watching the progress of buying and selling there, and examining the goods that he disposed of as well as the manner of so doing. The Eastern merchant does not trust to chance for customers, as in England and elsewhere, but no sooner were the goods set to rights in the morning, than he would sit down or stand at his door, inviting every one who passed to enter, and examine if his shops did not contain what they required; "Come, O girl, what do you seek? O my eyes! Come, O my heart." There is little honesty used in the mode of sale. The shop-keeper will obstinately adhere to his first price, even though it be an extortionate one. Iskender had kept a sword which he valued at forty dollars for two years' rather than sell it for thirty eight; although fully aware that the price of fine blades had fallen. "Yefta Allah!" was his reply to those who made him the offer, that is, God will open for me a way of sale! This expression is the one always used to imply a refusal or close a bargain. "What is the price of this article? Forty piastres. I will give you thirty.—Yefta Allah! Thirty, no! Yefta Allah," &c. &c.

When at home with the Sitt, in the absence of Iskender at the bazaar, Mr. Bayle St. John enjoyed the position of an elder son in the family, and was consulted on every occasion. Although, in reality, living on the most perfect terms of equality, Sitt Madoula took care officiously to point out to every visitor and relation who thronged her house out of curiosity or on business, the fact that a wooden bar was nailed across, to divide the portion of the house inhabited by the European from the remainder. This was merely, however, a nominal division. He possessed a private door opening from his bedroom to a passage leading to every part of the house, which allowed him free egress and ingress whenever he chose to avail himself of it. During his early instalment in this domestic circle, the ceremony of bringing him his meals to partake of alone in his chamber was maintained, but gradually this restriction wore off, and Oriental custom and etiquette was so far infringed as to allow him to sit at table with the rest in the family eating apartment. The Sitt, struggling between her national prejudices and her interest in the young Englishman, strove to conceal the dreadful fact that he was sharing in the same interests and joining in their occupations. Her natural character, however, burst frequently the slender bonds of her dissimulation, and she was constantly revealing the important truth by some indiscreet allusion hastily dropped, and as hastily sought to be recovered. Her prudence, however, was extraordinary, as appears from the fact of her carefully locking every door, so that no lover or friend could penetrate into the house or court-yard, to the spot where Wardy or the slave girls were assembled. The arrangements for the night were as follows :—

"In one large room nearly filled up with two raised platforms on either side the door, leaving only a narrow passage between, slept what may be called the harem, safely locked in; that is to say, the Sitt, and Heneneh, with either Wardy, a young Mohammedan servant girl, or a black female slave, Zara, who had belonged to the family for twelve or thirteen years, and was invested with the protection of age, passed the night in a kind of warehouse below. Iskender occupied the bedroom next to his mother, who carefully barricaded the doors and windows with cushions, and heaps of rags, to prevent him from catching cold. Ali and Hanna sometimes slept in the kitchen, sometimes in the great recess in the court-yard below, and sometimes in the gallery. The triple series of doors forming the entrance, were bolted, barred, and locked, as were the doors at the bottom and top of every staircase; so that every body was compelled to stop until morning in the position they took overnight. I alone had a set of keys for my own staircase and the outer door, and could move in and out as I pleased."

The wildest speculations were soon wafted abroad concerning the stranger's actual position. Sometimes it was whispered that the Sitt Madoula had fixed upon him as the successor to her three former husbands as soon as her period of mourning had expired. Nor was this result apparently at all distasteful to the numerous relatives, one of whom, one day, ventured to draw him aside, and expatiated on the excellence of the match it was in his power to make, describing the store of wealth in her possession, and trusting that he might easily enter into partnership with her son Iskender, and become thereby, in course of time, a very respectable merchant. His officious friend was kindly thanked by the traveller, but as his own notions of the future appeared somewhat to differ from those of the Oriental, he gravely informed him that he considered the Sitt, though a worthy personage, almost, if not quite, old enough to be his mother. The rejection of so brilliant an offer was instantly tortured into another meaning; it immediately occurred to him that there must be some concealed reason for his refusal, and ascribed it to an affection he supposed him to entertain for the fair Wardy, or, in fact, that there might be no affection in the case; he was probably hesitating between pecuniary and other motives. He gently hinted as much, but on receiving a somewhat stiff reply from Mr. Bayle St. John, to the effect that the Sitt was his mother and Wardy his sister, the intriguing scoundrel retreated, scowling over the ill-success of his plans. Machination, indeed, had long been in progress concerning Wardy, in whom, though perhaps our author could not repose his affections, he experienced all the interest of a brother. It was not, therefore, without feelings of much uneasiness that he discovered the plans in agitation to decoy her away, now that she was arrived at a marriageable age. Wardy's humble admirer, Hanna, was driven to despair by the turn affairs were taking, for the poor imbecile fellow was, as far as his capabilities admitted him, devotedly attached to his young mistress. The leader in these intrigues was Sidi Lyas, an uncle with whom a quarrel had broken out, but who steadfastly refused to quit the house, and the laws of hospitality not permitting a forcible ejection, was suffered to remain. He inhabited the room formerly occupied by his brother, Sitt Madoula's husband, and constantly fixed himself at a window, commanding a view of the whole court, whence he could survey both Wardy's and the infidel stranger's proceedings, between whom he imagined an affection subsisted. Once placed upon this scent, Mr. Bayle St. John encouraged the belief, for the purpose of annoying the old gentleman, who would spend whole days upon the watch for some circumstance upon which to ground a cause of scandal. If Wardy happened to come near the door of the stranger's room, his face would approach close to the panes and his eyes gleam with rage. Sometimes Wardy would come and talk to the Englishman through the chinks, when he would inform her that her uncle made a practice of watching her, upon which she irreverently exclaimed aloud: Anamali? What do I care? It must be confessed there was some ground for supposing a likelihood of such a state of things, and it was evident the Sitt Madoula would have been by no means displeased had it indeed been so. Wardy was a beautiful girl, and in the interesting occupation of teaching the Englishman Arabic, it is more than probable that they did not either of them confine themselves to the strict business of the moment. The reader must sincerely draw an inference from the following story, which the writer declares has very much to do with Wardy's impressions concerning himself. It may not on the surface appear, but will most likely do so on a thorough investigation:

"One night I returned late from the European quarter, lighted a candle in my study, and, shutting the door of separation, went to bed. After some time, I was awakened by a soreness in the eyes. I thought I had got ophthalmia, so I covered them up and I went to sleep again. About an hour before daylight I awoke a second time, and now noticed that the room was full of smoke. I was so stupefied, however, that I had scarcely strength to move, and lay still, in fact, for about a minute, feeling more and more inclined to give way again to sleep, although I was perfectly convinced that there was fire somewhere. At length, by a sudden effort, I got up, staggered to the door, and opened it; a dense volume of smoke then rushed in upon me. I descended the steps, but was compelled to make a hasty retreat. So black and dense was the vapour, that I could only distinguish a dim glow at the other end of the room, I shut the door, and proceeded to call the servants, in order to get water. One door being nailed up and the other bolted inside, it was some time before I could make myself heard. At length, however, the whole family came, with the exception of Lyas, who slept out that night, and Iskender, who remained in his bed in a state of monstrous trepidation, making up his mind, in case the flames spread, to cut and run for it. The whole divan, the curtains, and part of the wood-work of the windows, were destroyed; but we at length succeeded in getting the flames under. Luckily, my study, unlike the rest of the house, was nearly all stone; had it been otherwise, half the quarter might have been burnt down. I suppose I must have carelessly thrown the match, with which I lighted the lamp, upon the divan, instead of on the stone floor; but my landlady would have it that some malicious neighbour had chucked a coal of fire through an open window."

Ever after this affair Wardy was a changed being. She had heard tales of the unhappy lot of Eastern wives, and was continually present when, encouraged by the delight of finding a listener, they would pour forth their troubles into the Englishman's ear. His disposition must have interested her in him, for her demonstration of affection was unequivocal. She deemed that a young man who spoke kindly to her, who seemed to be living there without any profession and with money at his command, would make a more interesting husband than a turbaned, bearded and moustached fellow, who would shut her in a harim. She accordingly made every possible show of affection, and would shower upon him the richest glances whenever they sat together at meal time. Every possible excuse was resorted to for entering his room if it was only for a moment; she fancied he must continually be in need of a fresh pipe, and inquired at the most impossible times, when he was studying, and if he directed his glance towards the condemned door, he was sure to encounter her eyes peeping through the chinks, and hear her voice exclaiming—"Malak ya vingar." What is the matter, O St. John? His room was daily decorated with flowers by her hands, but at length, after having tried every means of convincing her that he regarded her only in the light of a friend, sometimes by attempts at harshness, in which he was defeated by her meekness and gently reproachful looks, when having scolded her for taking away his books, he at length allowed his stoicism to melt before her tenderness, an innocent flirtation was commenced, in which it is evident she entered with far more serious views than our author. One morning, after a pretty interesting scene with Wardy, in which an affectionate farewell was taken at the condemned door, Mr. Bayle St. John sallied forth to stroll in the bazaars. There is a crisis in all such affairs of which circumstances give warning, only that we do not notice them, but remember them after, and wish we had heeded the warning voice. It happened that day that he had business to transact, and on returning somewhat hastily from the bazaar to prepare for the post, he passed Wardy in the court-yard. She playfully called out to him, My bridegroom! He glanced hastily at her, smiled, and passed on. He never saw poor Wardy again. There was a busy concave sitting up stairs, composed of friends and relatives who were busy in deciding upon the poor girl's fate. They had heard of a merchant at Beyrout who was in want of a wife, and who had already had ten wives, and had scarcely a tooth remaining in his head. Poor little Wardy, the pride of the Sitt, with her innocent and hopeful heart beating with impulses foreign to an Oriental heart, was to be consigned to the care of an unfeeling old Turk, and leave all her early associations and happy friends, to be secluded in the walls of a harem. When in the evening Mr. Bayle St. John returned, he heard to his great surprise, amidst the tears and lamentations of the Sitt, the story of her being conveyed away. They had followed her to the room where she had locked herself in, and forced the door, and at length induced her by alternate threats and promises to leave the home where she had received the attention of a mother from the kind-hearted Madoula.

The departure of the Rose left a gap in the household economy of the Sitt, which nothing could wholly fill up. Our author felt some reproachful pangs on the departure of the young Levantine, and marks the great change which her absence wrought, by one simple expression—simple, but full of meaning, which occurs in his diary:—

"THE HOUSE IS DULL WITHOUT WARDY."

"He never met her again. The relations who conveyed her to Beyrout quitted her only when safely deposited in the hands of her future husband, and the door of the harem once closed upon her, no shadow of her form would ever again perhaps fall upon the street, no stranger would ever hear her voice. Those who have experienced a similar sentiment will perfectly understand the solitude in which the departure of one bright spirit leaves a house.

It is amusing to follow the now domesticated stranger in his daily routine of Levantine life, and the gradual strengthening of the little bond of friendship which had at first formed the link between our author and the Sitt's family. Like most other persons who aim at being superlatively kind, the tender solicitude of the Sitt was sometimes far from welcome. Habituated herself to the climate of Egypt, she could not conceive how loss of appetite from exposure to the heat could ever take place, and if Mr. Bayle chanced to refrain from partaking as usual of her bountiful hospitality, she was distressed beyond measure, imagined he was offended, and would stand a little apart and watch the progress of his meal, taking care to quadruple the quantity next day of that particular dish of which she fancied he partook the most. In order not to excite her anger or distress, Mr. St. John called to his aid a hungry cat and kitten, who made ample amends for his own deficiency. What, however, proves the inherent hospitality of her heart more than anything else, was the fact that she never on any occasion permitted him to make any extra remuneration for any visitors he might invite, no matter what the number; "Your friends are my friends," was her reply invariably.

We fear we have been tempted by this delightful narrative to follow it more closely and at greater length than we had at first intended. For the many amusing adventures it contains, for the visit to the Harem, the description of the dancing girls, smuggled with the Sitt's connivance into the house, and various other details, we must refer to the volume itself, which will amply repay a perusal, inasmuch as it is stocked with anecdotes, and traits of manner highly characteristic and interesting, while the descriptions given are written in a manly modest style. We may assure our readers that the work, though small, will throw a very vivid light upon the customs of the East.

 "A Life of Christopher Columbus." By Horace Roscoe St. John. This is a vivid and picturesque narrative of the life and discoveries of the great navigator, interspersed with apposite reflections and many genuine touches of eloquence. It is said in the preface, that this volume, (which, we may observe, en passant, is extremely modest in size and pretensions,) "was at first written without the aid of Washington Irving's work;" but the appearance of that admirable biography induced the author to depart from his original design, and to produce a much smaller book than he had at first contemplated. We have no hesitation in stating that the present production is just the kind of biography, which the school-boy would read through with unflagging interest. Its pages are crowded with incidents and adventures,—perhaps the most romantic and remarkable that have ever chequered the life of an individual,—in all respects most admirably told; and the character of the great discoverer of the western continent is delineated with great discrimination, power, and skill. Mr. St. John's "Life of Columbus," we can assure our readers, is by no means a common-place piece of biography; it abounds in vivid descriptions and vigorous thoughts, and the language is uniformly terse and elegant.

"The Burden of the Bell, and other Lyrics." By T. Westwood. A short note at the beginning of this volume informs us that several of the poems included in this collection have already appeared in the Athenæum and Frazer's Magazine. We apprehend that their re-appearance in the present form will be hailed with pleasure by many well-judging friends who have already detected their excellence. Mr. Westwood's lyrics appear to us to be instinct with true poetic feeling. He possesses, it is evident, a refined and cultivated taste, a warm imagination, and a musical ear. We might cite many happy examples of his graceful and elegant versification; and if this volume should fall (as we hope it will) into the hands of some of our readers, we would beg them to turn to the "Poet's Flower-gathering," "Effie's Secret," and the "Greeting on the Threshold," as exhibiting some of the best characteristics of Mr. Westwood's muse, and as being, at the same time, favourable specimens of modern fugitive poetry. A little poem entitled "Love her still," is full of gentle and graceful sentiment, and reminds us of some of the humane outpourings of the late Thomas Hood. We could not help fancying that there is, occasionally, a slight affectation in Mr. Westwood's phraseology, which we should like to see avoided; but where there is so much excellence, we do not wish to appear censorious.

"The Amyott's Home; or, Life in Childhood." By the author of "Life's Lessons," &c. A very interesting book for children of both sexes, conveying many useful lessons in an attractive style. The object of the authoress, as set forth in the preface, appears to us to be worthy of all commendation. "She would endeavour," she tells us—and we quote her words with real pleasure—"to inspire in children a respect for their own age, and would help to inculcate into the very youngest a sense of the holy bond between Life and Duty, showing that the small efforts and victories of the child, on the side of virtue, are precisely of the nature of those which make the Heroes and Philanthropists of grown up life."

"Whose Poems?" Under this strange title we have a small volume of poetry, published by Mr. Pickering, in a superior style of typography, and inviting notice as well from the intrinsic merit as the eccentric character of its contents. The preface informs us that "the poems were composed at different times, and without a view to publication." Many of them appear to us to display great powers of fancy, and facility of versification.

"The Vale of Cedars; or, the Martyr: a Story of Spain in the Fifteenth Century." By Grace Aguilar. The scene of this interesting tale is laid during the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella; and the authoress has cleverly availed herself of the religious and social aspects of the period to construct a story full of curious and romantic incident. "The Vale of Cedars" is the retreat of a Jewish family, compelled, by persecution, to perform their religious rites with the utmost secrecy. On the singular position of this fated race in the most catholic land of Europe, the interest of the tale mainly depends; whilst a few glimpses of the horrors of the terrible Inquisition are afforded the reader, and heighten the interest of the narrative.

"Pleasant Pastime; or, Drawing-room Dramas, for private representation by the young." The author of these dramas introduces them by stating that "impersonation has ever been the favourite pastime of childhood and youth," and that it is believed "that this development of the imitative faculty may be directed to useful purposes." Some pleasant little dramas are accordingly constructed, adapted for the performance of young people in private families and schools, and illustrating in general some moral sentiment. We can only say, that from their varied character and the simplicity of their structure, these Lilliputian dramas are admirably calculated to answer the purpose for which they have been written. The grave and gay appear to be mingled in equal proportions, and as the gem of the latter class we may particularly mention, "Ahmed the Cobbler, or the Astrologer," founded on an incident related in Malcolm's Sketches of Persia, which is full of harmless fun.

THE ARTHURS OF BRITAIN.

QUEEN VICTORIA seems resolved to introduce a complete change in the names of the royal family of England. Instead of George, Augustus, Frederick, Adolphus, and William, we have Albert, Alfred, and Arthur Patrick. The little boy only requires the addition of Andrew, to unite in himself the favourite names of the three kingdoms, which, in the lapse of time, have happily, as far as political matters are concerned, merged in England, retaining still, however, many interesting remains and evidences of independent nationality. As for Andrew, there may be, as the poet of progress, Charles Mackay, says or sings, "A good time coming yet."

With respect to the young ladies of her Majesty's happy fireside, we have a similar change; and Charlotte, Caroline, and Elizabeth, give place to Alice Maude, Louisa, and Helen.

The high and unwonted compliment paid to ARTHUR DUKE OF WELLINGTON, by the giving of his name to the young prince, has awakened public curiosity to the history of the name Arthur, as connected with our national history; a curiosity, for attempting to gratify which by the following brief notice, we expect the thanks of our readers.

The first ARTHUR whom we have to notice is the ancient British king, celebrated among other feats for his Knights of the Round Table.

The books which have been written on this hero are, beyond all reckoning, numerous. They might remind one of the story of the German prince, who, having received a cast of the skull of Robert the Bruce from George IV. and, although the owner of a most extensive library, being quite ignorant who this Bruce could be, desired his librarian to send him all the books he had about such a man. He was surprised by the arrival of a waggon load, with an intimation that a second would speedily follow. There have been little less than waggon loads of books written on King Arthur, and, as "a multitude of words darken wisdom," there is very little certain truth to be extracted from the whole mass.

Mr. Whittaker's account of King Arthur is held to be one of the most reasonable. Mr. Southey, in his introduction to "The Byrth, Lyf, and Actes of Kyng Arthur," gives a learned disquisition on his history. Richard Robinson, who prides himself on the title "Citizen of London," published in 1583 a little black-letter volume, styled, "The Auncient Order, Societie and Unitie laudable, of Prince Arthure, and his Knightly Armoury of the Round Table." It contains the titles, and a curious account, in doggerel rhyme, of the coats of arms of fifty-eight knights. When our infant prince Arthur comes in due season to entertain knights, we would recommend him, if he wishes for anything like comfort, to diminish very much the size of his round table.

Spenser makes Arthur's history the medium of the beautiful metrical romances, known to all lovers of English literature as "The Faery Queen." Sir Lytton Bulwer has also used his well-plumed pen on the same subject.

But we must give up further enumeration, else we shall furnish a list as bulky and confused as M. Panizzi's letter A, in the new catalogue at the Museum library. Suffice it to say, that while many of the works profess to be true histories, others are avowedly romances; and that the romances, in all likelihood, contain as much truth as the histories.

The word Arthur is the old Welsh, or Silurian, Arth-uir, meaning great man, or sovereign; and our hero is supposed to have been prince of the Silures, one of the tribes of ancient Britons. Admitting this to be the meaning of the word, the "hero of a hundred fights" has well vindicated his right to the name; and we trust Victoria's third son may be a great man also; but we would have him the Arthur of peace, as his godfather has been the Arthur of war.

King Arthur would appear, by the most credible accounts, to have been the son of Gorleis, Duke of Cornwall, and his wife Igerna, although when he had been raised to the sovereignty of the Britons in Wales, the vanity of the Welsh induced them to invent a fable by which his paternity was attributed, through the agency of magic, to Uther, pendragon, or king, of Wales. From his earliest youth he was distinguished as a warrior, and his fame having reached the ears of Ambrosius, pendragon of the Briton tribes, he was employed by him as a general in his wars against the Saxons and the Scots. Many are the accounts of his victories over these nations. He penetrated to the north of England, and defeated the Saxons in several battles in Lincoln and Yorkshire. He defeated also the united Scots and Picts on the borders of Scotland, and besieged Dunbritton, the modern Dumbarton, which, from its being almost inaccessible, must, before the use of cannon, have been a place of great strength. He also visited Edinburgh, at least so says tradition.

He so far influenced Scotch affairs, that his adherent, among rival claimants, was declared king of that nation, a circumstance not forgotten by Edward I. when he advanced his iniquitous claims to that kingdom. Loth, one of Arthur's knights, is supposed to have established himself in the Lothians, to which he gave his name. The pendragon Ambrosius was succeeded by his brother Uther, the magical father of Arthur; and on his death, Arthur was chosen pendragon: this was in 516. He was now at the height of his power, which seems to have been very extensively acknowledged, in so far that princes from all parts of the island, and probably also from Ireland, did him homage. It was then he instituted the knighthood of the round table, which has the credit of having given rise to all the orders of knighthood in Europe. It is assuredly a much more pleasant and jovial title than that of the evil-suggesting garter, the cold bath, or the prickly thistle; and should a new order be instituted by Her Majesty in honour of Prince Arthur, we would suggest its adoption. It has a hospitable sound—the round table, and we hope authors will not be forgotten in the distribution of the honours.

Arthur married Guenhumera, a lady of Cornwall, the same who, under the name of Guenever, is the subject of many metrical romances, in which she is more famed for her beauty than for conjugal fidelity. The stories of our hero's conquest of Sweden, Norway, Iceland, and the Orkneys, defy the belief of the most credulous; but he made an expedition into France, when Guenever, choosing to consider him as good as dead, married his nephew, Modred, and the two took possession of the throne. On Arthur's return a civil war of course ensued; Modred was defeated in an ancient Waterloo—a three days' battle, but the Arthur of old, less fortunate than him of our day, received so many wounds that he died shortly after in the island of Avelon, and was buried in the same place. This took place in A.D. 542, so that his reign as pendragon or king was twenty-six years. Of Modred's fate we learn—

"But Arthur slewe Modred with his knyfe long,
That Caliburne was called, of such vertue,
That whomsoc'er he smote therewith he slewe."

The knights of old had a fond fancy for giving names to their favourite swords, shields, and helmets, as well as to their horses.

Dr. Kippis tells us, that Henry II. in the last year of his reign, being at Pembroke, and hearing a Welsh bard singing to his harp the story of Arthur, concluding without account of his death and burial in the churchyard of Glastonbury, between two pyramids,—(it must be noticed that Glastonbury is the ancient Avelon, and was an island.)—the king instantly gave orders that the matter should be inquired into, and the body dug up. This was done, as the king directed; and, at the depth of seven feet, was found a vast stone, whereon was fastened a leaden cross, with this inscription on the inside, "Hic jacet inclitus Rex Arturius sepultus in Insula Avalonia." "Here lies the famous King Arthur, buried in the Isle of Avelon." Digging still lower, they found the king's body in the trunk of a tree, his beautiful queen lying beside him, with long flowing hair, in colour bright as gold, which, however, sunk into dust when touched. The king's bones were very large sized, and in his skull there were ten wounds, or more, all cicatrised except that of which he died. This discovery was made in 1189, as Giraldus Cambrensis tells us, who saw these bones, and examined the whole matter carefully. There was also a table containing this story set up in the monastery of Glastonbury; and the leaden cross, with the inscription, remained there till the dissolution of the monastery, when it was seen by the great antiquary, Leland; but what became of it since doth not appear. When we call to mind the cause of the war, the allegation that the queen's body was found beside that of Arthur throws doubt on the whole story. However, as Guenever retired to a nunnery, she may have had influence to cause her remains to be laid with those of Arthur. And the story is not without confirmation, for we read in Stowe's Chronicle, A.D. 1278, sixth of Edward I. "In the month of April the king and queen, and the archbishop of Canterbury, with their trains, took their journey towards Glastonbury, where the king caused the tomb of Arctour to be opened, whose bones he caused to be removed out of the said tomb, to behold the length and bigness of them, and then returned to London."

That Arthur surveyed broad Scotland from the magnificent hill which towers over Edinburgh, and bears the name of Arthur's Seat, is a tradition which the more zealously national of the Scottish antiquarians do not willingly admit; and they assign a different derivation to the word. There is no improbability, however, in Arthur's having visited Edinburgh, and that the hill in question received its name from him. A more modern, if somewhat trivial story, connected with this name and place, we can vouch for the truth of. The visitors to Edinburgh may remember a cottage which stood, some years ago at least,—(we know not if it still exists,)—on the brow of the hill overlooking Holyrood Palace. It was occupied by a very old man, named Johnston, one of the keepers of the grounds, who, in addition, sold ale to thirsty travellers, who had been climbing the neighbouring hills. This old man had an old raven, of great size, which he had trained to utter a few words. When asked, "Who won the battle of Waterloo?" it used to croak out, in tones by no means indistinct, "Arthur, boy!"

The next Arthur whose name attracts our attention in English history ought, had right prevailed, to have been king also. He is the unfortunate Arthur of Brittany, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, and grandson of Henry II. King of England. His mother was Constance, daughter of Conan, Duke of Brittany and Earl of Richmond. His misfortunes began early indeed; for the death of his father preceded his birth, which took place on March 31st, 1187. His uncle, Richard of the Lion-heart, had acknowledged him as his heir; but when that king received his death-wound, in 1199, he left all his dominions to his brother John,—a younger brother than Geoffrey,—worked upon by some secret influence, probably by that of his mother, if, indeed, the will was not forged by the Queen Dowager Elinor and her son John—a suspicion to which the infamous characters of both lend ground. Arthur was only twelve years of age, and had little chance against his crafty opponents; yet, under the guidance of his mother, Constance, he asserted his claims boldly; and, had his friends had more patience, and resolved to "bide his time," it is probable he would have succeeded, when the nation had been given time to reflect on the justice of his claims, and to discover the profligacy of John. As it was, a war between the two parties took place; and Philip of France having taken up the cause of Arthur, the English resented any such interference, and the youthful prince's cause was henceforth hopeless.

Shakspeare, in his historical drama of "King John," has thrown round this period the halo of his genius; and, after all that has been written by graver historians, the account of the bard of Avon is, probably, as nearly as can be learned, the correct one. Philip's ambassador claims the crown from John in these terse and lofty words:—

Chatillon. Philip of France, in right and true behalf Of thy deceased brother Geoffrey's son, Arthur Plantagenet, lays most lawful claim To this fair island, and the territories, To Ireland, Poitiers, Anjou, Touraine, Maine: Desisting thee to lay aside the sword Which aways usurpingly these several titles, And put the same into young Arthur's hand, Thy nephew and right royal sovereign."

In this rapid passage we have a summary of the dominions of England in those days; and if she has lost "Poitiers, Anjou, Touraine, Maine," the acquisition of India, Australia, Canada, and more islands than Mr. Benjamin Hawes or Sir William Molesworth can well keep count of, amply compensates for them. To the cavalier demand of France King John demurs:—

"What follows if we disallow of this?"

Chatillon. The proud control of fierce and bloody war, To enforce these rights so forcibly withheld.

K. John. Here have we war for war, and blood for blood, Controlment for controlment.—So answer France."

This is a summary way of settling a negotiation, which might give a useful hint, and save much time to Lord Palmerston and the protocolorians. M. Drouhyn de Luys, indeed, seems to have acted pretty much in the same spirit lately; but it has all evaporated, and now

"They shoot but calm words folded up in smoke."

According to our bard, Queen Elinor, who had played false to her first husband because he shaved his beard, and who had stirred up his sons to rebellion against her second husband, was quite conscious of the unsoundness of John's title to the throne. John says—

"Our strong possession and our right for us!"

Elinor. Your strong possession, much more than your right;

Or else it must go wrong with you and me. So much my conscience whispers in your ear; Which none but heaven and you and I shall hear."

What a contrast does this succession present to one which took place in our own day, when a lovely and amiable girl in her teens, amid the acclamations of millions, succeeded to an empire on which the sun never sets!

King Philip, in an interview with John, thus energetically describes Arthur's person and claims:—

"Look here, upon thy brother Geoffrey's face; These eyes, these brows, were moulded out of his: This little abstract doth contain that large Which died in Geoffrey; and the hand of time Shall draw this brief into as huge a volume. That Geoffrey was thy elder brother born, And this his son. England was Geoffrey's right, And his is Geoffrey's. In the name of God, How comes it then that thou art called a king, When living blood within these temples beats, Which owe the crown that thou o'ermasterest?"

The alleged will of Richard does not pass unquestioned. Elinor says—

"I can produce

A will that bars the title of thy son.

Constat. Aye, who doubts that?—a will, a wicked will, A woman's will, a cankered grandam's will."

The unfortunate prince himself exclaims—

"Good mother, peace!"

I would that I were laid in my grave! I am not worth this cell that's made for me."

And so it was. His army was defeated at Mirabeau—a place since celebrated as giving the title to the great revolutionary orator,—and himself taken prisoner. He was confined, first in Falaise, and afterwards in Rouen. In the spring of the year 1203 he disappeared, history tells us, and was never more heard of. Shakspeare represents that two attempts,—the one to put out his eyes, and the other to murder him,—having failed, through the humanity of Hubert, Arthur made an effort to escape, fell from the walls, and was killed. This, and his laying the scene in England instead of France, suited the plan of his drama. Arthur's body was never produced; and as John, although loudly arraigned by the clamours of his people, and more formally summoned by Philip as the lord paramount of his French dominions, could give no credible account of his nephew's death, we cannot but conclude that he had caused him to be secretly murdered. It is probable that the same fate befell his only sister some years afterwards.

If in his life he could not serve his people, by his death he did: it added much to that general indignation against John, which ended in wresting from him Magna Charta.

When the Earl of Richmond succeeded to the throne as Henry VII. he was anxious to strengthen his very doubtful claims to represent even the house of Lancaster. That he was a Tudor there could be no doubt, and it was easy to trace Tudor to Tewdrig, a Welsh prince of fame, and through him to Arthur. When therefore Henry's queen, Elizabeth of York, presented him with a boy at Winchester, in September 1486, he named the infant prince of Wales Arthur, in compliment to his original country, and in allusion to his descent from that illustrious hero. The Welsh thus claim our royal family all to themselves. Our friends the Welsh are most enterprising genealogists; they even lay claim to the Scottish Stuarts. Fleance, son of the Banquo who murdered the sleep of Macbeth, fled to Wales, and his son, by a Welsh princess, returning to Scotland, became steward to the Scottish king, and his descendant, marrying the daughter of Bruce, gave kings to Scotland, and ultimately to England. Thus between the Welsh and the Germans England has no claim to her Queen at all; the descent from Alfred is eclipsed.

The birth of this Arthur, prince of Wales, is thus mentioned by an old historian: "This to the most fortunate king was a near happiness; to the queen a great matter of joy; to the church a sovereign delight; to the court an exceeding pleasure; and, in sum, to the whole kingdom an incredible satisfaction." The events of this prince's life hurried rapidly on from the cradle to the grave. We are told that he was serious and studious, and learned beyond most princes. At fifteen years of age his father married him to Catherine of Arragon, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, who now were styled king and queen of Spain. This marriage had been in course of negotiation for several years, the two astute fathers trying to overreach each other as to the dowry, and was finally concluded upon by their respective plenipotentiaries at Bewdley, in the diocese of Hereford, on the 19th of May, 1499; but the princess did not arrive in England till October 2d, 1501, and the marriage was celebrated with great pomp in St. Paul's cathedral on November 14th. Catherine was in her eighteenth year. This marriage, which indirectly led to consequences of the greatest importance to England, was the immediate cause of the death of the Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence who was drowned in the wine-butt, and the undoubted heir, next to Henry's queen, to the English crown. Ferdinand, as a matter of policy, demanded his death. He had been long in prison, and Henry ordered him to be led to the scaffold, adding another to the instances of bloodthirstiness which we find recorded in every page of the Tudor history.

The youthful prince Arthur and his bride established a magnificent court at Ludlow Castle, but in the spring of the year 1502, on April 2d, he died, after a short illness. The fortune Ferdinand had agreed to give with his daughter was 200,000 crowns, a very large sum in those days. Henry had received 100,000 of this, and had settled on the princess as a jointure one third of the revenues of the principality of Wales, the duchy of Cornwall, and earldom of Chester. The king was a miserly lover of money, and was averse to let all this wealth go out of his family. From this motive, chiefly, it is supposed, he married his son Henry, now prince of Wales, to Arthur's widow. Henry was then only twelve years of age. He succeeded to the throne at eighteen. Soon after his accession a daughter was born, afterwards queen Mary, who vindicated her claim to true descent on both sides of the house, by the fires of Smithfield. Henry and Catherine lived for many years in happy union, but we need not repeat the story of her divorce, when the charms of Anne Boleyn impelled the king to separate from her, nor tell how this divorce of Arthur's widow accelerated that blessed event, the Reformation.

The history of Arthur Wellesley has been written in the blood of England's foes; it is recorded in monuments of brass, and marble, and stone; it is deep seated in the hearts and memories of his countrymen; it will be conned and got by rote by their children; it will employ the pens of hundreds of future historians. For the young prince, as we have said, we hope that he may be the "Arthur, the great man, of peace," and we trust that his character and actions may be such that he may be beloved while he lives, and that his memory, when he dies, may be honoured in the hearts of his countrymen.

ITALY.

THE CEMETERY AND BURYING HOLES AT NAPLES.

NAPLES is associated with thoughts of its beautiful bay and its bright skies; and surpassingly lovely is the scene there, when, in the early spring time, nature is courting forth into beauty under the tempered rays of the sun, which though shining warmly, do not as yet light up the intolerable mid-day of a southern clime. Magnificent points of view present themselves in all directions, whether we command the whole bay from the summit of the hill on the slopes of which Naples spreads itself, or enjoy the more limited survey from the sea-shore, or the royal gardens in the neighbourhood of the Chiesi;—I frequently preferred the latter.

The dreamy music of the waves breaking at one's feet, associates well with the scene and the feelings, and disposes one to the enjoyment of that Dolce far niente state of the mind, which sees and ruminates on all without trouble or excitement, opening the gate of fancy and postponing the severer judgment of things to other times.

Before you is the wide outspread bay, glistening in the sunbeams, crowned with Neapolitan boats, with their white sails catching the light. Behind, is the town of Naples, with the gloomy castle of San Elmo, and its neighbour, the convent of Certosa, crowning the heights—the one a military, the other like a spiritual guard over the city. On the right of the bay the land stretches far away, crowned with fertile heights, and trellised with vines, and every part studded with white and shiny-looking country houses. The left side of the bay is a long line of beauty. The eye passes from the buildings of the town to rest upon Mount Vesuvius, rising in sullen majesty—its outline against the clear sky, and a small wreath of smoke curling from its top—an indication of the fearful agency within, which tells, or ought to tell, that though the volcano slumbers, it may awake in a moment. Below the mountain is the town of Portici, and underneath Portici is Herculaneum; and yet the king has a palace at Portici, and the inhabitants live as if earthquakes were extinct.—It is like sleeping over a powder magazine. And then comes the town of Torre del Greco, with the hardened lava still remaining as it rolled down the streets and ruined the town, at no very distant eruption; the place itself is now rebuilt with volcanic material. A little further on is the pretty village of Torre della Nunziata, waiting quietly its turn to be overwhelmed; and within a walk is Pompeii.—What a world is in that word!—Our next picnic party is to be an excursion there.

We propose entering by the street of Tombs, visiting the deserted streets, and then lunching with a party of bright-eyed English ladies, on sandwiches and Champagne, in the house of Diomed, or in the villa of Catullus. Further on we dream for a moment as we see Castella Mare, like a white spot on the shore. There is the summer resort both of natives and visitors—the very bath of Naples,—beyond is Sorrento, where Tasso was born; and further on still is Amalfi, hid amidst the projecting rocks of picturesque beauty, which bound the view on the right;—and there stands out from the sea the island of Capri,—and we think of Tiberius, and the steam-boat excursion which is to be made in a few days, to explore the scenes which it was once death to visit.

There is no paradise on earth which has not its grave, —Naples is no exception, and has strange contrasts even in its burial places. There are two principal cemeteries, which swallow up the inhabitants when they have done with the sunshine. The one is called Il Cimiterio Vecchio, the old burying place; and the other, Il Cimiterio Nuovo, or the new and ornamental one; erected of late years in accordance with the spirit of the times. They are both, I am informed, well deserving of a visit—in fact, we ought not to leave Naples, my cicerone tells me, without looking into one of the 365 holes into which the uncoffined dead are thrown like dogs. The dead were formerly either interred in the churches, the convents, or in this cemetery. The rich and the high classes had their graves in the former—the poor and the humbler, were consigned to the latter. But no ordinary idea of a burial-place can convey any true notion of the Cimiterio Vecchio of Naples. I must see it—I will see both these places, and as the new in the present day successfully contests precedence with the old—"To the new cemetery, coachman!" I exclaimed to the driver of my caleche so soon as the resolution was formed.—I addressed the man in English—one is apt to forget oneself abroad. He touched his hat and looked me in the face,—I exclaimed, "Al cimiterio nuovo," and in half an hour we were there.

This cemetery is about three miles distant from Naples. An extensive area has been enclosed for it on an eminence, commanding on the one side a fine view of Vesuvius, and on the other, of the whole of the bay and the surrounding country. Many splendid mausoleums have already been erected, and many are in progress, so as to give the promise, in a few years, of a Père la Chaise for Italy.

The ordinary method of burial in the open ground may here be adopted by all who choose so to dispose of the remains of their kindred or friends. Numerous vaults are prepared for the reception of other bodies, and a number of holes or pits for those who are not to be buried in the graves or in the vaults. One of these pits is opened every five days, and by this arrangement the same hole is not reopened until the following year. But the part of this cemetery most curious, is the place fitted up for the reception of the dead bodies previously to interment. In southern climates it is the custom to inter very quickly after death, and many terrible accidents may have occurred in this manner, from death, although apparent, not having actually taken place.

The dead of the day are now brought to this reception place, which is an extensive hall, and remain there for twenty-four hours, as a precaution against premature interment.—I entered this building—and there a long line of coffins, supported about a yard high from the ground, extended the whole length;—they were all empty; the dead of the day had not yet arrived. "They will be here soon," my guide informed me, "and then all the coffins will be full;" the corpses being thus put in their cerements in these open places, must present a strange and horrible appearance. Over each coffin was a wire, which was to be fixed to each corpse in such a manner, that the slightest movement would sound a bell in an adjoining apartment, where attendants watched night and day with every proper appliance in readiness, in case any of the ghastly inmates should summon them. It would be curious to imagine the effect on such guardians, of the bell sounding—I inquired if it had ever occurred—it had not, but the Custode had been informed, that in some part of Germany, where a similar preparation had been made, a person actually returned from a trance, summoned the attendants, and was restored to life and health.

A large marble table was at another part of this charnel-house: it was for the dissection of such of the bodies as the medical authorities might wish to examine before their being consigned to the pit.

I was glad to find myself again in the open air. I fancied the atmosphere of the room was heavy and deathlike. Outside, the sun was shining brightly; Vesuvius was throwing up from its summit clouds of white smoke, shining like silver from the reflected rays of the sun.

And now to the old burying-place—the Cimiterio Vecchio. Will you join me in an excursion at sunset to see it when they bury the dead?—I proposed to a friend who had some taste for the horrible as well as the beautiful. "Be it so,"—and we were soon on our route.—We passed through some of the populous parts of the ever busy city of Naples. After leaving the Capuan gate we entered, at some distance from the town, into the suburban district leading to the cemetery; and after winding through many lanes, we reached a space of garden ground on which were some scattered houses and a squalid population, conveying the idea both of filth and misery; a fetid smell arising from decaying vegetation polluted the air. Groups of ill-looking men, who regarded us with a suspicious look as we neared them, were playing at cards and drinking, and numerous women were following us, loudly imploring for alms. We were obliged to seek information as to the cemetery from one of the peasants; a guide immediately offered himself, to whom we explained our object as well as we could in the Neapolitan dialect, and having put ourselves under his guidance, we proceeded for some distance through a desolate neighbourhood until we came to a raised ground covered with rank vegetation, which he pointed out to us as the cemetery.

We told him this could not be the one we sought, as there were no traces of a burial-place. The man had mistaken our demand; he had brought us to a burial-place; but it was the place where the victims of the cholera, which raged so frightfully at Naples, had been deposited in heaps upon heaps.

Our imaginations were active in such a spot, and fancying infection still remaining in the very air around, we retraced with eagerness our way, until at some distance we came to the entrance to the old cemetery, and ascending by a winding path, we reached a small terrace, on which were some yew-trees, fit ornaments for such a spot.

A plain wall, extending a considerable distance, formed one side of the large space enclosed for the burying-ground. Over the portico of the entrance was an appropriate inscription—and within the gate, and before passing into the cemetery itself, was a large atrium, or space with funeral monuments at each end.

This was the reception room for the dead of each day, as they are accumulated before the time of burial, which takes place at sunset: in this room were several of the men whose horrid occupation was that of receiving the corpses, and then consigning them to the Pits. The nature of such a pursuit had, doubtless, made them look as they did, or the associations with which we invested them made us all feel they looked unlike their species; a half-ferocious look, mingled with what I thought might be a sadness and disgust arising from such occupations, seemed upon them. There were six or seven of them; they looked like a band of resurrection men, or hangmen; they appeared to know our object in coming, for they all came forward and bid us enter, and we followed them into the large square of the cemetery.

There are no grave-stones there,—no trees,—no monuments of any kind,—no inscriptions,—no kind epitaph,—not even a remembrance, and yet the place contains unnumbered dead. There are 365 large holes or pits, one for each day in the year! and one is opened every day to receive the daily offering to Death, and then closed up. Its turn does not again arrive until a year has passed; the intermediate time has fulfilled in these horrid chambers its work of destruction, and the charnel-house has renewed room for its new dead: a stone without any inscription, except a figured number on it, is closed with cement over every pit, and the burying-place presents only an enclosure, with these numerous grave-slabs in every direction.

"Some of the dead are come, and the rest will soon be here,—we bury in number 120 to-day," was the information we received in reply to our questions; and looking around both in the charnel-room and the burying-ground, we observed various strange-looking boxes or cases, not coffins, but something like them, lying about in different parts;—they contained the corpses; and, one after another, our guides opened various cases to show us the dead. There, in one case, lay a woman of middle age, not in a winding-sheet, but in the dress of everyday employment, the stockings and shoes both on, the ghastly visage of death strangely contrasting with the vestments of life; in another was an old man, his shroud being an ordinary shirt; the lid of another box was lifted, and there lay a young woman who had died that morning, her hair hanging all in disorder about a face that had been lovely; some hand,—perhaps that of love, had placed a chaplet of flowers on her head,—in a few minutes the body was to be recklessly thrown in to fester, among the festering mass of the day.

There was beside us a common square box,—surely no human remains could be there; but the graveman lifted the top to disclose the corpse of a child covered with a common blue gown—the poor thing looked as if it had died of starvation. But it is useless to enumerate, when all looked horrible, unearthly and unnatural, for there is something even in the decencies attendant on death and sepulture, as occurring in England, which makes the contrast, as seen here, appear so strong. Bodies were now rapidly being brought for the sepulture of the day, and amongst them some small deal cases were carried by men, on their shoulders; they were the small or still-born children of the day, brought to be thrown in amongst the rest on the opening of the pit.

But the time to open the fosse or grave is arrived, the stone is uncemented and lifted; 365 days have passed away since it was lifted before; the bodies have all been consumed, a mass of bones alone rests at the bottom of the pit, the quick lime which was thrown in with the corpses, expedited the destruction, and the offering is again ready for the insatiate grave: the coffins of the dead are all collected around the mouth of the pit,—the officials throw out the contents, and corpse after corpse falls with a heavy dull sound into the pit;—there drops the woman we saw,—now the poor child,—now the young woman with her dishevelled hair, which waves out as she falls from the case, the coronet of flowers has fallen from her head, they will perish together at the bottom; and thus on—on,—corpse after corpse—body over body, until all is completed. An attendant priest makes one rapid service in Latin, for the whole of the dead; scarcely any relations or friends are there at this last scene of the departed,—the stone is again lowered, again cemented, and all is over: the nameless dead are consigned to a nameless grave, and their unrecorded memory will perish for ever from the records of humanity.

But imagination can look into the pit now closed amidst that mass, which the fall from above has thrown into such horrid contortion, and into such polluted contact,—and can still awaken scenes of the past, in which, during the fitful fever of life, these bodies have taken their part; scenes of love and hatred—of friendship and affection—of sorrow and of joy—of hope and of fear—of passion and of powerful emotions—of life and of death—the last struggle and the agony—have all been there, but all are over, and fancy itself shrinks back disgusted from tracing the picture of what must follow in the recesses of that abode of decaying mortality.

To-morrow the same scene will be renewed, the grave adjoining, number 121, will be opened, and will be filled—for when was Death ever disappointed of his prey?

As I left the place, I looked again at the graphic fresco painting which is over the entrance door. It represents the Saviour on the cross, and with its heaven-pointing moral there, is like a burst of sunshine on a stormy day: "I AM THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE,—HE THAT BELLEVETH IN ME, THOUGH HE WERE DEAD YET SHALL HE LIVE.—AND WHOSOEVER LIVETH, AND BELLEVETH IN ME, SHALL NEVER DIE."

S. LEE WOLMER.

THE TWO BEES.

A FABLE.

BY F. LAWRENCE.

ONE summer's morning fresh and sunny,
After a month of cloudless weather,
To gather in their choicest honey
A pair of bees set forth together;
Two loyal knaves as e'er were seen
Of the same good and gracious queen.

They'd not gone far when in the air
They met a wand'ring odour sweet,
Which led them to a garden fair,—

A cottage garden, plain and neat;
Where poor but lib'ral hands had set
Some charming beds of mignonette.

And fragrant thyme that filled the air
With rich and delicate perfume,
And roses, white and red, were there,
And dainty hollyhocks in bloom,
That soared majestic, straight, and tall,
Like mighty monarchs over all.

"Hurrah! yon garden plot," said one,
"A large and luscious spoil will yield."
"Nay," said the other, "this bright sun
Shall tempt me farther yet afield,— Perchance to pass my morning hours
With richer and with rarer flowers."

So one within the garden stay'd,
And gathered honey all day long,
Watch'd by a little bright-eyed maid,
Who listen'd to his joyous song,
And, as from flower to flower he flew,
(So busy and so cheerful too),
A life-directing lesson drew.

The other onward, onward sailed,
But joyless was his flight and dreary,
And soon his strength or spirit failed,
And, all disconsolate and weary,
He called the garden plot to mind
And wish'd that he had stay'd behind.

At length, to his profound relief,
Came wafted odours in the air,
And welcome glimpses, bright and brief,
He caught of a genteel parterre;
He hurried on, and, in a trice,
Alighted in a Paradise!

How fortunate at last was he,
Admitted to that realm of beauty!—
But languidly the weary bee
Applied to his appointed duty,
And more than once bewail'd the fate
That gave such privilege so late.

The sequel now: At eventide,
When both the bees were home expected,
The one came early to the hive,
The other late, and much dejected:
The one a precious burthen bore
The other half his wonted store.

The queen, who ruled by inborn right
Of sense sublime and princely spirit,—
Who made it her supreme delight
To humble pride and foster merit,— Summon'd forth with her subject-bees,
And briefly spoke in words like these:—

"My friends," said she, "the richest treasure
Is also oftentimes the nearest,
And those who travel far for pleasure
Will find that what has cost them dearest
Is far less precious, when 'tis earn'd,
Than the cheap happiness they spurn'd."

And men, like bees, may oft regret
The folly of the morning hour,
When with a cold and stern "Not yet,"
They hurried past the alighted flower,
Which had abundant power to bless
With years of hoarded happiness.

DEBORAH'S DIARY.

August.

OUR life here is most pleasant. Father and I pass almost y^e whole of our time in the open air; he dictating, and I writing, while mother and Mary find 'emselves I know not whether mere of toyl or pastime, within doors,—washing, brewing, baking, pickling, and preserving; to say nought of the dairy, which supplies us with endless variety of country messes, such as father's soul loveth. 'Tis well we have this resource, or our bill of fare would be somewhat meagre; for the butcher kills nothing but mutton, except at Christmass. Then, we make our own bread, for we now keep strict quarantine, the plague having now so much spread, that there have e'en been one or two cases in Chalfont. The only one to seek for employment has been poor Anne, whose great resources at home have ever been church-going and visiting poor folk. She can do neither here, for we keep close, even on the sabbath; and she can neither read to father, take long, lonely rambles, nor help mother in her housewifery. Howbeit, a resource hath at length turned up; for the lonely cot (which is the only dwelling within sight) has become y^e refuge of a poor, pious widow, whose only daughter, a weaver of gold and silver lace, has been thrown out of employ by the present stagnation of all business. Anne picked up an acquaintance with 'em shortly after our coming; and, being by nature a hoarder, in an innocent way, so as always to have a few shillings by her for charitable uses, when Mary and I have none, she hath improved her commerce with Joan Elliott to that degree, as to get her to teach her her pretty business, at the price of the contents of her little purse. So these two sit harmoniously at their loom, within earshot of father and me, while he dictates to me his wondrous poem. We are nearing the end of it now, and have reached the reconciliation of Adam and Eve, which, I think, affected him a good deal, and abstracted his mind all y^e evening; for why, else, should he have so forgotten himself as to call me sweet Moll? . . . Mary lookt up, thinking he meant her; but he never calls her Moll or Molly; and, I believe, was quite unaware he had done so to me; but it showed the course his mind was taking.

To-day, as we were sitting under the hedge, we heard a rough voice shouting, "Hoy, hoy! what are you about there?" To which another man's voice, just over against us, deprecatingly replied, "No harm, I promise you, master. . . . We have clean bills of health; and my wife and I, foot-sore and hungry, do but purpose to set up our little cabin against the bank, till the sabbath is overpast."

"But you must set it up somewhere else," cries the other, who was the Chalfont Constable; "for we Chalfont folks are very particular, and can't have strangers come harbouring here in our highways and hedges,—dying, and making themselves disagreeable."

"But we don't mean to die or be disagreeable," says the other. "We are on our way to my wife's parish; and, sure, you cannot stop us on the king's highway."

"Oh! but we can, though," says the constable. "And, besides, this is not the king's highway, but only a bye-way, which is next to private property; and the gentleman at present in occupation of that private property will be highly and justly offended if you go to give him the plague."

"That's me," says father. "Do tell him, Deb, not to be so hard on the poor people, but to let them abide where they are till the sabbath is over. I dare say they have clean bills of health, as they say; and the spot is so lonely, they need not be denied fire and water."

So I parleyed with John Constable, and he parleyed with the travellers, who really had passports, and seemed honest as well as sound. So they were permitted, without let or hindrance, to erect their little booth; and in a little while they had collected sticks enough to light a fire, the smoke of which annoyed us not, because we were to windward.

"What have we for dinner to-day?" says father.

"A cold shoulder of mutton," says mother, who had thrown 'em a couple of cabbages.

"Well," says father, "'twas to a cold shoulder of mutton that Samuel set down Saul; and what was good enough for a prophet may well content a poet. I propose, that what we leave of ours to-day, should be given to these poor people for their sabbath's dinner; and I, for one, shall eat no meat to-day."

In fact, none did but Mary and mother, who fancy fasting 'not good for their stomachs; soe Anne, who is the most fearless of us all, handed the joint over to them, with some broken bread and dripping, which was most thankfully received. In truth, I believe them harmless people, for they are now a singing psalms.

Ellwood has turned up agayn, to the great pleasure of father, who delights in his company, and likes his reading better than ours, though he will call pater payter. Consequence is, I have infinitely more leisure, and can ramble hither and thither, (always shunning wayfarers,) and bring home my lap full of flowers and weeds, with rustical names, such as Ragged Robin, Sneezewort, Cream-and-Codlins, Jack-in-the-Hedge, or Sauce-alone. Many of these I knew not before; but I describe them to father, and he tells me what they are. He hath finished his poem, and given it Ellwood to read, in the most careless fashion imaginable, saying, "You can take this home, and run through it at your leisure. I should like to hear your judgment on it some time or other." Nor do I believe he has ever since given himself an uneasy thought of what that judgment may be, nor what the world at large may think of it. His pleasure is not in praise but production; the last makes him, now and then, a little feverish; the other, or its want—never. Just at last, 'twas hard work to us both; he was like a wheel running down-hill, that must get to the end before it stopped. Mother scolded him, and made him promise he would leave off for a week or so; at least, she says he did, and he says he did not, and asks her whether, if the grass had promised not to grow, she would believe it.

I wish Anne were a little more demonstrative; father would then be as assured of her affection as of mine, and treat her with equall tenderness. But, no, she cannot be; she will sitt and look piteously on his blind face, but, alas! he cannot see that; and when he pours forth the full tide of melody on his organ, and hymns mellifluous praise, the tears rush to her eyes, and she is oft obliged to quit the chamber; but, alas! he knows not that. So he goes on, deeming her, I fear me, stupid as well as silent, indifferent as well as infirm.

I am not avised of her ever having let him feel her sympathy save when he was inditing to me the commencement of his third book, while she sate by at her sewing. 'Twas at these lines:—

"Thus with the year
Seasons return; but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine,
But clouds instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me; from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off; and for the book of knowledge fair, Presented with an universal blank."

His brow was a little contracted, but his face was quite composed; while she, on t'other hand, with her work dropped from her lap, and her eyes streaming, sate gazing on him, the image of woe. At length, timidly stole to his side, and, after hesitating awhile, kissed both his eyelids. He caught her to him, quite taken by surprise, and, for a moment, both wept bitterly. This was soon put a stop to, by mother's coming in, with her head full of stale fish; howbeit, father treated Anne with uncommon tenderness all that evening, calling her his sweet Nan; while she, shrinking back again into her shell, was shyer than ever. But his spiritts were soothed rather than dashed by this little outbreak; and at bedtime, he said, even cheerfully, "Now, good-night, girls: . . . may it, indeed, be as good to you as to me. You know, night brings back my day."

I wish I knew y^e distinction between temperament and genius: how far father's even frame is attributable to one or t'other. If to the former, why, we might hope to attain it as well as he;—yet, no; this is equallie the gift of God's grace. Our humours we may controwl, but our temperament is born with us; and if one s^d say, "Why are you a vessel of glorious things, while I am a vessel of things weak and vile?"

—nay, but, oh! man or woman, who art thou that questionest the will of God? His election is shewn no less in the gift of genius or of an equable temperament than of spirituall life; and the thing formed may not say to him that formed it, "Why hast thou made me thus."

Father, indeed, can flame out in political controversy, and lay about him as with a flail, right and left, making the chaff, and sometimes the wheat too, fly about his ears. 'Twas while threshing the wheat by the wine-press at Ophrah, that Gideon was called by the angel; and methinks father hath in like manner been summoned from the floor of his threshing, to discourse of heaven and earth, and bring forth from his mind's storehouse things new and old. I wonder if the world will ever give heed to his teaching. Suppose a spark of fire should drop some night on the manuscript, while Ellwood is dozing over it;—why, there's an end on't. I suppose father could never do it over again. I wonder how many fine things have been lost in suchlike ways; or whether God ever permitts a truly fine thing to be utterly lost. We may drop a diamond into the sea; but there it is, at the bottom of the great deep. Justinian's Pandects turned up again. The art of making glass was lost once. The passage round the Cape was made and forgotten.—If I pore over this, I shall puzzle my head. Howbeit, were I to round the Cape, I should hardly look for stranger and more glorious scenes than father hath in his poem made familiar to me. He hath done more for me than Columbus for Queen Isabel—hath revealed to me a far better New World. Now, I scarce ever look on the setting sun, surrounded by hues more gorgeous than those of the high-priest's breast-plate, without picturing the angel of the sun seated on that bright beam which bore him, slope downward, beneath the Azores. And, in the less brilliant hour, I, by faith or fancy, discern Ithuriel and Zephon in the shade; and by their side a third, of regal port, but faded splendour wan. A little later still, can sometimes hear the voice of God, or as, I suppose, we might say, the Word of God, walking in the garden. Pneuma! His breath! His Spirit! How hushed and still! Then, the night cometh, when no man can work—when the young lions, in tropical climes, waking from their day-sleep, seek their meat from God. Albeit they may prow about the dwellings of his people, they cannot enter, for He that watcheth them neither slumbers nor sleeps. Moreover, heavenly vigils relieve one another at their posts, and go their midnight rounds; sometimes singing, (father says,) with heavenly touch of instrumental sounds, in full harmonic number joined. . . . yes, and shepherds, once, at least, have heard them.

And then . . . and then mother cries, "How often, Deb, shall I bid you lock the gate at nine o'clock, and bring me in the key?"

with the air of a competent authority, which father took in the utmost good part, and chatted with him on the subject for some time. Howbeit, he is not much flattered, I fancy, by the Quaker's pragmatick sanction, qualifyde, too, as it was to show his own discernment; and when I consider that the major part of criticks may be as little fitted to take the measure of their subject as Ellwood is of father, I cannot but see that the gleanings of father's grapes is better than the vintage of the critick's Abieser.

To wind up all, Ellwood, primming up his mouth, says, "Thou hast found much to tell us, friend Milton, on Paradise Lost;—now, what hast thou to say of Paradise Regained?"

Father said nothing at the time, but hath since been brooding a good deal, and keeping me much to the reading of the New Testament; and I think my night-work will soon begin again.

I grieve to think Mary can sometimes be a little spitefull, as well as unduteous. She is ill at her pen, and having to-day made some blunder, for which father chid her,—not overmuch,—she rudely made answer, "I never had a writing-master." Betty, being by, treasured up, as I could see, this ill-natured speech: and 'twas unfair too; for, if we never had a writing-master, yet my aunt Agar taught us; and 'twas our own fault if we improved no more. Indeed, we have had a scrambling sort of education; but, in many respects, our advantages have exceeded those of many young women; and among them I reckon, first and foremost, continuall intercourse with a superior mind.

If a piece of mere leather, by frequent contact with silver, acquires a certain portion of the pure and bright metal; sure, the children of a gifted parent must, by the collision of their minds, insensibly, as 'twere, imbibe somewhat of his finer parts. Ned Phillips, indeed, sayth we are like people living so close under a big mountain, as not to know how high it is; but I think we . . . at least, I do. And, whatever be our scant learnings, father, despite his limited means, hath never grutch'd us y^e supply of a reall want; and is, at this time, paying Joan Elliott at a good rate for perfecting Anne in her pretty work. I am sorry Mary s^d thus have sneaped him; and I am sorry I ever hurt him, either by uncivil speech, or wronged him by unkind thought. Poor Nan, with all her infirmities, is, perhaps, his best child. Not that I am a bad one, neither. My night-tasks have recommenced of late; because, as he says—which, being interpreted, means, "His thoughts would let him and his daughter take no rest."

"I suoi pensieri in lui dormir non ponno;"

I know not that any one but father hath ever concerned themselves to imagine the anxieties of the blessed Virgin during her Son's forty days' mysterious absence. No wonder that

"WITHIN her breast, tho' calm, her breast, tho' pure, Motherly fears got head."

Good so! Master Ellwood hath brought back the MS. at last, and delivered his approbation thereon

Father hath touched her with a very tender and reverent hand, dwelling less on her than he did on Eve, whom he with perfect beauty adorned, onlie to make her sin appear more sad. Well,—we know not ourselves; but methinks I should not have transgressed as she did, neither, for an apple.

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION OF 1801.

PART II.

BY MISS JANE MARGARET STRICKLAND.

COUNT PAHLEN found the heir-apparent in the corridor of the palace St. Michael. Alexander was in some agitation, for when he had advanced to pay his customary respects to his father and sovereign, the emperor had made him a sign to withdraw from his presence. Alexander, though compelled to retire from the apartment, had lingered in the corridor in the hope of learning from Pahlen the cause of this banishment, and of that fierce anger which blazed in the eyes of the autocrat.

To the iron-hearted statesman, rending the ties that still linked the hearts of the father and son, was nothing. In the filial distress of Alexander, he only saw an advantage to be gained, and when the amiable young man asked him "If the emperor had left any orders that regarded him?" he replied, "Yes your highness, I am sorry to say I am charged with a very terrible one!"

"What is it?" asked the prince, in a tone expressive of surprise and anxiety.

"To arrest your highness and demand your sword! for from this moment you are my prisoner."

"Your prisoner—required to give up my sword—but what crime have I committed?"

"Your imperial highness is of course aware that in the court of St. Petersburg unfortunately punishment often precedes crime, and that innocence does not secure the individual who falls under the Emperor's displeasure."

"The emperor is doubly master of my fate as my sovereign and father. You have only to show me the order to induce my submission." The prince spoke with the dignity of an upright man and the reverence of a son and subject. He took the document which he perused in silence till he saw the name of the Grand-duke Constantine. "My brother too," cried he, "I had hoped this paper only related to me;" but when he beheld that of the empress, an indignant flush came over his face, and he exclaimed, "My mother! Oh my dear virtuous mother! that angel descended from heaven, that saint upon earth. It is too much Pahlen, it is too much." He dropped the order, and covering his face with his hands, concealed the evidences of tender filial love from Pahlen, who regarded his deep emotion with the feelings of a profound politician; for in the eyes of the crafty prime-minister the deep game he was playing was won.

"Hear me, your highness," said he, throwing himself at the feet of the agonized prince. "It is time to put a stop to these terrible misfortunes. It is necessary to restrain the effects of your august father's malady. To-day he abridges your liberty—to-morrow——"

"Count Pahlen," rejoined the prince.

The prime-minister repeated the name of "Alexis Petrowitz."

Alexander turned very pale, but he raised his head, and answered his crafty tempter with some sternness.

"Count Pahlen, you calumniate my father."

"It is not his heart I accuse, but his reason, your highness. These wild and contradictory regulations, impossible commands, and cruel punishments, betray to every eye his terrible malady. Those about his person are aware of it, and speak of it to others, who repeat it again to everybody. Your highness, to speak the truth, your unfortunate father is mad."

"Good heavens!"

"Well, my prince, it is necessary to save him from himself. He must abdicate in your favour. I do not give you this counsel as a solitary individual, it is the nobility, the senate, in fact the empire—it is the whole body of the nation who have chosen me to utter the public voice."

The prince drew back with the dignity of a son who still felt deep filial reverence for his unfortunate sire. "Pahlen, my father is still living; how then can I tear the sceptre from his hands. It is you who are mad. Never! never!"

"Look at the order," coolly returned Pahlen, "which your highness has not yet completely examined. Do you believe that it merely relates to your imprisonment? Believe me when I tell you that your days are numbered."

"Save the empress, save my brother!" replied the agitated prince, then more accessible to the holy influence of the affections than to that of ambition.

"Am I his master? have I the power? can I even be sure that those who wish to gain the emperor's favour may not anticipate his wishes on his prisoners? In closing with my offer you will not only preserve the empress and the Grand-duke, but save the life of your father also."

"What do you say, Pahlen?"

"I say that the reign of the Emperor Paul is ended. You refuse to sanction his abdication. To-morrow you will be compelled to pardon his assassination."

"Let me see my father—Pahlen, I must see him!"

"He has forbidden your highness his presence; to force an entrance is equally impossible, for he has taken precautions to prevent intrusion on your part."

"And you say that his life is in danger," remarked the prince thoughtfully.

"Russia has placed her hopes upon your highness. If you crush them, it will be necessary for us to decide between a determination which ruins us or a crime that saves us. Prince, we shall choose the crime;" and he turned to depart.

"Count Pahlen," cried the prince, "you shall not quit my presence without first swearing upon this holy symbol that the days of my father shall not be shortened, and that if he should even make any resistance you will preserve his life at the expense of your own!" He drew from his bosom a crucifix attached to his neck by a chain of gold.

"Prince, I have acquitted myself of a cruel duty in saying to you what I have done," coldly replied the imperial minister. "I depart to consider the oath you wish to exact from me, and leave you to deliberate upon the proposition I have made you." He bowed very low and quitted the presence of the heir-apparent, taking care, however, to put him under arrest by placing a guard at the door of the apartment. To the empress and the grand-duke Constantine, he merely displayed the order, which expressed fearfully enough to them the emperor's pleasure, but he posted no sentinels at the portals; that was a precaution the crafty conspirator only thought necessary with Alexander.

It was eight o'clock in the evening, and consequently the night was closed in when Count Pahlen met at the house of Count Talitzin his fellow conspirators, by whom he was overwhelmed with questions. "I have no time to answer you," was his calm reply. "Everything goes on well, and in half an hour I shall bring a considerable augmentation to your numbers."

In quality of governor of St. Petersburg, the doors of every prison were open to Count Pahlen, who, surrounded by a military guard, announced to the prisoners to hold themselves ready for instant removal. His severe look and tone alarmed these unfortunate victims of military etiquette, in whose mind death, or life-long exile in the dreary wilds of Siberia, were the permanent thoughts.

They entered the sledges, and a few minutes after alighted in the court of a magnificent hotel. "Follow me!" said the count; and he opened the door, which he closed behind him, leaving the soldiers outside. Arrived in the antechamber, he withdrew a cloth from a table, and pointed to a pile of swords.—"Arm yourselves!" was his command, and each of the astonished prisoners received again and replaced at his side that weapon which had been lately snatched from him by the vile hands of the common hangman. They felt assured that something strange and unexpected was required from them; but what—they could not divine.

The incomprehensible prime minister did not keep them long in suspense, he flung open the folding doors of a magnificent apartment, where the guests rose from the table and welcomed them glass in hand with the general cry of "Long live Alexander!" This reception from friends and relatives from whom they had believed themselves separated for ever, had the effect upon which Count Pahlen had calculated. In a few words the object in view was explained to them, and the proposition was eagerly accepted by men whose hearts were still full of rage and shame. No one refused to take his part in the terrible tragedy about to be performed at the palace.

Among these sixty regicides, General Benningen was the most irritated against the insane master who had disgraced a useful servant. He had been commander-in-chief, and was a Hanoverian by birth. His after career was brilliant and successful, for he stopped the advance of Napoleon at a later period in Poland. He was withdrawn from his banishment at his country-house to become the second leader in this plot, of which Count Pahlen was the secret head. Plato Zuboff and his two brothers, Nicholas and Walluin, Deperadowisch, Arkamahaff, and Prince Tatetoville, Talitzin, Gardanen, Sartarinow, Seriatin, and Prince Wercinskoi, were also leading men in a conspiracy in which the lately liberated prisoners may only be considered recruits.

The doomed emperor had passed the evening with the Princess Gagarin, his mistress. His pallid countenance, gloomy brow, and abstracted manner, made her ask him if any thing had happened to annoy him.

"The time is come in which I must strike a great blow!" replied the Emperor, gloomily. "In a few days some heads must fall which have been very dear to me."

The princess made some pretence to leave the presence of her sovereign, in order to write a few warning words to the Czarowitz Alexander; then actually under arrest, and it must be confessed she made the best use she could of the confidence reposed in her by Paul. The guards permitted the billet to pass, and Alexander read with consternation the intimation it contained, for he could not doubt a fact which reached him from a lady who held all his father's secrets in her keeping.

It is a remarkable feature in this conspiracy, that Count Pahlen added to the despatch he wrote under the dictation of Paul to the Russian minister at the court of Prussia, these emphatic words by way of postscript:—"His imperial majesty is labouring under indisposition to-day. The consequences may prove serious." The body of the document contained a threat to the Prussian government, designed to compel her to act with energy against England, in default of which, Paul expressed his intention of invading the Prussian frontier with eighty thousand men. The inserting of this sentence was designed by Pahlen to prevent Monsieur Krudener from attaching any importance to the substance of the despatch, while it hinted at some change. The words themselves comprised the actual death-warrant of Paul, and they were written under his own eyes.

An absurd superstition had like to have put an end to the conspiracy of the 29d of March, 1801. The conspirators, who entered the garden of the palace of St. Michael about eleven o'clock at night, disturbed a number of crows, who saluted them, in return for this invasion of their rest, by an ominous and lugubrious croaking; and men about to force an entrance into the bedchamber of their sovereign, and to deprive him of empire and of life, trembled before the national ill-omen. Counts Pahlen and Zuboff had some difficulty to induce their alarmed accomplices to proceed.

In the court of the palace they divided into two bands. One led by Pahlen entered the private door by which the minister usually obtained access to his sovereign; the other, headed by Zuboff and Beningsen, and directed by Arkamaloff the aide-de-camp of the emperor, ascended the grand staircase without meeting any impediment, for Pahlen had, in relieving the guard, filled the posts, not with privates, but officers in whom he could confide. They were challenged, however, by one sentinel whom he had wholly overlooked, while making his treasonable change. His challenge gave them some alarm. Yeningsen, opening his mantle, displayed his decorations.

"Silence," said he; "do you not see where we are going?"

"Pass, patrol," replied the sentinel, with the usual military motion of the head; and the murderers marched forward, relieved from this unexpected obstacle.

In crossing the gallery near the antechamber, an officer disguised as a sentinel answered the question of Count Zuboff, by the assurance that the Emperor had been an hour in his bedroom.

"Very well," was the brief reply made by Zuboff, and the disguised regicide continued his patrol. The emperor was indeed in bed, where he slept upon the faith of Count Pahlen. The door of communication between his apartment and that of the empress had been effectually closed, through the cruel suspicions the prime minister had excited in the bosom of the emperor, and on that being open depended his only chance of escape. Arkamaloff, the regicidal aide-de-camp, guided the conspirators to the door of the antechamber, at which he knocked.

"Who is there?" demanded the valet-de-chambre.

"Arkamaloff, aide-de-camp to his majesty."

"What do you want?"

"To make my report."

"Your Excellency is jesting; it is not yet midnight."

"Get up, it is you who are dreaming. I tell you it is six o'clock in the morning, and it is you that are the mistaken party. Open the door quickly, or the emperor will disgrace me."

"I do not know that I ought to do so."

"I am on duty, and I order you."

The valet obeyed, and the conspirators rushed forward, sword in hand, to the door of the imperial apartment. The terrified attendant hid himself in a corner, but a Polish huzzar, who was on duty, threw himself before the portal, and perceiving the object of these nocturnal visitors, ordered them "to go back." Count Zuboff refused, and endeavoured to force his entrance by the exertion of main strength. A pistol was fired in the struggle, and a sabre stroke disarmed the sole defender of a prince, who, a few hours before, had had fifty-three millions of men at his disposal. The gallant soldier lay on the ground overpowered, affording a noble example of fidelity in the midst of the band of treacherous assassins.

The report of the pistol awakened the sleeping emperor, who leapt from the bed, and rushed towards the concealed door leading to the apartment of the empress. He forgot in that moment of peril that he had himself directed it to be strongly barricaded. Disappointed in his first object, he remembered the trapdoor, which only required the pressure of his boot heel to spring open, and disclose the secret stair, but he vainly made the attempt, for his feet were naked, and that contingency had never occurred to his mind when taking those precautions against assassination in his bed-chamber. He concealed himself behind the chimney-screen, which he gained just as the door was forced open by the conspirators. Count Zuboff rushed to the bed, which he found empty.

"All is lost," cried he; "the emperor has escaped us."

"No, I see him," replied Beningsen.

The emperor, who saw himself discovered, called on Pahlen, whom he supposed was at hand, to save him.

"Help me, Pahlen."

Beningsen approached his sovereign with a show of respect, lowering the point of his sword.

"Sire, you call Pahlen in vain to your aid, for Pahlen is one of us. Besides, your life is in no danger; you are only a prisoner in the name of the Emperor Alexander."

"Who are you?" demanded the emperor, whom agitation, and the feeble light of the night-lamp, had prevented from recognizing the speaker.

"Whoever we are," haughtily rejoined Count Zuboff, "we are sent to you by the senate. Take this paper," and he held out the act of abdication to his sovereign, "and decide thy fate thyself."

Then he brought the night-lamp to that part of the room where the emperor still remained, that he might read the paper he offered to him. The emperor took and began to look over it. He then raised his head, and looking at the conspirators, exclaimed, "Great God! what have I done that you should treat me thus?"

"You have tyrannized over us for four years," cried a voice.

The emperor once more perused the paper, but the language, the epithets applied to him, recalled him to himself. His anger rose, and his courage with it. He forgot his dreadful situation; alone, naked, unarmed, and surrounded by men wearing their hats in his presence, and with swords in their hands. He tore the paper, and trampled it under his feet, expressing with resentment not unmingled with dignity his feelings in these words, "Never, never! rather death!" and he made a movement towards the fauteuil upon which his sword lay.

At that instant the second band of conspirators rushed in, composed of young men lately degraded from their military rank, and highly incensed against the unfortunate emperor. Among these Prince Tatetsville was distinguished by his determination to revenge, the insult he had received from his frantic sovereign, by shedding his blood. He flung himself upon the emperor, overturning, in that sudden movement, the lamp whose feeble rays had dimly lighted this dreadful scene; the rest of the struggle, maintained with a naked and unarmed man, took place in the midst of silence and profound darkness: Paul fell, and uttered a sharp cry of pain, for his head had struck against an angle of the room and received a fearful wound. That cry inspired with fear and energy the conspirators, Prince Wereinskoi, Seraitin, and Sartarinow, who threw themselves upon the emperor, who had regained once more his feet: Paul fell a second time, uttering sharp cries, which were changed into stifled groans, by the application of some hand to his mouth. With great exertion he freed himself from the murderous and stifling grasp, and addressed these words in French to his assassins—

"Gentlemen, spare me; leave me, at least, time to pray to—"

The sound of the last word was lost in the choking pangs of suffocation. A subaltern officer wound his sash about the waist of the emperor, whom he dared not strangle by the neck, while another struck him a deadly blow on the head with the pommel of his sword; at that moment Beningsen returned with the light for which he had gone in search, and beheld the emperor in the agonies of death. His two actual assassins were bending over him, and after a few convulsive movements, saw the spirit of the murdered emperor pass away.

In that moment of deep silence which invariably follows crime, a noise was heard at the private door; it was the empress, endeavouring to force her way into the apartment of the murdered emperor, whose dying groans had brought her instantly to his aid. This attempt alarmed and disturbed the assassins, till they recognised her voice, and remembered that the barred portal which opposed her entrance secured them from any dangerous consequences on that side. Beningsen raised the head of the emperor, and perceiving life to be extinct, directed the remains of the victim to be laid on the bed. It was at this instant Count Pahlen entered, sword in hand, for, faithful to the double game he was playing, he did not appear as a conspirator till it was won, and the tragedy concluded. At the sight of the sovereign he had betrayed, whose disfigured face Beningsen was covering with the bed-clothes, he turned very pale, and remained at the door, leaning against the wall, as if for support, with his weapon lowered. It was the only manifestation of feeling he showed; a feeling that none, perhaps, shared with him. Beningsen, who had only joined the conspiracy a few days, preserved an unalterable firmness throughout the dreadful night: he now said to his companions:—"Come, gentlemen, it is time for us to pay our homage to the Emperor Alexander."

"Yes, yes," exclaimed a multitude of voices; "Yes, yes; let us go to pay our duty to the Emperor Alexander;" and they quitted the chamber of death with greater precipitation than they had used in effecting their entrance.

In the mean time, the empress, faithful to her duties as a wife and subject, endeavoured to gain admission to the imperial apartment, by the saloon into which it opened; here she was met by Petroskoi, a lieutenant in the Semenokoi guards, who with thirty men opposed her entrance.

"Pardon me, madam," said he with a low bow, "but you must not go on."

"Do not you know me?" asked the empress, in a tone of surprise.

"Yes, madam, I know that I have the honour to speak to the empress; but my Colonel has forbidden me to allow your majesty to enter. Indeed, your majesty is the last person in the world to whom this permission could be granted."

"See if you dare execute your orders," replied the noble-minded and courageous princess, in a tone that expressed the affection of an anxious wife, without losing the dignity of an empress. She advanced towards the soldiers with an air of determination; but the men barred her passage to the fatal room with their crossed muskets. It was at this precise moment that the conspirators quitted the bed-chamber of the unfortunate emperor, crying out, "Long live Alexander!" that they beheld his new-made widow attempting to force her way thither. Upon her entreating him to let her pass, Beningsen advanced towards her; when, perceiving he was recognised, he said, "Madam, all is now concluded. I dare not permit you to enter, for in doing so you would shorten your own days; and those of the Emperor Paul are terminated."

The empress uttered a cry of deep anguish, and sank into a fauteuil. The Grand-duchesses, Maria and Catherine, awakened by the unusual noise and confusion in the palace, had followed the steps of their mother, unperceived by her. They knelt down on each side of her chair, as if to seek protection from her presence. Finding herself on the point of fainting, the empress asked for water; a soldier brought her some, but the Grand-duchess Maria would not let her mother take the glass, which she imagined contained poison. The soldier, perceiving her suspicions, drank a little of it, and presented the remainder to the Grand-duchess, to whom he said, "You see, madam, her majesty may drink this water without fear or danger."

Beningsen left the empress to the care of these princesses, while he descended with the conspirators to that in which the Czarowitz Alexander was confined, the situation of whose apartment, immediately beneath that occupied by his father, had made him painfully aware of the midnight attack, and its dreadful consequences. He had heard the report of the pistol, the struggle, the fall; the cries and groans of the murdered emperor had made him as well acquainted with the scene in the chamber above, as if he had been personally present at the murder. More than once he had endeavoured to rush forth to defend his parent; but the door was securely fastened without, and surrounded by a strong guard. The entrance of Beningsen and the conspirators, the cries of "Long live the emperor Alexander!" proclaim the completion of the tragedy. He can have no doubt as to the manner in which his accession to the throne has been accomplished.

"Ah, Pahlen," cried he to that treacherous statesman, "what a page for the beginning of my history!"

"Sire," replied the prime-minister, "those that follow it will make it forgotten."

"They will call me the assassin of my father;" and forgetful of every thing but his indignation, he loaded the impassible prime-minister with reproaches.

"This moment," replied the Count, "ought to be differently employed; your majesty must think of something else."

"Of what can I think unless of my unfortunate father?" and the new emperor lost all self-command, and sinking into a chair, covered his face with his hands and wept violently; for his heart was good and tender, and he was surrounded by the assassins of a parent—assassins, too, whom he had no power to punish. Count Zuboff brought the Grand-duke Constantine to his brother, whom that prince found overwhelmed with despair, and incapable of action.¹

"Come," said Count Pahlen to the emperor; "you have wept long enough for a son and subject. Rise up and reign!"

"My mother—the empress?" asked Alexander in a tone of great anxiety.

"She is in perfect safety," replied Count Pahlen, "but in the name of Heaven, sire, do not lose a moment."

"What can I do?" replied the new sovereign of Russia impatiently, for his mental distress would not let him form any decision.

"Follow me, sire, the least delay will be productive of dangerous consequences," replied Pahlen emphatically.

"Do with me as you please," coldly answered the emperor; and he was placed in the sledge Count Pahlen had provided for the conveyance of the late emperor to the fortress; for the prime minister's aim had been at the power, not the life, of his frantic master, who had been sacrificed to the vengeance of the degraded officers, headed by the revengeful Count Zuboff. Alexander, whose last thought was for his mother, despatched Beningen to the empress for her better protection. He then entered the sledge, with his face still bathed in tears. Counts Pahlen and Zuboff mounted behind in the place usually occupied by footmen. The reception Alexander met with from the regiments posted upon the quarter of the Admiralty, to which he was presented by Count Pahlen, was enthusiastic. "The emperor! the emperor Alexander! Long life to the new emperor!" was a cry echoed by a people roused from their sleep by the acclamations of the military; and their joyous shouts proved to the sorrow-stricken successor of Paul, that the midnight revolution which had placed him on the throne was acceptable to subjects over whom the mental infirmity of that unfortunate emperor had caused him to tyrannize. The agent was in Paul's brain." This brilliant remark from the pen of an accomplished writer forms a masterly apology for the misrule of the well meaning madman, who, in an inauspicious moment for himself and Russia, mounted a throne for which he was incapacitated by his dreadful malady.

The empress-mother was inclined to dispute the throne with her son, for she was ambitious, and the tragical history of Russia furnished her with but too many precedents of female usurpation. The message she sent to her son lacerated afresh a heart already deeply wounded; but the widow of Paul was a fond mother, and the wish to reign originated as much in her determination to punish the assassins of her husband, as in her love of power. She yielded up her claims, and took the oath of allegiance to Alexander: the hope of revenging the death of her husband, she did not.

Extraordinary pains were taken to conceal the manner in which the Emperor Paul received his death. His chief physician, Wette, pronounced the cause to be apoplexy, and the deep wound on his face was imputed by him to the fall. A large military hat, of the same shape probably as that he had compelled his subjects to adopt, with its plume, was placed forward on his head to conceal those stabs and contusions which even the proverbial credulity of the courtiers could not have considered as the effects of an apoplectic fit. The body was embalmed and lay in state for a fortnight. Etiquette every day brought beside that bier the Emperor Alexander, who always approached it with a visible change of complexion, and quitted it pale and in tears. He could not sentence the murderers to exile in Siberia, but he gave them rank in regiments stationed in that dismal country, where they were prisoners in every thing but the name. Count Pahlen remained for a time governor of St. Petersburg; but his penetrating eyes easily discovered the horror and remorse his presence gave his sovereign; remorse, because his artful arguments, by assailing the young prince on the side of the affections, had occasioned him to consider the necessity of his father's abdication. That meditation he always believed had occasioned the crime.

A few days after the interment of Paul, a priest exposed to public view a picture of the national saint,² which he pretended an angel had brought him from Heaven; beneath this painting, these words were written—"God will punish all the assassins of Paul I." Crowds visited the chapel in which this picture was placed. The circumstance, by attracting the public attention to the late tragedy, deeply affected the spirits of the new emperor. Count Pahlen asked permission to put an end to this imposture. The priest was whipped, and the castigation was sufficiently severe to draw from him the whole truth. He declared that the empress had employed him to excite the people against the murderers by an appeal to their superstitious feelings, and in proof of this assertion, he declared the count would find in her private oratory the fac-simile of the painting and inscription. Pahlen immediately broke open her chapel, and carried off the obnoxious picture. The empress, bathed in tears, demanded satisfaction of her son, who gladly availed himself of this pretext to despatch an order to the count, to withdraw to his estates. "I expected this," said the regicide, with a smile; "my packets have been already sent thither."

In another hour Count Pahlen had surrendered his portfolio as prime-minister, and his government of St. Petersburg, and that same evening was on the road to Riga.

The emperor Alexander never forgot the catastrophe that had prematurely placed him upon the imperial throne; it formed the secret remorse of his whole life. His features wore, when in public, a serene smile; but that constant smile only masked the deep melancholy that shadowed his mind with gloom. He loved solitude, because he could then drop that forced expression of satisfaction, and yield himself up unrestrained to his filial regret. To him might be applied the beautiful and truthful lines of the poet:—

"A face of smiles, a heart of tears,
So in the church-yard realm of death
The turf increasing verdure wears,
While all is cold and dead beneath."

THE BROWN RINGLET.

BY J. M. W.

"Love is love for evermore."—TENNYSON.

THE following little story, or fragment of a story, was communicated to me by an old schoolfellow of mine,—Miss Merton, or, as we all called her at school, Grace Merton, or, Gracey. She was one of a numerous family, which is, I think, an advantage to a girl. It is good to have a large and varied society within one's home;—to grow up among many brothers and sisters; and, in this way, to begin life with a good stock of sympathies and interests, apart from self. I know some philosophers who contend that family-interest is but a larger sort of self-interest. Be it so;—it is a larger sort, which is the one thing desirable, until human beings are so constituted as to be able to take all humanity to their hearts, before they know even the names of half the races who inhabit the earth. Yes, I am an old woman, and likely to be old-fashioned in my notions, and I feel bound to declare my opinion, that it is better for the generality of people to be brought up in the midst of a numerous family, whom they can know and love, than to be brought up apart from communion with others of their own age, and to be taught to talk about loving all the human race as their brethren. I lately heard a little child, an only child, talk about philanthropy; and how she disliked the noisy children next door;—and I thought she must have been very unfortunate in her up-bringing.

Grace Merton had another little advantage in the accident (that we should call any event of this life an accident!)—in the ordering of her birth;—she was neither the eldest nor the youngest child. I know many persons think it a fine thing to be the eldest boy or girl, and others think it very pleasant to be the youngest. Now, I do not think so, and for these reasons. Parents, being new to the office, and anxious to make something uncommon out of their first child, generally try experiments upon the unfortunate little creature; experiments which are not found to answer. They are so anxious about its development, moral, intellectual and physical, that they cannot leave any of the process to Nature. They must watch and meddle and interfere. They act as I did with the pot of mignonette seed I sowed on my eighth birth-day;—I killed half of it by poking about among the young sprouts, to see that it was all growing properly. It may be a good thing to be a boy, and inherit a large fortune by right of primogeniture (though that is a doubtful good, perhaps), but I do not believe that it is an unqualified good thing for a girl to be the eldest in a family, even though she takes precedence of all the rest. There are, however, two sides to that question; and some of the most admirable women I have ever known have been eldest sisters, the prop and stay of large families after the death of the mother. The youngest child, again, girl or boy, is generally the pet of one or both parents. Now, I need not remind my readers that judicious kindness is not synonymous with parental petting. I have so frequently seen a very large amount of future trouble and pain laid up for a petted, youngest child, by its otherwise sensible parents, that I think it a very doubtful good to be the youngest in a family. Therefore is it that I say it was an advantage to Grace Merton to be neither the eldest nor the youngest. I don't exactly know whereabouts in the dozen she came; but I rather think she was the third or fourth daughter, and being neither the beauty nor the wit of the Merton girls, nor the one clever in music, nor the very domestic one, Grace was quite unobtrusive in the crowd, and was never singled out from the rest for particular comment.

Mr. Merton was a London solicitor, and lived in a good house in Bedford Row. The family resided there nearly all the year, for Mr. Merton could not afford to keep a house in the country as well as one in town. But he and Mrs. Merton contrived, as well as they could, to let all the children have a month or two of country air in the course of the year. What the children as well as their parents all liked best, however, was the annual going down to some cheap watering-place, Herne Bay, South End, Ramsgate, or Broadstairs, for a week or two in the autumn. Papa was able to be with them, then, because, at that season of the year, business as well as pleasure is at a stand-still in London. Even the lawyers—who are busy at all other times in their offices, like spinners in their webs, catching all the foolish flies that venture within them—are ready in the autumn to fling aside blue bags and pink tape, and take to a wide-awake hat, a blouse, and a novel, or a stroll with their children in the country lanes or along the sea-shore.

It was always a grand day of rejoicing at the Mertons' when Papa had been brought to fix on the place to which they were to go, and the exact period of departure. On the particular year of my little tale he fixed the day and the place at once; "Hastings,—and this day week," resounded from attic to basement, and little Mertons met big Mertons on the stairs and volunteered kisses "because they were so happy!" There was uncle Henry, too,—he must be written to,—he must come and spend his yearly holiday with them as usual. This was Mrs. Merton's thought; it did not enter into the heads of the children, not even into those of the eldest ones. Uncle Henry was not popular among them, I believe. Perhaps, because he was an old bachelor, and a clergyman, and grave, and never would play trap-bat and leap-frog, or tell long stories "like darling papa." The Reverend Henry Langford was Mrs. Merton's brother; but nobody thought he was like her, and there could scarcely be two men more unlike than her husband and her brother; yet a very strong attachment subsisted between the three: they would have been very sorry to miss their yearly holiday meeting.

On the very day of the family rejoicing, however, Mrs. Merton was doomed to have a damp thrown on her pleasure by the receipt of the following letter.

Westbury Parsonage, Aug. 20th.

MY DEAR SISTER:—This is, I think, about the time that you and your mate will be making your annual autumnal migration with your goodly brood to the sea-side. I am very sorry that I cannot join you there, as usual, this year; for Mr. Bell is very ill, and unable to undertake the whole duty, as he always does during my absence. Mrs. Bell is, of course, much occupied in attending to her husband, and consequently I have more work on my hands, in the way of visiting the poor, than I can well manage. If you could spare me one of your girls for a month it would be of real assistance, as well as a real treat to me. I almost forget the precise number and respective names and ages of my nieces; but don't send me one under sixteen, as I shall set her about doing some of Mrs. Bell's duty among the poor. I beg you will inform the young lady that the only comfort in life which I can promise her here, beyond food and house-room, is a pretty pony to ride. Let me know directly whether any one of your girls will be heroic enough to devote herself for a month to the service of her crotchety uncle.

Your affectionate brother,

HENRY LANGFORD.

P.S. As soon as I receive your answer I will send up Bennett to fetch my niece. You will allow her to travel in the mail under his charge, I suppose. I would have fetched her myself, but I am not well enough to undertake a journey, just now.

Mrs. Merton showed this letter to her husband, and it was agreed upon immediately between them that one of the elder girls must go down to Westbury. They should settle it with the girls which of them it should be, that very evening. Accordingly, after tea, when the young fry of the family had been carried off to bed, Mrs. Merton read uncle Henry's letter aloud to the rest.

Fanny, the second daughter, looked at Sophia, the eldest, and Sophia looked at Mr. Young, who was winding a skein of wool from her hands. Mr. Young looked at Sophia and whispered, "I hope you will not be the victim, Miss Merton." Fanny smiled, and, turning to her father, said, "It will be of no use to send me, papa; you know I can't read aloud, I can't bear dull places and persons, and, above all, I should not know how to visit the poor. I would go willingly, only I should be of no use. I am, as you often tell me, a useless member of society. Sophia will be the best person to go. Don't you think so, Mr. Young?"

That gentleman thought nothing at the moment but that Fanny ought to be called the plague instead of the wit of the family.

"Mamma! If there is a pony to ride, I think I will give up Hastings, and go to Westbury," said Caroline.

"I don't think you come within your uncle's limitations, my dear; you are under sixteen, Carry," said her father.

"As there is a pony in the case, I almost wish I were a girl, and not under sixteen," said George, an intelligent boy, who was at that moment preparing a chess-board to have his evening battle with his mother.

Mrs. Merton was looking at Grace. Grace was about eighteen; she was a quiet, pleasant-looking girl, with blue eyes and light brown curls, which hung handsomely about her head. Fanny used to say that her sister Grace had but one good point about her, and that was her hair. Grace had another remarkably good point in my eyes: she had no point at all about her. Everything in Grace was rounded, unobtrusive, unobtrusive. There was a quiet harmony in the girl which baffled description, and which, once observed, had all the effect of real beauty on the observer. Grace met her mother's eye, and read in it her wishes. She smiled and nodded; "Yes, mamma, I am quite ready to go if you wish it." Grace was always calm and measured in her words. This was exactly what Mrs. Merton desired. She thought Grace was the one most likely to suit her uncle, and the one that would sacrifice the anticipated visit to Hastings the most readily.

On the following morning Mrs. Merton wrote to her brother to say that Grace would be glad to go and make herself useful at Westbury, for as long a time as he should want her; and that he might send his confidential man for her as soon as he pleased. Bennett came after three days, and on the fourth morning Miss Grace was put safely inside the Weirton Mail, and Bennett mounted to the top of it, and they set off for Westbury. Grace could not help laughing at the last thing her mother had said to her. "Oh! my dear, I had almost forgotten to tell you one thing; be sure to wear your hair curled all the time you are at Westbury; your uncle is very fond of seeing ringlets like yours." "What a very funny thing for mamma to tell me," thought Grace, "and of a grave clergyman like my uncle, who is not supposed to know the difference between the outward vanities of plaiting the hair and curling it."

I need not enter into the particulars of Grace's journey to Westbury, as she did, very minutely too, in a letter written to me at the time. It was her first very long journey, alone; and it made a vivid impression on her mind. She reached her uncle's parsonage about eight o'clock; sunlight still lingered on the hills and burnished the tops of the pine-trees; the flower-beds in front of the old-fashioned house sent forth a full rich scent, and as her uncle led Grace up the gravel walk from the gate to the porch it seemed to her as if the quiet spirit that held unseen dominion in the little place had already made her feel and love his power. She thought uncle Henry looked very much altered; he had become pale and thin. When she had laid aside her bonnet, and was taking some refreshment, he seemed to look at her with great interest. Presently he stroked her head fondly, and passing his hand through her long curls, he looked at them thoughtfully—then dropping them again, he turned away and left the room. "I could not make it out," wrote Grace in her letter to me; "there is, certainly, some hidden mystery in these curls of mine; perhaps my uncle once loved a lady with long curls. I cannot imagine uncle Henry in love—he is such a thorough old bachelor."

Grace was active, intelligent, and kind-hearted. She set herself diligently to work to do what her uncle required of her in his house and in the village. At the end of a week Mr. Langford wrote to thank his sister for sending him such a treasure; and Grace wrote me word that she was very happy at Westbury. She liked all her duties, especially that of reading to her uncle, whose eyes were uncommonly weak, so that it hurt him to read. Of her pleasure she said nothing—it was needless to do so, for it was clear enough that she was enjoying that blissful state of existence in which pleasures and duties are synonymous; somehow she forgot to regret the loss of the visit to Hastings.

All earthly happiness is proverbially transitory. About the end of the month which had been originally proposed as the limit of Grace's visit to Westbury, she was taking a turn in the pretty flower-garden, one morning before breakfast, and wishing that something might happen to prolong her stay in this place, where she felt that she was of real use to those around her, (the grand secret of content with our situation in life, be it said en passant.) when Mrs. Hargrave, the housekeeper, came running towards her from the house crying out—

"Oh! Miss Grace! Miss Grace! what shall we do? Master's took again."

"Took!" repeated Grace in blank amazement. "What is the matter?"

"Why the fit is on him again. Please to come to him, Miss; for he must not be left alone. Bennett must go off to Weirton for Dr. Lacy, and you must stay with him; for I am of no more use than a child when I see him in that way. It quite unnerves me; that it do. Poor, dear gentleman!—and a minister too, that preaches such powerful sermons against loving earthly things, and setting our hearts on heavenly things! Poor dear! If he could but hear himself talk, he would be quite shocked."

"Do you mean to say, Mrs. Hargrave, that my uncle is subject to fits of insanity?"

"Lord bless you, no, Miss! God forbid that I should say that. He only has a fit sometimes, when he drops down insensible for a time, and then when he comes to again he is quite light in the head and don't know any of us. But Bennett says he's as harmless as a child. I don't know much about it myself; for Bennett don't like any one but himself to be with master at these times. But, he told me just now to fetch you, Miss; for, says he, 'master's very fond of Miss Grace, and he will be still enough with her, I dare say, while I ride over for Dr. Lacy.'"

Grace told me of the strange conflict of feeling which took place within her as she hurried into the house. During the month she had spent at Westbury she had grown much attached to her uncle: he appeared to her quite a different creature from the grave, somewhat stern man, who used to appear amid their family circle every autumn, and who never stayed long enough to become familiar and intimate with his nephews and nieces. The uncle Henry she knew and loved in his own home was grave too, but he was far from being stern or harsh; to her he had been all gentleness, thoughtful attention, and consideration. He had accepted her services, as she had offered them,—in a quiet, undemonstrative way. They seemed to understand each other; and Grace felt that to part from uncle Henry would be a pain to her. Who shall say what the lonely man felt, on his side? His faithful servant, Bennett, who understood his master better than most people, saw the deep affection with which the old man looked down on the young head beside him as they strolled in the evening along the garden walks; or as they sat by lamp-light in the little study, and Grace read aloud, to save her uncle's eyes. Bennett saw those eyes fill with tears sometimes; and he felt sure, that now, at last, after so many years, Mr. Langford had found something to love with his whole heart. Grace had an instinctive knowledge that her uncle loved her, more than he loved all Westbury put together; and that because he loved her so well, it would be right and grateful in her to overcome any natural shrinking from the sight of him in his present state. Her blood turned cold within her at the thought of seeing any one deprived of reason; and that one a near relation,—a man of large and cultivated mind, who was looked up to by the neighbourhood as a master-spirit; that one the uncle Henry whom she had begun to love very seriously. Mrs. Hargrave accompanied her to the beginning of the passage which led to her uncle's chamber; but there she stopped, saying—"I daresn't for the life of me go any further. I am so afraid, Miss. You don't mind going on by yourself I dare say. You look quite brave and determined, Miss; I wish I had your nerves."

I fear Grace glanced rather contemptuously at stout ruddy Mrs. Hargrave, but she said nothing and walked steadily on to the door of her uncle's room. It was partially open, and she heard a voice speaking. She did not, at first, recognise it as that of her uncle. It was so changed. It sounded like the voice of a younger man, under the influence of strong emotion; it was not violent, but there was a deep sadness, an indescribable tenderness in the tones, which brought tears into the eyes of the strong-hearted girl. The voice had an irresistible attraction for her; she did not linger outside, but pushing the door gently, stepped noiselessly into the room.

Mr. Langford was dressed in his usual morning wrapper. He was seated at a table with his back to the door. Bennett stood behind, leaning against the wall, watching his master with a face of the most intense sympathy. It seemed to change with the changing tones of the voice which filled the room with the most melancholy sounds of sorrow; a sorrow long pent-up, and striven against, which has at last forced an expression for itself; even though it has, for a time, carried away the barrier of reason. Those who have ever witnessed such a scene, will feel with me that there are few more touching things, few more distressing to a sympathetic nature, than the unconscious exhibition of a hidden grief by a strong, well-disciplined, and truly religious man. Grace knew that her uncle was this, she knew also that he was generally supposed to be of a cold unaffectionate nature; and though she had lately learned to think otherwise, since she had been domesticated with him, she was not prepared for such a revelation as the following.

The grey head was bent down upon the clasped hands which rested on the table, and from time to time incoherent sentences burst forth.

"Faithless! thrice faithless! Clara, my own Clara! and I cannot save you from this fate—this awful sin—this appalling misery! Oh! what is my love good for, if it cannot keep thee free from evil? False! heartless! You deceived me! You trampled on my soul. Yet could I not turn away in scorn or hatred; I loved you too well; I learned to wish you might find in another a love as great as I felt within myself. I kept nothing that ever had been yours, but this. This, which you gave me when you made me happy with your love. Clara! Clara! you did love me once! That was not love's semblance; it was Love, I tell you. Let who will tell me otherwise, I know that you loved me in those bright summer days that seem so far off, now, that their light scarcely reaches to my sad spirit. Oh! God of Heaven, bring those days back again once more, and cut me off from immortality! Ah! Immortality! Who is immortal? what is immortal? Not Clara. No, no, it cannot be; it must not be—I will weary heaven with prayers to save her from that. Immortality of torment for my Clara, do you say? Impossible! You do not know how pure and good she is; you do not know how she hates sin. She to have her portion with the adulterers. You are mad to say so. Gone from her husband's house, say you? Yes, truly—gone to the mansions of the blest. With Colonel D——! Who told me that lie? Who dares to traduce my poor lost love? Away! Away! thou devil that sayest she is vicious—that she has forsaken her husband and her infants." Here the sufferer rose hastily, and drew himself to his full height, and seemed to stand face to face with some unseen antagonist. "Begone! fiend! I tell you I love her! I always will love her. You shall not tear her image from my soul and place an adulteress there. Clara! my love! If they all turn from you; if they will not believe that you are purer, and nobler, and better than all women—come to these arms once more. What do I say? Mrs. Lascelles! Ah! yes, I had forgotten.—False Clara!"

Here the old man sunk on his seat again, and paused for some time.

Grace saw large tears flow down his cheeks; she could restrain herself no longer, and agitated as she was she stepped across the room, and, kneeling at his feet, looked up into his face with streaming eyes. "Who are you?" asked the old man, in a hushed voice.

She saw he did not recognise her. "I am come to comfort you," she said soothingly.

"Comfort!" he repeated in a tone of heart-rending sadness. "Comfort! Do you know that they tell me she is wicked, vile? That God has cast her out of heaven?"

"God's mercy is infinite. God will forgive the repentant sinner. He is not so hard as man. There is hope, uncle."

"Ah! I see, you are an angel. Did my Clara send you to comfort me? You have locks like hers." And taking his niece's long curls in his trembling hands, he kissed them passionately. Suddenly he paused and drew back to look into her face. He scanned it earnestly. Then, at length, shaking his head, he murmured, "Clara! Clara! why will you not come yourself. I know this is not you; though the bright brown hair is yours. Look here," he went on, with a childlike look of mystery; "promise you will never betray me, and I will show you my treasure—where I have laid up my heart. It is written, 'Set not your affections upon things of the earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt.' See! see! the moth and the rust come not near this;" and hurriedly opening a small gold case which hung by a black ribbon from his neck, he showed her a long ringlet of brown hair, lying softly curled up within. The hair was like her own in colour. The old man's face brightened into a smile as he looked at it; and his eyes beamed with affection; "See!" he whispered, "no one knows that I have preserved this brown ringlet so many years; as long as I keep this next my heart, my love will not leave me. Look how bright and beautiful it is!" and taking it gently from the case, he shook out the whole length. Grace thought it was about a yard long. He held it up between him and the light, and seemed not to weary of passing his fingers over it and pressing it to his lips. He no longer spoke or seemed aware of the presence of his niece, but was absorbed in the contemplation of the much-loved relic. Once Grace ventured to touch it; and then, she said, her uncle's face assumed a fierce expression, and snatching it away, he pronounced the word "Audacious!" in so angry a tone, that she shrank back and sat still at his feet, waiting until he should turn his attention to her again. This he did not do till some time had elapsed, when her hair seemed to have caught his eye; and placing his treasured lock beside it, he muttered to himself, "Brown too,—very beautiful; I have seen a young girl lately with such ringlets, and I loved her for their sake, Clara! Do you hear me, my love? I have forgiven your desertion of me. We shall meet in heaven; and I will tell you so, then. There was a devil told me you would not go to heaven; but, I would not believe him; and then a young angel with brown ringlets like those I love;—like this which has kept my heart warm for you so many years, came to me, and told me that God was merciful; that he 'hated nothing that he has made.' I will preach a sermon on that text that shall bind up broken hearts. Clara, will you come to the church?"

And poor Grace's tears flowed fast at the tender accents of her uncle's voice, as he prayed devoutly for the soul of the lost one.

She is an old woman, like myself, now; and she has seen her share of the troubles and strange romance of this world, but she has often told me that she never in all her life felt so deeply moved to pity and to love, as she did on that morning. She felt an irresistible impulse to clasp her uncle in her arms. She rose and stood beside him; and he suffered her to kiss his forehead and to wind her arms round his neck. She saw that he was becoming exhausted with his late strong emotion; she placed his head on her bosom, and with the brown ringlet still in his hand he fell asleep. When she turned to look for Bennett, he was gone.

She remained a long time in this position, supporting her uncle; and watching his countenance gradually resume its habitual repose. She almost feared to breathe lest she should awake him. With the natural delicacy of a pure, reserved and affectionate nature, she feared, too, lest he should wake perfectly self-possessed, and find, by the ringlet in his hand, that he had betrayed his cherished secret,—the grief of his life,—to a young girl,—a child, like herself. She became very uneasy on this subject. The gold case glittered in the sun, beneath her eyes, as it hung from the sleeper's neck. She could reach it without disturbing him: but she could not take the ringlet from the closed hand without making a movement which would probably rouse him. She feared lest Mrs. Hargrave should be coming into the room when she heard a step outside the door, and she would not have suffered Mrs. Hargrave to see the brown ringlet. She threw her handkerchief hastily over the hand which held it. Fortunately it was only Bennett. He approached softly and said in her ear, "God bless you, Miss Grace! He will do well now he is asleep. Thank God for that. Ah! he has got that hair out again. Do you think we might burn it? It is that which excites him so, whenever he hears Mrs. Lascelles' name."

"Burn it!" exclaimed Grace, "not for the world! My uncle would never forgive us. You, perhaps, know the secret which his delirium has, in part, betrayed to me; I do not ask to know more. My uncle would not have imparted it to me. I should not wish him to suspect that I know any thing of this matter. Let us put up the brown ringlet in its case as if it had not been seen by me, or any one. You can take my place, and when he wakes he will not know that so young a person as I am has been witness to the secret sorrows of his heart."

Bennett looked at her with surprise, and said respectfully,—“As you please, Miss Grace. Maybe you are right; for Master is very close and never likes any one to know what he feels. Still, if he should ask me when he wakes what happened to him while ~~the~~ fit was on, I must tell him. I never told him a lie yet, and, please God, I never will.”

Grace moved away gently, and Bennett took her place in supporting his master. With an unsteady hand Grace took the beautiful lock of hair and restored it to its place in the case. The single word "Clara" was engraved on the lid. When she had closed it she replaced it within her uncle's bosom. Just at that moment Dr. Lacy entered the room and her uncle opened his eyes. Grace did not wait any longer, but went down stairs to wait for the doctor's departure. She had some time to wait;—and she employed the interval in a steady line of thought. She thought not, then, about her uncle's past life, but whether she by devoting herself to him might not make the remainder of his life happier than it would otherwise be. There were so many brothers and sisters at home, perhaps her father and mother would spare her to come and live altogether with uncle Henry, if it were good for him. She thought it would be good for him because she loved him and he loved her.

When Dr. Lacy came down stairs, she asked him to walk into the garden with her as she had something to say to him.

"Oh! don't be uneasy about your uncle, my dear young lady. He has these attacks sometimes. The fact is, he lives too much alone. Your visit has done him a great deal of good; and, for his sake, I wish it could last as long as he lives."

"Do you think my remaining with him would be of real benefit?"

"Think! I don't think at all about it. I am sure it would. He would not have many more of these sad attacks. Run to him now, for he fears that you have been unnecessarily alarmed about him. Good morning."

The next day Grace and her uncle both wrote to Mr. and Mrs. Merton asking permission for the visit to be prolonged for six months. Grace's letter had so powerful an effect on her parents that they wrote back to say she "might stay till her uncle was tired of her."

And Grace Merton stayed at Westbury Parsonage during the remainder of her uncle's life. The reticence of both was so strong that neither ever spoke to the other of the revealed secret which had knit them together. When Mr. Langford died, a note was found in his desk addressed to Grace, in which he requested her to place the gold locket he wore always in his bosom in his coffin, with her own hand, and to cut off one of her curls, and enclose it with the Brown Ringlet she had once seen. He spoke words of strong love and gratitude for her gentle affection which had sweetened his last years, and he told her that she had his permission to ask her mother to relate the painful circumstances of his life connected with the Brown Ringlet. He warned her that it was but an old story of a false love, and a true one, such as she would find in poems, and romances, and real life.

JAPAN AND THE MISSION.

TOWARDS the close of the thirteenth century, a young Venetian, accompanied by his father and uncle, left his native city and directed his course towards the East. He passed through Turkey and Persia, and traversed the northern confines of the gigantic Himalayah. He visited the soft and luxurious valley of Cashmere, and listened to the song of the nightingale in the gardens of Gtl. There he feasted his eyes on the delights of nature, and experienced that enthusiasm of feeling which the beauty and richness of the scene inspired. The turbaned people, and their flowing robes, struck upon his imagination, nor were their veiled beauties a source of less attraction to his penetrating gaze. He then pursued his travels through the vast and unexplored regions of northern Asia, and having crossed the empire of Tartary, finally arrived at the court of Khublai Khan, the great conqueror of those distant countries, who had recently annexed China to his extensive dominions.

Here Marco Polo, for that was the young Venetian's name, remained for several years. He was taken into great favour by the Tartar monarch, who perceived his abilities, and appreciated his virtues, and at last rose to several offices of high distinction in the country, being entrusted with matters of deep moment, and employed in several missions to distant kingdoms. It happened too that about this time Khublai Khan prepared an army, with a view of extending his conquests still further, and adding a kingdom, consisting of three large islands, lying eastward, to the list of his territories. However, the scheme failed by the disunion, it is said, of the admiral and commander-in-chief of the forces, one of whom was subsequently found guilty and punished with death, for his conduct on the occasion. Although our adventurer did not accompany the expedition to Zipangu or Japan, as the kingdom was called, yet he was enabled to glean much information respecting it.

Our young traveller had availed himself of the opportunities afforded him during his sojourn at the court of this emperor, to become acquainted with the principal nations of the far East; and on his return to Venice disseminated the knowledge he had acquired, and described to his countrymen in particular the kingdom of the three islands, which he represented as abounding in gold and precious minerals. The cupidity of southern Europe was excited, and the attempt immediately set on foot to discover a passage to it by sea. But their knowledge of the geography of the world was, as yet, too confined, and their nautical science too imperfect, to enable them to achieve so desirable an object. Time passed on, and their hopes were unrealized, when Columbus, a humble navigator, heard their story. He received it in silence; whilst others turned their eyes eastward, he felt convinced Zipangu or Japan might be reached by pursuing a westward course. He marked the currents of the ocean, studied the charts of the world, and meditated on such facts as related to its position. Having satisfied his own mind, he sought to persuade and convince others of the truth of his conclusions. This it was difficult to do; however, by the assistance of Isabella of Spain, he procured a squadron of three ships, and set sail, full of enthusiasm and determination to surmount all obstacles, and perform that which all had hitherto failed to accomplish. He discovered a new region. This was not, however, Zipangu, which he expected, but one of the Bahamas, nor was the position of that kingdom truly known until nearly two centuries later.

Subsequently to the discovery of a passage round the Cape of Good Hope, the Portuguese were indefatigable in penetrating into the eastern seas, and having surveyed the Indian Ocean, proceeded to explore the Pacific. Many were the rich and fertile islands they visited as they urged onward their course, and sailed up the channels of the Indian Archipelago. When they beheld the luxuriant foliage of the trees, whose branches drooped down even to mingle with the blue waves of the deep, and looked on the teeming plains stretched before them, bounded by a dark outline of distant hills, and felt the warm sunshine of those cloudless skies, they deemed that this delightful cluster of green spots in the ocean must indeed be the thousand islands so often spoken of in the tales of the Persians.

In 1642, however, accident accomplished for the Portuguese what their enterprise had failed to effect. One of their vessels, freighted from Siam to Cochinchina, was overtaken by a storm, and being driven about for several days upon a tempestuous sea, was at length cast upon the island of Nippon, the principal of the three constituting the Japanese empire, a complete wreck. Three alone of the crew escaped to experience the hospitality of the natives; the rest were overwhelmed by the power of the waves, and lost in their ineffectual struggle to buffet the surging billows. The survivors of this unhappy catastrophe, however, met with an hospitable reception, and learnt with an agreeable surprise, that the island upon which they were thrown was a part of Japan. The kindness of the natives was undiminished during the stay of the Portuguese amongst them, and when the unhappy seamen were anxious to return to their settlement on the coast of China, they assisted them in repairing their shattered vessel, and storing it with what provisions were necessary for the voyage. Nor did their attentions end here. They invited them to revisit Jeddo, with others of their countrymen, and pressed them warmly to establish a trade with them, holding out the wealth of the islands in gold and other precious metals as a strong inducement for them to comply with their requests. The Portuguese, who were always on the watch to seize any opportunity of advancing their commerce and enriching themselves, readily listened to and accepted the proposals of the Japanese. They hastened over to this new empire, and in a short time became comfortably settled in many of its towns and cities. The Jesuits also, anxious to extend their doctrines and their influence, accompanied their commercial brethren, and after combating and overcoming many difficulties, succeeded in making converts, and establishing the religion of the cross amongst a numerous and respectable class of the inhabitants. The connexion between the natives and the foreigners was also strengthened by the solemnities of marriage, and families were springing up in all parts of the country, whose affections were to bind in one, as it were, the interests of both people. But while the Portuguese were thus enjoying a monopoly of the commerce, some Dutch sailors, and with them an Englishman, were shipwrecked off the coast, and after encountering much peril, reached the land in safety, but utterly forlorn and destitute. On entering the nearest town, they were surprised and delighted beyond measure to meet with Europeans, and immediately entrusted their helpless and miserable condition to the sympathies of these their supposed friends. But the Portuguese remembered, with bitter enmity, the rivalry which their nation had so long maintained with the government of the Netherlands, and viewed with rancorous jealousy the progress of the Dutch commerce in the East; and accordingly the Portuguese in Japan, unmindful of the condition which they were in when landing for the first time on those very shores, determined to wreak their inhospitable revenge on those unfortunate mariners, and with inconceivable treachery, being used as interpreters, mis-translated their speeches to the native authorities, affirming that they were repentant pirates and spies, and by this crafty malice procured their condemnation, as it were out of their own mouths. It appears, however, that the Englishman Adams escaped the death which awaited the Dutch for their supposed piracy, but from what cause it is difficult to ascertain. The acuteness and ingenuity he displayed on many occasions brought him into favour with the government officers, and it was not long before he rose to some eminence in the country, and became noticed by the emperor. Eventually he became of great service to his countrymen, by obtaining for them a charter of free trade with those islands, and surpassed in influence at the court the Portuguese, who were frequently compelled to procure his intercession, though how little they deserved such kindness at his hands, the treatment he and his comrades met with on their landing sufficiently demonstrates.

Voyages to Japan now became very frequent. England, Holland, and Portugal vied with each other in gaining the good offices of the people, and establishing their interests most strongly in the country. The Honourable Company of East India Merchants fitted out several expeditions with that destination, and during the visit of the eighth, under command of Captain Saris, an English factory was founded at Nagasaki, which was well worked, and quickly in a flourishing state. But in the midst of this rising prosperity a crisis was approaching, which was to blast the prospects of the enterprising adventurers who had ploughed those distant waves, and encountered and braved the storms of those unfrequented climes. A period was at hand when this newborn commerce was to prove its shortlived existence; when the foreigners within its confines were to be banished from the soil and the ports of Japan, closed for ever against the admission of all people.

For nearly fifty years had the vessels of foreign merchants traded to Nagasaki and the other ports of the Japanese empire, and returned home laden with their peace-won spoil, filling the coffers of the adventurer with wealth, and adding to the prosperity of the country; but an over-ambitious spirit on the part of the Jesuits destroyed the good they had achieved. Not satisfied with the progress Christianity was making through the peaceful proclamation of its truths to the hearts and understandings of the natives, they assumed the right of dictating a creed for the unconverted Japanese, and asserted their right over the consciences of all. They declared themselves justified in suppressing the existing superstitions by violent means, and preached a tyrannous crusade against those that resisted their encroachments. Many and frequent were the disturbances to which such conduct gave rise, and in different provinces of the empire, where the power of the Christian exceeded that of the unbeliever, the worshippers of the ancient religion felt the cruel arm of persecution, and beheld the temples of the gods of their forefathers consumed to ashes.

Another event of a secular nature tended to hasten the great catastrophe. Jejas, who from being the Emperor's tutor, had been raised to the command of his armies, conspired against his master, and besieged him in the castle of Oasoca. The bravery of the besieged baffled the courage and stratagems of the traitor-general, who, finding all his vigorous attacks ineffectual, changed the siege into a blockade, and after four years of incessant warfare, compelled the garrison to surrender, more, be it understood, subdued by the victory of famine than the powerful forces of Jejas. The Emperor, with a few of his faithful adherents, who would not survive his misfortunes, retired to his palace. There, with an exulting pride and a spirit of defiance which nothing but the thought of capture could quell, he poured out his last libations to the gods of his country, set fire to the building, and when the pile of flames rose highest, rushed with a cry of triumph into the midst of the burning mass, and perished amidst the ruins of his citadel and home.

The result of this defeat was exceedingly disastrous to the Christians; for Jejas, having usurped the sovereignty, found it necessary to court the smiles of the stronger party in the empire to consolidate his power, and render his throne secure; and as paganism claimed the greater number of devotees, so he threw his influence on their side, discouraged Christianity, and struggled for the ascendancy of his own religion. This incensed the Jesuits to so violent a degree of rage, that they poured forth all the thunders of their anathemas against the pagan population, and incited their Christian converts, under fear of excommunication, to take up arms, not now against the idolatrous practices of the country alone, but against the usurper and his government. This was open rebellion. A violent struggle ensued; the contending armies met, and Jejas, heading his own forces, destroyed in a single battle the power and influence of the Portuguese and the Christians. The former were banished to their settlement at Macao in China, and against the latter a barbarous persecution was maintained, until the religion of the cross was swept from the land, and its professors exterminated. A decree was also passed, excluding all foreigners from the coasts and ports of Japan, a decree, from the severity of which the Dutch and Chinese claimed some exemption, the former from the assistance they gave in suppressing the rebellion, the latter from their peaceable national character. Thus Jejas effectually established his authority, and the influence of it was so great, that he transmitted the crown and its power in regular succession to his children and their children, and one of his descendants holds the secular sovereignty of the Japanese empire at the present time. These events happened in the year 1637.

The government of the country partakes chiefly of the feudal character, and many of the nobles have acquired such an accession of strength on their own estates, which are sometimes of great extent, and situated in the midst of a hilly and impassable country, as frequently to be able to live in open defiance of the authority of the laws. There are two sovereigns, who reign respectively over the spiritual and temporal affairs of the kingdom; but the nominal rulers of the different districts of the empire are princes, from whence these divisions are termed principalities, and these are again subject to the power possessed by two secretaries named Gokaros, one of whom resides in Jeddo, the other in the principal town of the district which is his peculiar care. The absent secretary is, however, obliged to leave in the capital as hostages his wife and family, from whom he is thus separated for a period of six or twelve months. A vicious and servile system of espionage is maintained by the government, so that every movement, the most secret, of any governor, is immediately reported at head quarters, and frequently, in a moment little thought of, and without any consciousness of guilt on his part, a potentate is hurried off by the officer of the crown, to undergo the execution of a sentence he has never openly had passed upon him. The spies are spread through every portion of the empire, and into every circle of society. When discovered they invariably meet with a violent death, and the assassination of one of them is of such frequent occurrence, that it attracts little or no attention amongst the Japanese public. So dangerous and hazardous is the possession of power, that abdications are constantly taking place, and the sceptre of sovereignty, after being enjoyed for a few years, is transferred into the hands of the next lineal claimant, who, it is presumed, has no immediate fear of violence from the unbridled passion of an offended and unprincipled governor.

The Mikado, their spiritual emperor, rules as the successor of the gods, who at one time were considered to have lived and exercised supreme power in Japan; and to maintain this inherited divinity inviolate, his humanity is constrained to submit to the most torturing discomfort. He sits daily upon his throne for a certain number of hours, without moving his body or turning his head to the right hand or to the left. This indicates the stability of the empire; were he to direct his face towards any part of his dominion, immediate ruin would be the consequence. He is not allowed to walk, but is always carried upon the shoulders of men, and that his sacred person may not be mutilated, his hair, beard, and nails are suffered to revel in unshorn dignity, though it is affirmed by some that such offices of decency and comfort are performed during sleep, and is called stealing his nails and hair.

The Ziogoon is the temporal, and it may safely be added, the real emperor. He has the control of the armies, which are maintained by the different princes according to the extent of their provinces. He possesses also an authority over the Mikado, but is himself subject to a variety of laws which limit his power, and expose him to the whims and caprices of the nobles. Of these, when too obnoxious, he manages to rid himself by means of his spies, who procure their condemnation and execute the sentence themselves. Hence it will be seen that the government is oppressive and tyrannical to the utmost degree. It offers no security to life or property, and renders its subjects the children of suspicion and fear.

The system is intolerable and barbarous, and its tyranny is felt from the emperor, through all classes of society, down to the peasant and the meanest slave, nor is there any prospect of a change in a policy which has obtained during so many generations, or amelioration in the condition of the Japanese, unless from external influence, since the spirit of regeneration is extinct among them, and the institutions of the country rotten at the core.

With all these social disadvantages, or rather in spite of them, the Japanese have many natural endowments. They possess a lofty and commanding figure, a frank open countenance, and an erect manly deportment. They are intrepid in danger, courteous in manner, graceful in action, and polite in the circles of their fashionable world, above any people of the east. The men shave the beard and front of the head, leaving a small piece on the crown, which is carefully gathered in, drawn upwards, and tied so as to form a tuft on the bald skull. This gives them a singular, and in the eyes of a stranger, a ridiculous appearance. The women, especially of the higher classes, are favourably described, being represented as possessing real beauty, not a little heightened by the freshness of their colour. The enthusiasm of an European admirer, it is true, might receive a severe check, when he is at first introduced to one of these fair Japanese, since the custom of blackening their teeth, pimping their lips, and extracting their eyebrows, is irreconcilable with our ideas of beauty. But laying this disfiguration aside, it will be perceived that the features of a Japanese woman have many claims to admiration, and that the face is generally soft, expressive, beautiful, and interesting. The hair is arranged in the form of a turban, into which ornaments of fine tortoise-shell of exquisite workmanship and delicate polish are inserted.

Both sexes are habited very similarly, the difference existing simply in the colours, value, and delicacy of the material. Wide gowns or robes worn over others is the chief article of dress. These are made of linen, calico, or silk, and among the wealthier orders the family coat of arms is inwoven on the back and breast. Around the waist is worn a girdle, which collects the hanging garments, and gathers them in gracefully so as to display the symmetry of the figure. The sleeves, which are of immense size and width, they use as pockets, and sometimes the folds of the gowns are applied to the same purpose, and deemed a safer depository. Gentlemen wear a scarf over their shoulders, which is regulated according to the class of the individual, but the chief distinction of rank is the privilege of wearing swords. Two worn on one side, one above the other, are indicative of a person of high nobility, whilst one is the mark of a gentleman. All classes below this are forbidden, on severe terms, to be seen with any arms.

The Japanese leave their heads uncovered, and only shelter them from the heat of the sun or the pelting of the rain by fans, an instrument which is in universal request amongst them, and may be seen in the hands of all classes. The uses to which it is applied are various, and come under the designation of useful as well as ornamental. The attire of a Japanese would be incomplete without it, it is a necessary to him. On it visitors receive their presents; the beggar stretches it out for the charitable to place their alms upon. The dandy swings it about as a Parisian or London beau would his cane. It is an instrument of punishment, and, not to enumerate too many of its uses, when presented to a noble on a peculiar kind of salver, it is the sentence of his death, which follows so instantaneously, that whilst he is stretching out his hand to take it, the executioner strikes off his head.

The foreigner, too, is considerably struck with the appearance of a Japanese town or city. The streets, as well as the buildings, are regular, and the houses seldom exceed one story. The spot chosen for the site is almost invariably the slope of a hill, a practice which the policy rather than the taste of the founders may have habituated. Wood smeared over with a mixture of clay and chopped straw is generally the material used for their construction. Adjoined to each house is a store-room, rendered fire-proof by a preparation with which the walls are plastered over. Into this room the valuable articles as well as provisions are stowed away, and so secure are they there, that when a whole town has been consumed to ashes, these buildings have remained uninjured from the effects of the fire. Every dwelling is surrounded by a garden, laid out with great taste, and kept in the neatest order, so that the tout ensemble of a Japanese town is perhaps unsurpassed by any other nations in picturesqueness of position, elegance of arrangement, and the lightness and airiness of appearance. The most elevated spots are chosen for their temples, which command an extensive prospect of the country around. In these edifices rooms are let out for the purposes of bacchanalian orgies, resembling our casinos, and thither the dissipated and profligate, as well as some of the more respectable members of the community, flock to surrender themselves up to the intoxicating delirium of pleasure.

We will now leave the town, and visit, for a short space, the country. And here no sooner is the barrier of obstructing walls left behind, and the summit of the hill on which the town is built, than a striking and beautiful picture stretches before us. Hills and mountains, undulating in every direction, intersect the island, rising higher and higher one above the other, until the dim form of the highest skirts the horizon like a cloud, and blends with the heavens, which seem to descend to meet it. No plain is visible, but these elevated grounds and deep valleys form the principle features of the landscape; whilst leafy woods, turf lands, and the pleasing garniture of vegetation fill up the ruder outlines of the scenery, and soften the aspect of the rocks. The rivers are but streams from the mountains; finding a meandering passage along the valleys; in summer fordable on foot, in winter impetuous torrents, sweeping all before them. Tufts of trees on the hills, abrupt cliffs, waving forests, villages, towns, and temples scattered here and there, fields of rice and corn, hemp and flax, orchards of fruit trees, and gardens planned with the most pleasing and striking effect, are the more minute objects in the picture, which the imagination of the reader must suggest before he can obtain a complete idea of a Japanese landscape. The rapture which a traveller feels, gazing on the beauties of this oriental Swiss prospect, is indescribable, and can only be perhaps surpassed by that of the Japanese themselves, who look upon it with the partiality which every one entertains for the beauties of his own country.

The Japanese are brave, frank, courteous, and proud by nature, but the form of government under which they live, and especially the system of espionage that exists amongst them, render them fearful, suspicious, cunning, and degraded. They are considerably advanced in the arts and sciences, and eagerly study any new learned work that may reach them from abroad. In the acquisition of languages they are said to be very quick, and take little trouble in becoming acquainted with the Dutch, which they speak fluently. In astronomy, pharmacy, and botany they have made considerable progress, but as they deem it pollution to touch a dead body, their knowledge of surgery is not very far advanced. Tea, wheat, rice, barley, hemp, and flax are the principal objects of agricultural labour, and produces an abundant harvest, but the riches of the earth are those that render Japan peculiarly rich. It abounds in gold, silver, copper, tin, sulphur, antimony, coal, precious stones, and a variety of submarine substances; all of which would constitute a source of lucrative trade, should we be able to burst asunder the chains of despotism and prejudice, which now seclude the commerce of those islands from all the world.

We may now briefly revert to those attempts which have been made to open communications with the government of the country since the year 1637, the date of that decree which interdicted all foreigners from its commerce. The Portuguese within three years attempted to regain their position in the favour of the Japanese, and a deputation was accordingly sent to Nagasaki; but the emperor was inexorable, and instead of listening to their petitions, ordered the members of it to be seized and summarily executed. Sixty-one out of seventy-three, the number the deputation consisted of, were put to death, the rest were sent adrift on the pathless ocean with a message of defiance to their king, which they never lived to deliver. They were never heard of afterwards. Subsequent attempts have been made by the English, French, Russians, and Americans to subdue the stubbornness of the Japanese government, but to no purpose. They case themselves in their prejudice, and perhaps the fear of their laws deters any influential nation from proposing the abolition of so unjust a decree. In 1808, Captain Pellw, cruising about these seas, was compelled on one occasion to take shelter in the harbour of Nagasaki, from the severity of a storm that was raging with unusual violence, and being also distressed for provisions, sent to the governor of the town requesting to be supplied with such necessaries as he required. The answer he received intimated he must be off, or the guns from the battery would open upon him. Such an insult to the British flag, and to a distressed vessel, was not to be brooked for an instant, and the gallant Captain returned a message to the effect, that unless the provisions were sent within a limited time, he would batter the town about the heads of its inhabitants. The governor thought fit on this point of the proceedings to comply, but no sooner was the order executed than he put an end to his life, to save his wife and family from death, and prevent the confiscation of his property; it being the barbarous law of the land, that any native having intercourse with a foreigner shall die, and if he consent not to be his own executioner, his wife and children shall suffer his fate, and all his property be seized and appropriated to the public service. In 1837, just two centuries after the publication of the edict of seclusion; another attempt was made to renew the trade. Some Japanese sailors had been wrecked on the coast near Macao, and an American ship was fitted out with the ostensible purpose of restoring these distressed mariners to their homes, but in reality to accomplish, if possible, a project so often tried, and in vain. But on approaching the coast, the vessel was everywhere warned off, and when the commander perceived he could effect no reconciliation, he returned to Macao, and thus the expedition ended. There are, however, hopes that the government of this country will soon exert its power and influence, and adopt some active measures to promote so desirable an object, and demand admission for the merchants of all countries, into one at least of the ports of the empire, and revive a trade which was once so profitable, but from the adverse circumstances already related, lost to us and the world for so many ages.

The desire on the part of the people to have this selfish policy abolished, has often been asserted, and there seems to exist strong evidence in favour of the assertion. It is reported that frequently in the course of a year, an European vessel may be seen from the coast of Japan, towards evening, lying in the offing; that as soon as the twilight deepens into darkness, numberless little boats put off from shore, and making way towards the ship, relieve it of its burthen and return home; that in the morning no sign or trace of the vessel is visible, and that this has occurred several times in the course of the past year. This bears its own comment. It is, we again affirm, to be hoped that, before long, the regulation which has been so oppressive for years upon natives and foreigners will be speedily removed, that we may have free ingress and egress, and thus be enabled to mingle with the Japanese as men and brethren. The interference of government in effecting such a good is extremely desirable, as it will not only confer a benefit on the natives themselves, but be the means of extending our commerce, enriching our merchants, and advancing the prosperity of Great Britain.

ON THE POSITION OF PARTIES IN THE UNITED STATES,

WITH REGARD PRINCIPALLY TO THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

BY T. O.

THE first thing that strikes the European traveller in America, especially any one from the Continent, is the independence of all the local administrations of the central government, and the very limited powers which are allowed to the latter, originally formed by an union of thirteen states, differing in the form of their governments, founded at different periods, and under the influence of different motives. A common peril and resistance to the encroachments of the English government first led these heterogeneous elements to combine; but even at their first Congress in 1774 there was a jealousy apparent between the delegates of the various states, and the war was often crippled by the little regard paid by the local governments to the decisions of the majority of the Congress. The war ended in 1783. The first difficulties which then devolved on Congress to contend with, were the debt and the restoration of commerce, which had suffered naturally during the war, and which the prohibitory tariffs of the European nations prevented from recovering its prosperity on the return of peace. In 1784, Congress applied to the various state governments for powers to make retaliatory prohibitory tariffs. Some of the states refused their consent to these regulations, and the necessity of strengthening the central government, at least as far as regarded the external relations of the country, become apparent. Virginia was the first to propose a meeting for making arrangements for this purpose. Deputies from twelve states met at Philadelphia, and on the 17th of September, 1787, the constitution was published. Ever since the first framing of the Federal constitution, causes have been at work tending to its dissolution, and the greater part of the internal history of North America consists of the account of parties and events which either have a tendency towards this result, or on the other hand counteract them. The first proclamation of the constitution gave rise to the federalist and the democratic parties, into which the American people divided themselves. The federalists, who owed their name to their opinions, and also to a remarkable work, published as a commentary on the new constitution, declared themselves the partisans of the federal power, and endeavoured to fortify its authority. They tried to point out, that on the strength of the central power would depend the position America would take with regard to foreign nations. At the head of this party we may consider Washington, who, from his long experience of the hindrances and obstructions arising from the dilatoriness and supineness of the various state governments during the war of independence, considered unity of power as indispensable, and wished to invest the central authority with supreme control in all matters of general policy. These opinions were shared by many of the men eminent at that period, so fruitful in great men. The most ardent promoter of these opinions was Alexander Hamilton, principal editor of the Federalist, and Washington's right hand during his administration. Governor Morris, author of some memoirs of the French Revolution, John Jay, Aaron Burr, and Adams the first successor of Washington as president, all entertained the same views. All these men were great proprietors, accustomed to the dignified life of great planters: they had received a brilliant education either in England or in the Colonies, had almost all filled important diplomatic missions, and had lived in European courts, where they had acquired refined tastes and manners, and justified the appellation maliciously applied to them by their adversaries, of gentlemen republicans. Opposed to them was Jefferson, the chief leader of the democrats. This party took advantage of the attachment of the Americans to municipal institutions, and endeavoured to show that the same independence which the municipal corporations held with regard to the state, ought to be enjoyed by each state in its relations to the central government. Self-government was the watch-word of this party.

Mr. Albert Gallatin, a Genevan, who died about a year ago, was the principal writer of their party. He had imbibed in his own country opinions hostile to all centralisation. The first decided check experienced by the federalists was the defeat of Adams, the second time he stood for the presidency, when he was superseded by Jefferson. Adams united the fortunes of the two families, Quincy and Adams, which were two of the richest and most important in America—had given their names to several towns and counties in New England—and who could trace their descent up to the first founders of the colony, and from thence to families in the old country. Adams thought some external splendour should accompany the first dignity of the republic. This was made a subject of reproach by Jefferson, who ridiculed it as monarchical, and thus made the friend of Washington unpopular.

The war of 1812 with England showed the necessity of not weakening the central government too much, and the two parties drew together. Madison's conciliatory administration greatly contributed to promote this result. The United States Bank was re-established for thirty years. Its charter had expired in 1811, and the opposition of the democrats had prevented its renewal. Hamilton had first introduced it during Washington's presidency; but not without strenuous opposition on the part of Jefferson. Besides the enmity which the United States Bank had to encounter on political grounds, the interests of the private banks were arrayed against it. That of New York, especially, had been very active in preventing the renewal of its charter. The whigs, as the federalists now began to be called, wished to support the bank, as an assistant to the treasury, it having been proved by experience that the money arising from the customs could not be confided to the private banks, who speculated with it, and held themselves, in consequence of the receipt of these sums, exempt from keeping gold in hand. Notwithstanding the advantages resulting from the bank, such is the fear of centralisation in America, that in 1843 its charter was not again renewed, President Tyler promising his vote against it, when the Congress were pretty nearly divided. This unexpected triumph of the democrats left them, however, in a state of embarrassment, not knowing how to take care of the state receipts. They have endeavoured to supply the services which the bank used to yield to the state, by the creation of a new office called the sub-treasury office.

Previous to this, another question had been solved, that of the (internal improvements) advocated by Mr. Clay, who, though unsuccessful, acquired great honour by the manner in which he urged this point. By the advice of Washington, duties had been imposed in order to protect native manufactures. The Americans have a peculiar dislike to direct taxation; and custom duties was to them the pleasantest way of raising a revenue. But the receipts from the customs soon exceeded the current expenses of the federal government. After the debt incurred in the war of 1812 had been paid off, there remained a surplus, the disposal of which was the cause of dispute between the two parties; the whigs wishing to lay it out in canals, railroads, and other public works, and the democrats declaring that works of this nature were not the business of the central government, and they wished the money to be returned to the separate states. This, however, was so evidently unjust, as the rich states would thereby have received so much the most, that this point was soon abandoned, and the democrats turned their attacks against the receipts, which they declared ought not to exceed the expenditure, as it gave too much power to government. This gave rise, therefore, to the question of lowering the duties, to which all the manufacturing, viz. northern states were opposed; while the south and west, which exported the new produce, fearing retaliatory tariffs in England, eagerly sought the abolition of the protective duties. To such a pitch was the dispute carried, that it nearly threatened the dissolution of the Union. To Mr. Clay is due the honour of having healed this breach, by the act of compromise which he introduced in 1833, when he induced mutual concessions from both sides. Though there have since been discussions on minor points of the tariff, substantially the agreement of 1833 has been adhered to. These questions no longer occupy the public mind. The whigs have given up all systematic plans of public works, and the democrats have in some instances requested the interference of the central government in works which required to be immediately carried through; as, for instance, the making a railway from the banks of the Mississippi to California.

The main question now occupying public attention is the abolition of slavery. For ten or twelve years preceding 1844, the abolitionist principles progressed under cover of the whig party. The venerable Adams consecrated his old age to the propagation of these opinions. The whig party furnished money to the abolitionist journals, the abolitionists voted with the whigs. But in 1844 disunion began to show itself. The abolitionists broke up into two distinct parties. The most ardent of them, under the celebrated Garrison, declared the constitution of the United States immoral and antichristian, for tolerating slavery, renounced all the rights of citizenship to that government, retaining only that of petition, which they said was not a legal but a natural right. They presented a petition for the immediate abolition of slavery, without indemnity. It was considered unconstitutional and not even read. From 1844, this fraction of the abolitionists ceased to vote at elections. The more moderate men in the abolitionist party saw that a declaration from the government pronouncing slavery immoral would be equivalent to an immediate dissolution of the Union. They turned their endeavours to preventing the spread of slavery beyond its present limits, leaving to time, the greater increase both of population and wealth in the free states, and free competition, to do the rest. The abolitionists now began to think themselves so numerous in the northern states, that they could carry a man of their own. They knew their strength was sufficient to throw the balance into whichever scale they favoured. In 1840 they had given the majority to the whigs; and many of them refusing to vote in 1844, had caused the triumph of the democrats. But when Mr. Clay and Mr. Polk were both standing for the presidency, they agreed to bring forward Mr. Birney as a third candidate. They could not carry him; but subtracting these votes from Mr. Clay, caused the success of Mr. Polk.

A small party among the abolitionists, styling themselves the free soilers, have limited their attack to demanding, year after year, the abolition of slavery in the small district round Washington, which is appropriated to the federal government, and a prohibition to all persons against bringing their slaves there. But this, as implying a condemnation of slavery, has been vehemently opposed by the deputies of the slave states. The portion of land which Virginia contributed to the federal district has been restored to it, in consequence of these difficulties. Maryland may, perhaps, have another portion, and it may end in the federal district being reduced to Washington. Of course, the free soilers have opposed the annexation of Texas, and the Mexican war, which have thrown such an increase of power into the slave states in the south. Polk demanded from Congress a vote of credit to enable him to carry on the war. The member for Pennsylvania, Mr. David Wilmot, proposed that the vote of credit should be accompanied by a proviso, that no slavery should be introduced into Texas. Every time that a new vote of credit is called for, the question of the Wilmot proviso is again brought forward. New York and Pennsylvania have instructed their deputies to persevere in demanding the Wilmot proviso.

In 1848 General Taylor became president. He was opposed by Van Buren, who, though a member of the democratic party, had a strong majority in Massachusetts, and in many of the whig states as an abolitionist, so completely has this question superseded all others in the present state of American feeling. Public men are trying to publish their opinions on this important topic. At the time Van Buren was standing for the presidency, Mr. Clay, who has always professed the most liberal ideas with regard to slavery, though a slave proprietor himself, published a pamphlet, addressed to the central states of the Union, and pointing out to them, that the time was now arrived for their taking steps preparatory to the abolition of slavery. This occasioned great agitation in the South. Parties run high, and there is great violence both in speech and action on both sides. Mr. Burton, the deputy for Missouri, during thirty years has refused to obey the mandate of his constituents to vote against the Wilmot proviso. He and Mr. Calhoun have spoken and written violently against each other on this subject. At this time ended the presidency of Mr. Polk, and the last session of Congress. Mr. Polk had proposed that provisional laws should be made for California as a territory, previous to its population having reached the numbers requisite to its being received as a state into the Union. Into this provisional constitution, the house of representatives inserted a clause that there should be no slavery. This was thrown out in the senate, and as the two chambers could not agree, California has been left without any government, with the most disorderly and unprincipled population the world can furnish—mere adventurers the greater part, who are attracted by the hope of finding gold there. It is to be hoped that some arrangement will soon be made, but as far as we have had news from America during this year, 1850, but little progress seems to have been made.

THE MUSICIAN'S MARRIAGE.

A TRUE STORY.¹

AFTER having passed the summer in visiting the principal towns of Germany, the celebrated pianist Listz arrived at Prague in October 1846.

The day after he came, his apartment was entered by a stranger,—an old man, whose appearance indicated misery and suffering. The great musician received him with a cordiality which he would not perhaps have shown to a nobleman. Encouraged by his kindness, his visitor said: "I come to you, sir, as a brother. Excuse me if I take this title, notwithstanding ing the distance that divides us; but formerly I could boast some skill in playing on the piano, and by giving instruction I gained a comfortable livelihood. Now I am old, feeble, burdened with a large family, and destitute of pupils. I live at Nuremberg, but I came to Prague to seek to recover the remnant of a small property which belonged to my ancestors. Although nominally successful, the expense of a long litigation has more than swallowed up the trifling sum I recovered. To-morrow I set out for home—penniless."

"And you have come to me? You have done well, and I thank you for this proof of your esteem. To assist a brother professor is to me more than a duty, it is a pleasure. Artists should have their purse in common; and if fortune neglects some, in order to treat others better than they deserve, it only makes it more necessary to preserve the equilibrium by fraternal kindness. That's my system; so don't speak of gratitude, for I feel that I only discharge a debt."

As he uttered these generous words, Listz opened a drawer in his writing-case, and started when he saw that this usual depository for his money contained but three ducats. He summoned his servant.

"Where is the money?" he asked.

"There, sir," replied the man, pointing to the open drawer.

"There! Why, there's scarcely anything!"

"I know it, sir. If you please to remember, I told you yesterday that the cash was nearly exhausted."

"You see, my dear brother," said Listz, smiling, "that for the moment I am no richer than you; but that does not trouble me, I have credit, and I can make ready money start from the keys of my piano. However, as you are in haste to leave Prague and return home, you shall not be delayed by my present want of funds."

So saying, he opened another drawer, and taking out a splendid medallion, gave it to the old man. "There," said he, "that will do. It was a present made me by the emperor of Austria: his own portrait set in diamonds. The painting is nothing remarkable, but the stones are fine. Take them and dispose of them, and whatever they bring shall be yours."

The old musician tried in vain to decline so rich a gift. Listz would not hear of a refusal, and the poor man at length withdrew, after invoking the choicest blessings of heaven on his generous benefactor. He then repaired to the shop of the principal jeweller in the city, in order to sell the diamonds. Seeing a miserably dressed man anxious to dispose of magnificent jewels with whose value he appeared unacquainted, the master of the shop very naturally suspected his honesty; and while appearing to examine the diamonds with close attention, he whispered a few words in the ear of one of his assistants. The latter went out, and speedily returned, accompanied by several soldiers of police, who arrested the unhappy artist, in spite of his protestations of innocence.

"You must first come to prison," they said; "afterwards you can give an explanation to the magistrate."

(1) Adapted from the French by Mrs. House.

The prisoner wrote a few lines to his benefactor, imploring his assistance. Listz hastened to the jeweller.

"Sir," said he, "you have caused the arrest of an innocent man: come with me immediately, and let us have him released. He is the lawful owner of the jewels in question, for I gave them to him."

"But, sir," asked the merchant, "who are you?"

"My name is Listz."

"I don't know any rich man of that name."

"That may be; yet I am tolerably well known."

"Are you aware, sir, that these diamonds are worth six thousand florins—that is to say, about five hundred guineas, or twelve thousand francs?"

"So much the better for him on whom I have bestowed them."

"But in order to make such a present you must be very wealthy."

"My actual fortune consists of three ducats."

"Then you are a magician!"

"By no means; and yet, by just moving my fingers, I can obtain as much money as I wish."

"You must be a magician!"

"If you choose, I'll disclose to you the magic I employ."

Listz had seen a piano in the parlour behind the shop. He opened it, and ran his fingers over the keys; then, seized by sudden inspiration, he improvised one of those soul-touching symphonies peculiar to himself.

As he sounded the first chords, a beautiful young girl entered the room. While the melody continued, she remained speechless and immovable; then, as the last note died away, she cried, with irrepressible enthusiasm,

"Bravo, Listz! 'tis wondrous!"

"Dost thou know him, then, my daughter?" asked the jeweller.

"This is the first time that I have had the pleasure of seeing or hearing him," replied she; "but I know that none living, save Listz, could draw such sounds from the piano."

Expressed with grace and modesty, by a young person of remarkable beauty, this admiration could not fail to be more than flattering to the artist. However, after making his best acknowledgments, Listz withdrew, in order to deliver the prisoner, and was accompanied by the jeweller.

Grieved at his mistake, the worthy merchant sought to repair it, by inviting the two musicians to supper. The honours of the table were done by his amiable daughter, who appeared no less touched at the generosity of Listz, than astonished at his talent.

That night the musicians of the city serenaded their illustrious brother. The next day the nobles and most distinguished inhabitants of Prague presented themselves at his door. They entreated him to give some concerts, leaving it to himself to fix any sum he pleased as a remuneration. Then the jeweller perceived that talent, even in a pecuniary light, may be more valuable than the most precious diamonds.

Listz continued to go to his house, and, to the merchant's great joy, he soon perceived that his daughter was the cause of these visits. He began to love the company of the musician, and the fair girl, his only child, certainly did not hate it.

One morning, the jeweller, coming to the point with German frankness, said to Listz,

"How do you like my daughter?"

"She is an angel!"

"What do you think of marriage?"

"I think so well of it, that I have the greatest possible inclination to try it."

"What would you say to a fortune of three million francs?"

"I would willingly accept it."

"Well, we understand each other. My daughter pleases you, you please my daughter: her fortune is ready,—be my son-in-law."

"With all my heart."

The marriage was celebrated the following week.

And this, according to the chronicles of Prague, is a true account of the marriage of the great and good Pianist, Listz.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XLI.

WHEREIN FAUST "SETS UP" FOR A GENTLEMAN, AND TAKES TO A COURSE OF SERIOUS READING.

WHEN General Grant had perused the Morning Post, containing the paragraph with which the last chapter concluded, he left the remainder of his breakfast untasted, and hastening to the library, wrote the following letter:—

"MY LORD,—On learning from my daughter the uncourteous, I had almost written ungentlemanly, manner in which you neglected her safety on Saturday evening, I was naturally much incensed. A paragraph referring to you in the Post of this morning, affords a sufficient clue to the cause of your absence from the opera-house, but unfortunately does so by casting upon you an imputation, which (unless you can explain the affair to my entire satisfaction, which I confess appears to me improbable,) must necessarily break off all intercourse between us. I am aware that your conduct may not have exceeded the limits which the world terms honourable, but I do not regulate my opinions by the world's standard, and should consider that I was indeed neglecting my duty as a father, were I to entrust my daughter's happiness to a gamester, whose success has involved the ruin and self-murder of a fellow-creature. These may sound harsh terms, but unless you can disprove that they are true ones, I for the last time sign myself, yours faithfully,

"ARCHIBALD GRANT."

Having relieved his mind by penning the above epistle, he despatched a mounted groom to convey it to its destination, and having seen him depart, shut himself up, in solitary dignity, to await an answer. In less time than could have been imagined, the groom returned, bearing the following missive:—

"Lord Bellefield presents his compliments to General Grant, and having perused his strangely offensive letter, begs to decline affording any explanation whatsoever of the conduct of which General Grant sees fit to disapprove. Lord Bellefield agrees in thinking that under these circumstances all intercourse between himself and the General's family had better cease."

While the General sat in his library pondering over this agreeable epistle with a rueful countenance, to which anger, vexation, and outraged dignity imparted a singularly undesirable expression, an eager and exciting conversation was being carried on in a pretty little apartment opening into a miniature conservatory, dedicated to the use of Annie Grant. Emily had arrived, all her own natural, fascinating, impulsive, silly little self again, and had pooh-poohed any attempt at coolness on Annie's part, by throwing her arms round her neck, and kissing her a very unnecessary number of times, under the plea of her being "a dear ill-used thing who must be petted." And having thus at one and the same time expiated her offences and relieved her feelings, she danced across the room, bolted the door, drew a heavy damask curtain over it, and exclaiming "Now we're snug," danced back again, and flinging herself into an easy chair, began,

"Oh, my dear Annie! I am so miserable, so utterly wretched, I must go back to Italy; I've written to Alessandro to come and fetch me directly. I shall never be happy again,—at least not till I've quite forgotten it all,—and that will be never." And here came out a little lace parody of a pocket-handkerchief, which, although by no means a desirable article where-with to face a violent cold in the head, or at all calculated to withstand so much as an average sneeze, yet sufficed to dry the ghost of the tear which Emily's deep wretchedness drew from her.

"My dear Emily, what is the matter?" returned Annie, alarmed by a thousand vague fears, though, not having seen the paragraph, she was as yet unconscious of the darkest cloud that obscured the family horizon.

"Oh, my love, I suppose I ought not to tell you anything about it, but I must, for I've no one else to confide in. That wretch Gus!—would you believe it? he actually wanted me to leave poor dear Alessandro, and to run away with him;" and then, with many ejaculations, and much flourishing of the homœopathic sized handkerchief, she went on to relate, how when she became separated from Annie at the opera house, "which was all that creature Gus's fault, and done on purpose," she was certain, the "creature" had availed himself of the opportunity he had thus secured, to urge his undying attachment to her, which affection, despite its inherent principle of vitality, he declared would assuredly bring him to an early grave in the event of her obduracy continuing; but Emily, though positively a flirt, and negatively rather a goose than otherwise, was not unprincipled, and so when she had overcome her first impulse of surprise and mortification, all the virtuous wife arose within her, and she gave Gus to understand, by dint of sundry short, sharp, and decisive plain-spoken unpleasantnesses, that he had made a false move, and ruined his game. Thence lapsing abruptly into a fit of sulky dignity, she ordered him, with the voice and gestures of a tragedy queen, to lead her to her carriage; finally, despatching the foiled "Lionne" hunter to remedy one of his ill deeds by finding Annie, on which mission he departed in a state of mind the reverse of seraphic. Having concluded this historical episode, la Contessa proceeded to append thereto certain annotations and reflections, in the course of which she contrived to fix much blame on society in general, and on Gus and Alessandro in particular, but none whatsoever on her own flirting manner and inordinate love of attention; which self-deluding analysis was by no means an original feature in the case, but rather an unconscious imitation of the proceedings of many a deeper thinker than poor little Emily.

The conference between the girls was still at its height, when a summons for Annie from her father interrupted the proceedings; whereupon Emily, declaring that neither her health nor spirits were then capable of undergoing the pain forte et dure of an interview with aunt Martha, drove home again, to console her breaking heart with a volume of George Sand's last novel. The General was in a great state of virtuous indignation. Lord Bellefield's note had been as gunpowder sprinkled over the smouldering embers of his wrath, and when Annie arrived, they (or, to translate the metaphor slang-icé, he) "flared up" to an immense extent. He told her of all the enormities which the newspapers attributed to her cousin, and signified his belief that the case had been rather understated than otherwise; he informed her of Lewis's rencontre with the delinquent at the door of a gaming-house; he adduced the note which he had just received as a proof that its writer must be lost to all better feeling, utterly wanting in a proper respect for age and position; and, in short, he said a great many severe and unwise things, after the fashion of angry men in general, for which he was afterwards very sorry, finding such speeches easier to say than to unsay— which result is also by no means uncommon in similar cases.

Having relieved his feelings by this explosion, he proceeded to the more serious business of the interview, by informing her that the necessary consequence of these uncomfortable revelations must be the dissolution of all ties, present or prospective, between herself and Lord Bellefield, which autocratic act he performed with outward austerity and inward impudation, as he fully expected Annie to receive the harsh decree with a violent burst of tears, and, man-like, there was nothing he dreaded so much—he would rather have faced a charge of cavalry any day. But to his surprise, Annie sustained the information with a degree of stoic self-control that was perfectly marvellous. She neither wept, sighed, nor attempted the hysterio line; she only said gravely, "It's all very sad and shocking; but, of course, dear papa, I am ready to agree to whatever you think best." The General rubbed his hands—there was a daughter for you! Not a word of opposition, to hear was to obey—it actually restored him to good humour: he talked to her kindly and sensibly for a quarter of an hour, and then went out and purchased for her a valuable diamond bracelet, which was his idea of rewarding self-sacrifice in woman. And so did Annie, involuntarily and unconsciously, gain high praise and honour, for submitting with resignation to a decree which afforded her unmitigated satisfaction. As she left the library, she encountered poor Walter, who appeared in unusually high spirits. Next to Lewis, Annie held the foremost place in Walter's affections, from the unvarying patience and kindness with which she treated him; moreover, having failed to inspire him with the degree of respect not unmingled with awe with which he was accustomed to regard his tutor, he looked upon her in the light of a companion and an equal, to whom it might be safe to confide certain mischievous performances, in which, as his spirits acquired more elasticity, and his mental powers began to develop, he saw fit from time to time to indulge. With some such intention did he now approach her, whispering as he drew near, "I want you, Annie, I want you to come with me and see Faust dressed like a gentleman!"

"See what? you silly boy," returned Annie, laughing.

"Come with me and you shall see," was the rhythmic and oracular response; and seizing her by the hand, he dragged her off in the direction of the sitting-room appropriated to his own use and that of his tutor.

"Is Mr. Arundel there?" inquired Annie, pausing when she discovered their destination.

"No, he's not at home, there's no other gentleman there except Mr. Faust," was the reply; and thus reassured, Annie complied with the boy's whim, and allowed him to carry her off unopposed. Now, since we have had any especial intercourse with that worthy dog, Faust's education had progressed rapidly as well as Walter's. Lewis, partly from want of occupation during the many weary hours his attendance on Walter necessitated, partly because by so doing he was enabled to excite and interest the feeble intellect of his poor charge, had availed himself of the unusual power of control he had acquired over the dog, to teach him gundry tricks, somewhat more difficult to perform than the ordinary routine of canine accomplishments—for instance, having perfected him in sitting on his hind-legs in the attitude popularly supposed to represent the act of begging, he went on to teach him to sit thus perched up in a corner for a space of time gradually increasing, as by practice the animal's muscles acquired more rigidity, until, at length, it was no uncommon feat for him to remain in this attitude for an hour at literally a "sitting." Moreover, if a light book or pamphlet were placed on his fore-paws, he would support it, and sit gazing on the open page before him, with a solemn gravity of countenance, indicating, apparently, the deepest interest in the work he seemed to be perusing. Of the results of this educational course, Walter had on the present occasion availed himself, and, accordingly, Annie, on her introduction to the study, found the excellent dog seated on his hind-legs in a corner, with an extempore mantle formed of a red scarf, drooping gracefully from his shoulders, and an old cap of Walter's on his head. Thus attired, he appeared to be conning, with an expression of puzzled diligence, a tract against profane swearing, by Mrs. Hannah More, presented to Walter by Miss Livingstone, on the occasion of his inadvertently making use in her presence of the scandalous expression, "Bless my heart!" Annie, duly impressed by this spectacle, laughed even more than Walter had hoped for, and told Faust that he was much the best dog in the world, in which assertion she was not, as we think, guilty of any great exaggeration. And Faust taking the compliment to himself only when the occurrence of his name rendered the allusion unmistakably personal, slobbered affectionately with his great comic mouth, and winked with his loving eyes, and made abortive attempts to wag his friendly tail, which was crumpled up un-wag-ably in the corner, and, in the plenitude of his excellence, sat more erect than ever, and studied his profane swearing still more diligently.

As soon as Walter's delight at Annie's amusement had in some degree subsided, he turned to her, saying:

"But, Annie, you have not found out why I told you Faust looked like a gentleman."

"Oh! because he sits there reading his book with such an air of dignified composure, I suppose," was the reply.

"No; I'd a better reason than that," returned Walter, with a look of unusual sagacity.

"Well, then, you must tell me what it was, for I can't guess," observed Annie, good naturedly.

"Look again, and find out," rejoined Walter.

Thus urged, Annie examined the dog more attentively than she had before done, and discovered that round his neck was slung the identical gold watch and chain, which, at her suggestion, Charles Leicester and his wife had given to Lewis.

"Why, you've hung Mr. Arundel's watch round Faust's neck! Oh, Walter, how foolish of you; he might have thrown it down and broken it!" exclaimed Annie, aghast at her discovery.

"Yes, that's it," returned Walter, chuckling with delight at the success of his puerile attempt at a trick. "All gentlemen wear gold watches, you know, and so does Mr. Faust."

"You ought not to have put it on him; I'm sure Mr. Arundel will be very angry," resumed Annie; and, kneeling down by the dog, she began untwisting the chain from his neck. "Sit still, Faust; be quiet, sir," she continued, as Faust, in his affection, attempted to take an unfair advantage of the situation to lick her hands and face, in which act of impertinence Walter sedulously encouraged him; still Annie persevered, and at length succeeded in disengaging the chain, and rescuing the watch from its dangerous position. "There," she exclaimed, "I have remedied the effects of your mischief, Master Walter; but I should never have been able to accomplish it if Faust had not been the best behaved, dearest old dog in the world;" and, with an impulse of girlish playfulness, she threw her arms round the animal, and pressed his rough head against her shoulder, her soft auburn ringlets falling like a shower of gold upon his shaggy coat.

At this moment, Lewis, who had been to talk over his Saturday evening's adventures with Frere, (or, at least, such portion of them as he chose to reveal, for on some subjects he was strangely reserved, even with Frere,) returned, and finding the door ajar, entered noiselessly, and stood transfixed by the sight of the tableau vivant we have endeavoured to describe. He thought that he had never beheld anything so lovely in his life before, nor was he far wrong. The time that had elapsed since we first introduced Annie Grant to the reader, had altered only to improve her beauty; her figure had gained a certain roundness of outline, and her face acquired a depth of expression, which had been the only finishing touches, wanting to complete, one of those rare specimens of loveliness, on which we gaze with a speculative wonder as to why so much beauty should be, as it were wasted on this world of change, and sin, and sorrow, and not reserved for that "Better Land"

"Where all lovely things and fair Pass not away."

Whether ideas at all analogous to these presented themselves to the mind of Lewis, we are unable to say; certain it is, however, that (his artist eye attracted by the picture before him) he stood gazing as one entranced, while his colour went and came, and his broad chest heaved with the intensity of his emotion. How long affairs might have remained in this position it is impossible to decide, had not Faust, becoming aware of his master's presence by some mysterious canine instinct, made an unceremonious attempt to free himself from Annie's caresses; and that young lady, raising her eyes, encountered those of Lewis fixed upon her with an expression, which changed in an instant from ardent admiration to one of grave courtesy, as he found that he was observed. Annie's manner, as she rose and came forward, afforded but little clue whether or not she had noticed this change, and though her colour appeared somewhat heightened, no want of self-possession was discernible as she said, holding up the watch,

"See what I have been rescuing from the mischievous devices of Master Walter! he had actually hung my cousin Charles' present to you round Faust's neck, in order to make him look like a gentleman, as he declared. Walter, come and answer for your misdeeds; I intend Mr. Arundel to be very angry with you—where are you, sir?" and, as she spoke, she looked round for her companion, but, whether really alarmed at the possibility of being reproved for his mischief, or whether actuated by some reasonless caprice of his half-developed intellect, Walter was nowhere to be found; so Lewis, having thanked Annie for her care of his watch, politely held open the door for her to depart. But, when kidnapped by Walter, Annie had been carrying an armful of books, and Lewis, becoming aware of this fact, could do no less than offer to take them up to the drawing-room for her. Having accomplished this feat he was about to retire, when it occurred to him that he was bound, in common civility, to inquire whether she had sustained any ill effects from her alarm.

"Oh, no," replied Annie, "thanks to your kindness and consideration, I am literally quite pour la peur."

"I suppose," she added, hesitatingly, "you have, ere this, learned the sad cause of Lord Bellesfield's absence on Saturday night?" and, on Lewis replying in the affirmative, she continued,—“And do you believe all that the newspapers insinuate? Can my cousin have really behaved so very wickedly?"

"I called on my friend Richard Frere this morning," returned Lewis, "and I learn from him that the main facts of the case are matters of notoriety; for instance, racing men are well aware that Lord Bellesfield won a large sum of money from this unfortunate young man; nor would your cousin attempt to deny that it is so. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the fashionable London world to hazard an opinion on the subject; but Frere, who knows everybody, says the story has gained universal credence; and, though by no means disposed to judge human nature severely, believes in it himself."

"It is very, very shocking," murmured Annie; "and I had hoped it could not be true, but papa is much incensed, and believes it fully; and I fancy you do also, although, having such just cause to dislike my cousin, you are too generous to blame him."

"Indeed, you are mistaken," returned Lewis, kindly; for her manner confirmed him in an impression which had arisen in his mind, that the distaste she had expressed to the engagement with Lord Bellesfield would vanish, as her anger at his neglect cooled. "Indeed I do not think so; on the contrary, I have a strong conviction that the affair has been misrepresented and exaggerated, and that your cousin will be able to clear himself, not only to your satisfaction, but to that of General Grant also."

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed Annie, impetuously; and then, ere the words were well spoken, she continued: "No, I do not mean that. How wicked of me to say so! but, oh! it is such joy to feel that I am free—free as air!" Then, observing that Lewis's eyes were fixed upon her with an inquiring glance, though his lips framed no sound, she added with a bright blush, "Yes, you were a true prophet, Mr. Arundel," and, turning abruptly, she quitted the room.

And, Lewis! Did he rejoice that the man he hated was thus crossed in his dearest wishes, thus held up to public obloquy? Strange as many will deem it, he did not. On the contrary—except on Annie's account—he was annoyed at the turn events had taken. In the first place, although the facts were so strong that he could not reasonably discredit the reports that were in circulation, he felt a sort of instinctive belief that Lord Bellefield was not guilty of all the evil laid to his charge. He recalled the expression of his face as he had seen it on the night of the suicide; it had not been that of a man hardened in crime, who had left the victim of his betting schemes, unaided in his extremity, to seek refuge from dishonour in the madness of self-destruction; but rather that of a being of mixed good and evil, startled by some frightful reality of life into a condition of temporary remorse. If Lewis could have realized his exact wishes at this moment, he would have desired to clear Lord Bellefield's character by his own unassisted efforts, and, as a reward, to have called him out the next morning, and fought with small swords, (pistols would have decided the matter too quickly to satisfy him,) till one or both should have furnished subjects for the undertaker. Then his thoughts reverted to Annie—she was free, and rejoiced in her freedom, therefore she was to be won. Watch his features as the idea strikes him: first a flush of joy, crimsoning brow and cheek, fading to the pale hue of despair; then the clenched hand and compressed lips, that tell of the strong will battling with, aye, and conquering—for the will is as yet the stronger—the germs of a consuming passion. Brave young heart, tasting for the first time the true bitterness of life, angels might have wept to view thy gallant striving!

CHAPTER XLII.

LEWIS PRACTICALLY TESTS THE ASSERTION THAT VIRTUE IS ITS OWN REWARD, AND OBTAINS AN UNSATISFACTORY RESULT.

THE aphorism embodying the statement that a storm is usually followed by a calm, although by no means original, is not, on that account, the less true; nor, in tracing the course of events in the household of General Grant, shall we discover an exception to this rule in the "Law of storms." Immediately after the incident we have related, Lord Bellefield, (probably wishing to escape the disagreeable notoriety likely to be obtained by his share in the catastrophe,) escorted his sister to Italy, without making any attempt to deprecate the anger of General Grant; and, although the Marquis of Ashford, who greatly desired that the proposed matrimonial alliance should take place, (hoping that marriage might wean his son from various expensive pursuits, of the nature whereof the reader may have gleaned some faint idea from the previous course of this narrative,) made sundry attempts to effect a reconciliation, the General remained inexorable. From his new position, as occasional secretary to her father, Lewis was thrown into constant intercourse with Annie, while, from the deservedly high opinion General Grant had formed of him, he was treated more as a friend than a dependant. Before Mrs. Arundel and Rose left London, Annie obtained her father's permission to invite the latter to spend a few days with them. Rose placed the invitation in Lewis's hand before showing it even to Mrs. Arundel; she divined that her brother would feel strongly on the subject, and determined to be guided by his wishes; he read Annie's note in silence; it was like herself, simple, frank and warm-hearted, it was accompanied by a few lines from the General, kind (for him) and courteous in the extreme. "Miss Arundel would confer an obligation on his daughter, by allowing her the opportunity of becoming acquainted with, &c. &c." The General had heard of Rose's literary reputation, and looked upon her as a second Madame de Staël;—a woman who had written a book, appeared to his simplicity a thing as wonderful, as, in these latter days, when, to speak poetically, the sun of literature is obscured by the leafy greenness of the softer sex, we are accustomed to regard a woman who has never done so. Lewis read the two notes; there was not a shadow of patronage from beginning to end at which the most rampant pride could take offence—the invitation was unexceptionable; and then a crowd of conflicting ideas rushed upon him, and he paced the apartment for once in a state of the most complete indecision. This was not a mood of mind which could ever continue long with Lewis, and, pausing abruptly, he said, "I really do not see how you can well refuse, after such a very kind note from—from the General."

"I shall be delighted to accept it, dear Lewis, since you wish it as well as myself; I long to know more of that sweet Annie."

"You will be disappointed if you expect to find Miss Grant unusually clever, returned Lewis, moodily; she has good natural abilities, but nothing more, neither has she been accustomed to live amongst intellectual people; she is by no means your equal in point of talent."

Rose looked surprised at this depreciatory speech; she considered Annie so fascinating, that she did not imagine it in man's nature to criticise her unfavourably, and that Lewis, of all people, should do so, was very incomprehensible. She only replied, however, "Miss Grant is much more accomplished than I am, at all events; she sketches like an artist, plays with great taste and execution, and sings most sweetly. I do not think it by any means an advantage to a woman to be unusually clever; it tends to force her out of her proper sphere, and to urge her into a degree of publicity repugnant to all the better instincts of her nature."

"I quite agree you," rejoined Lewis, cordially. "A woman should have a quick vigorous intellect, to enable her to perceive and appreciate the good, the true, and the beautiful, but nothing beyond. With a single exception, dear Rose, I consider literary women complete anomalies, things to wonder at and to pity; depend upon it few women who devote their lives to literature are really happy."

As Lewis ceased speaking Rose sat for some moments pondering the truth of the opinions which he, in common with many of the best and wisest of his sex, held on this subject. At length she said—"I agree, and yet I differ with you; surely a fine mind is one of the noblest gifts God can bestow upon his creature, because," she added reverently, "the higher the intellect, the nearer it must approach to His Own perfect wisdom; therefore talent ought to be a boon to woman, as well as to man; but is it not in the application of that talent that the mischief lies? If the consciousness of mental superiority unfits a woman for the performance of her natural duties, instead of enabling her to fulfil them more thoroughly, the fault rests not in the gift, which is in itself a privilege, but in the misapplication of it by the person on whom it is bestowed. Retirement is a woman's natural position, and anything which leads her to forsake it, tends to unsex and deteriorate her; I do not say that it must necessarily do so; if, for instance, some pious motive, such as a desire to assist her family, actuates her, she often appears to be protected from the dangers which surround the path which she has chosen, but that these dangers are great and many it is vain to deny."

"My opinion is," rejoined Lewis, "that amongst either men or women, those only should write books who, from some cause or other, are so thoroughly imbued with their subject, that utterance becomes, as it were, a necessity; then, and then only, do they produce anything great and good. The strongest argument I know against women writing, is, that they never appear to exceed pleasing mediocrity. You have no female Shakespeare or Milton—even Byron and Scott are unapproached by the bravest of your literary Amazons. Certainly women should not write;" and, having uttered this opinion much as if he would have liked to alter the "should" into "shall," and to be made autocrat of England till he had purged the land from blue-stockings, Lewis took his hat and departed, leaving that "talented authoress," his sister, to chew the cud of his encouraging observations as best she might.

The practical result of this conversation was, that Rose spent a week in Park Crescent, and thus the occurrences thereof fell out. Miss Livingstone first catechised, then patronised the young tutor's sister. The General also tried a pompously condescending system, but Rose's sweetness subdued the old soldier; and, ere the week had passed, he became devoted to her, and, in his stately fashion, loved her only a little less than his own daughter. And Annie—she first began by being afraid of her new acquaintance, because she was an authoress; then she discovered that she was not so alarming after all; next it occurred to her that she was very sensible; then that she was very affectionate, which went a great way with Annie; and finally, that she was quite perfect and exactly the friend she had been all her life pining for. From the moment she discovered this, which was once upon a time when Rose, carried away by the heat of congenial conversation, began to talk about her brother, she delighted to lay bare her pure girlish heart to her new-found friend. And what does the reader suppose it contained? Any very mysterious secret, any dire and soul-harrowing episode, as became the heart of a heroine?—Alas, for poor degenerate Annie! there were no such interesting contents in her warm little bosom, only much simplicity, sundry good resolutions containing the germs of future self-discipline, great natural amiability, a ready appreciation of all that was excellent in art or nature, and an open and unbounded admiration of, and respect for, the character of Lewis; so open indeed, that Rose thankfully acknowledged to her secret soul, that one alarming possibility, which had lately occurred to and haunted her, viz. that Annie and Lewis were falling in love with each other, had no foundation in fact. The only drawback to Rose's pleasure in her visit was, strange to say, the behaviour of her brother.—His manner, when alone with her—and the delicate tact of Annie Grant afforded them many opportunities for a tête à tête—was wayward and fitful in the extreme. Sometimes, but very seldom, he appeared low and out of spirits; at others, he was cold and sarcastic, or even perverse and unjust; and, though these fits were invariably followed by expressions of the most affectionate regard towards Rose herself, yet the idea with which they impressed her, was, that his mind was ill at ease, and, that for some reason which he studiously concealed, he was unhappy. The week passed away like a dream, and Annie, as she parted from her new friend, felt as if some being of a superior order, endowed with power to make and to keep her good, were leaving her, again to fight single-handed with the trials and temptations of life.

Frere had been despatched by his scientific superiors to inspect certain organic remains, which had come to light during the formation of a railroad cutting in the north of Ireland; which remains, assuming to be the vertebræ and shin bone of an utter impossibility, (the comparative-anatomical sketch, which Frere designed on the ex pede Hercules principle, represented the lamented deceased as a species of winged hippopotamus, with a bird's head, a crocodile's tail, and something like an inverted umbrella round his cameleopard-like neck, forming a whole more picturesque than probable,) excited the deepest interest in the world of science, which lasted till, unluckily, one of the workmen, striking his pickaxe against a partially imbedded bone, found that the Rumpaddyostodon, (for so had Frere's chef already named it,) was composed of Irish oak.

Ere Frere returned from this expedition, Mrs. Arundel and Rose had quitted London, a fact which annoyed that gentleman more than he could reasonably account for; having, however, recovered from his strange fit of shyness, he wrote Rose a long account of his adventures, winding up by originating a pressing invitation to himself to spend a fortnight with them during the vacation, which invitation he not only accepted most graciously, but, with the utmost benevolence, volunteered to prolong to three weeks, if he could possibly manage it."

Lewis, shortly after the departure of his mother and sister, received what Annie termed "marching orders," viz. an intimation that on a certain day and hour, he and his pupil were to hold themselves in readiness to start for Broadhurst, it being one of the General's pet idiosyncrasies, to manage his family movements saltatim, by jerks, as it were, which disagreeable habit he had acquired during his campaigning days, when the exigencies of military service necessitated such abrupt proceedings. The consequence of this particular exercise of discipline was, that Lewis received the following note on the evening before their departure.

DEAR SIR,—Learning this morning, accidentally, that you are about to leave town to-morrow, and wishing much to see you on a matter of some importance before you do so, shall I be putting you to any great inconvenience if I ask you to do me the favour of breakfasting with me to-morrow? Name your own hour from 6 o'clock downwards; my boy is waiting, or more properly (you know his mendacious propensities) lying in wait for your answer. N.B.—I am aware of the utter vileness of that pun, but my ink is so confoundingly thick that really I could not make a better one. Yours faithfully, T. BRACY.

To this, Lewis replied that he would be with him by eight o'clock on the following morning, and was as good as his word.

"This is kind of you, Mr. Arundel," exclaimed Bracy, shaking him heartily by the hand, "I like a man who will come to you at a minute's notice; now, as I know your time's short, we'll go to work at once and talk as we eat. Bring the eggs and rolls, Orphy."

"Please, sir, they ain't none of 'em come," responded the individual thus addressed, who was no less a personage than the tiger, "for falsehood famed."

"I knew he'd say that," observed Bracy aside, with a look of exultation, "I knew he'd say so, because I saw the man bring 'em five minutes ago; sharp boy! he never loses an opportunity of lying. Perhaps they may have arrived while you've been up here," he continued blandly, "go and see, Orphy."

"What do you call your tiger?" inquired Lewis, as the imp disappeared.

"Why his real name is Dick Timmins," returned Bracy, "I have taken the trouble to ascertain that fact beyond a doubt; of course, I should not have believed it merely upon his authority; but I call him Orphy, which is a convenient abbreviation of Orpheus, because, like that celebrated mythical musician, he is at all times and seasons perfectly inseparable from a lyre! 'a poor pun,' sir, 'but mine own.'"

"It must surely be inconvenient and troublesome to be obliged perpetually to guard against some deception or other, to be in continual doubt as to what has or what has not taken place in your household," remarked Lewis.

"Not at all, my dear Arundel, there's the beauty of it," returned Bracy; "others doubt and are perplexed, but I am never at a loss for a moment, I know all his most intricate involutions of lying, and can track him through a course of falsehood as a greyhound follows a hare: that boy could not deceive me unless he were suddenly to take to telling the truth; but there's not the least fear of that, his principles are too well established. Ah! inter alia, here he comes,—do you see the pun? pre-suppose an Irish brogue, and accent the penultimate instead of the first syllable in the second word, and its not such a bad one after all."

When, to use the popular lyric style, the "false one had departed," and the gentlemen were again left tête à tête, Lewis, reminding his companion that his time was short, hinted that it would not be amiss if he were at once to acquaint him with the business to which he had referred in his note.

"Ah! yes, to be sure," replied Bracy, "it was a letter I had from Frere, yesterday, which put the thing into my head. Let us see, what does he say?" And pulling a letter from his pocket, he ran his eye down it, reading and soliloquizing somewhat after the following fashion.—"Hum! ha! 'Never take shares in an Irish railway—' thank ye, I never mean to—'the natives in these parts are not Cannibals, at which no one at all particular in his eating would wonder, after seeing the state of filth—well, I won't read that, it will spoil our breakfast,—'the organic remains are coming out splendidly; I feel little doubt they must have belonged to some antediluvian monster yet unknown to science.' Ah! the fossil remains of a pre-Adamite Irish bull, probably; and that's another, by Jove, for there would have been nobody to make it at that time of day: there's a P.S. about it, though—Ah! here it is—'only fancy, my organic remains prove to be vegetable, not animal; nothing more nor less than a new species of Irish Oaks.' A new species of Irish Hoax, rather; I wonder how he came to miss the pun,—some men do throw away their opportunities sadly; but I'm wasting your time—now then—'in regard to what you tell me about the Bellefield affair, I can do nothing, not being on the spot; your best plan will be to communicate with Lewis Arundel,—he is thoroughly au fait as to the whole matter; tell him everything, and act according to his advice. You may safely do so. I always thought his lordship a great scoundrel,' (rather strong language!) 'but in this case he appears more to be pitied than blamed; I like fair play all the world over, and would give even the devil his due.'—There," continued Bracy, folding up the letter, "that's what Richard Frere says, and I, knowing his advice to be good, am prepared to act upon it."

"It may be good," returned Lewis, in a tone of annoyance; "but, as far as I am concerned, it is particularly enigmatical. There are many reasons why it is undesirable, I may say impossible, for me to interfere with Lord Bellefield's affairs."

"Still, if you are the man I take you to be," replied Bracy, seriously, "you would not wish any one to labour under unjust imputations, from which a word of truth can set him free. But it's no use beating about the bush; hear what I have to say, and then you can act, or remain neuter, as you please. Of course you read the newspaper account of that sad business about poor Mellerton?"

Lewis replied in the affirmative, and Bracy continued, "Except in one or two points, the statement was substantially correct, but these happen to be rather important ones. In the first place I should tell you that Mellerton was an intimate friend of my own. We were great cronies at Eton, and never lost sight of each other afterwards. I first heard of this betting affair from an officer of high rank, who holds an appointment by which he is necessarily a good deal behind the scenes at the War Office. Somehow it reached his ears that Mellerton had been betting heavily, and met with severe losses, and knowing that I had some influence with him, he wished me to give him a friendly hint, which I accordingly did. Mellerton took it very well, poor fellow! and thanked me for my advice, which was his invariable custom, though I can't say he usually acted upon it. He confessed that he had lost more money than was convenient, and told me he had been forced to borrow, but the amount of his losses he studiously concealed. On the morning of the day of his death, the same person sent for me again, and told me he was afraid Mellerton had been behaving very madly, and in the strictest confidence informed me that it was determined upon to examine into his accounts, and that if, as he feared, they would not bear the light, his character would be blasted for life, adding that I was at liberty to warn him of this, and give him an opportunity, if possible, of replacing the money. Owing to a chapter of accidents, as ill luck would have it, I was unable to meet with Mellerton till late in the evening, when I found him in a state of distraction, having just received officially the information I had sought to forestall. Seeing how much I knew already, he told me everything. I will not recapitulate the miserable details, but the newspapers did not overstate the truth. Well, as a forlorn hope, I suggested the appeal to Lord Bellefield's generosity, and after much persuasion he agreed to let me make the trial. I sprang into a hansom cab, and drove like the wind to Ashford House. Bellefield was dining with his sister; I followed him to Berkeley Square, and then to the Opera-house, where I lost not a minute in explaining my business. Well, sir, instead of rejecting the appeal, as has been reported, Lord Bellefield appeared greatly distressed at the intelligence,—jumped into his cab, taking me with him, and as we drove down to poor Mellerton's lodgings, expressed his readiness to do whatever I thought best,—adding, that he had 10,000*l.* at his banker's, which was quite at Mellerton's service till he could sell his Yorkshire estate. The rest of the tale you know. The poor fellow, thinking, from my prolonged absence, that my attempt had failed, and unable to bear the disgrace of exposure, placed a loaded pistol in his pocket, repaired to a gaming-table, betted to the full amount of his defalcation, lost, and blew his brains out. We got there just as the surgeon they had sent for declared life was extinct; and you never saw a man so cut up as Bellefield was about it. He accused himself of being a murderer, and, in fact, seemed to feel the thing nearly as much as I did myself. As soon as he had a little recovered, he volunteered to drive to Knightsbridge, to break the thing to poor Fred, Mellerton's brother, while I did the same by his mother and sisters; and a nice scene I had of it,—I thought the old lady would have died on the spot. But now, to come to the point;—I hear that old Grant, believing all the newspaper lies, has quarrelled with his intended son-in-law, and broken off the engagement; and that Lord Bellefield, too proud to make any explanations, has allowed him to continue in his mistake.—Is this so?"

"I have no reason to believe your information is incorrect," was the cautious reply.

"In that case, don't you think it is due to Lord Bellefield to acquaint General Grant with the truth?"

Lewis paused for a minute or two in thought ere he replied—"Certainly; it would be most unjust to withhold it."

"Well, I'm very glad you agree with me," returned Bracy, rubbing his hands with the air of a man who has escaped some disagreeable duty. "Then I may depend upon you to set the matter right?"

"Upon me!" rejoined Lewis, in surprise.

"Yes, to be sure," was the reply; "that's what Frere expects. You see, it's rather a delicate affair for a man to interfere in; particularly one who is a complete stranger. I don't believe I ever set eyes on Governor Grant in my life. Now you, living in the house, can find a hundred opportunities. There is a good deal in selecting the molliæ tempora fundi with men as well as with women."

"Then I am to understand that you have related these facts to me for the express purpose of my communicating them to General Grant?"

"Yes, to be sure. Do you think I should have put you to the inconvenience of coming here this morning merely for the sake of having a gossip?"

"And suppose I were to refuse to make this communication?" continued Lewis.

"Such a supposition never occurred to me," replied Bracy, in amazement, "but if you were to do such an ill-natured thing, matters must take their own course. In telling you, I've done all that I consider I am in any way called upon to do; if you, for any reason, deem it inadvisable to enlighten General Grant, there the thing must rest. Frere tells me to be guided by your advice, and so I shall; as I have just said, I leave it entirely to you."

"I understand you perfectly," rejoined Lewis, and as he spoke, a contemptuous smile curled his lip, "still, justice requires that the General should be enlightened, and although there are many reasons why it is painful and objectionable to me to do so, yet there are others which prevent my refusing; and now, Mr. Bracy, as my time is short, you will excuse my being obliged to leave you."

"Oh! certainly," returned Bracy, as his visitor rose to depart;

"Welcome the coming, speed the parting guest."

Liberty Hall this, sir! chacun à son goût, 'everybody has the gout,' as the little girl at the boarding school construed it. Then you'll make Governor Grant comprehend that in this particular instance Bellefield behaved like a brick?—Disagreeable business to be obliged to interfere in, but as Frere says, you're just the man to do it; good morning," and uttering these words with the greatest empressement, he shook Lewis's hand warmly, and suffered him to depart. As the door closed on his retreating figure, Bracy threw himself back in an easy chair.

"There's something in the wind that I'm not up to," he muttered in soliloquy; "I don't comprehend that good youth at all. There must be private feeling mixed up in it; something in the love and murder line, I suspect. How savage he looked when he undertook the job—rather he than I, though; Bellefield's just as likely to call a man out, as to say Thank ye, for interfering; but, as Frere says, Arundel's just the man to carry the thing through. He's a plucky young fellow and deucedly good-looking, but he certainly does not appreciate wit—ahem—that is, puns—properly;" and with this reflection, Bracy took pen and paper, and sat him down to indite an essay on moral courage, and the responsibility of man, wherewith to fill up a vacant corner of Blunt's Magazine.

And Lewis—what a task had he undertaken! He who would have made any sacrifice to gratify Annie's lightest wish, must now bring the first cloud over the sunshine of her young life; he must be the means of reconciling her father and Lord Bellefield; he must, by his own act, give the woman he loved to the man he hated. The woman he loved!—had then the fear that had lain cold and heavy at his heart, that had come between him and ——— resignation, assumed a definite shape? did he at length own that he, the poor tutor, the paid dependent, loved the rich man's daughter. Oh! Lewis, where was thy pride,—where that Hell-Angel beautiful in evil, which hath haunted thee even from thy childhood upwards, like a second self? Had Rose's tears prevailed and thy pride deserted thee? Would that it had been so; but no, he had not yet learned that hardest lesson for the young and brave-hearted, self-distrust; his bosom-sin clave to him, and striving single-handed, how should he subdue it!

Lewis was not one of those who deceive themselves long on any point; and his emotions after the scene at the Opera-house, the amount of self-control he was obliged to exert, to restrain any outbreak of feeling in the tête-à-tête drive with Annie, had revealed the truth to him, and ere he slept that night, he knew that now indeed was the sum of his wretchedness complete; for he loved, for the first time, one fitted to call forth all the depth and earnestness of his passionate nature, and he loved without hope. Pressing his hands to his burning brow, he sat down calmly to think. Calmly! yes, the treacherous repose of the smouldering volcano were an apt illustration of such a forced calmness. Renunciation and self-conquest! this then was his portion for the time to come. Self-conquest! Pride caught at the word; an enemy strong as the strength of will, which should subdue it. Reason cried, "Flee from temptation;" but pride whispered, "The task is worthy of you; accomplish it." And resolution aided pride, and the iron will came into play, and the contest was begun. And now the reader can understand why Lewis's interview with Bracy would scarcely tend to raise his spirits, or render his general frame of mind more satisfactory.

Punctual to the moment, the carriage made its appearance, drawn by four poststers; and the General and the two ladies ensconced themselves in the interior, while, the day being lovely, Lewis and his pupil took possession of the rumble. About two miles from Broadhurst was a steep hill; on reaching this point, Annie and her father, Lewis and Walter, alighted, with the intention of walking up; but before half the distance was accomplished, the General pleaded guilty to a very decided twinge of gout, and unwilling to provoke a second, re-entered the carriage, the others continuing their pedestrian exertions without him.

Annie, delighted to regain the freedom of the country, was in high spirits. "Why do people stay in London at this time of year?" she exclaimed. "This lovely sky, and the trees, and the birds, and the sunshine, are worth all the operas and pictures and balls, and every sight or amusement London can afford; those things excite one for an hour or two, but this makes me perfectly happy."

Lewis glanced at her for a moment; sighed involuntarily; and then rousing himself, uttered some common-place civility, which so clearly proved that he was forcing himself to make conversation from the subject of which his thoughts were far away, that Annie, struck by his manner, paused, and fixed her large eyes earnestly upon him. At length she said,

"I am sure you are ill or unhappy, Mr. Arundel. I am now too well aware how utterly unable I am to compensate for the loss of such a friend and counsellor as dear Rose, (oh, how I envy you that sister!) but if you would sometimes tell me when you are annoyed or out of spirits, instead of wrapping yourself in that cold proud mantle of reserve, I think even such poor sympathy as mine might make you happier."

Lewis glanced round. Walter, actuated by some caprice of his wayward intellect, had run on before—they were virtually alone. Now, it had occurred to Lewis, that as Annie had allowed him to perceive her dislike to the idea of an union with Lord Bellefield, he should entirely lose her good opinion, were she to learn that it was through his representations, that a reconciliation with her father had been brought about;

and although this would have been a very desirable result for many reasons, and have materially assisted him in his design of conquering his unhappy attachment, yet he by no means appeared to approve of the notion, but on the contrary had, with his usual fearlessness, determined to seize the first opportunity of explaining to her, why reason and justice obliged him to act in opposition to her wishes. And now that the opportunity had arrived, the considerate kindness of her address disarmed him, and, in the unwillingness to inflict pain on her, he half abandoned his purpose; but here his strength of will—that fearful agent for good or for evil—came into action, and settled the matter. It was right; it must be done. Accordingly, he thanked her for her kindness, made her a pretty speech, as to valuing her sympathy, which expressed somewhere about one-fifteenth of what he really felt on the subject—said, which was quite true, that nothing had for a long time afforded him greater pleasure than the friendship which had sprung up between her and Rose,—then, speaking in a low calm voice, he continued, “I have been both grieved and annoyed this morning; you guessed rightly when you thought so. Will you forgive me, and still regard me as your friend, when I tell you that circumstances force me to act in direct opposition to your wishes, and do that of which I fear you will highly disapprove?”

Annie looked at him, with an expression of surprise and alarm; which gave way to a bright trustful smile as she replied, “Nothing can lead me to doubt your friendship, Mr. Arundel; I have had proofs of its sincerity too convincing for me ever to do so. If you are obliged to say or do anything which may pain me, I am sure you feel it to be duty which compels you. And now tell me what it is to which you refer.”

Poor Lewis! the smile and the speech went straight to his heart, like the stroke of a poniard; pride, resolution, and all the other false gods he relied on, disappeared before it; and for the moment, love was lord of all. But self-control had become so habitual to him, that the most acute observer could not have detected the slightest indication of the inward struggle; and ere he spoke, his will had resumed its mastery, and his purpose held good. He gave her, in as few words as possible, an account of his interview with Bracy; and told her that it was his intention immediately to acquaint General Grant with the facts that had thus come to his knowledge.

She heard him in silence; and when he had finished, she said in a low voice, which thrilled with suppressed emotion, “My father will forgive him; and all will be as if this thing had never happened.”

They walked on side by side, but neither spoke. At length Lewis said, “I have told you, this man and I were not on friendly terms; I now tell you that he has heaped insult after insult upon me, till I HATE him. Yes, you may start, and your gentle woman’s nature may condemn me; but it is so: I hate him.” He spoke calmly, but it only rendered his words more terrible, for it told not merely of the angry impulse of the moment, but of the deep conviction of a lifetime; and Annie shuddered as she listened. Regardless of her emotion, Lewis continued, “Circumstances have in this instance forced me to appear as Lord Bellefield’s successful accuser. To some minds this petty triumph might have afforded satisfaction; to me it has been a source of unmixed regret; the retribution I seek is not of such a nature. Fate has now placed in my hands the means of vindicating his character; and every principle of honour, nay of common justice, binds me to do so. We may not do evil that good may come. I should forfeit my self-respect for ever, were I to conceal this knowledge from your father. You would not have me do so, I am certain!”

Lewis paused for a reply; there was silence for a moment, and then, in a low broken voice, Annie said, “No! you must tell him. But I am very, very wretched!” And uttering the last words with a convulsive sob, she covered her face with her hands, and turned away to conceal the tears she could no longer repress.

THE BRIGAND’S CAVE.

THIS picture represents an incident which, though fortunately becoming more rare in Italy, is still not unfrequent in Spain—the carrying off a child for the sake of the ransom. The writer was lately assured, when at Gibraltar, that repeated attempts had been made by the robbers of the neighbouring mountains to bribe the servants of a rich English officer, who possessed an only child, to betray it into their hands beyond the walls of the fortress, when it would have been carried off and retained until a heavy sum had been exacted. The painter, who studied the costume in Italy, has thrown the charm of feeling over his subject. The robber’s wife is nursing the blue-eyed infant—the child, probably, of some English parent—and is smiling upon it with an expression of almost maternal tenderness—in beautiful contrast with the gloom of every circumstance around.

LORD DERWENTWATER, AND THE REBELLION OF 1715.

A GENUINE English Jacobite has been long regarded as a sort of respectable curiosity—an interesting specimen of an almost extinct race. Admitting, however, that many ladies and gentlemen still exist who boast, with perfect safety, but with a generous warmth worthy of the olden chivalry, an abstract devotion to the Stuart cause, and a sincere faith in the doctrine of strict hereditary right, their opinions have now little practical bearing, and are seldom met with in print. Mr. William Sidney Gibson, the author of a recent work which has suggested this paper,¹ comes, as will soon be seen, under the denomination of an out-and-out Jacobite,—an enthusiastic and thorough-going advocate of the descendants of the ill-starred James II. Had he lived in the days of the Rebellion of 1715, he frankly avows that he would have fought against the House of Hanover, from a sense of duty, and as a matter of principle. "The age of succession wars," he says in his preface, "is happily over, and (as some writer has remarked,) the possibility of adhering to the descendants of King James II. has long ceased; and the author may, therefore, without endangering his reputation for loyalty to Queen Victoria, further confess that had he lived when the young Earl espoused the Stuart's cause, he would probably have done as Lord Derwentwater did."

(1) “Dilston Hall; or, Memoirs of the Right Hon. James Radcliffe, Earl of Derwentwater, a martyr in the Rebellion of 1715. To which is added, a visit to Bamburgh Castle, &c.” By William Sidney Gibson. London, 1850.

With no remarkable predilections ourselves for the exiled dynasty, we are free to admit that there are no pages of English history more interesting than those which record the trials, sufferings, and adventures of its loyal and generous adherents, during the reigns of the first two princes of the House of Hanover, no cause so tinged with romantic interest as that of the "so-called" Pretenders. Among those who embarked in each of the formidable rebellions of 1715 and 1745, or, as the phrase ran, went out in those eventful years, were many young and chivalrous men, actuated by the purest motives, and impelled by the most ardent zeal, the descendants of illustrious families, representatives of the old English gentry, whose boast it was that their loyalty

—was still the same
Whether it won or lost the game.

James Radcliffe, the third and last Earl of Derwentwater, was one of the earliest and most lamented victims of this luckless cause. He entered into it with all the ardour of youth, devoted to it all his energies, hazarded and lost life and fortune in its defence. Loyal and religious, according to his notions of true loyalty and true religion; acting from earnest conviction and a deep sense of duty; it is impossible not to feel some admiration for his character, and compassion for his fate. We turn then with considerable interest to the events of his life as they are presented in the volume before us.

He was born in London on the 28th of June, 1689; but his childhood was passed in France. His father, the second earl, quitted England soon after the birth of his infant heir, and joined the circle of emigrant royalists who composed the court of James II. at St. Germain's. The fallen sovereign distinguished the heir of Derwentwater with every mark of favour which in his position he was able to bestow. He was selected to be the play-fellow of the young Prince,—the first Pretender, or James III. of England, as he was afterwards called by his adherents,—and a friendship grew up between the boys, blended in the one with a feeling of affectionate loyalty, which in early manhood ripened into a passion and principle that acknowledged no limit of devotion, and hesitated at no personal sacrifice. In the quiet and monotonous court of St. Germain's, few events of importance took place during the nonage of Lord Derwentwater, and his existence was so far unchequered by adventure. His father died in 1705. In 1710 he attained the age of twenty-one, and paid his first visit to his ancestral home in Northumberland. Dilston Hall, the family seat of the Radcliffes, is described by Mr. Gibson as remarkable for the picturesque beauty of its situation. The ancient mansion was "surrounded with the poetry of historical association," and still retained the most striking features of its feudal grandeur. It was, however, very deficient in comfortable accommodation; and the young Earl commenced building a new residence, which he never lived to see completed. Having visited his estates in Cumberland, and spent some time in the Isle of Derwent, for the next two years he lived among his tenantry at Dilston, beloved and respected by every one. His private life and character at this period are thus eulogised by a contemporary writer quoted by Mr. Gibson: "As the Earl lived among his own people, there he spent his estate, and continually did offices of kindness and good neighbourhood to everybody, as opportunity offered. He kept a house of generous hospitality and noble entertainment, which few in that country do, and none come up to. He was very charitable to poor and distressed families on all occasions, whether known to him or not, and whether Papist or Protestant." Tradition further states that, in the true spirit of ancient hospitality, all the meat and game in the larder were distributed every Thursday evening to the poor. In 1712, when he was in his twenty-fourth year, he married—and the match was one of pure affection—the eldest daughter of Sir John Webb, of Canford, in the county of Dorset, another English Jacobite. The Earl had met his young bride many years before at the court of St. Germain's; for like himself she had been educated in France, and nurtured in the high-flown sentiments of loyalty which distinguished the adherents of the House of Stuart. She was beautiful and accomplished, and loved her lord most tenderly. Everything, in fact, looked smiling and prosperous round the young Earl of Derwentwater; his cup of domestic happiness was filled to the brim, and a bright and peaceful future appeared to await him,—when a political cloud, which had long been gathering in the horizon, burst over his head, and swept away life and fortune.

We do not think it necessary to fill our columns with any detailed sketch of the abortive plots and schemes for the restoration of the exiled family which engaged the attention of the leading English Jacobites, both at home and abroad, from the banishment of James II. to the accession of George I. When the Elector of Hanover was called to the English throne, the partisans of the "lineal heir of the blood royal of the realm" were eager to try the chances of an insurrection. Elated with the favourable circumstances of the hour, they were sanguine of success, and careless of the means by which it was to be censured. A few gallant gentlemen, it was thought, had but to appear in arms for their lawful sovereign, and the ancient loyalty of the people of England would be at once aroused, in all its lion-like strength. George I. had ascended the throne in the autumn of 1714. He was a foreigner, "with every prepossession against him, except the paramount one of religion. He was in the fifty-fifth year of his age; with the habits of a petty sovereign, governing by his will and pleasure—a stranger to the language, manners, laws, and liberties of the English people."¹ When he met his first parliament, he could not read the speech that had been prepared for him; but was obliged, in a sentence learned by rote, to direct the Chancellor to read it for him.² The sympathies of the populace were everywhere in favour of the Tory and High-church party, and against the King and his ministers. Dissenting meeting-houses were attacked by rural mobs; and tumultuous assemblages in the metropolis and elsewhere led to the passing of the Riot Act. All these circumstances seemed to indicate that the favourable moment for a popular insurrection had arrived; and relying on the existence of wide-spread discontent, and the secret disaffection of many powerful families, a few bold and ardent spirits had resolved without delay to proclaim King James III. as the rightful sovereign of these realms.

It does not clearly appear that the young Earl of Derwentwater was at first admitted into the secret designs of the Jacobite leaders, or consulted by them on the probable success of the rebellion. His support was undoubtedly relied on; for his hereditary attachment to the Stuart cause was well known; and his religion—he was a devout Roman Catholic—further disposed him to take part in the enterprise. From the moment that the Government received information of the design that was on foot, he was suspected, as a matter of course, and a warrant was issued for his apprehension. He had not much difficulty, however, in getting out of the way, and eluding the Government messengers who were despatched to Dilston to apprehend him. From the latter end of August, 1715, till the beginning of October, he remained in concealment; and during the greater part of that time, it is related that his hiding-place was the home of a humble cottager.

From the moment of his flight, he may be presumed to have committed himself to the desperate design for which he risked so much. But the measures which the Government had taken, with consummate prudence, prevented him from availing himself of the advantages which his position and influence would have given him, had he been allowed to remain at Dilston. Where were now his resources for levying war against the reigning dynasty? He was a fugitive, vigilantly tracked by the messengers of the Government, with no opportunities for collecting his friends or arming his retainers. The defence which he made on his trial was literally correct, and in more merciful times might have weighed with his judges in mitigation of punishment. "I have confessed myself guilty," he said, "but, my lords, that guilt was rashly incurred, without any premeditation, as I hope your lordships will be convinced by one particular. I beg leave to observe, I was wholly unprovided with men, horses, arms and other necessities, which, in my situation, I could not have wanted, had I been party to any matured design. No; my offence was sudden, and my submission was early." It has been also reported that the ardent loyalty of his lady, and her keen reproaches, were among the incentives which urged him to rebellion. Yet he might well have hesitated, when he reflected on the fearful risk he ran, and the terrible consequences of failure. "His stake," observes Mr. Gibson, "was heavier than that of any of his neighbours. He was not only surrounded by the tenderest domestic ties, and looked up to as the good lord of numerous dependents, but he enjoyed hereditary honours, and large possessions; all of which, as well as his life, were sure to be forfeited, if the enterprise which he generously and impulsively joined should prove unsuccessful. If the Earl, influenced by his natural disposition, and by these considerations, did waver between contending influences, tradition avers that, on stealthily revisiting Dilston Hall, his lady reproached him for continuing to hide his head in hovels from the light of day, when the gentry were in arms for the cause of their rightful sovereign, and, throwing down her fan before her lord, told him in cruel raillery to take it, and give his sword to her. But the amiable and gentle character of the Countess, whom the Earl, in his latest moments, declared to be all tenderness and virtue, and to have loved him constantly, renders it very improbable that such a domestic tableaux really occurred."

Early in October it was signified to the Earl, that his neighbours and friends were "ready to appear in arms, and were only waiting for him and his brother to join them." Accordingly, on the morning of the 6th, having ordered a few faithful retainers to be in readiness and furnished with horses and arms, the two gallant Radcliffes rode out of the court-yard of their paternal mansion, to which they had hastily returned for the purpose of rallying their followers, and departed on their unlucky enterprise. "Old ladies of the last century," adds Mr. Gibson, "used to tell of occurrences of evil omen, which marked the departure of the devoted young nobleman from the home of his fathers, to which he was destined never to return; how, on his quitting the court-yard, his favourite dog howled lamentably; how his horse became restive, and could with difficulty be urged forward; and how he soon afterwards found that he had lost from his finger a highly-prized ring, the gift of his revered grandmother, which he constantly wore." The little troop consisted of about twenty horsemen; they were soon joined by other gentlemen and their mounted attendants, and reaching Warkworth on the 7th of

(1) History of England, by Sir James Mackintosh and others.
(2) A sentence had been put into the speech, by the king's ministers, which roused the indignation of the Jacobites. "It had pleased Almighty God," he was made to say, "to call him to the throne of his ancestors;" a sentence certainly in no very good taste, seeing that the British Parliament, to secure a Protestant prince, had been compelled to take the descendant of the youngest daughter of James I. in preference to the lineal male heir to the crown.

October, they appointed as their general a Mr. Forster, who appears to have been deficient in every quality which a military leader should possess. His being a Protestant was the main reason for conferring on him the command; for it was thought that a prejudice would be excited against them if any Catholic nobleman or gentleman had appeared at their head. At Warkworth, Mr. Forster proclaimed James III. with all due formalities, and "on the Sunday morning the incumbent was directed to pray for the Prince as King, for Mary, Queen-mother, and all the dutiful branches of the royal family," but he prudently declined doing so, and withdrew to Newcastle. The Prince was next proclaimed at Alnwick and Morpeth. At Newcastle, however, the inhabitants were bent on showing their loyalty to King George, and had resolved to defend their town to the utmost. The Prince's army being deficient in all the materials for a siege, and with scarcely any foot soldiers, turned aside to Hexham, where they waited three days for reinforcements, and then joined the forces of Lord Kenmore, celebrated in the Jacobite ditty:—

"Kenmore's on and awa, Willie,
Kenmore's on and awa;
And Kenmore's lord is the bonniest lord
That Galloway e'er saw.

There's a rose in Kenmore's cap, Willie,
There's a rose in Kenmore's cap;
He'll steep it red in foemen's blood
Afore the battle drap."

The combined forces marched to the town of Kelso, whither a body of Highlanders, commanded by William Mackintosh, of Borlum, had been despatched by Lord Mar; and on Sunday the 23d of October, in the abbey church of that town a sermon was preached by a zealous Jacobite from a text which deeply touched every loyal heart,—“The right of the first-born is his.”

A council of war was held at Kelso, and plans of operation discussed. The Earl of Derwentwater and his brother were anxious in the first instance to achieve the conquest of Scotland, and then to march southward, with the prestige of victory in their favour, and having secured an avenue for retreat in the event of disaster. But their advice was overruled, and an invasion of Lancashire resolved on. Accordingly the Prince's army recrossed the Border, in number less than 1,000 men, of whom about 700 were mounted. As they advanced towards Penrith the militia was called out; rustics were summoned from the plough, hastily provided with implements of warfare, and a formidable opposition was threatened. But when the news arrived that the rebels were within six miles of them, the posse comitatus fled in disorder. Having entered Penrith, Mr. Forster proclaimed King James; “and told the listening group,” adds Mr. Gibson, “that the appearance of himself and his friends there was ‘for the security of the true High Church of England.’” From Penrith the Prince's army marched to Appleby, and from Appleby to Kendal. It was raining heavily when they entered the latter town; no drums were beat, nor swords drawn, but the bagpipes were played at the head of the troops, and at the market-cross James III. was proclaimed King; the proclamation commencing, “Whereas George, Elector of Brunswick, has usurped and taken upon himself the style of King of these realms,” and averring that the Prince was their “only and lawful liege.”

More joyously, and with better omens of success, they entered Lancaster, where the exiled dynasty had many friends, and where the commonalty were greatly in their favour. “The Rev. William Paul,” says Mr. Gibson, “a clergyman of the Church of England, who had joined the Prince's friends, read prayers on the 8th of November in the parish church. While the bell was rung to call the people, he substituted in the Prayer Book the name of James III. for that of the statute-made sovereign, and a large concourse of persons attended.” The ladies of Lancaster entertained the Prince's officers at their tea-tables; those gentlemen having gaily “dressed and trimmed themselves up” for the occasion. The Jacobite cause, it will be remarked, everywhere found favour in female eyes; the ladies were always its most enthusiastic supporters; they were not unfrequently outrageously violent upon it, and “would listen,” says Ray, the volunteer, “to no manner of reason.” The Lancaster sirens delayed the progress of the rebels for some days. At length the order was given to march to Preston, and that town, destined to be the scene of their disasters, was entered without opposition.

Meanwhile, the Government had been taking measures, with secrecy and skill, to crush the rebellion in the bud. Troops were collected from all sides, and despatched to the scene of action. On the 12th of November, a large force was discerned, by the advance guard of the rebels, in full march upon Preston. Measures were immediately taken to defend the town; but the want of competent generalship was soon apparent, and decided the fate of the rebellion. No advantage was taken of the natural defences of the place. The bridge over the Ribble, which formed the principal approach to the town, was left unguarded, although it was obvious that a few resolute men might have kept it against an army. In the town itself, however, barricades were thrown up across the four principal streets, and when the government troops attacked them, were desperately defended. “In ten minutes,” says Mr. Gibson, “120 men of the advancing party were killed, and 140 more fell in an attempt to enter the town by the Back Wynd. The engagement continued until after midnight, and is described by one who seems to have been an eyewitness, to have been fought with determined resolution on both sides. The roar of the engagement was heard twenty-five miles off, as a woman in her 108th year related to Dr. Whitaker in 1818.” The government troops were at length repulsed; and this temporary success was mainly owing to the bravery of the Earl of Derwentwater and his brother. On the morrow, however, fresh troops arrived, and thus reinforced, the besiegers menaced another attack. A determined struggle was again about to commence, and it is possible that the impetuous courage of the Stuart adherents might have again succeeded, notwithstanding the fearful odds against them. But Forster's heart failed him; his mind was prostrated by the extremity of the peril to which he and his friends were exposed, and he secretly sent to propose a capitulation. To surrender at discretion, and to place their lives at the disposal of the Government, were the only terms which could be offered to the rebels. When these conditions were made known to them, their indignation was so great that Forster had a narrow escape from being killed on the spot. To die sword in hand, cutting their way through King George's troops, appeared to the majority more desirable than to perish on the scaffold, or to drag out a miserable life in the American plantations. Their leaders, however, had now declared resistance hopeless, and a capitulation was reluctantly resolved on.

It is painful to dwell on the miseries and hardships that awaited the unfortunate prisoners. Hundreds of them were huddled into one of the churches at Preston, and there lay crouching and shivering; suffering acutely in that inclement season, from the want of proper food and clothing. Others were conveyed to Chester and Lancaster, where they arrived in a truly piteous plight. The season was one of the most rigorous that had been ever known. "Winter had set in with the most violent frost, and the deepest snows that had happened in England for thirty years; and the snow was a yard deep on the roads, when the unhappy prisoners were taken to their several destinations." Six gentlemen, who had borne commissions in the king's service, were shot as deserters.

About the beginning of December, the Earl of Derwentwater was conducted from Preston to London, with the principal noblemen and gentlemen who had taken part in the ill-fated enterprise. It is related, that on their way a question having arisen as to their probable place of destination, on arriving at the metropolis, the Earl observed, "that there was one house which would hold them all, and they had the best title to it of any people in Britain," and being asked what house that was, he replied, "Bedlam Hospital." At Highgate they were met by a detachment of guards; from thence to London the road was lined with spectators, who shouted vigorously for King George, and insulted the wretched captives. The drums beat a triumphal march; and as they entered the metropolis, the concourse of people was so great that the streets were scarcely passable. As they rode down Holborn to Newgate, the excitement increased, and the "glorious sight," says a government scribe, quoted by Mr. Gibson, "gave a very lively idea of the triumphs of the ancient Romans when they led their captives to Rome."

Lord Derwentwater and the other noblemen were imprisoned in the Tower, from whence so many other state offenders of lofty name and lineage had passed to the scaffold. In the interval preceding his trial, his loving lady arrived in London, having braved the rigours of a winter's journey from the north. Such a journey was at that time full of hardships. In the case of the Countess of Nithsdale, who travelled about the same time to London on the same errand, it is related, that on her arrival at York, the snow was found to be so deep that the coach could not set out for London. The heroic woman was, however, not deterred from proceeding; she took horse, and "rode to London through the snow, which was generally above the horse's girth." It was afterwards the privilege of Lady Nithsdale to save her husband's life. After in vain imploring mercy from the king, whose implacable nature even her tears could not soften, she succeeded in effecting her husband's escape, on the night before his execution, by arraying him in female garb.

To return to Lord Derwentwater. Articles of impeachment had been prepared by the Commons against the rebel peers, and on the 16th of January, 1716, they were taken to the House of Lords to make answer thereto. Lord Derwentwater, amongst others, pleaded guilty, and threw himself on the mercy of the crown. On the 9th of February they were brought before the High Commission Court, sitting in Westminster Hall, for judgment. When the young Earl was asked if he had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced, he briefly urged that his offence was unpremeditated, and made a final appeal for mercy. "I humbly hope," he said, "to obtain the mediation of your lordships, and of the honourable House of Commons, in my behalf, solemnly protesting that my future conduct shall show me not altogether unworthy your generous compassion for my life, which is all I can beg of his majesty." The Lord Chancellor Cowper thereupon pronounced sentence in the usual form, "during the delivery of which the edge of the axe turned ominously towards the noble prisoners arraigned at the bar."

Whilst lying under sentence of death, the young Earl was the object of general sympathy. Great exertions were made, and the highest influence employed, to obtain his pardon. Ladies of the highest rank forced their way to the royal presence, and with tears implored the sovereign that one so young and brave might not be suffered to perish in the prime of life, by the hands of the executioner, for a political offence. It is related that a pretty and impressive scene was devised, as a last expedient, to excite the king's compassion. On Sunday the 19th of February, the Duchess of Cleveland and some other ladies of rank accompanied the Countess of Derwentwater to St. James's palace, "in order that, as the king was returning from chapel, the Countess, kneeling before him, might implore mercy for his noble captive. In this intercession she was joined by the ladies who accompanied her." His majesty, it is said, appeared inclined to show some mercy, if the Earl could be brought to give him satisfaction on two points, viz. by becoming a Protestant, and acknowledging his title of sovereignty. But even this concession is doubtful, as it is well known that the king and his ministers had resolved to shut their ears against all appeals to their clemency. Certain it is that the Earl would have refused his life, if offered upon such terms. His constancy in this respect was tested on the following day, when two noblemen, it is related, came to him in the Tower, and actually promised him, in the king's name, that his life should be spared, if he renounced his religion, and acknowledged the Hanoverian title, but he refused to listen to their suggestions. It has been also declared that bribes were liberally offered for so valuable a life; and Walpole stated, in the House of Commons, that as much as 60,000*l.* had been tendered to him to effect this object. In the House of Lords an address to the king was carried, by a majority of five, "for a reprieve to such of the condemned lords as should deserve his mercy." To this address the cold reply dictated by the king's ministers was, that his majesty "on this and all other occasions would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of his crown, and the safety of his people."

Whilst so many unavailing exertions were made to save his life, Lord Derwentwater, having prepared himself for the worst, was busily occupied in pious exercises, and strict attention to his religious duties. The priest who attended him for the last fifteen days of his life, has left a circumstantial account of his conduct during that trying interval, in a letter addressed to the Countess of Derwentwater, which is preserved in the family of Lord Petre, and printed in Mr. Gibson's book. "Every day," says the priest, "he read a chapter or two in the New Testament, the like in The Following of Christ, and as much time as he could spare he employed in reading the Confessions of St. Augustine, and other good books; in meditating and talking of the passion of our Saviour, and other pious subjects, in order to prepare himself for a happy death He prepared himself for his general confession the first day he saw me, and finished it with wonderful composure the Friday, eight days before his death, which he partly renewed the Monday following; when he received with wonderful satisfaction a little book giving an account of the penitent behaviour of a man of quality, called Signor Troilo Savelli, who was beheaded in the flower of his youth, in the castle of St. Angelo at Rome, which was recommended to his perusal But when, on the Monday before he died, his life was assured him if he would change his religion, he told it me with the greatest transport of joy, that having refused his life on such terms, he hoped it was not now making a virtue of necessity; that had he a thousand lives he would sooner part with them than renounce his faith; and with tears of joy in his eyes, he humbly thanked God for giving him this opportunity of testifying his love for Him."

The 24th of February had been fixed for his execution. On Thursday the 23d he saw Lady Derwentwater for the last time, and took an affectionate farewell. A simple memorial in the possession of Lord Petre, reminds us how deeply she loved him. It is an original letter addressed to the Earl in his last moments, by the Right Rev. Bonaventure Giffard, "Vicar apostolic of the Church of Rome in the London district"—a pathetic and eloquent composition which the young widow doubtless bedewed with her tears; for it was indorsed in her own handwriting—"The Bishop's letter to my dear, dear Lord."

At 10 o'clock on the morning of Friday the 14th of February—a dull, cold, murky day,—the Earl of Derwentwater and Lord Kenmure were conducted in two hackney coaches to the scaffold which had been erected for them on Tower Hill. A small private room had been prepared for them by the sheriffs in the vicinity of the place of execution, where they retired for a short time, and engaged in prayer. From thence Lord Derwentwater, having given the sheriff notice that he was ready, walked forth alone, and ascended the scaffold with a firm step. His face was pale, and the sight of the assembled thousands who were there to witness his dying agonies appeared at first to disconcert him; but he quickly regained his composure. "He was attired in a complete suit of black velvet; suspended from his neck was a small crucifix in gold—treasured symbol of the love, the resignation, and the sufferings of his Saviour!" Having passed some minutes in devotion, he rose from his knees, and asked permission of the sheriffs to read a short paper which he had drawn up for the occasion. Permission having been given, he approached the rails of the scaffold, and read in a firm voice his dying speech, which concluded with these words:—"I die a Roman Catholic: I am in perfect charity with all the world—I thank God for it!—even with those of the present Government who are most instrumental in my death. I freely forgive such as ungenerously reported false things of me; and I hope to be forgiven the trespasses of my youth by the Father of infinite mercy, into whose hand I commend my soul." An unseemly quarrel for the possession of the Earl's wig and velvet clothes took place on the scaffold between the keeper of the Tower (to whom the Earl had given them) and the executioner (who regarded such articles as his ordinary perquisites). When it was over, the Earl felt the block, and finding it rather uneven, coolly requested the executioner to make it smooth. That functionary then besought his forgiveness in the usual terms, and received it, with a present of two half broad pieces. The unfortunate nobleman then knelt down, laid his head on the block, and having three times ejaculated a short prayer, his head was severed from his body at a blow.

The body of the Earl, having been embalmed, was placed in a rich coffin, the outer case of which was covered with crimson velvet, with a gilt plate whereon was inscribed:—

"THE RIGHT HON. JAMES, LATE EARL OF DERWENTWATER, Died February 24th, 1715, aged 27 years.

It was then conveyed, secretly and by night, to Dilston, where it was interred in the sepulchre of his ancestors.

We cannot here record the fate of all the victims of the unfortunate insurrection of 1715. Many perished on the scaffold, many more were transported to the plantations, and some more fortunate than their fellows, managed to escape from durance, and ultimately to quit the kingdom. Among the latter was Charles Radcliffe, the younger brother of the Earl, of whom we have already made mention. Whilst lying under sentence of death in Newgate, he succeeded, on the 16th of December, 1716, in effecting his escape from prison, and having been sheltered for some days by a lady of his family, residing in London, he proceeded thence to France. He lived in Paris for some years, and in 1724 married a noble and wealthy widow, to whom he had urged his suit, it is said, no less than sixteen times. His sixteenth proposal succeeded, in all probability, through a novel expedient adopted by the enthusiastic lover,—that of finding his way into the lady's apartment down the chimney, a feat which so pleased and terrified her, that she could no longer resist. After many years of absence from England, he ventured to return, and lived for some time in Pall Mall, under the assumed name of Mr. Johns, without being molested. From motives of prudence he once more retired to France; but in 1735 he again made his appearance in England. On this occasion he revisited Dilston, the forfeited seat of the Radcliffes, and whilst wandering about the neighbourhood, without any attempt at concealment, he was more than once taken for the ghost of the last Earl, whose unquiet spirit, according to tradition, continued for many years to haunt the abode of his ancestors. Having stayed two years more in England, he returned to France, and accepted a commission in the French army.

The Rebellion of 1745 once more involved Charles Radcliffe in the toils of conspiracy. On the 22d of November, 1745, a French privateer, loaded with stores and ammunition, and having on board a number of volunteers for the service of Charles Edward, the second Pretender, was captured by a government war frigate. Among the volunteers was found Charles Radcliffe, styling himself then Earl of Derwentwater. The whole party was conveyed to London, and Mr. Radcliffe, who was at first mistaken for the Pretender himself, was committed to the Tower. He remained there about a twelvemonth without any effort being made to bring him to trial. At length, on the 21st of November, 1746, he was taken before the court of King's Bench, sitting in Westminster Hall, and "arraigned on the conviction for high treason which had been recorded against him in 1716." He refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court, and claimed to be treated as a French subject, having held a commission in the service of the king of France. A jury, however, was impanelled, and evidence taken of his identity, which having been satisfactorily proved, he was adjudged to die on the 8th of December following. On the appointed day, he mounted the scaffold with a firm step, and told the assembled crowd that he died "a true, obedient, and humble son of the Catholic Apostolic church, in perfect charity with all mankind, and a true well-wisher to his dear country, that never could be happy without doing justice to the best and most injured king." Having passed a few minutes in prayer, he then laid his head upon the block, and having given the signal, the axe descended with such force, that it almost severed the head from the body with one blow, and became fixed in the block.

We have thus minutely followed Mr. Gibson's narrative, and detailed the principal events of the fatal insurrection of 1715 in the North of England. In Scotland the chances of success had been greater, but the result was equally disastrous. On the 6th of September James Stuart had been proclaimed by the Earl of Mar, who had been appointed commander-in-chief, and who was soon at the head of a large force. The cause of the Government was represented by the Duke of Argyle, who promptly marched against the rebels. On the 12th of November, being the very day of the attack on Preston, the opposing forces met at Dumblain, and a sanguinary engagement took place. The impetuous onslaught of the Highlanders soon routed one division of the government troops, who fled as fast as they were able to Stirling. But on the other side, the division commanded by the Duke of Argyle had succeeded in forcing the rebels to whom they were opposed from their position. The latter, finding the Highlanders victorious, were enabled again to turn and face the English. A curious scene followed. The two armies remained for some hours looking at each other, and in the evening drew off, in different directions. This singular battle (sometimes called the battle of Sheriff-Muir) has been commemorated in the excellent Jacobite song:—

" There's some say that we won,
Some say that they won,
Some say that none won,
at a', man.

" But one thing I'm sure,
That at Sheriff-Muir
A battle there was, '— which I saw, man.

" And we ran, and they ran,
And they ran, and we ran,
And we ran, and they ran,
awa', man."

To the Duke of Argyle the battle of Dumblain, however doubtful in its character, brought all the fruits of victory. The Pretender arrived in Scotland in December, but the enthusiasm of his adherents had by that time somewhat cooled, and his manners were not calculated to win popular admiration. A day was fixed for his coronation, but, in the meanwhile, the Earl was so closely pursued, that the son of James II. deemed it prudent to abandon his enterprise, and return to France.

ROUEN.

EVERY reader of English history has heard of the famous capital of Normandy, as every lover of Gothic architecture is acquainted with its magnificent churches and cathedral. The subject before us is admirably characteristic of the street architecture of this city—of its ponderous piles of antique dwellings and overhanging gables. "Rouen," it is proverbially said, "is a strong city, for it takes you by the nose." In fact, its narrow alleys are noted for the accumulation of filth and the variety of unsavoury smells that salute the passengers. All this, however, is unseen in the picture, which is an admirable specimen of the talented academician, Roberts. The tower in the distance is that of the beautiful church of St. Maclou.

REACTIONARY ROME.

ONE year has now elapsed since Rome was again placed under the dominion of the Church (militant), as represented in the persons of their Eminences, the Cardinals Della Genga, Altieri, and Vannicelli. We have already, some months ago, shown, in the pages of this journal, the unrelenting vengeance, the bitter persecutions, with which these Christian Clergymen commenced their reign of terror. We shall therefore confine ourselves, at present, to a calm and impartial view of the actual condition of the "Eternal City" and its victims, at this its period of reaction; or, to speak more correctly, of the endeavour to re-establish the subjugation of the reasoning powers and moral freedom of man, by the priestly faction who, for their own selfish purposes, would fain "roll back the ponderous wheels of time" to stick them fast in the ignorance and tyranny of the middle ages.

The period that intervened between the assumption of government by the Cardinals and the return of the Holy Father himself, presented a series of the most curious, we might have said the most ridiculous, anomalies, to the dispassionate observer of human character and human events, did not the thought of the sufferers in them, realizing the fable of "The Boys and the Frogs,"—"What is sport to you is death to us,"—continually intervene, to change the contemptuous smile of the satirist into the more reasoning frown of the philanthropist.

The priests pulled one way; the French, at last thoroughly ashamed of their preceding conduct, pulled another. The people plastered the walls with scornful placards in the night; the priests pulled them down in the day. The Cardinal triumvirate poured out arrests; the French general liberated the arrested. The Spaniards, affronted at being forbidden the entrée of the Holy City, avenged themselves in the provinces, by bastinadoing the unlucky peasants, who, in their wondering gaze at the General, Cordova, forgot that they were required to take off their hats to him, as he passed.

Meanwhile the finances went on from bad to worse, and private distress kept pace with public confusion.

The paper money was reduced, by order of the Cardinals, to two-thirds of its original nominal value; the Jews bought it up at another third discount, and made enormous profits by purchasing with it, and appropriating to themselves, from the Monte di Pietà, all the most valuable articles in gold and silver plate, jewels, and other long-stored treasures which had been pledged by families of the highest respectability, during the war, in their generous desire to serve the cause of their country's independence and honour; and who had now the mortification of seeing their own property, to the amount of eight or nine hundred thousand scudi, nearly two hundred thousand pounds, transferred into the hands of usurers, whilst they themselves were reduced from competence to absolute poverty. The labouring classes were not less to be pitied—they were forced to submit to a loss of one-third of their hard earnings, and were often obliged to waste half their time in the vain endeavour to change the circulating medium into the articles they required for their subsistence. It was hoped that, in consideration of their necessities, the smaller notes, with which alone they had anything to do, might have formed some exception to the general depreciation; but the government, impartial in its cruelties, visited all alike.

The number of persons that were thrown out of employment, incarcerated, or banished, for their political opinions, or for having accepted occupation, or even for having followed their usual calling, under the republic, deprived hundreds of families of their natural protectors, and the sources of their maintenance; and their grief was increased tenfold, by the sad thought that the same cause which left themselves without bread, deprived them of the means of solacing the miseries of the persecuted objects of their affections, who were either crowded together between prison walls, or driven forth to starve in foreign lands. Indeed, there could scarcely be a more pitiable object of contemplation than Rome presented under the arbitrary rule of the clerical despots, who, arrayed in "purple and fine linen," daily thundered forth fresh maledictions over the heads of the unhappy people who had already lost their kindred, their property, their hopes; everything, in short, but their wretched lives, which also the christian triumvirate sought every pretext for rendering forfeit to their power. Even those who would willingly have made sacrifice of their feelings, in order to procure bread for their children, as peaceable citizens, were treated with inhuman contempt. One single instance may suffice.

A person of the name of Ceccarelli, originally a book-binder, had fallen under the displeasure of the Cardinal Triumvirate, for having served in the civic guard, and was deprived of his situation accordingly. He waited upon them, nevertheless, to solicit some other employment, by which he might be enabled to maintain his wife and family. One of their Eminences was pleased to be witty on the occasion. "You had better return to your original occupation," said he, grimly smiling at his own concelto, "you will soon have plenty to do, for we are going to bind tutti i liberi;" and so the poor fellow was dismissed, to ruminate all the way back to his tearful wife, upon the cleverness of the sacerdotal punster, in playing so readily upon the words "liberi" (liberals), and "libri" (books). It happened, moreover, that the advice so wittily given was not of a kind that could at that time be put into practice. The first care of the cardinals had been to fetter the press with as many chains as fastened down Gulliver, in the island of Lilliput. All the master printers were required to render an exact account of the number, names, and residences of their workmen; the quantity and quality of the type they used; the name of the founder; and, in short, to observe so many other arbitrary and vexatious regulations, under pain of fine and imprisonment, on the breach of any of them, as filled even the devils (the printer's devils we mean) with amazement. Every book, pamphlet, journal, and periodical publication, was obliged to be submitted to the inspection of a lynx-eyed censor from the sacred palace, and gradually nearly all of them were suppressed, save the "Diario di Roma," the servile tool of government, and minute chronicler of the processions, benedictions, and miracles that form so large a part of the annals of the church. No wonder that book-binding was no longer in request, and that the journeymen printers were dismissed day after day by their masters, who had neither employment to give them, nor money wherewith to pay their wages. In this dilemma they went in a body to solicit of the Cardinals some amelioration in the edicts that had deprived them of the means of subsistence; but their Eminences calmly replied, that it was better a few should suffer temporary inconvenience,—the trifling inconvenience, be it observed, of starving,—rather than that a whole nation should be poisoned with the pernicious fruits of their occupation. This was poor consolation to Ceccarelli; but, his condition being desperate, he resolved upon making another effort to draw something from the compassion of these holy representatives of the "Father of his people." He therefore drew up a petition, in which he respectfully set forth the failure of his own branch of business, and the misery of his family in consequence; and again implored some means of giving them bread. This petition he presented on his knees to one of their Eminences, who, on the first glance at its contents, coolly tore it across, and threw it back in the petitioner's face; upon which cold-hearted insult the unhappy man, convulsed with every wounded feeling, drew forth a knife, and stabbed—not the Cardinal, but—himself, greatly to the relief of the reverend triumvirate; who, not more gifted with personal courage than his Holiness himself, had sent forth a simultaneous shriek at the sight of the weapon, and precipitately fled from their seats of justice, to the furthest end of the apartment. The wound Ceccarelli thus inflicted upon himself in a moment of despair was not mortal, and, as soon as he had sufficiently recovered from its effects to bear removal, he was taken to prison, on the triple charge of carrying prohibited arms, (the weapon in question was, however, a common table knife,) putting the members of the supreme commission into bodily fear, and attempting his own life.

Hundreds of similar instances might be given of families deprived of maintenance by the fathers of them being bereaved of their offices or employments, or thrown into prison, most of them from circumstances over which they had either no control, or in which they were actuated by motives connected with the general welfare; as may be seen in the manly statement of Dr. Millengen, before the "Inexorable Three," who had decreed his immediate departure from Italy, after twenty years peaceable residence in the country. "If I have served the republican government," said he, "it was not through enmity to the papal government; but I served it as a government de facto; and from a conviction that in those very critical moments when the people were abandoned to themselves, it became the duty of every honest citizen not to refuse his services to society, lest power should fall into the hands of the dishonest and the turbulent." To this, however, the cardinals replied, that if every individual insisted upon justifying himself, there would be no end of investigation, and the powers of government would be paralysed. No wonder that, under such tyrannic dictation, the prisons became full, even to danger of pestilence; notwithstanding Cardinal Antonelli's ingenious hint of there being "plenty of vacant ground for graves," by way of relieving them. In fact, twenty-two persons were, in one instance, crowded into a room originally intended for eight; and that under the heat of an Italian summer, bad ventilation, scanty fare, and absence of all means of keeping up personal cleanliness.

One of the prisoners at this time, in whose fate the English public have shown a degree of sympathy which might with equal justice have been bestowed on many others, was the Rev. Giacinto Achilli, whom we have already mentioned, a native of Viterbo. He was educated in the Jesuits' college, and assumed the habit of a Dominican monk in 1819, being at that time only sixteen years of age. Two years afterwards he repaired to Lucca, for the continuance of his theological studies, and received priest's orders, at the court of the duke, Carlo Lodovico. He went to Rome in 1824, and in 1826 was elected Professor of Philosophy, in the Lyceum of his native city; where he also filled the chairs of Sacred Scripture and Theology, until 1833; when he was offered, at the same time, a professor's chair at Macarta, and the office of visitor in the Dominican convents in the Roman and Tuscan States, which latter he finally decided upon accepting. He retained it only two years, at the end of which period he expressed his desire of renouncing his order; most probably from not finding either the members or its tenets bear the test of too familiar inspection; and, having obtained his secularization from Gregory XVI. he retired to Naples, where he lived simply as a priest, engaged in literary and scientific pursuits. In 1842

he came to Rome, where he soon afterwards found himself provided with lodgings, gratis, in the Inquisition; the blood-hounds of that "Holy Office" having tracked out some opinions in him which savoured, in their pious nostrils, of heresy. He had, however, the good fortune to be liberated from their clutches in three months; it baffling even their ingenuity to bring actual proof against him of error or misdemeanour. He had already had fearful misgivings respecting the tenets and practice of the Roman Catholic priesthood; this additional specimen of its spirit and its power was not likely to increase his veneration for it; he therefore, honestly and wisely, made up his mind solemnly to renounce all the honours, offices, and privileges he had hitherto enjoyed from his connexion with it, in exchange for moral freedom and liberty of conscience; and he was fortunate enough to obtain from the cardinal-vicar a decree of dismissal, complete and perpetual, from his ecclesiastical ministry. The year after his secession he lived chiefly at Malta, where he was engaged as professor of the college till the eventful year 1849, when he returned once more to Rome, a passive spectator of political occurrences, without taking the smallest part therein. Imagining himself safe under the passport regularly granted him by the Governor of Malta, he remained in the city during its occupation by the French, until the 20th of July; when, to his amazement, he was arrested by the French prefect of police, and again conducted to his old quarters of the Inquisition, whence, after being confined some weeks in a dark and unwholesome dungeon, he was transferred to the castle of St. Angelo, as a place of greater security. His crime was having turned Protestant, and having circulated Protestant Bibles. The flagrant injustice of his seizure, and of the treatment to which he was subjected, called forth the indignation and sympathies of many influential parties in this country, whose religious views were similar to those which he had embraced; and Sir Culling Eardley, and some other wealthy individuals, generously sent out a mission to Rome, to endeavour to procure his release, but in vain; the stronger the efforts that were made in his behalf, the more rigorously did his watchful guardians redouble their precautions to keep him to themselves; doubtless from a pious care for the welfare of his soul. Meantime the most absurd reports were spread by them, to the injury of his character; the most incredible stories fabricated, to prepare the public mind for the doom which they were anticipating for him. But lo! with all their precautions, they were doomed to find, in the words of the old poet,—

"Stone walls do not a prison make, Nor iron bars a cage;"

for one fine morning the bird was flown! The French authorities, convinced of the groundlessness of the charges against him, and ashamed of the injustice of his detention, contrived for the council of war to subpoena the doctor, as a witness in the trial of Cernuschi, who had been his fellow-prisoner. As soon as he was beyond the gates of St. Angelo, he was privately informed that the disguise of a soldier would be afforded him, in which he should be free to depart; but that once committed to his own discretion, he "must look right and left," and take care of himself: "For," said his liberators, "if you fall by any chance into the hands of the papal police, we can do nothing for you."

He accordingly walked into the street with, no doubt, a loudly throbbing heart—though he had borne his imprisonment with undaunted courage and cheerfulness—and repaired unmolested to the house of a friend, where he changed his military garb for plain clothes, and then proceeded to Mr. Freeborn, the English consul; who fortunately found out that he was at that very moment in want of a trusty person to convey some important despatches to Civita Vecchia: of course, he confided them to the care of Dr. Achilli, provided him with a carriage for the purpose, saw him fairly off, and the doctor was safely on board an English vessel, almost before he was missed in Rome. When, however, his escape was really made known, the consternation of the cardinals was extreme; it was only equalled by their rage—of all their intended victims he was the one they could least spare: he was gone, and had taken away with him, in his own personal experience, and his acquired information, ample store of materials wherewith to astonish the world, as soon as he should have security and leisure to lay them before it; as he is preparing to do at this moment. It was astounding! it was dreadful! One of their Eminences actually played the woman upon the occasion—he wept. The "iron tears" that Orpheus drew "down Pluto's cheek," were honey drops compared to those of the cardinal, scalding as brimstone, bitter as gall.

But, scarcely were the reverend Triumvirate recovered from the shock given to their nerves by the unlooked-for escape of Dr. Achilli from their clutches, when lo! another victim gave them the slip; and this no less a person than Monsignore Gazzola, who had been condemned to imprisonment for life in the castle of St. Angelo, in expiation of the crime of having, in the journal of the Positivo, recommended Pio Nono to abdicate; on the ground that there was no possibility of again uniting the spiritual and temporal powers of the papacy, save in the person of a new pope. He had had a powerful defence made for him, by the celebrated advocate Petroni; which, however, had no effect upon the tribunal, and lest it should have any upon others, they prohibited it from appearing on the register, and condemned it to the flames, in order to "make assurance doubly sure." The Inquisition was equally disappointed, meanwhile; having reckoned upon the captive as their own prey, for certain laxities in his religious opinions, had he cleared himself of his more purely political accusations. All parties were alike bewildered! bolts and bars had seemed to have given way, of their own accord, to facilitate the egress of the prisoner,—French guards and Roman sbirri to have shut their eyes, at the same moment, to the wonderful fact of his having walked out of the gates of Hadrian's tomb, unchallenged and unmolested.

Another prisoner whose fate excited the deepest interest in Rome, was Cernuschi, a Milanese by birth. He had distinguished himself equally by his bravery as his humanity, in his native city, during the insurrection against the Austrians; when the Lombards, for five days and nights, combated, almost without an hour's repose, the enemy who had been their scourge for thirty years; and in those five memorable days they reduced the number of their oppressors from eighty thousand, who garrisoned Italy throughout, to forty-two thousand, most of whom fled for refuge to divers fortresses, erected or usurped by their tyrannic sway. The spoil that remained upon the field was brought to Cernuschi, as one of the council of war. Of all of it, and it included many articles of great value, that council retained only the sword of Radetsky, and they retain it still.

Cernuschi came to Rome shortly after the death of Rossi, and was elected one of the representatives in that city, on the proclamation of the Republic, in consequence of the flight of the Pope. In the Chamber of Deputies he was remarkable for the coolness and impartiality of his reasoning, which at first rendered him unpopular, it being construed into lukewarmness. He invariably raised his voice against every measure that savoured of rashness or excess; and when the French expedition first disembarked at Civita Vecchia, he, judging of the truth and honour of la grande nation by the sentiments that glowed within his own breast, believed their protestations, and rejoiced in their approach; for he regarded them as the friends of rational liberty, and the impartial abettors of the Romans, in their endeavour to procure that boon for themselves which they hoped finally to see extended throughout Italy. But the advance of General Oudinot upon Rome, and his demand to take possession of the city, speedily betrayed the real spirit of his instructions, and the Romans, indignant at the treachery of the French Republic, or rather of its President, resolved to maintain their own rights, and repel force by force. On this occasion Cernuschi spoke with a determined courage, blended with the most admirable prudence, that repeatedly caused the chamber to ring with applause. He commenced his speech with an emotion that instantly commanded the most profound sympathy and attention in his auditors.

"Let us not," said he, "lose further time in speeches or discussions. It is decided that we must fight, and the people will decide that we shall conquer. Yes, we shall fight, and the victory will be ours. But for this many things are necessary—courage alone is not sufficient; and above all, we must maintain perfect order, in all things. If ever there was a moment when hatred to clerical sway ought to be suspended, that moment is the present one. Woe to him, whoever he may be, who shall be guilty of any act that may be construed into an insult to religion! It is for us to give an example to all assemblies that are the depositories of national honour. We have been calumniated, but undeservedly; we shall show that we know how to die, if called upon; true to the colours we wear." He drew forth his tri-coloured scarf as he spoke, and descended from the tribune, overwhelmed by his own feelings and the acclamations of his colleagues.

The struggle commenced: how unequally, impartial history will tell!

When further resistance became unavailing, Cernuschi was the first to propose a capitulation—but when he heard his own proposition carried, even as he had wished, unanimously, save with the solitary exception of Mazzini's voice, which, like his courage, still unsubdued, protested against yielding whilst life remained,—when he heard it carried, a convulsive spasm seized him; it seemed to him as if he had lent his hand to ring the knell of Roman freedom, and Italian hope! Two days afterwards he replied to Mazzini's protest against capitulating, in language as energetic as it was brief.

"Citizens," he said, "I have had the resolution to propose to you the decree of the thirteenth. We defended ourselves at first, because it was to our honour and benefit. We defended ourselves afterwards, because we had with us the vote of the French Constituency; and, at a later period, the treaty of Lesseps. We defended ourselves still, nine days after the breaches were mounted, nine days after the enemy was in the city, nine days after the news of the thirteenth of June, from Paris—and we defended ourselves after that, to show that we had no connexion with the insurrection there; that we were not under the influence of any party whatsoever. Here, as I have repeatedly declared,—here, in this assembly, we are neither socialists, nor communists, nor Montagnards: we are Italians, and, therefore, we are Republicans; because, henceforward there will be no other way of preserving nationality in Italy, but by Republicanism. After the last events, that have taken place in the siege, further resistance would be useless. We have only to cover our face, like Cæsar—let them come, and give the finishing stroke."

On the 5th of July, Cernuschi, having acquitted himself to the latest of his public duties, left Rome, then in full possession of the French, and proceeded with a passport regularly signed by the French police, for Civita Vecchia, where he was offered a secure asylum on board the Bulldog, English ship-of-war; but he declined accepting it, because he was unwilling to avail himself of an advantage in which his colleagues were unable to participate: almost immediately after, he was imprisoned, by order of the authorities, on the charges of having attempted to excite the Romans to tumult, upon the entrance of the French; of having taken an active part in the erection of the barricades; and of having spoliated, or connived at the spoliation of, the Farnese Palace. After six months' incarceration in the fortress of Civita Vecchia, he was brought, in the depth of winter, to Rome, to the castle of St. Angelo; where he arrived in such a state of utter destitution, that he was obliged to the charity of his friends, to supply him with a bed, and clothing, to shield him from the inclemency of the season. Surely this was not treatment to show a brave man, who had honourably capitulated along with the rest of the Roman Assembly, and who afterwards, in his defence, conducted by himself alone, though he had but twenty-two hours allowed him to prepare it in, completely rebutted all the charges which his enemies had taken seven months to bring against him! He was honourably acquitted by the French court-martial by which he was tried, but, on leaving the court, he was again seized by the papal emissaries, and re-conducted to St. Angelo's on some other trivial pretext. The Constitutionnel had the shamelessness to recommend that the next proceedings against him should be conducted in secret, as the only chance of convicting him. It might be thought almost impossible that the nineteenth century should produce such an open attempt to advocate the dark and wicked policy of Venice, in its most tyrannical days of despotism! Happily it did not succeed. He was tried a second time, a second time honourably acquitted, and left Rome in triumph.

Another illustrious victim to papal revenge and base French sufferance, was Colonel Calendrelli, of the artillery; a man of consummate ability as an engineer, and undaunted courage as an officer. To his admirable talent and foresight Rome was indebted for much of her long-protracted and brave defence; and even the French themselves, when their hour of shameful triumph came, could not but acknowledge, with admiration, his incorruptible principles and unimpeachable integrity. Nevertheless, they allowed him to be arrested, and thrown into a dungeon, after making him an empty offer of a passport; but he replied, that he had rather be a prisoner in his native country, than a beggar in the streets of Marsilles. Yet a fate like this is already the lot of hundreds, nay, of thousands of unfortunates, whose only crime is that of having taken up arms within their own walls, nay, on their own thresholds, to defend those walls, and their own households, against a foreign enemy! Yes, at this moment, there are hundreds of Italians in this metropolis, honourable and noble-minded men, who would actually die of hunger, if it were not for the few among them, who, more fortunate, in having some small funds of their own, deny themselves everything approaching to a luxury, almost to a comfort, in order to minister to the necessities of their destitute fellow-sufferers.

The Italian refugees are indeed, in many respects, more to be pitied than those of any other country, who have been driven by cruelty and despotism to appeal to English compassion; and yet, strange to say, that compassion has been withheld from them, in a manner wholly at variance with our general character as a nation, whose pride, and delight, and boast it is, to afford shelter to the oppressed, solace to the afflicted, and freedom to the slave. This general indifference to Italian sorrows, and Italian wrongs, on the part of the English public, is mainly attributable to the false and malevolent light in which they have been placed before it, by some of our—unfortunately for the cause of truth and justice—most influential journals: but how much have those writers to answer for, who thus wilfully mislead nations, and endeavour to confuse all innate perceptions between right and wrong! The generous blood they have caused to be shed, the tears of anguish they have wrung from innocent and affectionate, nay, even from manly and heroic eyes, the misery, in every shape, that they have caused, or strengthened, by their unprincipled misrepresentations, of the falsehood of which, in a hundred instances, eye-witnesses can convict them, will all weigh heavily upon their consciences, when the moment shall arrive that calls upon them—the base and petty politics of this world, and their own selfish interests in them, fast fading from their sight,—the solemn moment, when they are called upon to render an account to their Creator, of the use they have made of the talents committed to their charge, for far other purposes than to pervert judgment and advocate oppression.

Yes; we love our own country too well, and respect her too highly, to believe otherwise than that if she be prejudiced against Italy and the Italian cause, it is only because she is misled with regard to facts. To imagine her unwilling to be made acquainted with them, would be to acknowledge that there is an end of her intellectual superiority among nations, and of the dominion of truth in the moral world.

Let us then look stedfastly at the actual position of Reactionary Rome at the present moment, and dispassionately inquire into the benefits her inhabitants are likely to receive from their return, voluntary or involuntary as it may be, to the papal sway.

In order to view the subject in an impartial light, we must consider it in the same manner that we should if it were a question connected with our own country; with Ireland, for example, or with any of our colonies. A people complain of hardships, oppression and injustice. Are they correct in the statement of their wrongs? if they prove themselves to be so, have they not a right to ask for an amelioration of their condition? That the Romans laboured under wrongs in the system of their government, no one will attempt to deny; and we cannot think that any Englishman will deny their right to claim release from them; after having submitted to them for centuries, and seeing themselves becoming, in consequence of that submission, a bye-word of contempt among other nations, more fortunate in their institutions, however less finely gifted by nature. They did claim this release. They claimed a revision of their laws, an equality of civil rights, open justice, extension of commerce, and freedom from priestly influence, both in private and public life, no branch of either being free from the insidious and corrupting familiarity and grasping monopoly of the priests of one grade or other. We do not intend, however, to recapitulate the exceeding hardships the Romans laboured under; hardships unguessed at by the idle and luxurious who sit in judgment upon them, under a happier constitution; nor to revert to the manner in which they conducted themselves during the brief period of their being their own masters; we have only to view them as they now are, bowed down once more under the papal yoke.

After much hesitation with himself, much altercation with his Cardinals, much prevarication with his dearly-beloved French allies, and much mystification with all the world beside, Pio Nono re-entered the gates of Rome on the 12th of April, 1850. By some curious unknown sympathy in the doctrine of correspondencies, the body of his carriage was black, and the wheels red; too fatal emblems of the blood and desolation his dishonest flight had caused. The Cardinal-Vicar had issued orders to the parish priests to engage as many of the lower classes as they possibly could, at three pauls a head, to hold themselves in readiness to bawl out "Viva Pio Nono" at the top of their voices, as soon as he should present himself beyond the gates: and present himself he did, at four in the afternoon, at the gate of San Giovanni, and proceeded immediately to the church, amid as many priests, soldiers, foreigners, and rabble as could be got together. There he was received and blessed by the archpriest, and bowed his head to the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul; who, however, did not return the compliment; though had they been declared to have done so, it would not have been more marvellous than the relations of the Virgin at Rimini opening and shutting her eyes, the sailing of a portrait of the Saviour up and down the Adriatic, of its own accord, between two lighted tapers, and many other miracles that have been solemnly stated, and solemnly attested, for the edification of the Roman people, since the return of their spiritual guide and teacher.

It had been modestly proposed, that a body of respectable citizens should go out, bare-footed and in sackcloth, to meet his Holiness, with halters round their necks, and ashes on their heads, and chanting the penitential psalm,

"Peccavi, Domine, miserere mei."

But this suggestion, notwithstanding the romantic effect which the execution of the measure would doubtless have produced, in its interesting association with the remembrance of the moyen age, did not meet with a more flattering reception than that had done some time before, of procuring twenty or thirty thousand signatures to a petition for the return of his Holiness; the canvassers for which generally found themselves at the bottom of the stairs in so much shorter time than it had taken them to get up, that they very soon relinquished their applications.

Whatever anxiety the people might have felt as to the health of the Holy Father, after the various reports that had been spread, of his wasting away and consuming by slow poison at Naples, was speedily set at rest by his rotund and rubicund appearance. It was very evident that the luxurious clime of the siren Parthenope had agreed with him, nor did the national exclamation of "Per Bacco!" which sits so naturally upon Roman lips, seem any way misplaced on his own.

VOL. XII.

From the first day of his re-installment in the papal chair, Pio Nono seemed bent upon making the most offensive difference between his treatment of the French soldiers and his own subjects. To the former he showed every mark of affection and consideration, loaded them with honours and favours, went in person to see their sick in the hospitals, and showered down indulgences and absolutions among them; whilst for the latter were reserved maledictions, reproach, arrests, and destitution. The financial distress continued unabated. Whatever silver was imported to replace the republican paper, disappeared under the grasp of the clergy, who nevertheless obstinately refused to let any portion of the church property serve as security for the loans that were eagerly sought by government; and when, at last, Rothschild advanced, nominally, fifteen millions of francs, twelve millions were stopped by himself for an old account, and the other three were pounced upon by the Cardinals, for pretended arrears of their salaries.

One of the worst features of the present government is the re-installment, in the police, of all the infamous characters that had disgraced it so far in the reign of Gregory XVI. that even he objected to their continuance in it; and as domiciliary visits and arrests are entrusted to these wretches, notorious for infamy and crime, it may be easily imagined how many are made the victims of their private malice and resentment. Honourable men are thrown into the same cells with murderers and housebreakers, and no distinction made between mere errors of opinion and deliberate crime. The most onerous taxes are all renewed, with many additional ones, in order to support the foreign troops, without which the Pope does not feel himself sure of his throne for one single day; notwithstanding his infallibility, and the tremendous weapons he wields, in the shape of the keys of St. Peter, over the bodies and souls of all Christendom. Who now, then, can say that it was not the desire of the Romans themselves to stand up for their rights among nations; and for the performance of the Pope's voluntary promises to them of privileges which he had, in fact, so far actually granted them, that if the agreement between him and his subjects had been, as far as the spirit and understanding of it went, simply as a commercial transaction between two plain merchants or traders, instead of between a priestly prince and his people, he could in no way, either in law or honesty, have got off his bargain? But for potentates to be meted with the same measure wherewith they mete those they govern, would require a perfection in society which none can expect it to arrive at, in this world, save those who are fortunate enough to believe in the Millennium.

If the Romans were indeed overcrowded, as has been maliciously asserted, by "a handful of foreign rabble," how is it that now, when that rabble is all cut off, or wandering far away, homeless and destitute, how is it that they still so pertinaciously withhold all marks of satisfaction at the restoration of the old order of things? How is it that they have the rosolution to forego all their innocent luxuries and customary enjoyments, even their pecuniary interests, and almost their means of subsistence, rather than do anything that can be construed into reconciliation with their oppressors? How is it that they abstain from French produce, in every shape, for their own consumption, and will not even deal it out to others, in the way of business, if they can avoid it? How is it that they suffered even the Carnival, that grand event in Roman existence, to pass by without taking part in it, rather than have their temporary gaiety received as the expression of a contentment, the very reverse of the sadness their hearts were labouring under? How is it that they can keep up among them a secret press, in spite of spies on every side, and the certainty of imprisonment and chains, and the probability of a secret death, if discovered, or betrayed? How is it that they can circulate in the very heart of Rome two thousand copies of the Italia del Popolo, devoted to keeping alive in their breasts the sacred flame of freedom, whilst the pet journal of both the Roman and Neapolitan governments, the "Civiltà Cattolica," though it is purposely published at a price so low as to place it within the reach of even the humblest classes, is obliged to call in force, to procure readers; every municipality being required to take a certain number of it, in proportion to the inhabitants; sixty copies being palmed upon the little town of Spoleto alone?

It must certainly be allowed that at this moment Reactionary Rome presents a more really afflicting spectacle even than she did on the fatal day when, the flower of her defenders cut off, her ammunition gone, her walls gaping beneath the feet of the brave men that would willingly have been crushed, sword in hand, beneath their ruins, she was compelled, in compassion to the women and children,—too many of them, alas! already widows and orphans,—to open her gates to a treacherous enemy, to whom she might indeed say, "All is lost to us, except our honour!" for let it always be borne in mind that defeat in a good cause is more honourable than success in a bad one. Time, however, will show, and that very speedily, whether the restoration of tyranny, superstition and bigotry, with their attendants, cruelty, hypocrisy and ignorance, be desirable in civilized society in the nineteenth century; whether secret tribunals and open bribery, paid spies and hired defamers, foreign troops and priestly enthrallment, afford any thing in themselves deserving of imitation. If not, let the countries, among which England stands foremost, that are blest with true freedom, the freedom of just laws, moral order, and intellectual enlightenment,—let them show their gratitude for these inestimable privileges, by their sympathy and compassion for such of their fellow-creatures as are suffering every calamity and hardship, solely from their attempt to obtain a government equally excellent, and to raise themselves to that level in the scale of nations which none ever seriously desire or aim at, until they feel themselves capable of filling it worthily.

PARAPHRASE OF THE SONNET OF PETRARCH.

IO VO PIANGENDO I MIEI PASSATI TEMPI.

Oft o'er the shadowy records of the past,
In pensive mood, my sadden'd thoughts I cast,
And musing thus, uncheck'd will rise the tear,
To feel how dark those bygone scenes appear;
Life's noblest aims—alas, too oft forgot,
Life's brightest pages stain'd by many a blot,
Bound down to earth, my spirit prostrate lies,
Folded the wings, which God had bid to rise.
Oh Thou! who knowest all man's devious ways,
Great King of glory—of eternal days—
Extend thy pity to thy child of earth,
And with thy pardon, raise to nobler birth,
Restore his soul to freedom, and unbind
The heavy fetters which enchain the mind,
And grant, though tempest-tost his life has been,
Peace yet may rest upon its closing scene.
May the brief hours, which yet thy love may spare,
Be for thy praise—to Thee he makes his prayer,
Dread Power! who reignest with unbounded sway:
Thou, Thou alone art all his spirit's stay,
In Thee alone the soul can find its rest,
Who lives for thee—he, he alone, is blest.

THE LION HUNTER IN AFRICA.¹

OUR readers will remember that some months since, we expressed a hope that Cumming, the lion hunter, would return and present us with the narrative of his adventures. This he has now done. The book answers the expectations we formed of it; for it is made up of incidents among the most original and remarkable we remember to have read. If we glance at the author's wild career of sport in the barbarous regions where he has spent five years of his life, it will not be to condense the cream of his narrative, but to draw from it that which may enable our readers to judge of the rest.

Born in Scotland, inured to the field, and accustomed to the chase from boyhood, Cumming was at an early age a wanderer through the magnificent wilds of India: with a fervent love of excitement, he exchanged one occupation for another, until finally he resolved to throw himself entirely into the gratification of his favourite propensity, and live as a hunter in the remote interior of Africa. With the wagon for his home, with savages for his only companions, with the river and the forest perpetually before him, and with the chase as his sole occupation, he passed five romantic, adventurous years, engaged in warfare with the lion, the elephant, the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus, the giraffe and the smaller denizens of the wild.

In order to gain an idea of his fashion of wandering, a notice of the equipment with which he provided himself may be necessary. First he procured two wagons, substantial, roomy, and commodious vehicles, with two spans of oxen, (twenty-four,) accustomed to heavy draught. Next he had two horses, Simon and the cow, and four servants, an Englishman named Long, formerly a London cab-driver, much addicted to love; a Hottentot driver named Kleinboy; an assistant, descended from the Mozambique races, named Carolus; and a native named Cobus,—these three perpetually drunk. Coffee, tea, sugar, rice, meal, flour, pepper, salt, vinegar, pickles, hams, cheeses, gin, and brandy, in substantial quantities, formed the chief provisions of the party; they carried muskets and other articles for barter with the savage tribes, utensils for use in the wilderness, with every necessary for a protracted expedition through an inhospitable region. The main object of the journey was not neglected. The wagon mounted its ordnance—three double-barrel rifles, one heavy-barrelled German gun, and three double-barrel pieces, for ordinary work. Four hundred pounds of powder, ten thousand prepared leaden bullets, fifty thousand percussion caps, two thousand flints, three cwt. of lead, fifty pounds weight of pewter, with grease patches, wads, lead-ladles, bullet-moulds, loading-rods, shot-belts, and flasks, formed the hunter's peculiar equipment, besides 200*l.* in cash; and thus prepared, he started from Graham's Town towards the end of October 1843. His servants were changed and increased on the journey, and additions were made to his equipments. The first day's journey was ominous of the rest, for the route lay over a rugged country, traversed by narrow ill-defined tracks, now lost in a marsh, now dipping suddenly, and now entering a region of rocks and ravines perilous to the last degree to the traveller in a gigantic wagon. Many accidents and more dilemmas consequently occurred; but none of a serious nature. We intend, however, to follow the hunter through the less known country, and we therefore hurry him over the Great Fish River, and along the margin of the stream, amid groves of mimosa, willow, and white thorn, richly covered with yellow blossoms, emitting a powerful and fragrant perfume. Continuing its course straight onwards, the wagons five times traversed the great Fish river. Gradually the colonial farms became less frequent; the traces of European civilization less distinct, the forest more dense, and the plain more peopled by its original denizens, the wild beasts and the savage.

(1) "Five years of a Hunter's Life in the far interior of South Africa." By Ronaelyn Gordon Cumming, Esq. with Illustrations. Two vols. London: Murray. 1860.

Traversing one level and bare expanse, where the traveller saw troops of the graceful springbok passing to and fro, a singular sight presented itself to his eye. Thousands of skeletons and skulls strewed the plain—the remains of animals who had died in this dreary but beautiful region. After passing Colesberg, the country became in reality barbarous South Africa, and Cumming's narrative becomes invested with all the attributes of a startling romance, though at the same time written in a tone so natural and circumstantial, that we feel as we read, that the book is not a fiction, but a record of extraordinary reality.

On the 2d of December, he started with his followers for the vast Hamo plains, lying towards the west, where the gemsbok was said to be abundant. Within eight days, he was in the long looked for region, and a herd of the beautiful animals was seen. When chased, however, they fled northward, and defied the hunter's horse to overtake them. Every hour now brought the little caravan into a wild country abounding in ostriches, quaggas, herds of the hartbeeste, ash-coloured bucks, and gemsbok. At length Cumming was able to shoot one of these creatures. "My thirst was intense, and the gemsbok having a fine breast of milk, I milked her into my mouth, and obtained a drink of the sweetest beverage I ever tasted." Sport became plentiful, especially in the blue wildebeeste or brindled gnou. One of them was found with one of his fore-legs caught over his horn, so that he could not run, having probably thus entangled himself during a fight with one of his fellows. Ostriches were also abundant, and their nests frequent. These consist of basins scooped in the sandy soil, generally among low thickets; the eggs are piled in the hollows. Two hens are believed occasionally to lay in one nest. Should the place be disturbed, or even approached during the absence of the old birds, they invariably smash the eggs and fly from the spot. Our author says the natives make great use of the eggs, as utensils, and confirms the accounts of other travellers with respect to the manner of hunting the ostrich.

"A favourite method adopted by the wild bushman for approaching the ostrich and other varieties of game, is to clothe himself in the skin of one of these birds, in which, taking care of the wind, he stalks about the plain, cunningly imitating the gait and motions of the ostrich until within range, when, with a well-directed poisoned arrow from his tiny bow, he can generally seal the fate of any of the ordinary varieties of game. These insignificant looking arrows are about two feet six inches in length; they consist of a slender reed, with a sharp bone head, thoroughly poisoned with a composition, of which the principal ingredients are obtained, sometimes, from a succulent herb, having thick leaves, yielding a poisonous, milky juice; sometimes from the jaws of snakes. The bow rarely exceeds three feet in length; its string is of twisted sinews. When a bushman finds an ostrich's nest, he ensconces himself in it, and there awaits the return of the old birds, by which means he generally secures the pair. It is by means of these little arrows that the majority of the fine plumes are obtained which grace the heads of the fair throughout the civilized world."

In the wild region thus inhabited, the hunter passed a lonely and romantic life. His camp abounded with delicacies—tongues, brains, marrows, kidneys, venison, rich soup, and ostrich eggs, while many a most delicious draught was afforded by the far-famed and wonderful water-plant lying eight or nine inches underground, and by a singular provision of Providence, especially abundant in the more arid plains.

A most extraordinary spectacle presented itself one morning to the traveller's eye, and accustomed as he was to strange scenes, he describes this as the strangest he ever witnessed. For two hours before dawn he had reclined in the wagon, listening to a trampling sound, mingled with grunts, as though of a vast herd of springboks grazing near the camp. As soon as light broke, he looked forth to see. At the north lay a range of lofty hills, pierced by a broad opening, and to the north-east another ridge was broken by a similar pass. Between spread a plain, and all around forests appeared at intervals, on the verge of the landscape. Through the northern pass was pouring a host of springbok. Crowding the valley, and emerging upon the plain, they covered it with a moving mass of animal life, which flowed through the opposite gateway in the mountains. The whole of the level land was alive with these animals. Slowly and steadily they came forth in dense masses, legion after legion, like the flood of a mighty river, continually disappearing through the opening in the hills, but never diminishing. The earth seemed covered with a red mass of life, floating from north to north-east. For two hours the hunter gazed on the wonderful spectacle, and then, saddling his horse, he rode towards the army of springboks, shot fourteen of them, and returned to the camp. The animals were emigrating from a plain whose herbage they had nearly exhausted towards a region of more exuberant fertility, and the traveller computes at some hundreds of thousands the number he saw that morning.

Reaching the Vaal River, which he immediately forded, the traveller was delighted by the anticipation of a hippopotamus hunt in its waters. This beautiful stream is bordered by hanging trees of rich foliage, and winds through a romantic and verdant country. The wild animals in all their variety of size, form, kind, and colour, which abound, lend a charm to the region, even to those who do not, like Cumming, enjoy the chase and slaughter of them. To him, however, as a sportsman, no place could be more delightful. He fell in with many extraordinary adventures, described in a lively and natural style; but many of them we must necessarily pass over in our hurried advance towards the country of elephants and lions. One incident, however, must be mentioned. Sleeping on the banks of a pool, the hunter's couch was attended by two grunting porcupines and an old wildebeeste, while under his pillow he heard some creature moving in the cracked earth. Doubtful whether it might be a mouse or a snake, he wrapped himself in his blanket, and slept. Next day, after he had enjoyed his morning's sport, two men approached, holding forth a large puff-adder, one of the most deadly of African reptiles, which had been discovered sunning itself on the edge of the hunter's blanket.

After his first encounter with a lioness, Cumming fell in with two buffaloes, which he chased for miles through a woody country until they turned and stood at bay in a thicket. The hunter placed himself in front of them, with his attendant behind him. He fired right and left at the two gigantic brutes, who bent their armed heads to the earth, and, with a subdued roar, charged headlong against him.

"In an instant I was round a clump of tangled thorn trees; but Isaac, by the violence of his effort to get his horse in motion, lost his balance, and at the same instant himself, his saddle, his big Dutch rifle, all came to the ground together, right in the path of the infuriated buffaloes. Two of the dogs which had fortunately at that moment joined us, met them in their charge, and, by diverting their attention, probably saved Isaac from instant destruction. The buffaloes now took up another position in an adjoining thicket. They were both badly wounded; blotches and pools of blood marking the ground where they had stood. The dogs rendered me assistance by taking up their attention, and in a few minutes these two noble bulls breathed their last beneath the shade of a mimosa tree. Each of them in dying repeatedly uttered a very striking, low, deep moan. This, I subsequently ascertained, the buffalo invariably utters when in the act of expiring."

These brutes were of enormous size and power. Their horns, like rugged roots of the oak tree, were each about a foot in breadth at the base, and together protected the skull with a massive and impenetrable shield. Descending, and spreading out horizontally, they completely overshadowed the eyes, imparting to the animal a most savage and sinister look. The head of one of them cut off, was with difficulty lifted by two strong men, and the flesh was devoured by a tribe of savages in the neighbourhood.

The death of an eland is touchingly described, and we confess, that did our own fortune lead us through the wilds of South Africa, it would be a source of far deeper delight to us to gaze on these beautiful animals in their undisturbed happiness, than to "bowl them over," and without feeling watch their agonies in the struggles of life and death. An eland, the largest of the antelope tribe, exceeding an ordinary ox in size, was one day observed standing under a tree.—

"He was the first I had seen, and was a noble specimen, standing about six feet high at the shoulder. Observing us, he made off at a gallop, springing over the trunks of decayed trees which lay across his path, but very soon he reduced his pace to a trot;—spurring my horse, another moment saw me riding hard behind him. Twice in the thickets I lost sight of him, and he very nearly escaped me; but at length, the ground improving, I came up with him, and rode within a few yards behind him. Long streaks of foam now streamed from his mouth, and a profuse perspiration had changed his sleek grey coat to an ashy blue. Tears trickled from his large dark eye, and it was plain the eland's hours were numbered. Pitching my rifle to my shoulder, I let fly at the gallop, and mortally wounded him behind; then, spurring my horse, I shot past him on his right side, and discharged my other barrel behind his shoulder, when the eland staggered far and subdued in the dust."

The hunter now plunged into the lion-haunted region, adorned with all the graces of landscape, and profusely enriched with the beauties of animate nature. Birds of gaudy plumage fluttered in the woods, and beasts of exquisite form and colour disported in the green and grassy valleys. All night long the loud roar of lions was heard, and all day the traveller was in quest of these animals. One was shot as he approached the camp, and the traces of many others, with those of the rhinoceros, buffalo, and camelopard, were abundant on the banks of the streams. The hunter's picture of a giraffe chase is animated and picturesque :—

"I suddenly beheld a sight the most astounding that a sportsman's eye can encounter. Before me stood a group of ten colossal giraffes, the majority of which were from seventeen to eighteen feet high. On beholding me they at once made off, twisting their long tails over their backs, making a loud, switching noise with them, and cantered along at an easy pace."

The blood-loving hunter was quickly in pursuit. He separated the finest of the herd from her companions, and galloped after her.

"She increased her pace, and cantered along with tremendous strides, clearing an amazing extent of ground at every bound; while her neck and breast, coming in contact with the dead old branches of the trees, were continually strewing them in my path. In a few minutes I was riding within five yards of her stern, and, firing at the gallop, I sent a bullet into her back. Increasing my pace, I next rode alongside, and placing the muzzle of my rifle within a few feet of her, I fired my second shot behind the shoulder; the ball, however, seemed to have little effect. I then placed myself directly in front, when she came to a walk."

Leading the hunter through a long and exciting chase, the giraffe at length stood with him in the midst of a wild wood.

"I gazed in wonder at her extreme beauty, while her soft, dark eye, with its silky fringe, looked down imploringly at me, and I really felt a pang of sorrow in this moment of triumph for the blood I was shedding. Pointing my rifle towards the skies, I sent a bullet through her neck. On receiving it, she reared high on her hind legs, and fell backwards with a heavy crash, making the earth shake around her. A thick stream of dark blood spouted from the wound; her colossal limbs quivered for a moment, and she expired."

Mr. Cumming pauses for a moment in the narrative of his Nimrodian achievements to relate a characteristic anecdote of the Bechuana tribe. Bartering with them, he exchanged a large quantity of gun-powder for some arms of native manufacture. The chiefs used the powder, but, taking no aim, missed all they fired at. With a conceit common enough among civilized folks, the savages laid all the fault on the instrument, and none on their manner of employing it. Accordingly a council was called, and it was declared the powder wanted medicine. It was piled up on a kaross, or robe of state, and the king of the Booby tribe sat with the six men, the hereditary peers of his realm, around it. Ceremonies and incantations were performed innocently enough, until one of the sages, wise by birth, said that the presence of fire was necessary. Upon this a censer of glowing embers was passed to and fro over the pile. As a natural consequence, a coal dropped into the powder, which of course exploded, knocking the hereditary councilmen head over heels in all directions round. Many of them died from the burns thus received.

Traversing a desert of ashes, where the Bakalahari people had burnt the forest, our traveller approached the long-sought mountains of Bamangwato, indicating the commencement of endless elephant forests. The summit of the range, beautifully blue, loomed along the line of the horizon, and the scenery assumed all the characteristics of the wildest nature. Entering the territories of the King Sioomy, whose subjects had never yet seen a white man, he was honourably welcomed by the tribe. The women and children crowded on the hills; the warriors came out in the full glitter of warlike equipment, and the king took coffee with our traveller in the camp. Cumming adopted a politic course with the native chiefs and people with whom he came in contact. He was mild, but firm, and, consequently, respected. Thousands of the poor savages blessed his name, for his rifle left plenty among many a tribe, which had for several days wandered hungrily over the plains, unskilled in the art of the chase, and unpossessed of the white man's deadly weapons. Provided by him, they feasted on the carcasses of elephants and giraffes, with elands, and the others of the antelope tribe, slain by his rifle. Business and pleasure, however, combine in most Scotchmen's avocations, and Mr. Cumming, while he enjoyed his sport, sold muskets to the chiefs for ivory at a profit of 3,000 per cent.!

Shooting his first bull elephant, the hunter enjoyed the spectacle of the natives swarming upon it, like flies upon carrion, to procure its flesh, while he partook of a great delicacy—an elephant's foot baked.

This species of game, noble as it was, gave place to a nobler; for the chase of the lion occupied a large portion of the hunter's care. Discovering a buffalo newly slain by one of these majestic animals, whose royal thirst of blood is so celebrated, he watched in the vicinity for his return. Presently he was seen marching towards the spot, and our murderous Nimrod galloped off to meet him :—

"Ye gods! what a savage he looked! The whole of his mane was deeply tinged with the blood of the buffalo, and the rays of the declining sun added to it a lustre which imparted to the exasperated lion a look of surpassing fierceness. He was making for the adjacent rocky mountains, and he marched along in front of the dogs with his tail stuck straight out, stepping along with an air of the most consummate pride and independence. There was not a moment to lose, so I galloped forward on one side, and then rode in slowly to get a near shot; as he approached, I came within thirty yards of him, and halting my horse, I fired for his heart, from the saddle. On receiving the ball he wheeled about, when I gave him a second a little below the first; he then walked, or ran, about ten yards forward, and fell dead. This was a very large, old lion; he had cleaned his buffalo very nicely, dragging up all the offal into a heap at a distance from the carcass, and he had watched it all day to keep away the vultures."

Our author dilates with enthusiasm upon the ardent pride with which he gazed on a slain lion. No description, he tells us, can correctly suggest the beauty of the magnificent brute. His splendid mane, his massive arms, his sharp yellow nails, his hard and terrible head, his immense and powerful teeth, his perfect symmetry, render him as he lies extended on the earth, with tawny skin and closed eyes, the image of power subdued.

But though Mr. Cumming was the victor in these contests, he frequently ran the risk of discomfiture and death. On one occasion he fought a hippopotamus. Any one that has seen the brute now in the Zoological Gardens, which is only a kitten, may imagine a single combat with a full-grown monster of the species. Such a combat took place in the waters of the richly-bordered Limpopo River. The hunter discovered a number of the animals near the reedy bank, and selecting that nearest to him, gave her a mortal wound, "knocking loose a great plate on the top of her skull." She immediately commenced plunging round and round, with intervals of stillness, while the rest of the hippopotami fled down the stream, running as long as it was shallow, and swimming afterwards. Meanwhile the battle continued between the Nimrod and his prey. He gave her a second ball, which passed in at the roof of the skull, and out at the eye, but the brute still floundered further and further down the river towards deep water, and her pursuer, leaping into the water, followed. Armed with a sharp knife, he approached, preparing to dive should she attack him. Then, seizing her tail, he attempted to drag her towards the shore; but her strength was immense, and she shook him to and fro, continuing "to splash, and plunge, and blow, and make her circular course, carrying me along with her, as if I was a fly at her tail." This was but a poor hold. The knife was, therefore, employed to cut two deep parallel incisions in the skin, through which Cumming passed his hands: and then a desperate struggle took place. The man pulled one way, the hippopotamus pulled another, and they danced a waltz in the water. Victory hung in a doubtful balance for some minutes; but at length the man prevailed, and the beast, sometimes hauled, sometimes pushed, was brought to shore. There a servant quickly brought a stout lashing, which, passed through the opening in the thick skin, was secured to the trunk of a tree. Then, taking his rifle, the hunter sent a ball through the head of Behemoth, and she was dead. The brute was almost five feet across the belly.

The lion was also a formidable enemy, and an incident occurred during Mr. Cumming's wanderings that illustrates the danger of this tremendous sport. The camp was one night formed round a low fire, in a locality where wood was scarce. It was black dark; the country round was bleak and desolate, and a wild howling wind swept over it, in whirling blasts, while the men one by one reclined by the bivouac fire, and fell asleep.

"Suddenly the appalling and murderous voice of an angry blood-thirsty lion burst upon my ear, within a few yards of us, followed by the shrieking of the Hottentots. Again and again the murderous roar of attack was repeated. We heard John Ruyter shriek, 'The lion! the lion!' still, for a few moments, we thought he was but chasing the dogs round the kraal; but next instant John Stofolus rushed into the midst of us, almost speechless with terror, his eyes bursting from their sockets, and shrieked out—'The lion! the lion! he has got Hendrich; he dragged him away from the fire, beside me. I struck him with burning brands upon his head; but he would not let go his hold. Hendrich is dead! Oh God! Hendrich is dead! Let us take fire and seek him.'"

A terrible clamour ensued; which Cumming repressed, bidding his people keep close together and await the dawn, as nothing could save Hendrich. The dogs were let go; but instead of routing the lion, they rushed fiercely on one another, and fought desperately for some minutes. After this they went at him, detected his position, and barked until dawn of day, occasionally driven away by the brute, who lay all night within forty yards of the camp, devouring the unhappy man he had chosen for his prey.

"It appeared that when the unfortunate Hendrich rose to drive in the ox, the lion had watched him to his fireside, and he had scarcely lain down when the brute sprang upon him and Ruyter, for both lay under one blanket, with his appalling, murderous roar, and roaring as he lay, grappled him with his fearful claws, and kept biting him on the breast and shoulders all the while, feeling for his neck; having got hold of which, he at once dragged him backwards around the bush into the dense shade.

"As the lion lay upon the unfortunate man he faintly cried—'Help me, help me! Oh God! men, help me.' After which the fearful beast got a hold of his neck, and then all was still, except that his comrades heard the bones of his neck cracking between the teeth of the lion. John Stofolus had laid with his back to the fire on the opposite side, and on hearing the lion he sprang up, and seizing a large, flaming brand, belaboured him on the head with the burning wood; but the brute did not take any notice of him."

Next morning one of Hendrich's legs, bitten off below the knee, one shoe, and the fragments of a coat were found. The lion had taken his departure; but Mr. Cumming had the satisfaction of meeting him soon after, and driving two balls into him, which killed him.

Shooting elephants at the fountain by night, as described by Mr. Cumming, is wild occupation. Hiding in a hole by the water's brim, the hunter with his follower awaited the arrival of the herd. A black rhinoceros approached, but, not being considered a shot, was driven away with a log of wood. Presently four old bull elephants drew near, and one of them was struck near the heart by a bullet: the rest passed on. Then three others of gigantic size followed, and one of these received a similar wound. He ran two hundred yards, and then stopped, evidently dying. The others also halted, and one of them—the finest of the three—slowly and warily approached the fountain. Meanwhile the wounded brute gave the cry of death, and flung his ponderous form upon the earth. The old bull neared the water, appearing to mistrust the very ground on which he trod, pausing occasionally for five minutes together, and examining every spot before he passed it. At length, having inspected three sides of the fountain, he appeared satisfied that all was right, and, pacing majestically towards its brim, prepared to drink, unconscious of the enemy lurking within seven yards of him. He turned his side towards the pool, lowered his trunk into it, drew up a volume of water, and threw it over his back and shoulders, to cool them. This process having been several times repeated, he commenced drinking by filling his trunk, and pouring the water thence into his mouth. With inflexible hardness of heart, our hunter broke his leg with a rifle shot; and that night seven or eight elephants fell under his balls.

The next night, with horse, and hound, and horn, Cumming went forth to hunt the elephants by moonlight—a novel and exciting sport. The vast brute fled away before the dogs, blowing his trumpet as he went, while his pursuers yelled behind. Brought to bay, he resorted to a singular expedient for self-defence—by sweeping up the red dust with his trunk, and endeavouring thus to screen himself behind a cloud. This did not avail, and he died.

The tusks of an ordinary bull elephant were worth to our traveller about 33*l*. However, a large quantity of the ivory was stolen by the chief of a neighbouring tribe, which Mr. Cumming undertook by a bold device to recover. He resolved to ride into the native village and threaten to shoot the chief, unless the tusks were restored. This he did. The chief was sitting in council when the white approached him, leaving a guard of one man at each door! He sat silent for a while, and then said—"My heart is very bitter with the chief of this village. You were hungry, and I killed much flesh and fat for you. I told you that many of my elephants were lying dead, and that I wanted their teeth. You promised me to watch the vultures, and bring me the teeth."

He then said that he traced the tusks to the village, and that they must be produced. The chief complied. The teeth were brought, and an amicable intercourse took place. Upon one of the chiefs the hunter practised an amusing deception. The man made him some handsome presents, and in return begged to be inoculated with the mysterious power of shooting well. Opening a book of prints, with representations of the principal quadrupeds, he caused the savage to place his fingers, one by one, on the figures, and each time anointed him with turpentine, repeating all the while uncouth and absurd sentences. Then lancing his arm in four places, and anointing the wounds with gunpowder and turpentine, he told him his gun would never miss any of these animals, provided he held it straight. Glorifying in the acquisition of this mystical power, the chief departed.

Our author, whose narrative, if it have not passed through the hands of a professed writer, betokens considerable literary skill in a hunter's pen, may be described as one of the boldest and most adventurous, as well as one of the most successful, among the followers of Nimrod. In South Africa, he is known among the natives as the Great Slayer of Lions. He shot more than a hundred elephants: he counted his lions by the score. The rhinoceros was his ordinary victim, and to shoot nine hippopotami at a time was considered no marvel. Giraffes, with elands, gemsboks, springboks, steinboks, and others of the antelope species—the most graceful of all animals—were destroyed in great numbers. But even the achievements of Mr. Cumming are exaggerated by the wild people of the countries which he for the first time visited. Among them he is regarded as something between earthly and divine. Strange tales are told of his conduct, and it is said that he condescended to wear no other costume than that of father Adam. This story is probably accounted for by the fact that his arms were always bare, and that frequently a single garment, rudely tattered, was all that was left to him after a chase through the thorny thickets. Whatever he may have done in the far interior of South Africa, however, he has published a work of wonderful interest. The narrative is novel and exciting, and much is added to our knowledge of the regions visited by the adventurous hunter. Sir William Harris presented us with a magnificent volume of plates, in imperial folio, and splendidly coloured, representing the objects of sport in Africa, and with these before us we enter fully into the spirit of Mr. Cumming's narrative, embellished, as it also is, with many interesting and well-executed wood-cuts.

"IN MEMORIAM."

It is well understood that this nameless volume is the production of Alfred Tennyson—the most successful of our younger poets. The brief but significant title aptly indicates the nature of its contents; and such of our readers as have not seen the book, or read any extracts from it, need scarcely be informed that it is a practical tribute to the memory of a departed friend: a collection of plaintive elegies poured forth over the early grave of one who perished in his prime, fondly beloved and deeply lamented. It is also generally known that the object of these mournful strains was the son of Mr. Hallam, the historian; and that his death, as appears by the following inscription at the commencement of the volume, took place some years since:—

IN MEMORIAM

A. H. H.

OBITU MDCCLXXXIII.

We gather also from some passages in the poems themselves, that, independently of the strong tie of friendship, the poet had cherished the hope of being more closely allied to Mr. Hallam by the bond of relationship, and that another of his house had cause to mourn with grief more poignant than his own, over his friend's untimely grave. Once again in the history of the true love whose course so seldom runs smooth, had death interposed to prevent a union fraught, as it was believed, with all earthly happiness. It is not easy to misinterpret the following stanzas:—

"I see thee sitting crown'd with good,
A central warmth diffusing bliss
In glance and smile, and clasp and kiss,
On all the branches of thy blood;

"Thy blood, my friend, and partly mine;
For now the day was drawing on,

(1) Major Rogers, the Indian Hunter, shot two thousand elephants, and then left off counting his victims. Mr. Cumming is quite eclipsed in his blood-spilling vocation.

When thou shouldst link thy life with one
Of mine own house, and boys of thine
"Had babbled 'uncle' on my knee;
But that remorseless iron hour
Made cypress of her orange flower,
Despair of hope, and earth of thee."

Since the days when Shelley mourned for Keats in his most musical and melancholy poem of Adonais, we feel sure that no Englishman has been lamented in strains so fastidiously elegant or so gracefully pathetic as the early friend of Tennyson. We would be the last to question the earnestness or reality of the sorrow which has found such eloquent utterance; but we have felt more than once as we turned over the leaves of the volume, that the pathos would have been more impressive, had the language and construction of the poems occasionally worn an air of greater simplicity, and if some of the thoughts, striking and original as we confess them to be, had not appeared so far-fetched and so painfully elaborated. Some of the most beautiful elegies are those in which the poet dwells upon the tastes and pursuits of his friend, and recalls some little passages of his personal history. In the following lines, for instance, in which he paints the young barrister, revelling in the enjoyment of fresh air and country scenery, after days of uncongenial toil, there is a picturesqueness and warmth of colouring all attractive and most artistic; worthy in fact of Alfred Tennyson!

"Witch-elms that counterchange the floor
Of this flat lawn with dusk and bright;
And thou, with all thy breadth and height
Of foliage, towering sycamore;

"How often, hither wandering down,
My Arthur found your shadows fair,
And shook to all the liberal air
The dust and din and steam of town;

"He brought an eye for all he saw;
He mixt in all our simple sports;
They pleased him, fresh from brawling courts
And dusky purlieus of the law.

* * * * *
"O bliss, when all in circle drawn
About him, heart and ear were fed
To hear him, as he lay and read
The Tuscan poets on the lawn:

"Or in the all-golden afternoon
A guest, or happy sister sung,
Or here she brought the harp and flung
A ballad to the brightening moon."

In point of genuine poetical merit, we apprehend that many of these elegies will be held superior to anything which has yet proceeded from Mr. Tennyson's pen. They bear all the marks of his peculiar genius, and are more carefully finished than the most elaborate of his previous performances. All the qualifications which have rendered him so acceptable to the critical readers and discreet lovers of poetry, are here displayed in their matured excellence:—the graceful diction and exquisite harmony of versification; the subtle flights of thought and fancy; the delicate sense of beauty and keen appreciation of the beautiful; the power of condensation, and of presenting the commonest objects in a new and unexpected light;—these and many more characteristics of his genius are observable in the pages of "In Memoriam," and even if rumour had been altogether silent, would have marked it as his production. How beautifully has he embodied in a single stanza his spiritual and unwavering faith in the sanctity and divine uses of earthly sorrow!

"I hold it true, whate'er befall;
I feel it, when I sorrow most;
'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all."

The various aspects under which the poet contemplates his bereavement, suggest to him many charming pictures, and ideal resemblances drawn from the beaten path of human life, full of exquisite truth and beauty. The following stanzas speak for themselves:—

"He past; a soul of nobler tone:
My spirit loved and loves him yet,
Like some poor girl whose heart is set
On one whose rank exceeds her own.

"He mixing with his proper sphere,
She finds the baseness of her lot;
Half jealous of she knows not what,
And envying all that meet him there.

"The little village looks forlorn;
She sighs amid her narrow days,
Moving about the household ways,
In that dark house where she was born.

"The foolish neighbours come and go,
And tease her till the day draws by;
At night she weeps, 'How vain am I!
How should he love a thing so low?'

Of a similar character, but in a loftier and sublimer strain of poetry, is the following address to his departed friend:—

"Dost thou look back on what hath been,
As some divinely gifted man,
Whose life in low estate began,
And on a simple village green;

"Who breaks his birth's invidious bar,
And grasps the skirts of happy chance,
And breasts the blows of circumstance,
And grapples with his evil star;

"Who makes by force his merit known
And lives to clutch the golden keys,
To mould a mighty state's decrees,
And shape the whisper of the throne;

"And raising up from high to higher,
Becomes on fortune's crowning slope
The pillar of a people's hope,
The centre of a world's desire;

"Yes, feels, as in a pensive dream,
When all his active powers are still,
A distant dearness in the hill,
A secret sweetness in the stream,

"The limit of his narrower fate,
While yet beside its vocal springs'
He played at counsellors and kings,
With one that was his earliest mate;

"Who ploughs with pain his native lea,
And reaps the labour of his hands,

"Or in the furrow musing stands;
'Does my old friend remember me!'"

We cannot forbear quoting one more touching simile of the same description, as graceful at least as any of the passages we have cited.

"A happy lover who has come
To look on her that loves him well,
Who lights and rings the gateway bell,
And learns her gone and far from home,

"He saddens, all the magic light
Dies off at once from bower and hall,
And all the place is dark, and all
The chambers emptied of delight.

"So find I every pleasant spot
In which we two were wont to meet,
The field, the chamber, and the street;
For all is dark where thou art not."

Our readers cannot have failed to remark that the metre in which these elegies are composed, has been most happily selected by Mr. Tennyson. In the charm of versification, and in the due appreciation of the properties of style and minute niceties of expression, no modern poet can be said to have surpassed him. His least important poems abound with musical and mellifluous lines, and no Englishman has had the good fortune to make our language appear more flexible and harmonious. In the present volume there are many rhythmical peculiarities which prove to us that its author is a consummate master of the art of poetical composition. One of the earlier elegies, for instance, concludes with the following stanza; and we call the attention of our readers to the artistic introduction of an apparent harshness in the last line, to embody the idea of dreariness and discomfort:—

"He is not here; but far away
The noise of life begins again,
And ghastly through the drizzling rain
On the bald street breaks the blank day."

We could multiply examples of mere felicities of style; but we turn from these minor excellences to take a final view of the pervading spirit of these matchless elegies. In many of the author's former compositions we have lamented the apparent absence of any direct or intelligible aim; whilst his poetry appeared to breathe a spirit of refined philosophy, we we could not discover in it that genuine sympathy with the influences which assist the cause of human progress generally found in the highest order of poetry. But the present volume abounds with noble aspirations and generous sentiments which reflect equal glory on the philanthropist and the poet, and which prove to us that we have not been wrong in classing Alfred Tennyson among the great and moving spirits of the age. The last quotation we shall make from the In Memoriam will illustrate these remarks.

We are disposed to believe that a strain of nobler music or more divine philosophy than the following has scarcely ever found human utterance:—

"Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light:
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

"Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.

"Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

"Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out my mournful rhymes,
But ring the fuller minstrel in.

"Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

"Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

"Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be."

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LEIGH HUNT.¹

A GREAT portion of the pleasure we derive from the perusal of this memoir arises from the consciousness, that the man into whose history it affords so many glimpses, is still living to hear judgment passed upon his actions, and the thoughts and opinions of his past life criticised.

Leigh Hunt's writings have, in all probability, endeared him to a vast circle. His delicacy, his taste, his sweetness, have won him the impartial admiration of the many, but we feel assured no one could peruse the three volumes before us, without becoming, to a certain degree, attached to the spirit that so candidly owns to its early errors of judgment, and makes the best possible apology for them. There is less of egotism in the autobiography of Leigh Hunt than could have been anticipated. A man's own confession of hidden facts and thoughts, into which the dearest friend, perhaps, has not been permitted to penetrate, naturally leads him, unless gifted with great taste and discrimination, to rivet the reader's attention solely upon himself. Now this our author is far from having done, and perhaps scarcely sufficiently; for we should at times have been better pleased to have followed more closely in the current of ideas and feelings which carried him from the sunny sea of childhood to the darker ocean of manhood, and gradually placed him in the position he now occupies. We are presented, indeed, with sketches of character, and brief outlines of events which are certainly possessed of great interest, though far, perhaps, from satisfying us so completely as a hundred more domestic details relating to himself would have done. It might have been wished that our author had consented to pursue the thread of his story quite as familiarly, quite as simply, as he did in the earlier pages. This curiosity the subject of our memoir must forgive us, since he has awakened the interest himself, and is bound to a certain extent to satisfy it. However, we have much to occupy us in Leigh Hunt's volumes. From the pen of a friend or relative, the life of this remarkable man, known as the originator of a whole system of poesy, if we may so speak, would have been far less interesting, since the delicacy of affection or friendship often induces biographers to gloss over trifling circumstances, which are in reality far from detracting from the interest or merit of the man. Here, however, we have an open revelation of a hundred misdeeds, with which no one else would have become acquainted. The writer tells the whole truth concerning himself and his career, and leaves the world to judge of his failings and his virtues.

Leigh Hunt lingers upon the scenes and incidents of his childhood, and we ourselves feel much inclined to follow his example, for we must plead guilty to the fact of having derived more intense pleasure from the perusal of his early life, than from that of any fictitious narrative; not perhaps because there is anything very extraordinary in the details; not because the events are very remarkable, but because little incidents are told with so much winning simplicity; we enter so completely into his domesticity, and feel so completely with him, that we cannot but be tempted to leave our readers to borrow more copious details of the later portion of his life from the volumes themselves.

It would not, we feel assured, add much to our readers' respect and admiration of Leigh Hunt, to be told that his family was of noble origin, that his blood was pure, his descent unexceptionable; he has, he may rest assured, earned for himself a more honourable name, than if his ancestors had been descended direct from a long line of disreputable kings. Suffice it that they were honest and respectable, and owed no man ought; performed their duty to mankind, and, to satisfy any conscientious scruples, belonged to the middle class of society. The family had formerly been settled in Barbadoes, which accounts for the very remarkable cast and complexion of our author's countenance. His father was born, and resided there for some considerable period, but being of a more restless disposition than the former members of his family, soon contrived to render his departure from his native place a matter of necessity. He had been too much indulged in early youth by his father, and therefore acquired habits which subsequently, in more mature life, led to his ruin. Many chances of fortune, or at all events of comfort, opened upon him, but were all in their turns disregarded. Every day some new scheme presented itself to his fertile imagination, and was as speedily abandoned. His talents were of a very high order, and would have fitted him for almost any position; but that want of perseverance, so often the accompaniment of talent, perverted all his capabilities, and unfitted him gradually for every post. The example he showed his son was anything but calculated, had he been weak enough to follow in his footsteps, to distinguish him in his after career. During the revolution in America, circumstances imperilled his residence in Barbadoes, and he accordingly abruptly quitted it for England, leaving his wife behind, to follow him as soon as she could make the necessary arrangements. She was, however, a very superior woman. Her feeling mind, her delicacy, her charity, her keen perception of right and wrong, her gentleness, were the things that endeared her to every one. She did not pass through the world without suffering. The best often suffer most acutely. The conduct of her husband—his wavering, and many other failings, long before their time wore wrinkles in her brow, and stamped a sorrow upon her countenance, which nothing could efface. She never reproached him, however, but would listen to his promises of amendment with the same earnestness, and weep for joy at the prospect never fulfilled.

On reaching England with her children, she found him, much to her astonishment, filling the post of a clergyman, and discharging his duties with much eloquence. Unfortunately, however, though apparently every prospect of success opened before him, his love of conviviality and jovial society soon again spoilt all; and embarrassed affairs, uncomfortable knockings at the door, demands for payment, and various other evils attendant on poverty, known only to such as have experienced them, afflicted him, and kept him in a nervous state of discomfort. The earliest recollections of Leigh Hunt are of a prison. Pity that memories so gloomy should have dimmed his young heart. Yet they are mingled with so many others, that it could not be supposed they made much impression.

We will, however, turn wholly from this painful picture, to Leigh Hunt's own story. As he was the most distinguished of the Hunt family, it is not uninteresting to know that he was born nine years after his brothers and sisters, and was consequently perhaps regarded with somewhat more affection, as is commonly the case with the youngest child, particularly when coming after the parents may reasonably expect to be favoured with another. He was born at the beautiful little village of Southgate, where early he imbibed a love of nature. All around him seemed to breathe poetry into his soul at the outset, and though misfortunes in the family were many, his lively mind felt little of them. The freedom of the country inspired him—green fields, woods, hedges, copses, rivulets, flowers, bushes, grass, the clear air, the blue sky; and he revelled there carelessly and happily. His health was always delicate. Around his childhood there were two influences at work, which assisted materially in giving the proper tone to his mind. His father was by nature of a mild, lively temperament, and infused into him something of his joviality, while the sweet pensiveness of his mother also acting upon him, counteracted what otherwise, carried to excess, might have been a pernicious influence. A spirit of more than ordinary watchfulness was around him. The other children had all been healthy and robust, while the new comer, the little Leigh, gave indications of extreme delicacy, which engrossed his mother's most earnest attention. Some indications, too, of the expansion of the intellect were observable, and it was whispered to the proud mother's ear, that if he survived the perils and sicknesses incident to childhood, he would distinguish himself in the world as a remarkable character. The alternative held out, however, was a dreadful one. Either, it was prognosticated, the spirit would form itself into something great and glorious, or it would sink into helplessness, and be a burden to itself. The anxiety of his mother knew no bounds. How she watched round her child; averted from it all sources of terror and uneasiness, ministered to its wants, and sought to lead the spirit through its deities and dangers. A strange tenderness was in her watchfulness, recalled, as he observes, many a time since, with something of sadness, lest these marks of affection should have been unappreciated, or not sufficiently acknowledged. Illness after illness came; suffering refined his feelings, and rendered him patient. Nothing, perhaps, exerts a more beneficial effect upon the mind than a protracted illness. Moments are then permitted us for reflection, which occur at no other times. The quiet, the hush around us awaken something infinitely purifying within. At length it was found necessary to remove him to the coast of France, where he was located in the house of a good-natured Frenchwoman, who regarded the child with the warmest feelings of affection.

The illness passed. Leigh Hunt was brought back to England, where he was exposed to simple but far more injurious influences. The very danger his mother so ardently desired to avoid might have been incurred through the thoughtless, to say no more, behaviour of an elder brother, remarkable for the exercise of that spirit of tyranny which sometimes, perhaps not unfrequently, distinguishes them. As an instance of this, we will mention the fact, that when going to school he astounded his companions by appearing in the most unfavourable weather with perfectly clean boots and spotless trousers. The bad condition of the lanes through which he was compelled to pass rendered this phenomenon most extraordinary. At length it was discovered that the young Nero actually forced one of his younger brothers to carry him to school upon his shoulders!! Over all he sought to exert his tyranny, but after they had become emancipated by age from his clutches, he turned to try his experiments upon Leigh, whom he found not quite so patient under his treatment. Illness and suffering, and the constant gentleness of his mother, ill prepared him to receive such conduct, and being unchecked by the consequences, and free from the consciousness of the horror his mother would have entertained of any fighting going on in the family, used to resist it by every means, and made furious struggles whenever one of his brothers took him bodily in hand, kicking his shins, when another used to hold him at arm's length, aggravating him by taunting speeches, and laughing like a goblin. If he could not succeed in his endeavours at tormenting him thus, however, he had him completely in his power by trying the influence of hobgoblins on his mind. He perceived how sensitive young Leigh was upon this point, and took continual advantage of it, rendering his hours of darkness and watchfulness perfect periods of misery. He had learned from experience the child's horror of the dark and of horrid faces, and worked upon his imagination by imitating the "mantichora," a fabulous animal, of which having seen a frontispiece in some book, he had an unspeakable horror. The modes of frightening him to which he resorted continually were such as to exert the most injurious effect upon Leigh Hunt's mind, had it not been providentially checked by the judicious training of his mother, who was just the woman to have brought up such a child.

A love of music seems always to have distinguished Leigh Hunt. He recalls with heartfelt pleasure the evenings of his youth, when his mother, surrounded by her little clique, would encourage them to warble sweet old-fashioned songs—the more sweet for being old—and inspire each singer afresh by her approbation.

"The universe itself was nothing but a poor sitting-room in the year '89 or '90, with my mother in it bidding me sing, Miss C. at the pianoforte, harpsichord more likely, and my little sister, Mary, with her round cheeks and blue eyes, wishing me to begin. What a great singer is that little boy to those loving relations, and how Miss C. with all her good nature, must be smiling at the importance of little boys to their mothers! 'Alone by the Light of the Moon,' was the 'Show song,' but 'Dans votre lit' was the favourite with my sister, because, in her ignorance of the French language, she had associated the name of her brother with the sound of the last word."

That little sister Mary died not long after. He was so young that he tells us his only recollection of her is contained in her blue eyes and favourite song.

Now may Leigh Hunt's life be said to begin. The time approached when he was to quit home with all its innocent pleasures and tender luxuries, the solicitude of his parents, for a life at school. The training of his mind could no longer be entrusted to the gentle hands that had hitherto taken care of it; sterner hands must mould it. Here a man's life must date its commencement; for in school-life the boy has to encounter sharp rubs for the first time.

The chief fault that Leigh Hunt appears to have carried to school was a feeling heart; he shed tears over the punishment of a schoolfellow, and was too quiet to take offence at the slight and injustice of others. This, however, he quickly discovered was not the spirit for school. He must resent oppression from boys as well as masters, or consent to be crushed at once. His affectionate disposition and aversion to fighting kept him out of those disgraceful personal encounters between boy and boy, which remind us more than anything else of the encounter of wild beasts; and he soon came to be loved and respected as a romantic enthusiast, who would dare all for a friend without condescending to blows to gain his object. His boldness with the master soon won him great esteem.

"There was a monitor, or 'big boy' in office, who had a trick of entertaining himself by pelting lesser boys' heads with a hard ball. He used to throw it at this boy and that; make the throwee bring it back to him; and then send a rap with it on his cerebellum as he was going off.

"I had borne this spectacle one day for some time, when the family precepts rising within me, I said to myself, 'I must go up to the monitor and speak to him about this.' I issued forth accordingly, and, to the astonishment of all present, who had never witnessed such an act of insubordination, I said, 'You have no right to do this.' The monitor, more astounded than any one, exclaimed, 'What?' I repeated my remonstrance. He treated me with the greatest contempt, as if disdaining even to strike me; and finished, by ordering me to 'stand out.' Standing out meant going to a particular spot in the hall where we dined. I did so; but just as the steward, (the master in that place,) was entering it, the monitor called me to come away; and I neither heard any more of standing out, nor saw any more of the ball."

Into a description of Christ School we have not space to enter. Our readers must seek it as given by Leigh Hunt in his own interesting volumes. He affords a most accurate description of the school, its cloisters or wards, the nurses, the masters, the dress and the food. It was of the coarsest kind, and the quantity very insufficient. This relates to a past time, however, when the system pursued was very different from the present one. Enlightenment has, along with other things, taught the fact that education cannot be crammed down starving children's throats; and this knowledge has crept into schools as well as elsewhere. The breakfast was bread and water; the dinner a small slice of meat and bread, and occasionally milk-porridge, or rice-milk. There were no vegetables or puddings. Once a-month they had roast beef, and twice a-year a dinner of pork, which occasions were looked forward to with the utmost impatience and anxiety. For supper, there was bread again, and going to bed early they contented themselves with looking forward to their scanty breakfast in the morning. Of the various preachers he gives a most amusing and graphic account, and also of the way in which the time of Church-service was passed. The boys all ranged under the surveillance of their steward. Not daring to go to sleep under their drowsy and often unintelligible minister, some of the big boys used to induce those who sat behind them to play with their hair by way of entertaining them in some way, and keeping them from falling asleep. The various masters afforded constant sources of amusement. Some were kind, others rough, and all possessed of some peculiarity. With the thoughtlessness of boys, they took advantage of every idiosyncrasy.

"The under grammar master, in my time, was the Reverend Mr. Field. He was a good-looking man, very gentlemanly, and always dressed at the neatest. I believe he once wrote a play. He had the reputation of being admired by the ladies. A man of a more handsome incompetence for his situation perhaps did not exist. He came late of a morning, went away soon in the afternoon; and used to walk up and down, languidly bearing his cane, as if it was a lily, and hearing our eternal 'Dominuses,' and 'As in præsentis,' with an air of ineffable endurance. Often he did not hear at all. It was a joke with us, when any of our friends came to the door, and we asked his permission to go to them, to address him with some preposterous question wide of the mark, to which he used to assent. We would say, for instance, 'Are you not a great fool, sir?' or, 'Isn't your daughter a pretty girl?' to which he would reply, 'Yes, child.' When he condescended to hit us with the cane, he made a face as if he was taking physic."

Another Master was not so gentle or by any means so well liked. Boyer was a short stout man, inclined to peevishness, with a cruel face, and no less cruel nature. His capriciousness perfectly unfitted him for his vocation, and rendered him an object of perfect terror and dislike to the boys. His only virtue consisted in the conscientious discharge of his duties, no matter at what expense of fatigue to himself. He would, however, take violent likes and dislikes to particular boys—would servilely truckle to the sons of the rich, pat their heads, and gently speak to them. On the other hand, he would pinch some by the ear till the blood came. One sickly-looking boy he used to beat about the head and ears till he was perfectly lost in bewilderment. One poor fellow, rather backward, having come into the school at rather a later age than usual, was constantly in fear. He used to drawl out his words, perhaps, disagreeably enough, but the conduct of his master was far from encouraging. It was with the greatest dread that he advanced to repeat his lesson.

"Master.—'Now, young man, have a care; or I'll set you a swinging task.' (A common phrase of his.)

"Pupil.—(Making a sort of heavy bolt at his calamity, and never remembering his stop at the word missionary.)—'Missionary Can you see the wind?' (Master gives him a slap on the cheek.)

"Pupil.—(Raising his voice to a cry, and still forgetting his stop.)—'Indian No!'

"Master.—'God's-my-life, young man! have a care how you provoke me.'

"Pupil.—(Always forgetting the stop.)—'Missionary How then do you know that there is such a thing?' (Here a terrible thump.)

"Pupil.—(With a shout of agony.)—'Indian. Because I feel it.'"

One more act of his injustice we must put in:—

"One anecdote of his injustice will suffice for all. It is of ludicrous enormity; nor do I believe anything more flagrantly wilful was ever done by himself. I heard Mr. C—, the sufferer, now a most respectable person in a government office, relate it with a due relish, long after quitting the school. The master was in the habit of 'spitting' C—; that is to say, of taking every opportunity to be severe with him; nobody knew why. One day he comes into the school, and finds him placed in the middle of it with three other boys. He was not in one of his worst humours, and did not seem inclined to punish them till he saw his antagonist.

'Oh, oh! sir,' said he; 'what, you are among them, are you?' and gave him an exclusive thump on the face. He then turned to one of the Grecians, and said, 'I have not time to flog all these boys, make them draw lots, and I'll punish one. The lots were drawn, and C——'s was favourable. 'Oh, oh!' returned the master, when he saw them, 'you have escaped, have you, sir?' and, pulling out his watch, and turning again to the Grecian, observed, that he found he had time to punish the whole three; 'And, sir,' he added to C—— with another slap, 'I'll begin with you.' He then took the boy into the library and flogged him; and, on issuing forth again, had the face to say, with an air of indifference—'I have not time, after all, to punish these two other boys; let them take care how they provoke me another time.'

Our author declares he often wished he was a fairy, that he might secretly torment this obnoxious master.

Few dared to interfere with the master, for to play a joke upon him was almost death directly. Sometimes, however, it was ventured on. One afternoon a boy stole behind him while he was nodding asleep, and with a pen was preparing to attack him just at the opening between the wig and the coat. The boys by smiles, and nods, and becks, and whispers, encouraged his proceeding. On a sudden, however, the head falls back, and with a start and wide distension up, the eyes make a sudden dart at the unfortunate culprit, who underwent, of course, his due punishment. It seemed the height of sorrow to this man if any opportunity of escape occurred to his pupils. One day he entered the room unexpectedly, and discovered a boy busily engaged in devouring some cherries. He approached him with an inward chuckle of approbation, hoping he had discovered a cause of complaint, and preparing to punish the unfortunate culprit. "Where did you get those cherries from?" he abruptly asked. "Mrs. Boyer gave them to me," he coolly replied, and his master turned away vexed and irritated at the tremendous disappointment. His wife was as much beloved as he was detested, and her presence among the boys was always a source of joy.

So well were the sources of her patronage understood, that old Boyer often experienced the mortification of finding his offers of good-will rejected with contempt.

"Le Grice was in the habit of eating apples in school-time, for which he had been often rebuked. One day, having particularly pleased the master, the latter, who was eating apples himself, and would now and then, with great satisfaction and ostentation, present a boy with some halfpenny token of his mansuetude, called out to his favourite of the moment;—'Le Grice, here is an apple for you.' Le Grice, who felt his dignity hurt as a Grecian, but was more pleased at having this opportunity of mortifying his reprobator, replied, with an exultant tranquillity of assent, 'Sir, I never eat apples.' For this, among other things, the boys adored him."

Amidst all this, however, Leigh Hunt's education proceeded. His tastes developed themselves along with his energies. The best authors occupied his attention; but always the predominant inclination was for poetry, or whatever was light and beautiful. His mind, about which so many fears had been expressed, developed its powers, which shone out even more strongly than had been anticipated. A slight accident from a scald gave him an opportunity of making himself acquainted with the strange poesy of Butler. The anecdote will let us a little more into the discipline of the school.

"The scald that I speak of as confining me to bed was a bad one. I will give an account of it, because it furthers the elucidation of our school manner. I had then become monitor, or one of the chiefs of a ward; and I was sitting before the fire one evening after the boys had gone to bed, wrapped up in the perusal of the 'Wonderful Magazine' and having in my ear at the same time the bubbling of a great pot, or rather caldron of water, containing what was by courtesy called a bread pudding; being neither more nor less than a loaf or two of our bread, which with a little sugar smashed up with it, was to serve for my supper. And there were eyes, not yet asleep, which would look at it out of their beds, and regard it as a lordly dish. From this dream of bliss I was roused up on the sudden by a great cry, and a horrible agony in my legs. A 'boy,' as a fag was called, wishing to get something from the other side of the fire-place, and not choosing either to go round behind the table, or to disturb the illustrious legs of the monitor, had endeavoured to get between or under them, and so pulled the great handle of the pot after him. It was a frightful sensation. The whole of my being seemed collected in one fiery torment into my legs. Wood, the Grecian, (afterwards Fellow of Pembroke at Cambridge,) who was in our ward, and who was always very kind to me, (led, I believe, by my inclination for verses, in which he had a great name,) came out of his study, and after helping me off with my stockings, which was a horrid operation, the stockings being very coarse, took me in his arms to the sick-ward. I shall never forget the enchanting relief occasioned by the cold air, as it blew across the square of the sick-ward. I lay there for several weeks, not allowed to move for some time; and caustics became necessary before I got well. The getting well was delicious. I had no tasks—no master; plenty of books to read; and the nurse's daughter (absent calumnia) brought me tea and buttered toast, and encouraged me to play the flute. My playing consisted of a few tunes by rote: my fellow invalids (none of them in very desperate cases) would have it rather than no playing at all; so we used to play and tell stories, and go to sleep, thinking of the blessed sick-holiday we should have to-morrow, and of the bowl of milk and bread for breakfast, which was alone worth being sick for."

Leigh Hunt at length quitted school altogether, and returned to the bosom of his family. This portion of his career is diversified by few incidents. He spent the greater portion of his time in visiting his school-fellows, hunting the bookstalls, and writing verses, which his father collected and published. The next thing he did was to set out with a few companions on a pedestrian tour through various places, which afforded him infinite pleasure and delight. At this period of life he began for the first time to devote himself with pleasure to the study of the classics, and began to make his appearance as a public character, under the signature of "Mr. Town, Junior," in a series of essays published in the Traveller. The delight at finding himself in print was, like that of all young authors, very exuberant. He pored and pored over his own contributions, wondering how they were received, wondering what eyes beheld, what voices read them, and all his labours seemed amply repaid by receiving six copies of the paper to which he contributed every Saturday evening. Leigh Hunt's brother next set on foot a paper entitled the News, to which he contributed the theatricals, which naturally brought him familiarly acquainted with the theatre. The plan upon which Leigh Hunt and his brother proceeded, was novel. They announced impartial criticism, and with the fervour of young men rejected all obstacles as unreal. No one believed in the announcement at first, but a little perseverance succeeded in establishing their credit, and they appeared before the town as critics to be dreaded.

A more important undertaking, however, was on foot, the establishment of the Examiner, which has continued to flourish up to the present day. Some mistakes, of course, as were to be expected, occurred at the commencement of the affair; but inexperience soon changed into experience. Sincerity, however, was a fault never to be forgiven; and as the politics of the paper were adverse to the predominant party, it was not long before Leigh Hunt, by writing an article which was called an attack upon the Regent, got into prison for libel! The two brothers had written together, and shared the trouble of the paper; but it was Leigh who had written the obnoxious paper. Both were, however, condemned to imprisonment in separate gaols. The same day witnessed their removal. A pressure of the hand spoke their emotion and their willingness to share the same fate. They parted, and hackney coaches conveyed them to their destination. The first glimpse of the prison-gate and the high walls smote dreadfully on Leigh Hunt's imagination. He longed already for freedom and the society of his wife and children. At length he was ushered into the presence of the gaoler (a great man), after waiting in the prison yard for a considerable period. He seemed about fifty years of age, with a white night-cap perched upon his head, as if he were going to be hung, a great red face, about to burst with blood. The first words he uttered were, "Master, I'd ha' given a matter of a hundred pounds if you had not come to this place—a hundred pounds!" He was a strange character, passionate, and sometimes insolent. He expatiated on the miseries of the prison on purpose to induce Leigh Hunt to hire an apartment in his house, which he at first pronounced perfectly impossible to obtain, in order that he might enhance the price. He named, however, a sum so exorbitant, that he overreached himself. His object was to keep him among the prisoners until he was sickened and disgusted with the accommodation. Finding that no offer was made which pleased him, he began to speak well of the prison.

"From abusing the prison, he then suddenly fell to speaking well of it, or rather of the room occupied by the colonel; and said, that another corresponding with it would make me a capital apartment. 'To be sure,' said he, 'there is nothing but bare walls, and I have no bed to put in it.' I replied, that of course I should not be hindered from having my own bed from home. He said, 'No; and if it rains,' observed he, 'you have only to put up with want of light for a time.' 'What!'

exclaimed I, 'are there no windows?' 'Windows, mister!' cried he; 'no windows in a prison of this sort; no glass, mister; but excellent shutters.'"

It was at last arranged, that for a night or two, Leigh Hunt should occupy a garret in the house of the gaoler, while the room in the prison could be got ready, and the windows glazed. On his first entrance into the prison, he had been received by the under gaoler, a man of forbidding exterior, but whose heart he discovered to be made of stuff as hearty as ever beat in a human breast. The delicacy with which he treated the new prisoner was surprising, and he and his wife realised more of the romantic gaoler than any he had ever heard of or met with. She was a delicate slight creature, with apparently the nerves of a fine lady, but she went through her office with quiet firmness, and looked up the prisoners day after day. On the first night of Leigh Hunt's arrival in the prison, she stole up so gently that he never knew until the morning that it had been done at all. This showed her innate delicacy more than a hundred more open actions would have done. Soon he passed into his new abode, and felt oppressed by feelings of the most melancholy nature. Every night he lay awake listening to the locking up of the cells, till his heart died within him. There he was alone, away from his family, cooped up within the confined limits of a prison; he who had been accustomed to a freedom the most unlimited. Every turn of the lock seemed like a fresh insult to him. But he says his dreams were always pleasant, and the monotony of his existence wore away; he became accustomed to his solitude. At length, however, he succeeded in procuring the companionship of his wife and children, when his prison-life assumed a pleasanter aspect; numerous friends, also, came to see him.

Regret and impatience to be free, of course, assailed him at times.

"During the first six weeks, the sound of the felons' chains, mixed with what I took for horrid execrations or despairing laughter, was never out of my ears. When I went into the infirmary, which stood between the gaol and prison walls, gallowses were occasionally put in order by the side of my windows, and afterwards set up over the prison gates, where they remained visible. The keeper one day, with an air of mystery, took me into the upper ward, for the purpose, he said, of gratifying me with a view of the country from the roof. Something prevented his showing me this, but the spectacle he did show me I shall never forget. It was a stout country girl, sitting in an absorbed manner, her eyes fixed on the fire. She was handsome, and had a little hectic spot in either cheek, the effect of some gnawing emotion. He told me, in a whisper, that she was there for the murder of her bastard child. I could have knocked the fellow down for his unfeelingness in making a show of her; but, after all, she did not see us. She heeded us not. There was no object before her, but what produced the spot in her cheek. The gallows on which she was executed, must have been brought out within her hearing;—but perhaps she heard that as little.

"To relieve the reader's feelings, I will here give him another instance of the delicacy of my friend the under-gaoler. He used always to carry up her food to this poor girl himself; because, as he said, he did not think it a fit task for younger men."

At length his imprisonment was ended, but instead of darting from his cage like a bird, as it was anticipated he would, he emerged from it slowly, and with a constitution early impaired by confinement, and a lowness of spirits he could not easily shake off. When he met his brother, he rushed into his arms, and tears of manhood bedewed his cheeks. His intimacy with Lord Byron now began, and he mixed more in the world. Shelley, Keats, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Lamb, were also among his friends, and of them he gives us amusing sketches and experiences. He mixed with them, got acquainted familiarly with their character and feelings.

Fortune, which had hitherto smiled upon Leigh Hunt, now began to threaten some frowns. The Examiner, hitherto so flourishing, was upon the decline; politics adverse to his were triumphing over Europe, and less stress was laid upon its opinion. England, therefore, seemed to open few chances to the poet. He had long been in a very declining state of health; his wife, also, was ill, and, surrounded by a numerous family, he hardly knew where to step. He was advised to proceed, therefore, to Italy, and in conjunction with Shelley to set up a periodical there. The plan seemed feasible; packing up, therefore, their goods and chattels with their books, they all embarked with strange thoughts and new feelings upon the sea.

Shelley had advised them to come by sea, and they accordingly journeyed that way, although it would have been infinitely cheaper to have gone overland. They were compelled to put in at Ramsgate, for stress of weather, and remained there nearly three weeks, and at length, once more embarked on board, with a promise of fine weather, which, however, proved deceptive. The next day the wind changed again, and a severe storm ensued. The passengers presented few novelties, it was what such journeys usually are; they got trebly acquainted with every body on board, amused them with the usual gossip about each other, and at length arrived in Italy, where he immediately sought out his old friend, Lord Byron, or Amory, at whose house a singular scene presented itself. Lord Byron was then living with Madame Guiccioli, a handsome young Italian.

"Upon seeing Lord Byron, I hardly knew him, he was grown so fat; and he was longer in recognising me, I had grown so thin. He took me into an inner room, and introduced me to Madame Guiccioli, then very young as well as handsome, who was in a state of great agitation. Her face was flushed, her eyes lit up, and her hair (which she wore in that fashion) streaming as if in disorder. The Conte Petro, her brother, came in presently, also in a state of agitation, and having his arm in a sling. I then learned that a quarrel having taken place among the servants, the young Count had interfered, and been stabbed. He was very angry; Madame Guiccioli was more so, and would not admit the charitable comments of Lord Byron, who was making light of the matter. They seemed to think the honour of their nation at stake. Indeed there was a look in the business, not a little formidable: for though the stab was not much, the infliction of it threatened more, and was at that minute keeping watch outside, with the avowed intention of assaulting the first person that issued forth. I looked out of the window, and met his eyes glaring upwards like a tiger. He had a red cap on, like a sansculotte, and a most sinister aspect, dour and meagre, that of a proper catiff.

"It was a curious moment for a stranger from England. I found myself pitched into one of the scenes in the Mysteries of Udolpho. Everything was new, foreign, and vehement. There was the lady flushed and dishevelled, exclaiming against the 'scelerati,' the young Count wounded and threatening, and the assassin waiting for us with his knife; nobody, however, could have put a better face on the matter than Lord Byron did, composed and endeavouring to compose; and as to myself, I was so occupied with the whole scene, that I had not time to be frightened. We rushed out at the house door, all squeezing to have the honour of being first, when a termination is put to the tragedy by the man's throwing himself on a bench, extending his arms, and bursting into tears. His cap was half over his eyes, his face gaunt, ugly, unshaved; his appearance altogether more squalid and miserable than an Englishman would conceive it possible to find in such an establishment. This blessed figure reclined, weeping and wailing, and asking pardon for his offence; and, to crown all, he requested Lord Byron to kiss him."

Leigh Hunt passed some years in Italy, and then once more returned to England, ever devoted to one pursuit—literature—and ever cherishing a warm love of poetry. He lived some time in Chelsea, and then definitively removed to Kensington, where he still remains, until very lately engaged in his accustomed pursuit: still writing, still sustaining a cheerful part in every conversation, still assembling round him his friends, and imparting pleasure by his elegant power of conversation and the stores of his knowledge. Long may he still form the centre of the same group, surrounded still by children, although, as our readers are probably aware lately, that babe born in prison some thirty years ago has been withdrawn from his gaze, and passed before him through the valley of the shadow of death. Leigh Hunt has constituted the life and charm of a wide circle of society, and whenever, he may pass away—be it years and years hence!—he will still be remembered and talked of.

"My old Pupils." By the author of "My school-boy Days," &c. A pleasant and most instructive collection of a schoolmaster's reminiscences, intended for juvenile reading, and being in matter and style well calculated to fix the schoolboy's attention. The author briefly delineates the characters of some of his "old pupils," and, referring to their subsequent careers, points out the permanent influence of early habits, tastes, and associations. A large experience in the most difficult and important of human callings appears to be embodied in these sketches, and much judicious counsel is conveyed in an attractive form. In the preface the author expresses his conviction, that "this third attempt to interest and improve the young . . . is more worthy of youthful patronage than either of its predecessors." Notwithstanding the extensive popularity of the works referred to, we are not surprised at this instance of a writer's partiality for his latest production, and can confidently recommend "My old Pupils" as an excellent present to put into a schoolboy's hands.

"Life and Death in Ireland, as witnessed in 1849."

By Spencer T. Hall. 12mo. Manchester: Parkes. London: Simpkin & Co. A quiet, unpretending, apparently truthful, and certainly most painful picture of the present state of Ireland, by one who, with an eye to appreciate her beauties, and a heart to bleed for her woes, had opportunities afforded him for estimating her actual position, which are denied to many of her visitors. We recommend its perusal to all desirous of forming an opinion on this "vexed question."

GLEANINGS.

ALEXANDER AND DIOGENES.

Diogenes.—[from his tub.] Who calleth?

Alexander.—Alexander: how happened it that you would not come out of your tub to my palace?

Diogenes.—Because it was as far from my tub to your palace, as from your palace to my tub.

Alexander.—Why then, dost thou owe no reverence to kings?

Diogenes.—No.

Alexander.—Why so?

Diogenes.—Because they be no gods.

Alexander.—Plato is not of thy mind.

Diogenes.—I am glad of it.

Alexander.—Why?

Diogenes.—Because I would have none of Diogenes' mind but Diogenes.

Alexander.—If Alexander have anything that may please Diogenes, let me know, and take it.

Diogenes.—Then take not from me that you cannot give me,—the light of the world.

Alexander.—What dost thou want?

Diogenes.—Nothing that you have.

Alexander.—I have the world at command.

Diogenes.—And I, in contempt.

Alexander.—How should one learn to be content?

Diogenes.—Unlearn to covet.

Alexander.—Hephastion, were I not Alexander, I would wish to be Diogenes. . . . Diogenes, when I come this way again, I will both see thee and confer with thee.

Diogenes.—Do.

BEGGARS AND BEGGING.

Half of these stories about the prodigious fortunes made by begging, are (I verily believe) misers' calumnies. One was much talked of in the public papers, some time since, and the usual charitable inferences deduced. A clerk in the Bank was surprised with the announcement of a 500*l.* legacy left him by a person whose name he was a stranger to. It seems that in his daily morning walks from Peckham (or some village thereabouts), where he lived, to his office, it had been his practice for the last twenty years to drop his halfpenny duly into the hat of some blind Bartimeus, that sate begging alms by the way-side, in the Borough. The good old beggar recognised his daily benefactor by the voice only; and, when he died, left all the amassing of his alms (that had been half a century perhaps in the accumulating,) to his old bank friend. Was this a story to purse up people's hearts and pennies, against giving an alms to the blind?—or not rather a beautiful moral of well-directed charity on the one part, and noble gratitude upon the other?

I sometimes wish I had been that Bank clerk.

I seem to remember a poor old grateful creature, blinking and looking up with his no eyes in the sun. Is it possible I could have steeled my purse against him?

Perhaps I had no small change.

Reader, do not be frightened at the hard words, imposition, imposture—give, and ask no questions.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters." Some have unawares (like this Bank clerk) entertained angels.

Shut not thy purse-strings always against painted distress. Act a charity sometimes. When a poor creature (outwardly and visibly such) comes before thee, do not stay to inquire whether the "seven small children," in whose name he implores thy assistance, have a veritable existence. Rake not into the bowels of unwelcome truth, to save a halfpenny. It is good to believe him. If he be not all that he pretendeth, give, and under a personate father of a family, think (if thou pleasest) that thou hast relieved an indigent bachelor. When they come with their counterfeit looks and mumping tones, think them players. You pay your money to see a comedian feign these things, which, concerning these poor people, thou canst not certainly tell whether they are feigned or not.

CARDS.

Behold four kings in majesty revered,
With hoary whiskers and a forked beard;
And four fair queens whose hands sustain a flower,
The expressive emblem of their softer power;
Four knaves in garb succinct, a trusty band,
Caps on their heads, and halberds in their hand;
And party-colour'd troops, a shining train,
Drawn forth to combat on the velvet plain.

ELOQUENCE OF THE SAVAGE.

Plutarch, in his lives of great men, does not produce anything more beautiful and heroic, than the answer which one of the Canadian chiefs returned to a native of Europe, who had proposed to him the relinquishment of his patrimony, on certain terms and conditions:—"We were born on this land—our fathers were buried here—shall we say to the bones of our fathers, Arise, and come with us into a strange land?"—L'Abbé Busin.

SOCIETY IN THE BUSH.

FRESH ARRIVALS—NEIGHBOURLY DISCUSSIONS—THE DOCTOR'S STORY.

BY MRS. TRAILL,

Author of "The Backwoods of Canada."

"THE spirit of sociability seems sadly on the decline among us since our little village has extended into a full-grown town," was the remark of a cheerful, bustling little matron, in a dark brown merino dress and neatly quilted little cap, as she took her seat on the vacant place on the sofa beside a benevolent lady-like person habited in the close sombre dress of widowhood, who was with her knitting needles showing some new pattern to a friend.

"Our present social little party does not quite bear you out in the assertion, my dear madam," observed a fine looking white-haired man, whose dress and general appearance declared him to belong to the medical profession. "Here, at least, is an instance of kindly feeling, in inviting a prosy old man like me, to listen to your pleasant conversation and catch good humour from your cheerful looks."

"Our friend the doctor is always thankful for small mercies," archly whispered a lively brown-eyed girl, peeping merrily at him from beneath a redundancy of rich dark ringlets.

The doctor shook his cane with playful menace.

"I must ask you," my dear lady, he said, addressing the former speaker, "what makes you reproach us in this good charitable town for want of sociability?"

"I have noticed, my dear sir, now for some time past, that when strangers come among us they are shown none of those hospitable attentions that used to welcome the newly arrived emigrants. Instead of the oldest inhabitants of the neighbourhood coming forward to receive and invite them to their houses, as used to be the invariable rule, we all draw back, eye them with distrust, and, in fact, treat them as if they were an importation of ogres and ogresses, or, what is worse, of impostors."

"I am afraid there is some truth in what you say," observed the widow lady, looking up thoughtfully from her knitting, "I have myself noticed the jealous feeling that has crept in among us. I remember the time, when there were but few of us in the place, with what delight we hailed the news of the arrival of respectable settlers; each family seemed to scramble for the chance of being the first to show them attention, and afford them every species of useful information that we imagined might benefit them, and save them trouble and expense."

"I can speak to the truth of that from my own experience," said the mistress of the house, with a bright and grateful smile; "I know I was your guest for weeks, while our own house was building. I shall never forget the pleasant time I spent with you."

"Nor I, my dear friend; it was a very pleasant time to me and my family, I assure you."

VOL. XII.

"You heard of the smart people who arrived at the hotel last week?" said the doctor. "Of course, ladies, you will redeem the character of friendliness to strangers, and call upon them."

"I cannot afford to enlarge the circle of my acquaintance," said one.

"These new-comers give themselves so many airs," said another.

"Yes, indeed, and find fault with everything that differs from their old country prejudices," observed a third.

"They affect to despise us poor Canadians," said a native-born young lady, putting up her lip; "for my part, I pity them for their ignorance and uselessness. I was quite amused with the awkwardness of a young lady who was staying with mamma; she really did not know how to handle a broom. She tried to sweep the carpet after dinner, but I was obliged to take it out of her hand."

"Well, my dear, in all probability, it was the first time she had ever attempted such work," said the doctor; "servants are more plentiful at home, and labour cheaper. Young ladies never have occasion to sweep their own floors in the old country. But do not condemn her as useless or ignorant; I have seen many a white hand make as clean a hearth or carpet as you young Canadians."

"You always praise the British ladies, I observe, doctor."

"Yes, my dear, I love Britain, her institutions, her people, and all that belongs to her; and I like to encourage a British feeling among my young friends. I would not have you forget that your father and mother are Britons; and all that is high, and noble, and honourable, and useful, in your education has been inculcated by them. I rejoice in your love for your native soil; but while you are proud of being a Canadian, do not forget that you are a British Canadian."

The fine eye of the old man kindled with more than usual fire as he uttered these words; meantime the discussion of the important question of "to call or not to call," was going on at the other end of the room.

"For my part, I am too old to form new friendships," said the master of the house, buttoning his coat tighter about him, as if to suit the action with the words; "there are no friends like old friends."

"True," said the widow, gently; "but old friends will drop off one by one in the course of nature, and if we do not supply their places, a dreary time will come when we shall find ourselves alone in the world."

"When true hearts are wither'd, and fond ones are flown, Oh, who would inhabit this bleak world alone!"

The old doctor nodded an affirmative. He was a philanthropist, an old man with a young heart; he went about doing good and receiving good; he loved good people wherever and whenever he met with them; he loved the children for the sake of the parents; his tastes were refined; he had a sound head and a kind heart—no wonder that he was a welcome guest wheresoever he went.

"I am going," he said, "to set you all a good example, and leave my card for the new-comers."

"And be a sort of pioneer to the rest of us," said the widow. "I think I shall wait your report, doctor."

"Mamma, I'll go instead of you," said the pretty brunette, laughing, "and then I shall get the first peep at the English fashions."

"For my part I dislike being bored about the English fashions," said the fair Canadian; "those ladies that come from the old country talk of nothing but their fashionable dresses for years after they come to Canada, forgetting that fashions change in time; and then they despise every thing that we wear, and complain that our stores produce nothing fit for them, forsooth."

"I make many allowances for strangers when they first come out to the colony, things are so different, so inferior in quality; there is such a want of accommodation—everything is on such a make-shift plan, especially in these half-formed provincial towns; of course, it is still worse in the bush. The most contented temper in the world can hardly refrain from grumbling," said the widow. "What do you think, my dear?" added she, addressing the lady who had hitherto been too much absorbed in the mysteries of the knitting-stitch to enter much into the subject in discussion."

"Indeed, I am of your opinion. I remember, when first I came to this country, I was dreadfully discontented—nothing pleased me. I was perversely determined to find fault with everything and everybody; I did nothing but cry and fret; I tormented every one about me with my ill humour and constant repining, and worried my husband to take me home 'to the old country,' though I well knew we could not live there as we wished to do. 'Wait awhile, and see what time will do for you,' my husband would reply, 'you know nothing of the trials of a bush-settler's wife yet.' Now I fancied I had experienced a 'great deal of real hardship; my log-house was small—I had no second parlour—I could procure no change of diet, only the everlasting pork and potatoes, and I hated pork with a Jewish hatred. I had so offended my bush-maid—the daughter of a decent settler in an adjacent township—that she had left me in the middle of a large wash, to fold and iron my linen by myself. My barm had turned sour, and I had spoiled the last modicum of flour by an attempt to convert it into bread; it was as sour as vinegar, and as heavy as lead. I had made an attempt at manufacturing soft soap, but that also was a woful failure—the ley and the grease would not combine. One person told me it wanted more ley to take up the grease; another, that it had not grease enough to thicken the ley; and a third, that it wanted more water. I tried all these remedies, but nothing would do; then I was told that the ashes were bad, and would not make soap at all; so I abandoned the task as a hopeless one. I then tried candle making, but somehow my candles generally chose to stick in the mould just when I wanted to draw them, which, like a thriftless housewife, generally happened at the eleventh hour, either when I had burned out my last, or when a party of visitors unexpectedly arrived to pass the evening. Now, though these mishaps had originated in my want of skill, or want of management, I laid them all upon the abominable country, and considered I had full right and title to complain; and complain I did from morning till night—Mrs. Candle was a lamb to me. One fine afternoon, by way of diverting my ill-humour, my husband and my sister-in-law, who had preceded us in the settlement three years, and was well acquainted with all our neighbours, proposed taking me to pass the afternoon with a young married lady in our neighbourhood, who had lately been confined. The clearing was about two miles from our house; the way lay for some distance through a dark dense pine-wood and thick cedar and hemlock swamp, replete with fallen trees and mud-holes; the path was merely a blazed one." The fineness of the weather—it was the middle of April, and rather uncommon at that season, the snow was all gone even in the forest—tempted me to consent to accompany them. My sister-in-law assured me I need not be at all particular about my dress; but, being a little desirous of displaying my old-country finery and my own gentility, I dressed myself in silk and lace, thin shoes, and the finest thread stockings, turning a deaf ear to my sister-in-law's remonstrances. Of course, I soiled my silk pelisse and dress, and tore my fine lace veil and pelerine in scrambling along wet logs and through brush-wood, and finally lost one of my shoes in a mud-hole, which my husband had some difficulty in fishing up with the ivory crook of my parasol. As to my stockings, they were in an awful condition long before I dropped my shoe. The worst of the matter was, that I received neither consolation nor pity from my companions, who were more disposed to laugh at my misfortunes than to sympathise with them. I would have cried, but was too angry; so I marched on in sullen silence, which I thought dignity. We found the husband of the lady we were going to see in the sugar bush, with a ragged little Patlander, boiling down maple sap into molasses. He politely offered us fresh-drawn sap to drink, which I declared was sickly, mawkish stuff; my companions said it was pleasant and refreshing.

"Leaving the care of the sugar-kettle to little Pat, the gentleman escorted us to the house by a circuitous path, winding among stumps and log-heaps, to escape certain pools of melted snow and treacherous swampy spots. I was weary and out of humour, but obliged to conceal my chagrin as well as I could on entering the small log-room, lighted by one window of scanty dimensions. There was a strange mixture of rudeness and elegance in the furniture and general aspect of the apartment, which you all know is not unusually the case in the houses of newly-come-out emigrants, where articles of handsome furniture, often of ornamental rather than useful character, are singularly blended with rough, home-made materials, clumsily manufactured, to supply the places of indispensable conveniences. Against the rough, unhewn logs were suspended fine engravings; an elegant sofa beside a rude deal table, which was concealed by a handsome cover; richly bound books, fit for a drawing-room table, were arranged on unpainted pine-wood shelves; a recess bed, draped with tasteful hangings, was partially hidden by a curtain of green baize, above which the mossy rafters were seen, and smoke-dyed shingles of the unceiled roof. I have seen piano and harp in a shanty since that day, and felt no surprise, but these things were new to me in those days.

"Our hostess was busily engaged boiling sugar, when we entered, in a huge three-legged pot, stirring the bubbling syrup and rocking a wooden cradle from time to time, that stood on a chest near her, in which lay a fine sleeping baby of six weeks old; on the shelf stood a sugar-trough and large tin dish, heaped with the crystallized sugar which had been boiled down the day before. It was bright, rough, and sparkling, like masses of fine sugar-candy; not in thick dark cakes, as I had before seen it. Our new friend welcomed us courteously and made haste to get tea ready, which consisted of real brown bread, molasses as sweet as honey and clear as wine, and tea and new milk; butter there was none. I really am ashamed at this day to remember how very disagreeably I behaved. I made remarks on the smallness and inconvenience of the house, though my own was not really very much better; I pitied our hostess, instead of envying or applauding her cheerful contented temper. I did nothing but complain of the country, the servants, the stumps, the log-houses, the mud-holes, the gloomy forest—in short, everything seemed a source of annoyance. I remember, too, my ill-disguised mortification, that the only apology for a looking-glass at which I could arrange my hair, after taking off my bonnet, was a narrow slip of glass from a dressing-case belonging to the master of the house, and which was scarcely wide enough to admit of a full reflection of my face. I would not allow that my feet were wet, refusing the proffered comfort of dry slippers; the consequence was that I got a severe cold. I determined not to be amused, and tried to convince my hostess that she must of necessity be very miserable under such disadvantageous circumstances as she was placed in, but she assured me that such was not the case.

"'This sort of life,' she replied, 'has its charms, if only for the wild novelty of it. I think I enjoy the spirit of contrivance that it calls forth as much as Robinson Crusoe must have done when he was building and planning, and endeavouring to supply his household with necessary conveniences, through the exercise of his own ingenuity; besides, we are always cheered by the prospect of circumstances improving, and that our present discomforts are only temporary.'

"Now, this was good philosophy; but as it did not harmonise with my froward humour, like Joseph's brethren, I only hated my new acquaintance the more for her dreams of future good, and for not choosing to be as miserable as I was myself, especially as she was not half so comfortably domiciled. Moreover, I chose to think that she pretended to be more contented with her lot than she really was, just for the sake of being thought more magnanimous than some of her acquaintance. I was very glad when our visit was over; and, suspecting that I had been taken to see a good example, I provokingly became more perverse than over.

"A few years of initiation into the privations and trials of a life in the backwoods did more for me, however, in the end than either precept or example. I now regard myself as a regular bush-settler's wife; most of my difficulties and all my discontent have vanished; I have learned to look with kindness and sympathy upon strangers on their first coming out to this country. I remember what I myself felt, and how I behaved during the first year of my noviciate. I can never forget that I was once a stranger in a strange land."

"I should not hesitate about calling on the newcomers," said one of our party, "but, since that affair of the Dillons, I really have grown cautious. We were all so deceived in that matter."

"Poor thing!" said the widow, compassionately; "she was so very young, and I believe she was a complete victim to an artful man. They say she had no idea that he was a married man—there have been many instances of this kind in the colony."

"I was very much annoyed at having invited them so often to my house; it looked as if I countenanced such irregularities," said the former speaker.

"There were many deceived beside yourself, my dear madam."

"Yes, to be sure; that was a consolation."

"She was a very lovely and fascinating young woman," said the doctor, "and, I believe, an innocent one. At all events, dear madam, you have no cause to reproach yourself for kindness and courtesy shown in all singleness of heart. I remember a circumstance of a similar nature that fell under my own immediate knowledge, in which I was deeply interested."

"I hope the doctor is going to tell us one of his entertaining stories," whispered one of the young ladies.

"It is too sad a one, my dear, to amuse you," replied the old gentleman; "it may not prove wholly uninteresting to you; but you must bear with my prolix way of telling it; I always like to begin at the beginning, and go regularly on to the end."

"I do not like your stories the worse for that, dear sir; because we are sure to learn something about what you have seen and heard, or thought of."

"I am a gleaner," replied the doctor, "and in my path through life I have gathered up things both new and old. Among the chaff, no doubt, may be found a few grains worthy of having been hoarded up;—but to my tale.

"I was rambling one day among the gravel hills in the neighbourhood of Fowler's Park, with my botanical case for the collection of plants and flowers that I might chance to discover in my walk; my way had been for some time among beautiful rounded knolls, adorned with groups of feathery pine and silver poplars, the light foliage of which contrasted charmingly with the dark branches of the evergreens around them; beneath my feet the ground was curiously carpeted with a delicate little downy saxifrage, the creeping stems and soft silky leaves of which, mixing with the dark glossy leaves of that pretty little evergreen so common on dry gravelly or sandy soils, known by the common names of winter-berry, and Christmas-berry, formed a beautiful variegated sort of natural embroidery; while the gentian, with its spike of deep blue blossoms, the lighter, more elegant, fringed-gentian, mingled with wavy branches of that graceful blue autumnal aster that you see in such perfection on plain lands; and here and there, though late in September, a few specimens still lingered of the gorgeous scarlet Euchroma painted cup, to charm my admiring eyes."

"The doctor will never get on with his story if he stops to fill his botanical case with floral specimens," softly whispered the pretty brunette to her neighbour.

"He is a walking herbal!" she replied, in the same tone; "but not a word, or we shall lose the tale and vex the kind old gentleman."

"Climbing one of the flowery knolls, I seated myself beneath the shade of a fine black oak, and quietly surveyed the pleasant scene before me. Following with my eye the course of the bright rippling stream, I watched its onward flow, between mossy banks and huge boulders of granite, till it was lost for awhile in a thicket of dark evergreens, silver birches, and black alders; then, again emerging, it appeared in a less attractive form, spreading over a flat of several acres, dammed up for the purpose of turning a saw-mill, which stood there, a blot, to my eye, on the fair landscape. It seemed to preside over the stagnant waters, with its littering encumbrances of lumber, piles of bark, and rubbish, as the head-quarters for the Spirit of desolation and fever; and I rejoiced in the apparent decay and silence about it, thinking it had not been profitable, and that a few years would restore to this lovely scene its own quiet tone of beauty, and sweep from the spot the ruined saw-mill, which, unlike other ruins, leaves no trace of former beauty, gives rise to no feeling of interest, conveys no connecting idea of former days, of grandeur or power in the possessor of the soil. But my speculations were suddenly interrupted by the careless whistle of a man in a countryman's grey coat, who turned into the mill, and in five minutes' time—clack, clack went the wheels, and clatter, clatter, clatter, went board after board as it was thrown upon the vast pile of sawn lumber below. The mill had only ceased working while the sawyer was taking his dinner; and, in my mind's eye, I beheld the axe of the lumberer remorselessly chopping down the noblest of the remaining pines and oaks that still adorned my favourite hills, to supply food for the teeth of that execrable saw. Presently I heard the cheerful tones of a female voice speaking to the sawyer, and a decently clad woman, with a pitcher in her hand and a small Indian basket on her arm, appeared from behind a projecting heap of timber, and bent her steps towards that side where the creek, no longer pent up by the mill-dam, dashed rapidly on between its deep water-worn banks, spreading greenness and fertility around. Just below the bank welled out a spring of pure cold water, and here the woman stooped to dip her pitcher, and to collect fresh cresses, which grew in abundance at that spot. Being very thirsty, I descended from my vantage height, and, approaching the spring, I begged a draught of water from the woman; who, presenting me the pitcher, apologised that she had no cup to offer me the drink in. The clear accents of my native county fell not unpleasingly on my ear, and a beam of gladness brightened her eyes as I thanked her, and claimed her for a countrywoman. Talk as they will of freemasonry and odd-fellowship, believe me there is no sign so irresistible as the accents of one's native county heard in a far country; it opens the narrowest heart and the closest hand to deeds of kindness and hospitality.

"If you would only honour me, sir," said my new friend, 'by walking on a few yards further to our cottage, you can rest till the heat of the day be over, and I will give you an early cup of tea, to which you shall be kindly welcome.'

"I love that phrase, it sounds so hearty. I was not in the humour to reject the hospitable invitation; I was pleased with the respectful yet frank manners of Sarah Love, for so I found she was called; and I gladly accompanied her along the winding path that led to a pretty log frame-house, which, with its garden, enclosed by a low pricket fence, had been concealed from my view by the groups of trees that screened it, and shut out the prospect of the unsightly saw-mill from its windows.

"The little dwelling had a more tasteful and ornamental look about it than most of the buildings in that vicinity. 'You have a nice house here,' I said.

"Yes, sir; it is a pretty and a comfortable place, though it is not kept as it used to be; but my good man is too much taken up with the mill to attend to these things; the mill and the farm occupy all his time. Be pleased, sir, to speak low, as we are near the house, lest the sound of our words should startle her.'

"Have you a sick daughter then," said I, thinking the her must apply to some child that was ill.

"No, no, sir; no child of mine—yet she is almost a child in years. It is my poor dear mistress of whom I spoke.' Then, suddenly pausing, she said, looking earnestly in my face, 'May I be so bold, sir, as to ask if you are a medical man?'

"I answered in the affirmative. She clasped her hands and said,

" 'The Lord himself be thanked! for it is his goodness that hath sent you hither. Possibly she may yet be saved.'

"I was naturally anxious to learn something of the condition of my patient before being introduced into her presence; it often throws more light upon a case than all the sufferers can tell you of their own symptoms: the real cause is frequently withheld, the effect only made known.

"From the short narrative of Sarah Love I learned the following particulars:—that her mistress, when only a lovely girl of seventeen, had eloped from school with a Captain French, (I shall call him,) to whom she was married; she, Sarah Love, being one of the witnesses to the marriage; that she was an orphan, and heiress to a considerable West Indian property, her paternal grandfather being trustee and guardian; but he was a stern old man, and considered he did his duty to his grandchild by taking care of her property and sending her to a fashionable school. He was engrossed in mercantile business in London, and seldom saw his granddaughter; he evinced little love for her, and she shrunk from him with childish dread. She was a loving young thing, and her beauty attracted the attention of many who dared not approach her; but Captain French found means to introduce himself and win her affections. He loved her passionately, but it was with a selfish love. He persuaded her to marry him privately, and to accompany him to Canada. She dreaded nothing so much as meeting her grandfather; for her fortune she cared little; she thought it would all be right at last, and it was in safe hands.

" 'I believe it was her beauty the captain cared for more than her money,' said my informer. 'Well, sir, he brought her out to this country—he had his reasons doubtless, but they were confined to his own breast. He surrounded her with comforts, for he possessed means to do so; he bought land, and entered into the speculations of the country; he built the cottage here, and bought the mill, in which she took a great interest. My husband held the farm on shares with him, and I did the work of the house. I was much attached to Mrs. French, and came out with her as her attendant; she made a companion of me, I may say.

" 'One day the captain went to the town for letters from the old country, and he did not return till the next day. He seemed a changed man in that little time; my poor mistress could not tell what had come over him. She was near her confinement; her husband told her that his affairs required his absence from home, and he must return to England—she could not accompany him on account of her health. He took a tender farewell of her; it seemed almost to distract him leaving her, but he did go, and, after some days, she got a letter from New York. It told her that he had deceived her; that, urged by his doting passion for her, he had married her, but that he was a husband and father at the time, though united to one he did not love. He blamed himself—made a thousand excuses—and said that the letter that had so distressed him had announced the arrival of his injured wife in New York, on her way to join him in his Canadian retreat; to spare her such a meeting he had torn himself from her, never to meet again on earth—for well he knew her high spirit would never admit of a reunion! There was a great deal more in the letter, all in love and kindness; but it was of no use, that letter I believe, sir, signed my poor mistress's death warrant. In woe and sorrow she gave birth to a lovely boy, the very image of its cruel father. She reproaches herself hourly for the birth of the innocent babe—despair seems to have frozen her heart. I had hoped that the sight of the child would have brought her back to herself; but she only wrings her hands when I bring him to her, and prays that she may soon die, and the infant too; but there is no sign of death in his bright eyes and rosy cheeks. When I say to her, 'Dear lady, it is a sin to wish for the death of your babe—the babe that God has given you to comfort your heart,' she says, 'Sarah, he is a boy—he will grow to be a man, and may wring some fond trusting heart as his father has done mine. May God pardon him for the deed!' Sometimes she weeps, sometimes she sings, and often, of late, she prays in secret for hours; but her health is fast failing. She says she does not wish to live, she would fain be at rest from all her troubles—her heart is broken.'

"I was much touched by the sad story I had heard, and not a little interested in the warm-hearted narrator, who appeared devotedly attached to her mistress. She was none of your fair-weather friends; one who would not hesitate to abandon one whom society would, of course, condemn—confounding misfortune with guilt, as is too often done in matters of this kind.

"Sarah observed, with much feeling, 'The saddest thing to me, sir, is to hear my poor lady wish for the death of her child. I was a mother once, and my boy died when a fine lad, since I came to Canada, and I know what a mother's feelings are. I believe, sir, it is all the same whether the flower be cut off in the bud or in the bloom; she is a mother, and, notwithstanding her wild words, she would feel the loss of her little one, I doubt not, as bitterly as I did mine.'

"We now approached the wicket that opened upon a rustic verandah. In a garden chair, supported by pillows, reclined a graceful female; a young infant lay cradled on her breast. 'It has awakened during my absence,' whispered my conductress. She bade me keep a little out of sight, while she prepared her mistress for my visit. I did so, but not so far but that I could see and hear what passed. The faithful creature knelt down beside the invalid, and, taking the white wasted hand in hers, said, 'Dearest lady, I have brought a medical man to see you, and implore you to give your poor servant the consolation of knowing that your precious life has not been thrown away without some effort to save it. You are too young to die yet,' and she burst into tears as she finished the pathetic appeal.

"I saw the convulsive heaving of the poor afflicted one's bosom; her fine hazel eyes were bent, with a troubled expression, upon the tearful face of her loving attendant; her quivering lips showed the struggle within. I could not hear the low tremulous words she uttered; but I guessed their import from the look of distress that came over the face of the faithful Sarah. But Sarah was a woman, a tender-hearted woman; she had been a mother, and she knew a mother's heart, and the language most likely to find its way to it, better than the rhetoric of schools. Hers was the language of nature, and nature ever prevails. She took the slumbering babe from its mother's breast—she knelt before her—she pleaded for its helplessness, its innocence, its orphan state.

"'It is your duty to love and cherish this little one, and to take care of the life which is so necessary for its preservation.' She joined the tiny waxen hands together, and held them up as if it were also beseeching its mother to listen to the prayers of its kind nurse.

The voice of nature was felt; the heart of the grief-stricken mother was stirred within her; the powerful feelings of maternity conquered the apathy of despair—she bowed her face over her unconscious babe, and wept. Sarah had conquered, and, with joyful haste, she admitted me within the wicket. I had seen all, heard all, understood all that had passed, and it needed a strong effort on my part to overcome my emotion, and to act the part of the mere man of physic. By tenderness and soothing sympathy I soon won the confidence of my dear patient; but it needed little skill to discover that the nervous system was dreadfully deranged, that grief had destroyed the very springs of life; in fact, that her days were numbered. Long fits of fainting were brought on by the slightest personal exertion—the hectic flush or deadly paleness by turns prevailed. As her chance of life grew fainter, her desire to live, for the sake of the infant, grew stronger and stronger. 'He is twining himself round my heart,' she would say; 'weaving chains of earthly love, to bind me to this wicked world. Alas! he is too dear—too dear!'

"The last time I saw her she gave me her grandfather's address, and besought me to write to him to tell her sad story for her,—to plead for her babe. She also besought me to discover her unfortunate husband, and to convey her forgiveness to him; and, lastly, she prayed me to watch over her boy, and be a friend and counsellor to him, and to have him baptized. I promised to do all she desired; I was to be one of the sponsors, the good Sarah and her husband were to join me in the sacred office. I left her with a missionary, a kind and excellent man, who laboured devoutly to smooth the rough and painful path through the valley of the shadow of death. Never was I more grieved at the death of any one that was not bound to me by kindred ties, than by that of this young and interesting creature; I sorrowed for her as for a daughter.

"We buried her near the creek, beneath the overhanging branches of a beautiful aspen; no stone marks the spot, only the green mound and the quivering aspen, on which I carved her initials, her age, and the date of her death. Many a time have I paused as I passed the lonely spot, in my way to and from the cottage, to look upon the grave, and listen to the murmur of the brook, and the tremulous sound of the shivering leaves of the tree; as they quivered in the breeze they seemed like the sighing of the poor heart-stricken deer, who had there found a home and a resting-place."

The old man was silent; his benevolent heart was moved with the remembrance of the unfortunate being, whose sorrows had so deeply awakened his sympathy.

"I fear there are only too many tales of this kind to be told in this very province," said the widow lady. "It strikes me that it is the frequency of these things that has laid the foundation for that spirit of scandal that has so long been noticed as forming a disagreeable feature in the conversation of our neighbours, the Americans, and is fast gaining among ourselves. But what became of your interesting little godson?"

"He grew a fine, engaging child under the fostering care of his excellent nurse, and I began to contemplate with pleasure the time when I should be able to take him under my own especial care; but a more brilliant fortune awaited him. The letters I wrote on his behalf to his grandfather had so worked upon the mind of the old man, that he caused his agent to signify his earnest wish that, as soon as the child was old enough to leave his nurse, I would complete the good work I had begun, and make the necessary arrangements for his voyage to England. I was loth to part with the child. Sarah, however, accompanied him home, and her husband has since sold his property and has joined her. I heard, not long since, of the death of Arthur's great-grandfather; he is now heir to a large fortune, and is living with his guardian, a clergyman, who means to educate him for the church. Of his father I never heard; probably his name was assumed, and my letters never reached him."

The ladies all thanked the doctor for his story; the fair Canadian declared it was almost as good as if it had been a chapter of a novel; the pretty brunette said it had made her quite sad, and wondered if the doctor's godson would ever come out to Canada and settle near his birth-place, and build a tomb over his mother's grave; but before the doctor had time to give any answer to this conjecture, the sound of sleigh-bells at the door announced that the old gentleman's cutler was waiting, and the sociable little evening party broke up, with the promise of a reunion at no very distant date.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN ENGLAND.

BY M. GUIZOT.

My object in examining the causes of the success of the representative system in England, is this—that it appears to me the only way of accounting for its failure in our country.

In the thirteenth century the parliament of Great Britain began to rise, and has ever since continued to increase in importance. Since the end of that century, though meeting with many vicissitudes, sometimes increasing, sometimes decreasing in power, yet it has never ceased to be an integral and necessary part of the English Government. In France, on the contrary, the States-General did not originate till the fourteenth century, and never, since then, even in the days of its greatest prosperity, (that is, during the fourteenth century,) has it ever been a necessary part of the constitutional establishment. We must therefore seek for the causes of these differences before the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

ON THE ANGLO-NORMAN GOVERNMENT.

To nations, as well as individuals, sufferings are often of use: it may be that England owes her liberties to the Norman Conquest. When between the fifth and seventh centuries, the Goths invaded Spain, the Franks Gaul, and the Lombards Italy, what could be the result but anarchy and slavery? Wandering tribes, with no habit of social life, no laws, no restraints, falling upon a frightened, degraded people—spiritless, downcast, who had almost ceased to be a people; of course, the result was that the conquered became slaves of the conquerors. But this was not the case in England, when William conquered it, and transferred his empire there. Then it was one nation, (barbarous it is true, but still a nation,) with habits of social life, laws and institutions, though rude and uncultivated, which subdued another nation, equally having laws and habits of its own, in many instances not dissimilar from those of their conquerors. Their primitive origin had been the same; therefore the Conquest, though it brought many evils in its train, did not produce the entire dissolution of the two people, as it had done on the continent, nor the permanent subjection of one race to the other. The forced approximation of the two races, produced many reasons for fraternising.

This circumstance, in my opinion, has not been fairly recognised by English historians. Naturally a people detests owing any thing to that, which for a long time was a source of unhappiness and mortification to it. But the oppression of the Normans has ceased for centuries; for many centuries both Saxons and Normans have alike disappeared, yet the remembrance of the twelfth century still exists, and can be traced at the present day in the opinions of the different parties. Tory writers pay little attention to the Anglo-Saxon institutions; whigs, on the contrary, attach the utmost importance to them, and refer to them the origin of all their liberties. They say that, on the Continent, the feudal system was unable to produce one free government; and they attribute to the Normans what of despotism and feudality exists in their government, whilst they regard the Saxons as the authors of their rights and guarantees. This is not a correct view. It is true Saxon institutions were the primitive cradle of English liberties, but there are good reasons for doubting if they alone, without the help of the Conquest, would have been able to found a free government in England. The Conquest brought forth a new character; political freedom was the result of the situation in which the two nations were placed towards each other. Looking at Anglo-Saxon institutions alone, and their results towards the middle of the eleventh century, we see nothing very different from those of other countries.

From the fifth to the eleventh century, there was in Great Britain, as in Gaul, a continued struggle between free, monarchical, and aristocratic institutions, and there is nothing to indicate the approaching triumph of free institutions; on the contrary, evident symptoms of their decline, as on the continent. Their local institutions differed little from those of the Franks. The country was divided into tythings, hundreds, and counties, in each of which meetings were held and presided over by the tything man, the chief of the hundred, and the earl (or chief of the county,) or by his deputy, or sheriff. At these courts justice was administered, and all the civil transactions of the division were carried on there. These meetings, at first frequent, became by degrees more rare, till at last they had nearly disappeared. At the general county courts, which were never oftener than twice a year, all the freehold proprietors of the county were bound to attend, or pay the penalty, (a fine,) but the frequency and urgency of the summons proves how much they were neglected. It is therefore clear, that though the principle of free government—public deliberation—still existed, its vigour was much impaired.

However, aristocratic institutions, or the right of man over man, was a system much less dangerous to English liberty than it was in France; but the germ of this evil still existed, and was developed, in England as in France, by gradual encroachments on individual liberty. There is no doubt that in England, before the Conquest, a great number of freemen lived under the protection of one great lord, whose jurisdiction over his domains was often almost sovereign, and superseded the regal tribunals. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, royalty suffered much, and from the same causes under which it sank in France, during the dynasty of the Carolingians. The great vassals of the crown, Earl Godwin, Siward duke of Northumberland, Leofric duke of Mercia, and several others, were dangerous rivals of the king, and were on the point of converting their several domains, counties, and dukedoms, into independent sovereignties. Harold, usurping the crown from Edgar Atheling, the rightful heir, resembles very nearly Hugh Capet. The sovereignty was evidently tending to dismemberment, the national unity to dissolution. The Witanageat, the or Champs de Mars, of the Anglo-Saxons, had originally consisted of the freemen and warriors, but, by degrees, the new element, territorial influence, crept in, which gradually changed its character, till it became merely the general assembly of thanes or landed proprietors. These were again divided into the large proprietors, who, from their strength and importance, or from being the companions and immediate vassals of the crown, were called royal thanes, and the lesser thanes. The former gradually became negligent about attending; confined themselves more and more to their own domains; trusting in their great strength, they refused to exercise it for the benefit of the public, and, in fact, exercised all the rights of petty sovereigns. Since the middle of the tenth century, the Witanagemot, after undergoing these successive changes, almost entirely disappeared. What is there in this different from the history of the Franks? Yet notwithstanding these points of similarity, there were some essential differences which led to different results. There was more unity in the population of Great Britain, than in that of Gaul. The ancient inhabitants, the Britons, though perhaps not completely destroyed, were so entirely subjected that they were utterly unimportant. In a compact small kingdom like that of Great Britain, it was more difficult to shake existing institutions; in fact, most of the central establishments, such as county courts, corporations, &c. though much decayed and weakened, still preserved some little life and vigour in the provinces, in the middle of the eleventh century. The feudal system, too, was not nearly as advanced or as matured as it was on the continent. Nevertheless, I do not believe that these circumstances, though they might, and most probably would, have retarded the growth of aristocratic and monarchical principles, would have had strength entirely to check them, or to prevent the anarchy which would have been the result of the struggle. But the Norman Conquest, by uniting the Anglo-Saxons more closely together, and by infusing more life into those laws and institutions, which guaranteed freedom, put a check to this downward tendency. It gave more unity, more system, to both parties. After the Conquest, the Normans, being a small, though strong body, encamped in an enemy's country, surrounded by people jealous of their independence, and waiting but for the opportunity to regain it, were forced, for their own safety, to cling closely together; consequently, they observed strict justice towards each other, they established laws to which they adhered religiously, and had no quarrels amongst themselves. All the struggles that there were, were between the conquerors and the conquered. This was far from being the case among the Gauls. There the former inhabitants had been so completely degraded, that they were almost entirely annihilated by the invasion of the barbarian hordes, so that the conquerors there might settle any where with impunity, far from their neighbours, and might be quite independent of those of their own race; which after a time led to so many independent dukedoms and sovereignties. In England, too, the conquerors did not seize land here, and land there, as they fancied, but they always made a pretence of justice, and seized those which had been confiscated by the rebellion of their owners. The great aim William and all the Normans had in view, was to establish the supremacy of the Normans over the Saxons, and that of the royal power over the Normans. Nearly 600 vassals took the oath of allegiance to him, and as if to guard against their future independence, particularly those whom he enriched most, he scattered their domains in different counties. The territory was divided into sixty fiefs, which were given to knights who took the oath of fidelity. The Domesday book, the statistics of the fiefs and their owners, begun in 1081 by William's orders, and finished in 1086, is an existing monument of the order and cohesion of the Norman aristocracy twenty years after its establishment in England.

These same causes, these same necessities, of course produced analogous effects upon the Saxons. The spirit of nationality, which was beginning to die away before the Conquest, revived under the weight of foreign oppression. It gave the whole population, a strong fierce race, one interest, one feeling, one object,—that of expelling the conquerors. For this purpose they united and held closely together: to defend themselves, the Normans united and held equally firm among themselves. They had found in Normandy their rallying point round the feudal system; the Saxons placed theirs in their ancient institutions and laws. William's government was not entirely, at least not in forms, one of force. After the battle of Hastings, the throne was offered to him in the name of the Saxons, and before his coronation he swore to govern the two people by equal laws. Ever since this time the Saxons have never ceased claiming as their right their ancient laws, the laws of Edward the Confessor, which, at various times, they have recovered from their Norman kings, when they rose strong enough to wrest any thing from them. They defended and claimed their property in virtue of titles anterior to the Conquest, and their titles were recognised. They met in the different courts of the county, receiving justice from their equals, and for the purpose of taking their common interests into consideration there. Thus we see, that while on the continent the Conquest entirely destroyed both people (the conquerors and the conquered), in England, on the contrary, it only united each nation more firmly within itself in order to oppose the other. On the continent the government and all political laws had all perished together; in England they were more cherished than ever. On the continent, all interests, aims, and objects were entirely individual; in England they were thoroughly national. On the continent, the feudal system rose out of the destruction of the central power and political unity—in England it tended to preserve them. The Roman Gauls, except in a very few cities, had almost disappeared, or were in the lowest state of serfdom; the Saxons always maintained their position as a people, and reclaimed and vindicated their liberties in right of their ancient laws. In a word, in England, the Conquest, instead of dispersing and confounding everything, brought into being two strong opposing forces, one endeavouring to gain dominion, the other resolutely defending their liberties. For each party, public deliberation and agreement was necessary—this is the principle of all free governments.

THE "SEPOY."

A TALBOTYPE.

BY MRS. POSTANS.

BHOWANI SINGH, of the thirty-first Bengal Native Infantry, was perhaps one of the most characteristic of his class, picturesque in appearance, handsome in person, self-satisfied in manner, and poetical in temperament. By birth a native of Hindostan, he delighted in the fine muslins of Delhi and the gay embroideries of the "Upper Provinces," while, having been acquainted from childhood with the legendary lore of the Christna and the Jumna, he delighted in recounting tales of the Indian Apollo, and in melodizing Hindu pastorals to the tones of his wire-strung sitarr. By caste a Brahmin, his food was uncooked rice and his beverage water, but as regarded the purity of both, his creed made him singularly fastidious. In the morning his mantras or prayers were rigidly observed, and his ablutions were equally considered by him as a religious duty, while his chief pleasure appeared to consist in culling large quantities of chumpā and mogree blossoms, and then selecting a cool and shady spot, to string these flowers into garlands, with which to adorn his graceful costume.

It would be difficult for one accustomed to see the human form disguised as it is by English costume, cramped and disfigured by ill-made boots, stiff stocks, unpliant gloves, and a regulated military manner, more disfiguring than either leather or buckram, to imagine the degree of grace, the symmetry of proportion, the natural ease, and the elegance of manner which marks the Hindostan Sepoy in general, and Bhowani Singh, perhaps, more particularly. This grace is doubtless acquired by the varieties of position that a hot climate suggests, in giving rest to the body, and also to its freedom from restraint; as we observe in England the exceedingly graceful attitudes of little children, before nature is sacrificed at the shrine of custom, and the corset maker and the dancing master are called in to mar or to distort her handywork. Bhowani Singh very naturally disliked the livery of "the Company," and certainly, red broad cloth, thick soled "clumps," and heavy beaver, pressing on the brows exposed to the heat of the tropics, is not a costume to be loved for its own sake, however suggestive of duty, and the consequent morality of the wearer's being well pleased therewith.

Bhowani Singh was tall, slight, and singularly handsome, with large lustrous eyes, a high and well-formed forehead, and a manner that suggested what the young Hindu nobles were, ere Moslem tyranny and conquest destroyed the courts of their princes, and laid their power in the dust. Many a man have I noted, in our sepoy ranks, whose bearing and lineaments were so distinctive of gentle blood, that the mind immediately recurred to the past, and to the Moslem and Mahratta armies, and their strong defences, where such men were chiefs and leaders, as brave and chivalrous in field and castle, as any of the knights of England's olden time, chronicled by a Scott or a James. We see the soldier of India, in our day, as a being whose ancestors were oppressed by a long series of tyrannies, a deteriorating succession of injustices; we see him humbled by dependence, servile and degraded in position; but it was not always so. The chronicles of Indian history teem with anecdotes of the bravery and heroic self-sacrifice of men, who, in the ranks of such leaders as Aurungzebe, or the Bejapoor princes, possessed all the requisites of distinguished soldiers. The worthy descendant of such ancestry was the man whom I have chosen, as characteristic of his class; and the calm of his high caste manner, and the dignity of his bearing, pointed to an origin among the truest and bravest of his race. It was remarkable, however, to observe how the whole manner of Bhowani Singh appeared to change, when he relinquished his bright plum-coloured silk ankrika or body-coat, with its long drooping sleeves lined with pale pink, the graceful doputta, with its muslin drapery and scarlet silk border, the picturesque waist girdle, and the jauntily poised turban, for the stiff dress of the European soldier, and how completely the mind and manner of the man seemed shackled with his dress.

Bhowani Singh happened at one time to be our "orderly," while a detachment of the regiment was employed on duty in the jungles, and it was then I became well acquainted with his character; for being somewhat read in Oriental physiognomy, I was attracted by the index his countenance presented, and being engaged in some inquiries concerning the poetry and traditions of Hindostan, I frequently sent for Bhowani, who, attired in his graceful undress, would sit at the door of my tent, and sitarr in hand, relate, with flashing eyes, the deeds of the chieftains of central India, or, as a troubadour, recite the loves of the sun-god Heri, on the banks of the blue Yamuna. His amiable character endeared Bhowani Singh to all who served with him, and when he strolled into our camp at sunset, swinging a little silver bowl, that he had brought from the river side, suspended by a cord over his hand, and his turban ornamented with a fresh bunch of oleander blossoms, a score of merry voices would break in on the cadences of his Delhi love song, and every little knot of chatting sepoys would seek to win the favourite orderly to a seat beside their watch-fire. And with reason, too, for once there, how faithful they became! what tales were told, legends recited, and native airs, full of quaint conceits, sung to the sharp-toned sitarr or vina. "Humara Bhye," one would say, while he cast his arm caressingly over Bhowani's shoulder; and thus they would chat, handing about pān leaves and the hubble-bubble, till midnight came, when each man, wrapped in a cumli, would stretch himself upon the ground, and at early dawn rise with clear head to fulfil his duties; rise, without the sluggishness produced by noise, heat, or wild excitement, but with that alacrity calm rest produces, and forthwith proceed to perform his personal and religious duties, hastening to the nearest stream or well, for prayer and required ablution.

It is almost impossible, while in India, not to contrast this peaceful, temperate, becoming behaviour of the sepoy, with the language, conduct, and bearing of the European soldier, and to regret that (as it is said,) the exigences of war require so large a number of the last should be sent to India, where their example certainly does not tend to increase that "empire of opinion" the Christian conquerors have been said to hold over the natives of India. It is very grievous to see, as I have done, the population of a whole village fly from their huts, at the appearance of a few soldiers strolling towards a camp. It is very sad to know the fear that possessed these poor people; the fear that spirituous liquor would be demanded, and if not produced, the knowledge that they would be beaten and ill-used, and become the victims of men already excited by intoxication, and who, in ignorance of the language of these poor peasants, were certain to explain their will by blows. I have witnessed such things frequently, and have felt humiliated and pained that it should be so. A European barrack may well be shunned, but few things are more pleasing than the sepoys' lines in India. On the arrival of a native regiment at a station, the men erect little huts for themselves and their families, the officers also living in the lines, while the European officers occupy separate bungalows in different parts of the cantonment. The only difference between the accommodation of the sepoy and his native officer, is in the size of the hut. All are of bamboo work, neatly thatched, and over the roofs water-melon plants and convolvulus are abundantly trained, the gay blossoms of which, with the neatness of the huts, and the cleanly kept road, have a very pleasing effect. Here and there we see a few tulsi and other sacred trees, enclosed in a sort of decorated brick flower-pot, some four feet high; these are regarded as the penates of the lines, and duly venerated.

Whenever a stranger may pass through the lines of a native regiment, all is found to be orderly. In the morning, before the door of the huts, the sepoys' wives may be seen in the dark blue sarees suited to their condition, grinding corn for the family consumption, or kneading the grain into large flat cakes of unleavened bread, singing as they do so; and in the evening groups of sepoys, with their little wood fires brightly burning before the huts, chat and laugh merrily together, while others, who have strolled to the river side for the coolest water, with which to enjoy their simple meal, may be heard returning, chanting, as they come, odes sacred to their gods. The sepoy is eminently domestic; is kind to his wife, tender-hearted and affectionate to his children. No scene of gaiety or dissipation is comparable, in his mind, to the happiness of playing with his children, and chatting among them with his comrades, and the quiet enjoyment and good feeling to be seen in the sepoys' lines, will make every looker-on who can sympathise with the simplest and best pleasures of life, rejoice that he has witnessed such. The native soldier, has, however, notwithstanding the contentment of his spirit, very little of this world's goods, for his pay is very little more than suffices to find his wife's blue saree, his own white cotton ankrika, and coarse Badjiree cakes for the daily food; and this in peaceful times, for when stirring seasons come, the sepoy's lot is hard indeed, poor fellow! for in accordance with the manners of the East, he not only provides food and shelter for the wife and the little ones, who are not allowed to follow him to the field, but for the aged father, the palsied mother, the idiot brother, or the orphan family of a relative or a comrade,—a "blyc bund" he is called; for Oriental laws of hospitality, even among those who can spare but little, compel that that little should be shared by all those branches of a family who may be unable to gain a living for themselves. Thus, the young, the healthy, and the active, cannot live for himself, but must feed, clothe, and shelter as he may be able, the aged, the weak, or the helpless, and an orderly havildar (serjeant) of our regiment, once told me that he supported fifteen persons in his house, besides his wife and little children. With such knowledge of the habits of the people, he must have a hard heart indeed, who has once witnessed the departure of sepoys on active service, and seen the partings between the native soldier and those who depend on him for bread, and who could grudge him his hard-earned pittance, or the little increase to it expected from the usual "batta" of field service. It must be remembered too, that according to his religious laws, a sepoy, if a Hindoo, is forbidden to quit his country; and in doing so he hazards caste in his fidelity to our service, and cheerful willingness to do the "nokari" (service); we may imagine too the miseries he endures, among scenes that are to him redolent of pollution; his conscientious terrors of the eternal punishment that may follow; his grief at leaving his beloved country; the yearnings of his heart for that anxious and helpless family that he struggles to support in his native village. All these are sad trials for human nature at any time, and more especially so for a nature so simple, loving, and unsophisticated as the native of India possesses, and yet the sepoy braves them all! On board ship, among the slaughter of animal life, in contact with all most abhorrent to his feelings, in cases of extreme suffering, from want of space, air, and water, as I have seen on board the transports for Kurrachee, the native soldier preserves his cheerfulness, seeks with innocent pleasantry to support the spirits of his comrades, and with the simple phrase, "sirkar ka hookum hi," (it is the order of government,) silences all objection.

The sons of the sepoys attend regimental schools, and, with the usual precocity of native children, soon make considerable advance in the general knowledge suitable to their age and position, while they are distinguished for their quickness and usefulness as little orderlies; seeming always to prefer "duty" to play, even at the early age when life appears, to the boys of the west, a mere Paradise of marbles; and thus the ready smile with which he receives an order, and the alacrity with which he seeks to execute it, makes the little sepoy orderly a general favourite. The native soldier is very proud of his son, and anxiously seeks to train him well, giving him a constant example of sobriety, temperance, and respect to his superiors; it is seldom, therefore, that the father's hope is condemned to disappointment, for, as has been pithily observed, "If we would train up a child in the way he should go, we must go in the way we would train up the child." In the earlier history of our connexion with India, the value of the sepoy was more truly esteemed than it is at present; and yet in the acquirement of our position in the East, his duties and virtues, capabilities and faithfulness, as a mercenary soldier, must have been best known; the struggle for occupation being necessarily strong, our empire unestablished, and our power unknown. It is only necessary, however, to turn to the evidence afforded by such men as Clive and Wellesley, to chronicles of our wars with Tippoo, or even the Peishwa, to see how our British leaders valued the services of the sepoys, and how justly and liberally the meed of praise was yielded. Surely, a longer experience of faithfulness should increase the value placed upon it, should strengthen the tie between the native soldier and his European employer, and increase the amount of respect, gratitude, and consideration on either side. I use the word gratitude advisedly, and not for the sake of a sentence. While resident on the borders of Beloochistan, among the Bengal sepoys employed in the harassing duties on our frontier, and beyond the Indus, in the constant war with the Hill tribes, numerous cases of the fidelity of the sepoys have come under my notice, as shown towards their European officers. Many can bear me witness that they owe their lives to the chivalrous bravery of native soldiers, shown in individual instances, and that, when no eye was near to approve the generous self-devotion, and the object of it, for the time, insensible to its value.

I recollect, after the fight with the followers of Doda Murree in their rocky fastnesses, the sword of a Belooche casting a European officer from his saddle, leaving the body under a gun-wheel, apparently dead, and a native soldier in passing it, after the Belooches had retired to the brow of the neighbouring hill, recognising the form of his officer; instantly he stooped, raised it in his arms, and with the body across his saddle he galloped on the enemy, cutting his way towards the camp, which he reached in safety. The officer's wound, though a very serious one, where the point of a sword was broken in the skull, proved not to be mortal. He gradually recovered, and felt for his native preserver the regard of a brother. I saw them both immediately after the affray, and have witnessed the gratitude felt for the man, who, despising danger, careless of probable loss of caste in bearing to a place of safety the supposed corpse of his officer, would willingly have sacrificed all, rather than that the casket of that which he had respected should suffer dishonour at the hands of an enemy.

I recollect, too, during the occupation of the Fort of Kahun, in the Murree hills, when the gallant band that held it were in hourly expectation of perishing from famine,—when empty uniforms, filled with straw, manned the guns that the weakened sepoys could no longer stand beside,—when grain bags were filled with sand to deceive the Murree chiefs,—how, when they came to offer terms, these Murrees were astonished at the merry voices that in song and laugh rang around that old Fort, little thinking such sounds came but to deceive, from men parched with fever, and whose forms, attenuated by hunger, were propped among the crumbling mud of the place they had determined to perish in, rather than yield to degrading terms. The officers of this band, eventually saved by their heroism, bore witness to the devotedness of the gallant sepoys; telling how they begged that lesser food might be served to them, and an even scantier supply of water, that the baggage cattle might be preserved alive, and rendered efficient, should they yet be enabled to leave that fort with honour; a conduct not less self-devoted than that recorded by the accomplished and learned historian of the times of Lord Clive: when the sepoy soldiery fought bravely upon rice-water, themselves requesting that the more solid grain should be given to their European comrades. Multitudes of such cases might be quoted by those experienced in the characters of our sepoy troops in India, and none who know them well, and have, from a knowledge of the ancient institutions of the people, learnt to regard them apart from prejudice, but will respect them as they deserve. Opinions seem to have undergone strange changes as affects the sepoy; time was, when young men about to enter the Indian service received stringent orders as affected their conduct to the native soldiery,—and these orders were severely enforced.

Sir John Malcolm was a leader of whom India might well be proud, and he was ever first in instilling the necessity for respect to the native soldiery, and in recommending studies which should lead our young aspirants to military glory to an acquaintance with the religious customs and habits of the men they commanded, with a view to their protection from unintentional insult; and he ever enforced the greatest possible propriety of demeanour from the European to the native. Such has ever been the principle which governed the acts of men who acquainted themselves with India and her people, and who rightly weighed their responsibilities, and it was under such men that our troops pressed their success in India, attached to their interests the native soldiery, and through them the peasantry, whose families they represent. While associated with the 15th Bengal Native Infantry for some time, at Ahmednugger, I used to feel great pleasure in receiving and conversing with the native officers of the corps: fine old soldiers many of them, who had in their youth fought hard fights, and had grown grey, strong in love and respect for their European leaders. Among them Sheikh Wuzeer, the jemidar (adjutant), was a remarkably fine man, and old Sukojee Rao, the subedar-major, with Makonji Naik, of the 6th Company, was ever delighted to indulge in the garrulity so sweet to an old soldier. In conversing with these native officers, I have been often surprised at the knowledge they have displayed of character, in speaking of their European officers; how acute their observation has been, how true their remarks, how freely among themselves they have canvassed motives and acts, and have uniformly felt deep respect where it was due, and expressed slight where it was merited, and that without any reference to the rank of the individual whose character was discussed. I have frequently heard these old soldiers express the deepest regret that young men, as European officers, should create disaffection in the native troops by inconsiderate acts affecting their prejudices; while they have spoken of the necessity for our attaching their affection, as the best security for their fidelity, and have doubtfully shaken their heads on the question of how, without such security, the bribery of foreign powers might affect the sepoy army.

The sepoys, as I have said, represent the peasant families of India, and in hazarding their fidelity, we risk our empire of opinion among the whole people. I have seldom entered a village in India, where some old woman or sturdy cultivator did not bring me some little offering because the son or the brother was a sepoy, and ate our "salt," as the phrase is; and the opinion formed in the army of our acts, becomes the opinion of the whole population of India. It is not uncommon to hear an officer in command of Europeans speak in terms of dislike and distrust of the military machine he directs, for there are, perhaps, no class of men on whom demoralizing influences act more fatally than on the European soldier; but I have never heard sepoys spoken of, by intelligent commanders, in any other terms but those of consideration and regard. It is not uncommon for sepoys, on the death of a European officer who was respected in his regiment, to burn a light for years before his tomb, which I recollect to have been done in the case of a Lieutenant Mitchell of the 16th Native Infantry, among others; and I recollect on the death of another officer in a native corps, who was remarkable for his Christian piety and oriental learning, that the company he commanded, even though loss of caste was the result, proceeded to his house, and, remaining until the funeral, performed all necessary offices, and that amid their tears and groans, insisting, at the same time, on bearing the body to the grave.

The three great festivals of the Hindoo year are the Dusrah, or Doorga Poojah, a fête of ten days, in honour of the goddess Bhownance (the wife of Siva, the creator, and answering to the Venus Urania of the Greeks); the Dewalli, or feast of lights, a fête of four days, held at the commencement of the Hindoo lunar year; and the Hooli, a fête celebrating the beginning of the vernal equinox. In the two former the sepoy takes his part, with the rest of native society. During the Dusrah it is customary for each man to offer a tribute of respect to the object connected with his mode of life; the groom decorates his horse with flowers, the carpenter considers his tools, and the sepoy twines fresh blossoms round his musket, in honour of the festival; at the Dewalli the sepoys ordinarily assist the people in bearing branches of their sacred trees in procession, more particularly the tulsi, as the guardian of their homes; but the Hooli is a festival especially their own. On this occasion the sepoys of a native regiment borrow a large tent, which they pitch in their lines, and having hired a taifah of natch women, invite their European officers to the gala. It is considered a matter of course that the invitation should be accepted, and as general license prevails during the Hooli, the sepoys usually express their opinion of their officers, on the occasion, by acts that could only be allowed during the brief sovereignty of the Lord of Misrule.

The last sepoy natch I attended was at Nuggur, and that being a large station, the double-poled tent of the collector, borrowed by the native officers for the occasion, was crowded with guests; sofas and carpets were arranged for the European officers and ladies, whose presence is always particularly requested, and considered a high compliment by the sepoys, while the native officers were seated on chairs, and the sepoys, in their undress, crouched round immediately in front of the torch-bearers, these same "links" being inodorous in the extreme. The natch women were seated with their accompaniers at the farther end of the tent, and the white dresses of the sepoys, and the kanauts (side walls) of the tents, were abundantly powdered with the red dust "abir," a mixture of cinnabar, the splutterings of which are emblematical of vernal flowers. In the tent all was courtesy and order; the guests were received with great respect, garlands of Indian jessamine thrown round their necks, and perfumes sprinkled on their dresses, which were as innocent in their effects as their fragrance was delicious; but outside the tent, lying perdue, were some of the younger sepoys, with vessels of cinnabar, mixed with oil and alum, and on the departure of a European officer whose conduct had been in any way offensive, these wags would not fail to write their judgment in such abundant sprinklings on his apparel as were not easily erased. These sepoys were seldom wrong, however, in the opinion so inscribed, and one commanding officer, well known to me for the commission of acts of unjustifiable espionage, and occasional very undeserved severity, came to his house blinded and nearly stifled by attacks which he could with difficulty support himself against. On another occasion I remember severe treatment being endured by a European ensign, who, in his folly, had neglected to offer a chair to the subedar of his regiment. The sepoys took the liberty of the Hooli to resent the affront, reminding the looker-on of the feeling that animated some native soldiers, when they nailed the right hand of a European officer of high rank to the gate of a fort, as the hand that he had boasted was never raised to return the salute of a native. The sepoy is no military automaton, but a being highly susceptible of kindness, deeply grateful for consideration, and sensitively alive to injustice. The sepoy army have, as a body, served us faithfully; as individuals they have been brave, generous, and attached; and when we, as a nation, most needed their services to extend and secure our eastern possessions, the native soldiery never failed us. They were mercenaries, it is true; so are all soldiers; but these men, often tampered with by the princes of the land, stood faithful. They did not fight for country, as the British soldier does in a foreign land, under the banners of his Queen; but the sepoy fought, for duty's sake, in oft-tried faithfulness, against his own countrymen, for foreigners and aliens in religion, language, and custom, but whose salt he had eaten, and to whom he was bound by service and gratitude.

India is at rest, and her governing power is British. Our love of conquest tempts us to extend our empire far beyond her frontier. Meeting with powerful enemies, well trained in warlike exercises, and differing altogether from the princes of India who first opposed our progress, it is thought necessary to pour European troops at a vast expenditure of life and treasure into the East; but while we do so, let us not forget the debt we owe the sepoy, or hazard the fidelity of the native army, the respect of the people of India, or our own character for gratitude as a nation, by offering degradation to the native soldier, or by grudging or withholding from him that meed of respect, remuneration, or credit as a soldier, that he has at once so highly prized, and so justly deserved.

THE FORTUNATE MAN.

BY F. H. K.

CHAPTER I.

"THEN I cannot persuade you to join us at Harrington's to-night, Dacre," said Edward Stanley to his friend, as they paused at the corner of a street previous to separating.

"You must persuade me out of my principles first."

"Principles! Fiddlesticks! As if principles had anything to do with a merry dance and a quiet rubber."

"Not much at Mr. Harrington's, I believe; and that is just my reason for staying away."

"You are wrong, Tom—you are wrong, depend upon it. Harrington is a capital fellow; he has the best cook, the finest wines, and the first company in London. You meet the very élite of the ton at his house. Besides, he is as rich as Croesus."

"Riches are only valuable when usefully employed."

"And I do not see that Harrington makes a worse use of his than thousands of other people."

"That is no criterion, my dear Stanley. If he makes an improper use of them, the matter is not mended by the fellowship of others. Can you tell me of any sick that he has relieved—any load of poverty that he has lightened—any half-withered heart-blossoms that have been steeped in the soft dews of his sympathy?—any —"

"Nay, nay; a truce to preaching. You are a rare hand, I know; and, when I am chancellor, I will make you a bishop."

"I wish I could induce you to give up this habit of turning serious things into ridicule. Believe me, it is unworthy both of your head and your heart."

"My best compliments. What you are going to say is highly edifying, I have no doubt; but I cannot stay now. I must have the homily some other time, and perhaps there may be a few trifles to add to it. Au revoir." And the friends separated.

Edward Stanley was one of those persons who offer to their fellow-beings a constant temptation for the exercise of the passion of envy. His father was a merchant of some respectability; and the son, in succeeding to the business, had, by a series of speculations at once bold and successful, made rapid advances both in credit and income. All things had gone so prosperously with him that he was nick-named, on 'Change, the Commercial Midas. Fame is said to have a hundred trumpets. We never met with any one who had numbered those of wealth; but, judging from the rapidity with which its announcements fly in all directions, like sparks from a fire-wheel, they cannot be much under a thousand. In an incredibly short space of time everybody knew that Edward Stanley was a wealthy and prosperous man; moreover that the golden barometer was still rising, and steadily pointing towards "set fair." Almost as immediately, and by a simultaneousness highly creditable to their powers of discernment, everybody discovered that he had great mental powers, a lively fancy, a sparkling wit, a refined taste, a sound judgment, and a surprising store of erudition. The single young ladies found out that he had remarkably fine eyes, and a Byron turn of feature—was an elegant dancer, and a love of a talker: and their mammies suddenly recollected that they had formerly been on intimate terms with that worthy old man, his father, and wondered how it ever came to be broken off. We happily live in times when merit such as his never finds itself neglected; and door after door flew open to receive him as if a hundred Ali Babas had cried out at one and the same instant, "Open, Sesame!" Nor was Edward more reluctant than the Arab woodsman to avail himself of the treasures which thus courted his acceptance; and pleasure succeeded to business, and business to pleasure, as regularly as the alternations of day and night. As time wore on, the first of these began to be more and more in the ascendant. Not that Edward neglected business; but he had always rather submitted to than relished the drudgery of its details: much that had formerly been done by himself could now be performed by others; and he found himself with more leisure to devote to pursuits infinitely more congenial to his tastes and feelings. He indulged in no excesses which the world calls vicious; but, as he himself said, he enjoyed himself; and very innocently, too, as every one else said, except his old schoolfellow, Thomas Dacre, who, having some very unfashionable prejudices on certain points, frequently differed widely from his friend in his estimate of the quality and value of his pursuits and society, and scrupled not to point out that difference with quite as much plainness as good breeding.

The party at Mr. Harrington's, to which allusion has been already made, was elegant and fashionable. "The feast of reason and the flow of soul" might be wanting; but the decorations were tasteful, the refreshments recherché, and the amusements varied and attractive. Voluptuousness breathed in the dance; music spoke to the heart as only music speaks; young hearts made still sweeter minstrelsy to each other amid a dazzling blaze of lights, and a labyrinth of garlands and fancy bowers, whose varieties of form, of colour, and of fragrance, seemed to recal youth's images of fairy land; and when Edward slowly and reluctantly tore himself from the intoxicating scene, the sun, (as the Morning Post informed the gay world the next day,) had "looked in upon the revelers" for upwards of an hour.

Dacre called upon his friend the next morning, long after the usual hour of business, and found him at his breakfast.

"It is rather late, that is the truth," said he; "but really it was so very fascinating that I never once dreamt of the hour. Besides, they were not half gone, as it was, when I left."

"Fellowship in grief divides not pain," said Dacre. "You do not enjoy your breakfast, I see. You are not ill, I hope."

"Oh no, thank you. Mouth a little feverish or so, and the least bit of a head-ache; that is all. Harrington's wine is almost too good, that is the fact. But how came you to drop in so early, as if on purpose to catch me?"

"Have you forgotten our business appointment?"

"Faith, I had, and everything else about business; and if you had heard that sweet girl of Harrington's sing last night, you would have done the same."

"I think not," said Dacre, drily; "nor should I be doing the duty of a friend if I did not direct your attention to the fact, that broken rest, neglect of business, head-ache, latent fever, and forgetfulness of duty, have been the primæ facie results of your indulgence last night. What less obvious consequences it has to answer for, it is not for me to say."

"There, there, Old Morality, do not give me another preachment, for heaven's sake. It is abominably late, and I must be off to the counting-house. I know what you are going to say, but you won't persuade me that there is any harm in a little innocent recreation. I am sure I work hard enough when I am at it; and if you never heard of an old proverb about all work and no play, I have, I can tell you."

CHAPTER II.

HANNAH MORE has well observed, that an extensive prospect may be discerned through a small opening; and the preceding chapter will suffice to explain the kind of life Edward Stanley was leading, without exhibiting it further in detail. The rapid growth of habit has been observed and dwelt upon ad nauseam, and Dacre perceived the increasing effects of its pernicious influence on Edward with more sorrow than surprise. At first, there had been nothing startlingly wrong in his indulgences; nothing beyond the consumption of a great portion of precious time not given to be wasted on idle vanities—the absorption of many of the hours nominally devoted to other pursuits, in the recollection or anticipation of the fascinating scenes—the false stimulus their mental opium imparted, and the dull and listless vacuum till it was renewed—the indifference to higher and nobler pursuits which the heart insensibly acquired—and the consumption of sums which would have carried fulness and joy into many abodes of sickness and penury, and caused the thankful blessings of hundreds of desolate hearts made glad, to be wasted in grateful incense to heaven. These, and such as these, were the only early results of his mode of living; and these things, unhappily, are "trifles light as air" to those who use the world's standard in their measurement of right and wrong. But in such a career there is no standing still; not to draw back is to go forward; and Dacre soon began to hear of gentlemen's parties, from which Edward had returned "a little elevated;" and, on putting into execution a long talked of project of an alms-house in their native town, towards which Edward had always promised him fifty pounds, when he called to claim the subscription, the promiser told him that he had really lost such heavy sums at play lately that he could not afford to give it. Naturally mortified at the loss of an important sum on which he had fully depended, and looking on the reason assigned for the breach of faith rather as an insult than an excuse, he remonstrated with spirit and energy; but had the subject dismissed somewhat summarily with the remark from Edward, that it was quite impossible to avoid a little play sometimes—he was known to be rich, and it was expected from him—others might think as they liked, but, for his part, he could not look mean for the sake of a few paltry hundreds—and as for the alms-house, he had no objection to the idea, on the contrary, he quite approved of the principle, and would willingly give his assistance to it, but one really could not do everything.

Dacre, who saw the vortex towards which he was hurrying, used every effort, on this and many subsequent occasions, to arrest his course; but he might as well have attempted to stop the rapids of the St. Lawrence. Still the tide of prosperity rolled on unchecked; thousand after thousand poured into his coffers, but their only effect was to enlarge the sphere of his expenditure and the circle of his enjoyments. Self was the idol before which he worshipped, and no sacrifice was too costly to lay upon its altar. Those whose business it was to minister to pomp and luxury, ranked him among the most munificent of his sphere; but the widow and the orphan knew him not. About this time Dacre, who watched him with the deepest anxiety, and who, though every expectation of success from his own remonstrances had failed, still clung to the hope that a something (though vague and undefinable even to himself) would yet interpose between him and perdition, had the mortification to find a new barrier to his hopes raised up in the person of Mr. Harrington; whose association in the business, and the marriage of whose daughter with his young partner, followed in rapid succession. Both these events were regarded with regret by Dacre. Mr. Harrington was, emphatically, a man of the world; he lived in it and for it. Utterly destitute of that high principle of duty and accountability which should be the pole-star round which all others revolve in the order and proportion suited to their respective stations, he was the most dangerous associate with which a man of Edward's character could be linked; and the daughter, though without any actually vicious propensities, was the mere creature of the circumstances among which she found herself—the butterfly of the hour, and passing it as if, like the insect, the only objects of her existence were

"Roving for ever from flower to flower, Dying when fair things are fading away."

Against these events, therefore, particularly the latter, Dacre remonstrated with all the energy of his character and all the freedom of old and faithful friendship; and so zealous and uncompromising were his representations of their probable ill consequences to a mind already too much deadened to a sense of its high duties and responsibilities, that Edward, who had begun to acquire some of the haughtiness of prosperity, took great umbrage at the tone of his remarks, which, he hinted pretty broadly, the now wide difference in their worldly stations by no means authorized; with the addition, that he felt himself quite qualified to steer his course through life without the pilotage of so ungracious a Mentor; and that as he had reason to know that Dacre's ill impression of his new connexions was fully reciprocated on their parts, the time had arrived when the intercourse between them ought to cease.

Such a remark admitted but of one reply. Dacre withdrew, though more in sorrow than in anger; for his Christian spirit pitied the friend of his youth, even while unhesitatingly he burst the bonds of half a life for the sake of a vain and worldly connexion; and Edward, though the reproofs of his friend had never produced any change in his conduct, felt a sensible relief when his searching eye was no more bent upon his actions. That an eye yet more searching looked constantly into his inmost soul, never crossed his thoughts; for those thoughts were all occupied with the nothings of the present; and, though he had now quite relinquished all commercial affairs to his partner, and made pleasure the only business of his existence, the hours were too short for the amount of enjoyments, or fancied enjoyments, which had to be compressed into them. Gay equipages, richer liveries, larger parties succeeded. Every fresh increase of his worldly means was but the signal for a corresponding increase in his expenditure; and bons vivans extolled his wines, and ladies his taste, and parasites his spirit; and he listened complacently, and was satisfied. As the Roman conqueror had a monitor at the back of his triumphal car, to temper the effect of the almost divine honours which he was receiving, by the timely admonition, "Remember that thou art but a man;" so should every one who has riches at his disposal have some one at his side to be ever whispering in his ear, "Remember thou art but a steward." This truly golden rule, the acting upon which can alone prevent him who lives the life of Dives from dying his death, and partaking of his after inheritance, never entered Edward's mind. He was rich, but few public charities numbered him among their contributors; he was rich, but no private dwelling, wherein dwelt want, opened its door to receive his form; no crazy stair creaked beneath his footstep; no sunken eye was lit up at his approach; no shrunken palm closed over his gold; no grateful blessing hung on his retiring footstep; no desolate heart made glad poured forth for his welfare that earnest, though half-suffocated prayer which the angel of mercy loves to bear to heaven. He was rich, and he looked upon his riches as the mere vehicle of his pleasures—pleasures which became more and more guilty, as his senses, accustomed to their strong stimulus, required a deeper and deadlier draught to produce their wonted excitement. He was rich, but his heart swelled not with humble gratitude to the great Dispenser of earthly gifts, that He had placed his steps upon the velvet pathway of life, while so many had to toil over the rugged flint and through the loathsome quagmire. He looked round upon a board where every delicacy offered its stimulant to the languid appetite; and he heeded not the wail of anguish as his pampered servants drove the starving beggar from his gate; and he sank to rest upon his downy pillow, unmindful that many a head more faithful to its great Master, and more mindful of the high duties of its being, was finding its repose on the hard log, or the cold stone, under no canopy but that of heaven.

CHAPTER III.

EDWARD was aroused from this guilty dream by the sudden death of his wife. It was the first withdrawal of the sunshine from the landscape of his life, and he was stupified for a time under the effects of the blow. He could not understand how anything painful could happen to him—it seemed quite a reversal of the order of nature. Then the pent-up stream burst its banks; he gave way to a frantic delirium of grief, and shut himself up from every one in a perfect agony of despair. Time had scarcely begun its usual work of mitigating the first bitterness of grief, when another and, if possible, still more astounding blow succeeded. His partner, in whom he had reposed the most unlimited confidence, suddenly absconded; having, as it appeared, been engaged in some speculations of a very extensive character, the failure of which involved the prospect of certain ruin. Having resolved to avoid this by a precipitate flight, and having the sole control of the business, he had availed himself of his facilities to carry off with him the whole of his own assets, and the greater portion of those of his unfortunate partner, leaving him to meet the liabilities of both.

This was a stroke indeed. The hitherto spoiled child of fortune, pampered with indulgence, unused to exertion, and maddened at the occasion which now rendered it imperative, made a few convulsive efforts to retrieve his position, which only served to show how desperate it had become; and a few appeals to the multitude of friends who had so often plighted body and spirit to his service, which only served to exhibit the hollowness of the high-sounding drum-cases. Instead of proffers of assistance, he now, for the first time for many years, heard truth; but truth in its most uninviting form. He who had so lately been an immaculate being, whose smile was a blessing, whose judgment an oracle, and whose taste a standard, could now hear of his reckless extravagance, his indiscreet choice of a partner, his want of foresight in not anticipating a ruin which all shrewd men had long seen to be inevitable. There were not wanting, indeed, those who went further, and declared that he must have foreseen it, and had either gone on in the criminal determination to enjoy himself at all hazards while the means existed, careless of what should follow; or, what was quite as likely, had made an underhand arrangement with his partner for a division of the spoils of their joint guilt; being, in either case, no better than the footpad on the highway—in fact, not so good; for the latter at least made no pretensions to honesty and good standing in society. Sentiments like these, conveyed by innuendo, by implication, by affected commiseration, by the medium of third parties, and all the various modes by which slander conveys its imputations—and, unhappily, when once the sun of fortune has gone down, her fetid breath finds as many points as those of the mariner's compass to blow from; the defenceless head of the unfortunate one forming the common centre of them all—these sentiments, at such utter variance with those which had been accustomed to reach his ear, filled him with astonishment; and the more so as he knew them to be as unmerited as ungenerous. He had been forgetful of his God—though his heart did not tell him so—and of the ends for which riches were entrusted to him; he had lived to himself, and been unmindful of the sons and daughters of penury; but to the world he had stood fair. He had been honourable, and even liberal, in his dealings—his very profusion had been a source of great gain to many of those who were now the first to condemn it; while many others had been the constant participants of his pleasures, had contributed no mean assistance to the dissipation which they now execrated so loudly, and were then as loud in their commendations of what was at that time munificence, generosity, patronage of merit, nobility of spirit, and the usual ad infinitum of toadies. He had been all his life reading the book of nature in illuminated characters, and in turning now to the common black letter, his senses were quite bewildered by the different appearance of the page.

Much salutary wisdom is locked up in the fine old adage, "Prosperity gains friends, and adversity tries them." The gaudy butterflies which had fluttered round Edward Stanley during his hours of sunshine had disappeared at the first frost-breath; and, while he brooded over the change with a bitterness of feeling not unmixed with misanthropy, he could not do otherwise than sometimes remember that he had once possessed a friend of a totally different character, and that he had driven him from his side. Neither could he avoid the gnawings of self-reproach as the faithfulness, the purity, and manly straight-forwardness of Dacre's character stood out in fine relief from its contrast with the despicable beings for whose sake he had been so unjustifiably slighted; and the first pang of remorse which Edward suffered, was that which arose from his unworthy treatment of his first and only friend. Still there was a degree of false pride lurking in the bottom of his heart, which forbade his making those overtures for reconciliation which his better feelings prompted, but which he at the same time felt would be capable of great misconstruction in the present state of his fortunes. Dacre's friendship, however, was stamped with the same signet as the rest of his character—that of Christianity. He had, with deep regret, seen himself forced to retire from his friend's side when his peril was so imminent; and he no sooner heard of his reverses than, without giving a thought to the manner in which he had been previously treated, or the probable reception he was at present likely to meet,—far less to the punctilio that, as he was the offended party, he was entitled to expect that the first advances should be made to him,—he hurried to the house of his old friend with the simple purpose of ascertaining what could be done to serve him.

If the self-love of Dacre's character had not been long subdued before the influence of a purer and holier feeling, it would have found ample gratification in the manner of Edward's reception—his deep self-abasement at the first, and, after that had subsided before the honest kindness with which it was met and soothed, the entire reliance and perfect confidence which succeeded it. Without the least reserve or hesitation, Edward laid his situation fully before him, and detailed all his views and feelings as to a second self; while Dacre, on his part, listened to the explanations, and entered into the whole subject with an eagerness and a zeal which he would have condemned as too worldly if excited by his own affairs. Once master of the subject, and burning with honest anxiety to show his recovered friend that he really wished to serve him, he devoted himself to the task of "winding up" with an alacrity that nothing seemed to check, and a perseverance that nothing seemed to tire. At the first glance, the liabilities were so extensive, the debts so heavy, and the assets abstracted so large, that a considerable defalcation appeared inevitable; but, by judicious arrangements, by the exercise of much mercantile skill in making every article realize its utmost value, and by successfully negotiating the settlement of some of the larger claims rather upon an equitable than a strictly legal basis, his generous spirit at last found an ample recompense for its labours, in being able to impart to the dejected and care-worn Stanley the most grateful intelligence that, under such circumstances, can greet the proud spirit of a British trader—that his creditors would be satisfied, and his fame as a merchant unsullied. True it was that, to effect this end, every other was necessarily sacrificed; houses and grounds, equipages, paintings, costly furniture, and the bijoux which had stamped his character as a man of taste to the admirers of vertu, and gratified his personal vanity by the universality of their eulogies, fell in one undistinguished hecatomb together, a sacrifice at the shrine of vice and folly. True it was that, when all was done, the once wealthy merchant stood up a beggared man, with no inheritance but his pride, and that pride only the more tenacious and exacting from the altered circumstances under which it found exercise; but at least he could walk the street without dreading to look his fellow-pedestrian in the face, lest he should encounter one on whose books his name stood as a defaulter—no scornful finger could point him out as he passed, as that concentration of all that is most abhorrent to the feelings of an Englishman, a bankrupt. If he had not a shilling, there lived no human being who could say he owed him one. There was a noble freedom in the thought; he breathed more freely than he had done for many weeks; the great object had been achieved, and all else seemed, for the moment, comparatively light.

With Dacre, however, the great object was not achieved. He felt an honest pride in the reflection that he had been enabled, if not to place his friend's worldly interests on a desirable footing, at least to extricate them from that ruinous termination at which they must inevitably have arrived, had a handless firm, or less able, attempted their disentanglement. It was confessedly a great work, but "the greatest was behind." In the renewal of their intercourse he had been deeply pained to perceive that Edward's heart had wandered much further from its Maker than his worst anticipations had foreboded. He had been startled by occasional profanity, an evident propensity to intemperance, an utter neglect of even the common forms of religion, and an habitual deadness to the concerns of a future world, if not to the fact of its existence. He had felt, however, that Edward's mind was, at present, in too wild a state of tumult, for him to make any effort for its change of feeling with a rational hope of success. Remonstrance, to be effectual, should be well-timed and judicious, as well as zealous and sincere; and, with a full conviction of this great truth—for want of attention to which so many well-meant efforts have failed—while Stanley's state of aberration was a source of much watchful and prayerful anxiety to him, he forbore uselessly to agitate the troubled waters; waiting patiently the arrival of some favourable opportunity when he could at the same time pour upon them the oil of peace.

That opportunity came earlier than he expected. Edward had borne up unflinchingly through all the repugnancies attendant on the settlement of his affairs. Painful as these frequently were in themselves, and aggravated by the morbid sensitiveness which often led him to believe that those with whom he was brought into contact were taking marked pains to convince him, by their altered manner, how much worldly things were changed with him, he shrank from no details, however humiliating; he avoided no intercourse, however revolting; he abstained from no labour, however toilsome. There might be pain, there might be weariness, there might sometimes be sickness of heart in it; but there was excitement also, and that bore him up through it all. But when it was over—when the accountants had drawn the lines of the balance sheet, and the lawyers had made out their bills of costs—when the last creditor had signed a receipt in full, and Dacre had drawn Edward away to the quiet of his own residence in the country—then the reaction came. It first showed itself in gloomy taciturnity, which no effort could break, and a misanthropic avoidance of every one, as if the sight of his species were abhorrent to him. This seemed to increase rather than diminish; his mind appeared to wrap itself up more and more in its moody contemplations, till at length the overwrought spirit gave way; the wire that had been so long strained to its utmost tension snapped abruptly, and Edward was suddenly seized with an alarming fever.

ANNABEL C—.

In the "Amulet" for 1829 appeared a few verses entitled "To my daughter, on her second birth-day." In them occurred the following stanzas:

"I ask no plum'd and jewell'd crown,
Where Rank and Wealth their moment blaze;
No transient meed of vain Renown,
No length of perishable days.

* * * * *

"I supplicate enlightening grace,
To guide thy feet in Wisdom's way,
And strength her heavenward steps to trace,
Through twilight to the perfect day.

* * * * *

"Float peacefully along the tide,
Till, all secure, thy spirit shine
In realms where souls alone abide,
Serene and innocent as thine!"

It is seldom that parental aspirations have been so literally fulfilled as the above verses in the case of her to whom they were addressed. Our readers are well acquainted with this lady, under the signature of Annabel C—: and we cannot but feel that they will learn with more than a selfish regret that her pure and gifted mind will no more hold palpable communion with theirs; and that they will accept with grateful interest a few particulars of one already endeared to them, and most endeared to those who most intimately knew her.

We have said, the prayer offered by her father on her second birth-day presents an extraordinary counterpart to her life. It may be thought that the daughter of a country curate—for such she was—would not be likely to experience the temptations that beset "Rank and Wealth;" yet "Renown" would very probably have proved her portion, had her "perishable days" been lengthened; and that this might have led on, in an age when literature is fashionable, to intercourse with "Rank and Wealth," is conceivably possible. Yet it is remarkable that she had a constitutional antipathy to display and parade of every kind. It was no vulgar or ungenerous jealousy of those who moved in loftier orbits, which none could have adorned more entirely than herself, that forbade her to covet their position. Retirement, domestic love, simple country joys, afforded her such exquisite delight, that, although keenly enjoying the pleasure of occasionally mingling in town society, especially literary, she astonished her friends by the frank and simple outpourings of her heart in favour of nature and her beautiful abode, and her wonder that any could find permanent enjoyment except in rural and home-bred pleasures. Our readers may remember an exquisite little poem embodying this feeling in vol. i. of our publication, intitled "My Country Home." Indeed

"The fields and hills were her dear changeloss friends;
But, fair as were the scenes around her spread,
Fairest they ever were unto her eye;
For every thing shone with a light that sprang
From her own spirit, and reflected came Back to her soul again."²

Here is an autumnal picture from her journal, (Oct. 13):—

"Another exquisite day—more beautiful even, if possible, than yesterday; clear, bright, and rather frosty—thoroughly enjoyable. It would have been quite a shame to have wasted it, as I did yesterday, in dawdling about, so I went with papa across the hill. . . . The country all round looked so lovely! I do pity those whose happiness is all shut up in a town; and who, when they leave it, instead of enjoying the beauty that is wasted round them, are only thinking when they shall get back again to their beloved bricks and mortar, and do nothing but complain of the dulness of the country. I sadly fear the dulness is in themselves. They lose one of the greatest of earthly pleasures, one of earth's highest and purest—and dead indeed must be my heart, when the country and its beauty ceases to be my

Her contributions to this publication are the ballads "Agatha," and "All Aben Fahar;" the poems, "My Country Home," "A Legend of St. John's Eve," "Dreams," &c.; "Lindaraxa," and "Albayaldos," two mixed articles, translated and adapted from the Spanish; "Superstitions of the West of England," &c. &c.

joy and delight, and the heightener of every pleasure I may have in it. I trust my lot may always be cast in it; for truly do I feel the force of 'God made the country, but man made the town.'

I saw a beautiful little bit about it in Sharpe's Magazine."³

In the same loving spirit with which her heart cleaved to her home, did she love her native England. She was no politician whatever; probably she had never read one parliamentary debate—she knew nothing of the questions which give rise to parties and their strifes. But in all that concerned the superiority, the honour, the well-being of her country, she felt a keen and jealous interest: and those who wished to kindle the soft repose of her countenance into brilliant animation, had only to suggest some topic connected with the fair fame of her fatherland. In her copy of "the Lay of the Last Minstrel," the well-known verses, "Lives there a man with soul so dead?" &c. are doubly dashed in pencil; and her deep English feelings, and hostility to the cause of the invading spoiler, are prominent in her noble ballad of "Wulfstan."⁴

The distinguishing feature of Annabel C—'s temperament was its poetical and romantic character. She did not versify to gain a coterie celebrity; poetry was her element; she delighted in the works of its great masters from a child; she stored it from external nature with the instinct of the bee; she extracted its subtle essence intuitively from the ordinary objects and incidents of life; and it sprang up within her as a perennial fountain. Her poetry is the pure image of her very being:—

"—velut fidis arcana sodalibus olim
Credbat libris; neque si malè cesserat, usquam
Decurrens aliò, neque si bene. Quo fit ut omnis Votivâ pateat veluti descripta tabellâ
Vita."

When we speak of her romantic feeling, we are very far from intending what is commonly understood by that term, a maudlin boarding-school sentimentality. For such a disposition, when she encountered it, she had only a good-humoured laugh. Her romance, on the contrary, was fresh, free, and joyous. It was the high-toned, chivalrous, confiding, generous spirit which breathes in the writings of Spenser,⁵ Scott, Southey, and Fouqué, all of whom she ardently admired (with the two first, indeed, she was conversant in early childhood); a spirit which was kindled in them by the old balladists, in whose writings she took immeasurable delight; particularly in the Spanish ballads and romances, several of which she translated for this publication.

(3) We are not able to particularize the passage to which she alludes.

(4) Original Ballads, by living Authors, edited by the Rev. Henry Thompson. Masters, 1850. (Reviewed in our Number for February last.) In criticising this work, the Morning Post found "space" only for one ballad, "Little Agnes," which was Annabel C—'s; and which he thus introduced: "We are sorry that this lady does not give us her name in full; for the very soul of poetry and of truth dwells in the following lines. They evince a rare poetic genius." It was pleasing to witness the genuine and almost childish surprise with which she perused the above criticism.

(5) In her journal of her first visit to Westminster Abbey, she says:—"I found out Spenser's tomb by some inward feeling,—by intuition, I suppose."

Being, as we have noticed, the daughter of a clergyman, she was also the child of her father's church. As she was a warm patriot, though no politician, so was she a decided and devout churchwoman, though no controversialist. Without depreciating the importance of the religious controversies of the day, it is not too much to say, that Annabel C— lived above them. Her career was not unlike that of the first Christian disciples, ere controversy had arisen. Her religion, like all her feelings, partook largely of her poetical temperament. The Bible she received as the rule of her life, and the Prayer-book, of her devotion; and none, perhaps, more fully entered into the spirit of either. With the writings of Keble and Williams, two of the deepest expositors of both, she deeply sympathised, their poetical and spiritual character being equally congenial to her mind; and from the numerous passages in their poetry which she has dashed with her pencil, a fair estimate may be gained of her faithful, but simple, theology. Faith, hope, love of God and human kind, contemplation of the Divine love, and of the beauty of the Divine works, have always elicited these simple tokens of her joyous and thankful approval. There was no belief in which she more delighted than the certainty that all is for the best; and a mourner was deeply comforted in opening her "Christian Year" for the first time after her departure, at this stanza, dashed throughout, and the last two lines doubly :—

"Raise thy repining eyes, and take true measure
Of thine eternal treasure;
The Father of thy Lord can grudge thee nought;
The world for thee was bought.
And as this landscape broad, earth, sea, and sky,
All centres in thine eye,
SO ALL GOD DOES, IF RIGHTLY UNDERSTOOD, SHALL WORK THY FINAL GOOD."

In the "Thoughts in Past Years," she has, in like manner, marked the sentiment :—

"Though pain and grief prevail, that God is good,
That nothing can be evil on this earth
Wherein his sacred Spirit hath abode,
Save what from man and evil will have birth."

And a little fragment of a poem just begun, found among her papers, sets forth :—

"There is a proverb I have heard,
So full of peace and rest,
In glittering gold I would write each word:
'ALL THINGS ARE FOR THE BEST.'

"I would make it the motto to rule my life,
To still a restless heart,
The oil to quiet the waters of strife—"

From this habit of contemplating what may be called the day-side of nature,—the world in the light and guidance of the providential Eye,—it may readily be inferred that she exhibited on all occasions a buoyant cheerfulness, which indeed remarkably sustained her through an illness of six months. Hence, too, religion wore in her a winning and attractive aspect; nor indeed were its severities requisite in one who had lived so near to baptismal purity. In the quiet holy walk of Christian peace and love she was ever to be found. In the cottages of the poor, and in the Sunday-school, her vacant place has called forth many a word of love and sorrow.

But cheerful as were her thoughts on religion, they were solemn too; and though she could not have contemplated, until the later part of her illness, so early a departure, yet she kept the event itself before her eyes. Williams's sonnet "On a picture of the Crucifixion," which is dashed by her pencil throughout, concludes,

—"Oh! o'er my spirit reign!
Teach me each day to bear my cross with thee;
And when night's curtains close, be ever near!
Be thou my pilot through night's cloudy sea!
Be thou the silent chariot's charioteer!
And when ere long I sink on couch of death,
Oh let me in thine arms resign my breath!"

The following passage from "The Mountain Home" of the same poet, also marked by her pencil, is a striking representation of her feelings on the same subject :—

—"If the storms
Gather around me, and the waterfloods
Roll o'er my soul, oh! let no envious clouds
Hide from mine eyes that solitary star,
Rising in loveliness beyond the storm!
Oh! o'er the howling wilderness of waves,
Let not faith fail to bear me up! Be Thou
My guardian, Thou my guide! Thee may I see
When earth is fading from my dying eyes!
Thee may I hold with faltering hand! Awhile,
And all this strange terraqueous scene of things
Shall be but like a sick man's dream, or gleams
That come upon the dawn of infancy;
And all our tears but like the dews of night,
Lost in the presence of the eternal sun."

But her contemplation of death in its awfulness, no less than its peace and blessedness, was evinced not only by her notice of passages like these;—it frequently became the subject of her own pen. Our readers remember the beautiful "Legend of St. John's Eve," in a former volume of this magazine. But a poem found amongst her papers, and dated 1844, not only so fully illustrates her feeling in this respect, but is so accurate a description of her own departure and its concomitant circumstances, that it may seem a presentiment, and may well stand as the closing scene.

"Maiden! maiden! on thy bed of death
Low dost thou lie!
Convulsively comes thy struggling breath—
This is to die!"

"Around thy pallid couch thy loved ones stand;
In each heart, woe;
To heaven is raised each pray'r-uplifted hand—
It should be so!"

"Thy lips are moving—thou dost strive to pray
With those around;
Thy palsied tongue may not—it dies away,
The uniform'd sound."

"To the dim heavens (dim to thee) thou'st raised
Thy aching eyes;
Now are they closed—for the last time thou'st gazed
On those bright skies."

"Thou hast gazed thy last on that blue heaven
From here below;
Yet to all who love God is the promise given Thither to go.
May it with thee be so!"

Amen!

It is a most consolatory reflection, that, though the subject of this memoir was called away in the very opening of that life which she was so well fitted to enjoy and adorn, she was not only screened from the troubles and temptations of later years, but the few she lived were exquisitely happy. Beneath the parental roof, in the home of her affections, amid warm friendships and the attachment of all who knew her, in the midst of the most exquisite natural objects, from which she drew such pure and unfailing delight; in the enjoyment of her favourite pleasures of literature, and in the exercises of piety and beneficence, she passed her brief career—and at last fell asleep, consoled by all the offices of religion, and surrounded by those she loved the dearest. Even her grave bears witness to the loving regret of those who knew her, adorned as it is every Sunday with crosses and crowns of her own beloved flowers. It would seem that the prayer of a clergyman who visited her father's house during her childhood, and wrote it in a little book which she kept, was no less exactly fulfilled than her father's own.

"Let the full heart disclose its fervent hope:
May no dark cloud e'er interrupt that brightness,
No scowling blast assail a form so lovely;
Mid peace divine, and joys which know no end,
Be it thy lot to flourish. So, having borne
The fruits of faith, and hope, and sacred love,
Be thou transplanted to a happier clime,
E'en to the garden of the Lord on high,
There to abide and flourish evermore!"

The last verses she published appeared in the "Keepsake" for the present year, without any signature. They were written long before publication, and published before her last illness—and they remarkably echo at the close of her life what her father had besought at its rise:—

"I sigh not for the poet's wreath,
The victor's mood of song;
I would not on the world's cold breath
My name be borne along.

"True woman is my heart within,
All earthly things above;
I would my name a home should win
In the hearts of those I love.

"I would not, when in chancel old
At last I lie at rest,
That they should carve the marble cold
For me in scroll and crest;

"But rather, that my name should be
A holy thing,—enshrined
Within the deep, deep memory
Of the loved ones left behind."

Never was desire more completely fulfilled. The name of Annabel C— is for ever a holy thing, and those who were privileged with her affection must cherish it in the inmost depths of memory. From her marked copy of the "Lyra Innocentium," she seems to address them individually:—

"Thy first glad earthly task is o'er,
And dreary seems thy way.
But what if nearer than before
She watch thee e'en to-day?"

"What if henceforth by heaven's decree
She leave thee not alone,
But in her turn prove guide to thee,
In ways to angels known?"

* * * * *

"In loving hope, with her unseen,
Walk as in hallow'd air;
When foes are strong, and trials keen,
Think, 'What if she be there?'"

Such thoughts may well prepare the bereaved to entertain a precept, commended from the same book, by the same beloved spirit:—

—"to stay
Self-loving moans—allow no way
For grief that only grieves;
But drops that cherish prayer, or speed
The pure resolve, or dutious deed,—
He gave them, He receives."

Nor would the mourner here pass by two stanzas of a poem by Longfellow, ("The Light of Stars,") thus pencilled in her copy: "This one—I am so fond of it!"—(the stanzas themselves too are dashed by her pencil):—

"And thou too, whosoe'er thou art,
That readest this brief psalm,
As one by one thy hopes depart,
Be resolute and calm.

"O fear not, in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,
Know, how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong."

May the memory of Annabel C— speak no less tenderly and eloquently to our readers! When the last volume of our work began, few were less likely not to behold its last number. May our youthful readers lay this to heart; and whether their portion, when another volume shall terminate, be time or eternity, we feel that we can offer them no kindlier wish than that their life and their lot may be hers.

Our notice, we feel, would be imperfect, were we to omit the following graphic sketch, from the pen of one than whom none knew better, or loved more deeply, her whom it delineates. Those who knew her will immediately acknowledge the fidelity of the portrait; while to others it will convey the liveliest possible image of one whom they may well regret never to have seen:—

"Gifted with many accomplishments, with much personal beauty, she was yet singularly free from that dark canker, vanity, while ever the first to perceive and appreciate talent or loveliness in any of her young companions. Her beauty was peculiarly of that kind which emanates from a pure and joyous spirit, at peace with itself, and with all around;

'The quiet of her sinless heart
Was pictured in her face.'

"Few could listen to her melodious voice singing the last verse of one of Longfellow's touching little ballads,

'Be still, sad heart, and cease repining,— Behind the cloud the sun is shining,' without feeling the cheering influence of that quiet and happy temperament; few who had the pleasure of conversing with her will forget the lighting up of that radiant face, shaded by its soft brown beautiful hair—now, alas! the only treasure left to those who loved her so well! all that remains now until the morning of the resurrection!"

DEBORAH'S DIARY.²

AND NOW I have transgressed about a pin! Oh, heaven! what weak, wicked wretches we are! "Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" And the tongue is a fire, an unruly member. Sure, when I was writing, at father's dictation, such heavy charges against Eve, I privily thought I was better than she. And, sifting the doings of Mary and Anne through a somewhat censorious judgment, maybe I thought I was better than they. Alas! we know not our own selves. And so, dropping a stitch in my knitting, I must needs cry out—"Here, any of you . . . oh, mother! do bring me a pin." My sisters, as ill-luck would have it, not being by, cries she, "Forsooth, manners have come to a fine pass in these days! Bring her a pin, quotha!" Instead of making answer, "Well, 'twas disrespectful;—I ask your pardon;" I must mutter, "I see what I'm valued at—less than a pin."

"Deb, don't be undutious," says father to me. "Woulde it not have been better to fetch what you wanted, than strangely ask your mother to bring it?"

"And thereby spoil my work," answered I;—"but 'tis no matter."

"'Tis a great matter to be uncivil," says father.

"Oh! dear husband, do not concern yourself," interrupts mother; "the girl's incivility is no new matter, I protest."

On this, a battle of words on both sides, ending in tears, bitterness, and my being sent by father to my chamber till dinner. "And, Deb," he adds, gravely, but not harshly, "take no book with you, unless it be your Bible."

Soe, hither, with swelling heart, I have come. I never drew on myself such condemnation before—at least, since childish days; and could be enraged with mother, were I not enraged with myself. I'm in no hurry for dinner-time; I cannot sober down. My temples beat, and my throat has a great lump in it. Why was Nan out of the way? Yet, would she have made things better? I was in no fault at first, that's certain;—mother took offence where none was meant; but I meant offence afterwards. Lord, have mercy upon me. I can ask thy forgiveness, though not hers. And I could find it in me to ask father's too, and say, "I have sinned against heaven, and in thy . . . thy hearing!" And now I come to write that word,

I have a mind to cry; and the lump goes down, and I feel earnest to look into my Bible, and more humbled towards mother. And . . . what is it father says?—

"What better can I do, than to the place
Repairing, where he judged me, there confess Humbly my fault, and pardon beg, with tears
Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek!"

. . . He met me at the very first word. "I knew you would," he said; "I knew the kindest thing was to send you to commune with your own heart in your chamber, and be still. 'Tis there we find the Holy Spirit and Holy Saviour in waiting for us; and in the house where they abide, as long as they abide in it, there is no room for Satan to enter. But let this morning's work, Deb, be a warning to you, not thus to transgress again. As long as we are in peaceful communion among ourselves, there is a fine, invisible cobweb, too clear for mortal sight, spun from mind to mind, which the least breath of discord rudely breaks. You owe to your mother a daughter's reverence; and if you behave like a child, you must look to be punished like a child."

"I am not a mere baby, neither," I said.

"No," he replied. "I see you can make distinction between Teknia and Paidia; but a baby is the more inoffensive and less responsible agent of the two. If you are content to be a baby in grace, you must not contend for a baby's immunities. I have heard a baby cry pretty loudly about a pin."

This shut my mouth close enough.

"You are now," he added, gently, "nearly as old as your mother was when I married her."

I said, "I fear I am not much like her." He said nothing, only smiled. I made bold to pursue;—"What was she like?"

Again he was silent—at least for a minute; and then, in quite a changed tone, with somewhat hurried in it, cried,—

"Like the fresh sweetbriar and early May!

Like the fresh, cool, pure air of opening day . . .

Like the gay lark, sprung from the glittering dew . . .

An angel! yet . . . a very woman too!"

And, kicking back his chair, he got up, and began to walk hastily about the chamber, as fearlessly as he always does when he is thinking of something else, I springing up to move one or two chairs out of his way. Hearing some high voices in the offices, he presently observed, "A contentious woman is like a continually dropping. Shakspeare spoke well when he said that a sweet, low voice is an excellent thing in woman. I wish you good women would recollect that one avenue of my senses being stopt, makes me keener to any impression on the others. Where strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. Why should not we dwell in peace, in this quiet little nest, instead of rendering our home liker to a cage of unclean birds?"

Bunhill Fields, London, Oct. 1886.

People have phansied appearances of armies in y^e air, flaming swords, fields of battle, and other images;

(1) We may, perhaps, from time to time, publish some of Annabel C—'s posthumous poetry.

and, truly, the evening before we left Chalfont, methought I beheld the glories of the ancient city Ctesiphon in the sunset clouds, with gilded battlements, conspicuous far—turrets, and terraces, and glittering spires. The light-armed Parthians pouring through the gates, in coats of mail, and military pride. In the far perspective of the open plain, two ancient rivers, the one winding, t'other straight, losing themselves in the glowing distance, among the tents of the ten lost tribes. Such are one's dreams at sunset. And, when I cast down my dazed eyes on the shaded landscape, all looked, in comparison, so black and bleak, that methought how dull and dreary this lower world must have appeared to Moses when he descended from Horeb, and to our Saviour, when he came down from the Mount of Transfiguration, and to St. Paul, when he dropt from the seventh heaven.

What a click, click, the bricklayers make with their trowels, thus bringing me down from my altitudes! Sure, we hardly knew how well off we were at Chalfont, till we came back to this unlucky capital, looking as desolate as Jerusalem, when the city was ruined and the people captivated. Woods in the streets—smouldering piles—blackened, tottering walls—and inexhaustible heaps of vile rubbish. Even with closed windows, everything gets covered with a coating of fine dust. Cousin Jack yesterday picked up a half-burnt acceptance for twenty thousand pounds. There is a fine time coming for builders and architects—Anne's lover among the rest. The way she picked him up was notable. Returning to town, she falls to her old practises of daily prayers and visiting the poor. At church she sits over against a good-looking young man, recovered from the plague, whose near approach to death's door had made him more godly in his walk than the general of his age and condition. He notes her beautiful face—marks not her deformed shape; and, because that, by reason of the late distresses, the calamities of the poor have been met by unusual charities of the upper classes, he, on his errands of mercy among the rest, presently falls in with her at a poor sick man's house, and marvels when the limping stranger turns about and discovers the beautiful votaress. After one or two chance meetings, respectfully accosts her—Anne draws back—he finds a mutual friend—the acquaintance progresses; and at length, by way of first introduction to my father, he steps in to ask him (preamble supposed) to give him his eldest daughter. Then what a storm ensues! Father's objections do not transpire, no one being by but mother, who is unlikely to soften matters. But, so soon as John Herring shuts the door behind him, and walks off quickly, Anne is called down, and I follow, neither bidden nor hindered. Thereupon, father, with a red heat-spot on his cheek, asks Anne what she knows of this young man. Her answer,—“Nothing but good.” “How came she to know him at all?” . . . Silent; then makes answer, “Has seen him at Mrs. French's and elsewhere.” “Where else?” “Why, at church, and other places.” Mother here puts in—“What other places?” . . . “Heavens!

what can it signify,” Anne asks, turning short round upon her; “and especially to you, who would be glad to get quit of me on any terms?”

“Anne, Anne!” interrupts father, “does this concern of ours for you look like it? You know you are saying what is uncivil and untrue.”

“Well,” resumes Anne, her breath coming quick, “but what's the objection to John Herring?”

“John?—is he John with you already?” cries mother. “Then you must know more of him than you say.”

“Sure, mother,” cries Anne, bursting into tears, “you are enough to overcome the patience of Job. I know nothing of the young man, but that he is pious, and steady, and well bred, and well read, and a good son of reputable parents, as well to do in the world as ourselves, and that he likes me whom few like, and offers me a quiet, happy home.”

“How fast some people can talk when they like,” observes mother; at which allusion to Anne's impediment, I dart at her a look of wrath; but Nan only continues weeping.

“Come hither, child,” interposes father, holding his hand towards her; “and you, good Betty, leave us awhile to talk over this without interruption.” At which, mother, taking him literally, sweeps up her work, and quits the room. “The address of this young man,” says father, “has taken me wholly by surprise, and your encouragement of it has incontestably had somewhat of clandestine in it; notwithstanding which, I have, and can have, nothing in view, dear Nan, but your well-being. As to his calling, I take no exceptions at it, even though, like Cæmentarius, he should say, I am a bricklayer, and have got my living by my labour—”

Father stopt for a moment; then resumed. “You talk of his offering you a quiet home: why should you be dissatisfied with your own, where, in the main, we are all very happy together? In these evil times, 'tis something considerable to have, as it were, a little chamber on the wall, where your candle is lighted by the Lord, your table spread by him, your bed made by him in your health and sickness, and where he stands behind the door, ready to come in and sup with you. All this you would leave for one you know not. How bitterly may you hereafter look back on your present lot! You know, I have the apostle's word for it, that, if I give you in marriage, I may do well; but, if I give you not, I shall do better. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy in body and spirit, and attend upon him without distraction. Thus was it with the five wise virgins, who kept their lamps ready trimmed until the coming of their Lord. I wish we only knew of five that were foolish. Time would fail me to tell you of all the godly women, both of the elder and later time, who have led single lives without superstition, and without hypocrisy. Howbeit, you may marry if you will; but you will be wiser if you abide as you are, after my judgment. Let me not to the marriage of true minds oppose impediment; but, in your own case——"

"Father," interrupts Anne, "you know I am ill at speaking; but permit me to say, you are now talking wide of the mark. Without going back to the beginning of the world, or all through the Romish calendar, I will content me with the more recent instance of yourself, who have thrice preferred marriage, with all its concomitant evils, to the single state you laud so highly. Is it any reason we should not dwell in a house, because St. Jerome lived in a cave? The godly women of whom you speak might neither have had soe promising a home offered to them, nor so ill a home to quit."

"What call you an ill home?" says father, his brow darkening.

"I call that an ill home," returns Anne, stoutly, "where there is neither union nor sympathy—at least, for my share,—where there are no duties of which I can well acquit myself, and where those I have made for myself, and find suitable to my capacity and strength, are contemned, let, and hindered,—where my Mother-Church, my mother's Church, is reviled—my mother's family despised,—where the few friends I have made are never asked, while every attention I pay them is grudged,—where, for keeping all my hard usage from my father's hearing, all the reward I get is his thinking I have no hard usage to bear——"

"Hold, ungrateful girl!" says father; "I've heard enough, and too much. 'Tis time wasted to seek to reason with a woman. I do believe there never yet was one who would not start aside like a broken bow, or pierce the side like a snapped reed, at the very moment most dependence was placed in her. Let her husband humour her to the top of her bent,—she takes French leave of him, departs to her own kindred, and makes affection for her childhood's home the pretext for defying the laws of God and man. Let her father cherish her, pity her, bear with her, and shelter her from even the knowledge of the evils of the world without,—her ingratitude will keep pace with her ignorance, and she will forsake him for the sweetheart of a week. You think marriage the supreme bliss. A good many don't find it so. Lively passions soon burn out; and then come disappointed expectancies, vain repinings, fretful complainings, wrathful rejoinsings. You fly from collision with jarring minds. What security have you for more forbearance among your new connexions? Alas! you will carry your temper with you—you will carry your bodily infirmities with you;—your little stock of experience, reason, and patience will be exhausted before the year is out, and at its end, perhaps, you will—die——"

"As well die," cries Anne, bursting into tears, "as live to hear such a rebuke as this." And so, passionately wringing her hands, runs out of the room.

"Follow after her, Deb," cries father; "she is beside herself. Unhappy me! tried every way! An Edipus with no Antigone!"

And, rising from his seat, he began to pace up and down, while I ran up to Nan. But scarce had I reached the stair-head, when we both heard a heavy fall in the chamber below. We cried, "Sure, that is father!" and ran down quicker than we had run up. He was just rising as we entered, his foot having caught in a long coil of gold lace, which Anne, in her disorderly exit, had unwittingly dragged after her. I saw at a glance he was annoyed rather than hurt; but Nan, without a moment's pause, darts into his arms, in a passion of pity and repentance, crying, "Oh, father, father, forgive me!—oh, father!"...

"'Tis all of a piece, Nan," he replies. "Alternate hot and cold—every thing for passion, nothing for reason. Now all for me; a minute ago, I might go to the wall for John Herring."

"No, never, father!" cries Anne;—"never, dear father——"

"Dark are the ways of God," continues he, unheeding her; "not only annulling his first, best gift of light to me, and leaving me a prey to daily contempt, abuse, and wrong, but mangling my tenderest, most apprehensive feelings——"

Anne again breaks in with—"Oh! father, father!"

"Dark, dark, for ever dark!" he went on; "but just are the ways of God to man. Who shall say, 'What doest Thou?'"

"Father, I promise you," says Anne, "that I will never more think of John Herring."

"Foolish girl!" he replies, sadly; "as ready now to promise too much, as resolute just now to hear nothing. How can you promise never to think of him? I never asked it of you."

"At least I can promise not to speak of him," says Anne.

"Therein you will do wisely," rejoins father. "My consent having been asked is an admission that I have a right to give or withhold it; and, as I have already told John Herring, I shall certainly not grant it before you are of age. Perhaps by that time you may be your own mistress, without even such an ill home as I, while I live, can afford you."

"No more of that," says Anne, interrupting him; and a kiss sealed the compact.

All this time, mother and Mary were, providentially, out of the way. Mother had gone off in a huff, and Mary was busied in making some marbled veal.

The rest of the day was dull enough: violent emotions are commonly succeeded by flat stagnations. Anne, however, seemed kept up by some energy from within, and looked a little flushed. At bedtime she got the start of me, as usual; and, on entering our chamber, I found her quite undrest, sitting at the table,—not reading of her Bible, but with her head resting on it. I should have taken her to be asleep, but for the quick pulsation of some nerve or muscle at the back of the neck, somewhere under the right ear. She looks up, commences rubbing her eyes, and says, "My eyes are full of sand, I think. I will give you my new crown-piece, Deb, if you will read me to sleep without another word." So I say, "A bargain," though without meaning to take the crown; and she jumps into bed in a minute, and I begin at the Sermon on the Mount, and keep on and on, in more and more of a monotone; but every time I lookt up, I saw her eyes wide open, agaze at the top of the bed; so I go on and on, like a bee humming over a flower, till she shuts her eyes; but, at last, when I think her off, having just got to Matthew, eleven, twenty-eight, she fetches a deep sigh, and says, "I wish I could hear him saying so to me . . . 'Come, Anne, unto me, and I will give you rest.' But, in fact, he does so, as emphatically in addressing all the weary and heavy-laden, as if I heard him articulating, 'Come, Anne! come!'"

THE PRE-ADAMITE WORLD.

Among the millions of human beings that dwell on the earth, how few are those who think of inquiring into its past history. The annals of Greece and Rome are imparted to our children as a necessary and important branch of education, while the history of the world itself is neglected, or at the most is confined to those who are destined for a scientific profession; even adults are content to receive on hearsay a vague idea that the globe was in being for some undefined period preceding the era of human history, but few seek to know in what state it existed, or what appearance it presented.

This is owing, partly, to the hard names and scientific language in which geologists have clothed their science, and partly to ignorance of the beauty and attractive nature of the study; we dread the long, abstruse-sounding titles of Ichthyosaurus and Plesiosaurus, and are repelled by the dry disquisitions on mineralogy into which professors of the science are apt to stray. The truth is, however, that geology properly is divided into two distinct branches; one of these consists of the less attractive, though equally useful, investigation of the chemical constituents of the strata, and the classification of the fossil flora and fauna which belong to the various formations; this, which may be styled geology proper, is the department which belongs almost exclusively to men of science, and, inasmuch as it involves the necessity of acquaintance with the sister sciences of chemistry, mineralogy, zoology, and botany, is least adapted to the understanding of the uninitiated. The other branch, which may be called the history of geology, presents none of these difficulties; it is as easy of comprehension, and as suitable to the popular mind, as any other historical account; while it presents a variety of interest, and a revolution of events, before which the puny annals of modern history sink into insignificance.

Such of our readers as are unacquainted with the science, will probably be inclined to doubt the possibility of our being aware of events which took place ages before Adam was created; here, however, nature herself steps in, and becoming her own historian, writes "in the living rock" the chronicles of past ages, and so accurately and circumstantially, that we can say positively, "Here existed the sea at such a period, and here the tide ebbed and flowed for centuries;" nay, she shows us the footmarks of extinct animals, and tells us the size, nature, habits, and food of creatures which have for unnumbered ages been buried in the grave of time. She informs us that here the ocean was calm, and that there a river flowed into it; here forests grew and flourished, and there volcanoes vomited forth lava, while mighty earthquakes heaved up mountains with convulsive throes. Such are the events that mark the world's history, and we now purpose giving a short sketch of the various eras in its existence.

Hundreds of thousands of years ago the earth, now so busy and full of life, rolled on its ceaseless course, a vast, desolate, and sterile globe. Day and night succeeded one another, and season followed season, while yet no living form existed, and still the sun rose upon arid, verdureless continents, and hot, caldron-like seas, on which the steaming vapour and heavy fogs sat like an incubus. This is the earliest period of which we glean any positive record, and it is probable that previous to this era the universe was in a state of incandescence, or intense heat, and that by the gradual cooling of the globe, the external surface became hard, and formed a firm crust, in the same manner that molten lead, when exposed to the cold air, hardens on the surface. The vapours which previously floated around this heated mass, in like manner became partially condensed, and gradually accumulating in the hollows, formed the boiling seas which in after ages were destined to be vast receptacles teeming with life.

How long such a period continued it is impossible to say, and were we even able to number its years, we should in all probability obtain a total of such magnitude as would render us unable to form any accurate idea of its extent. Our ideas of time, like those of space, are comparative, and so immense was this single period in geological history, that any interval taken from human records would fail to present an adequate idea of it.

As might be expected, this era was marked by vast and violent convulsions; volcanoes raged and threw up molten granite, earthquakes heaved and uplifted continents, seas were displaced and inundated the land, and still the earth was enveloped in vapour and mist, arising from the high temperature, and the light most probably penetrated only sufficiently to produce a sickly twilight, while the sun shot lurid rays through the dense and foggy atmosphere. Such a world must have been incompatible with either animal or vegetable life, and we accordingly find no remains of either in the rocks which belong to this early period; their principal characteristic is a highly crystalline appearance, giving strong presumptive evidence of the presence of great heat.

After this era of desolation and gloom, we enter upon what is technically termed the "Transition period," and here we begin to mark the gradual preparation of the globe for the reception of its destined inhabitants. The change is, however, at first very slight, and there is evidence of frequent convulsions and of a high degree of temperature; but the action of fire appears to have declined in force, and aqueous agencies are exerting themselves. The earlier portion of this formation is rendered peculiarly interesting by the fact, that during it the most ancient forms of life sprung into existence. It is true that merely a few species of shell-fish, with some corals, inhabited the depths of the ocean, while the dry land still remained untenanted; nevertheless, humble and scanty as they were, we cannot fail to look with interest on the earliest types of that existence, which has subsequently reached such perfection in ourselves.

The presence of corals shows, that although the transition seas had lost their high temperature, yet they retained a sufficient degree of heat to encourage the development of animals requiring warmth. These minute animals possess the remarkable property of extracting from the elementary bodies held in solution in the waters, the materials for forming new rocks. To the coral animalcule or polype we owe much of the vast limestone beds which are found in every part of the world, and many a vessel laden with the riches and productions of the earth finds a grave on the sunken reefs that are the fruit of its labours.

As ages elapsed, and the universe became better adapted for the reception of life, the waters swarmed with zoophytes and corals, and in the silurian strata we find organic remains abundant; shell-fish are numerous and distinct in form, and in some instances display a very interesting anatomical construction. As an instance we may mention the Trilobite, an animal of the crustacean order; the front part of its body formed a large crescent-shaped shield, while the hinder portion consisted of a broad triangular tail, composed of segments folding over each other like the tail of a lobster; its most peculiar organ, however, was the eye, which was composed of four hundred minute spherical lenses placed in separate compartments, and so situated, that in the animal's usual place at the bottom of the ocean it could see everything around. This kind of eye is also common to the existing butterfly and dragon-fly, the former of which has 35,000, and the latter 14,000 lenses.

Continuing to trace the history of this ancient period, we reach what is called among geologists the Old Red Sandstone age. The corals, and the shell-fish, and the crustacea of the former period have passed away, and in their place we find fishes; thus presenting to us the earliest trace of the highest order of the animal kingdom—vertebrata. The plants in this system are few, and it would seem as if the condition of the world was ill-adapted for their growth. Another peculiar characteristic of this era is the state of calm repose in which the ocean appears to have remained; in many rocks the ripple mark left by the tide on the shores of the ancient seas is clearly visible; nevertheless considerable volcanic action must have taken place, if we are to believe geologists, who find themselves unable to account otherwise for the preponderance of mineral matter which seems to have been held in solution by the waters.

We now pass on to the Carboniferous period, and a marked change at once strikes us as having taken place. In the previous era few plants appear to have existed; now they flourished with unrivalled luxuriance. Ferns, cacti, gigantic equisetums, and many plants of which there are no existing types, grew, and lived, and died in vast impenetrable forests; while the bulrush and the cane, or genera nearly allied to them, occupied the swamps and lowlands. This is the period when the great coal beds and strata of ironstone were deposited, which supply us with fuel for our fires, and materials for our machinery. The interminable forests that grew and died in the lapse of centuries were gradually borne down by the rivers and torrents to the ocean, at whose bottom they ultimately found a resting place. A considerable portion of the land also seems to have been slowly submerged, as in some cases fossil trees and plants are found in an upright position, as they originally grew.

There is no period in geological history so justly deserving of examination as this. To the coal beds then deposited Great Britain in a great measure owes national and mercantile greatness. Dr. Buckland, in speaking of this remote age, remarks in his Bridge-water Treatise, that "the important uses of coal and iron in administering to the supply of our daily wants, give to every individual amongst us, in almost every moment of our lives, a personal concern, of which but few are conscious, in the geological events of these very distant eras. We are all brought into immediate connexion with the vegetation that clothed the ancient earth before one half of its actual surface had yet been formed. The trees of the primeval forests have not, like modern trees, undergone decay, yielding back their elements to the soil and atmosphere by which they had been nourished; but treasured up in subterranean storehouses, have been transformed into enduring beds of coal, which in these latter ages have been to man the sources of heat, and light, and wealth. My fire now burns with fuel, and my lamp is shining with the light of gas derived from coal, that has been buried for countless ages in the deep and dark recesses of the earth. We prepare our food, and maintain our forges and furnaces, and the power of our steam-engines, with the remains of plants of ancient forms and extinct species, which were swept from the earth ere the formation of the transition strata was completed. Our instruments of cutlery, the tools of our mechanics, and the countless machines which we construct by the infinitely varied applications of iron, are derived from ore, for the most part coeval with, or more ancient than the fuel, by the aid of which we reduce it to its metallic state, and apply it to innumerable uses in the economy of human life. Thus, from the wreck of forests that waved upon the surface of the primeval lands, and from ferruginous mud that was lodged at the bottom of the primeval waters, we derive our chief supplies of coal and iron, those two fundamental elements of art and industry, which contribute more than any other mineral production of the earth to increase the riches, and multiply the comforts, and ameliorate the condition of mankind."

This may justly be styled the golden age of the pre-adamite world; the globe having now cooled to a sufficient temperature to promote the growth of plants without being injurious to them, is for the first time clothed in all the rich verdure of a tropical climate. Doubtless the earth would have presented a lovely aspect, had it been possible to have beheld it; the mighty forests unawakened by a sound save that of the sighing of the wind; the silent seas, in which the new-born denizens of the deep roamed at will; the vast inland lakes for ages unruffled but by the fitful breeze; all present to the mind's eye a picture of surpassing, solitary grandeur.

The creatures that existed, though differing from those of the previous age, were still confined to the waters; as yet the dry land remained untenanted. The fishes give evidence of a higher organization, and many of them appear to have been of gigantic dimensions. Some teeth which have been found of one kind, the Megalichthys, equal in size those of the largest living crocodiles.

There is one peculiarity respecting fossil fishes which is worthy of remark. It is that, in the lapse of time from one era to another, their character does not change insensibly, as in the case of many zoophytes and testacea; on the contrary, species seem to succeed species abruptly, and at certain definite intervals. A celebrated geologist¹ has observed, that not a single species of fossil fish has yet been found that is common to any two great geological formations, or that is living in our own seas.

Continuing our investigation, we next find the fruitful coal era passing away; scarcely a trace of vegetation remains; a few species of zoophytes, shells, and fishes are to be found, and we observe the impression of footsteps, technically called ichnites, from the Greek ichnon, a footmark. These marks present a highly interesting memento of past ages. Persons living near the sea-shore must have frequently observed the distinctness with which the track of birds and other animals is imprinted in the sand. If this sand were to be hardened by remaining exposed to the action of the sun and air, it would form a perfect mould of the foot; this is exactly what occurred in these early ages, and the hollow becoming subsequently filled by the deposition of new sediment, the lower stone retained the impression, while the upper one presented a cast in relief. Many fossil footmarks have been found in the rocks belonging to this period.

It is evident from the fact of footmarks being found, that creatures capable of existing on dry land were formed about this time, and we accordingly find the remains of a new order—Reptiles. These animals, which now constitute but a small family among existing quadrupeds, then flourished in great size and numbers. Crocodiles and lizards of various forms and gigantic stature roamed through the earth. Some of the most remarkable are those which belong to the genus Ichthyosaurus, or fish-lizard, so called from the resemblance of their vertebræ to those of fishes. This saurian Dr. Buckland describes as something similar in form to the modern porpoise; it had four broad feet, and a long and powerful tail; its jaws were so prodigious that it could probably expand them to a width of five or six feet, and its powers of destruction must have been enormous. The length of some of these reptiles exceeded thirty feet.

Another animal which lived at this period was the Plesiosaurus. It lived in shallow seas and estuaries, and would seem, from its organs of respiration, to have required frequent supplies of fresh air. Mr. Conybeare describes it as "swimming upon, or near the surface, arching its long neck like the swan, and occasionally darting it down at the fish which happened to float within its reach."

This reptile, which was smaller than the Ichthyosaurus, has been found as long as from twelve to fifteen feet. Its appearance and habits differed from the latter materially. The Ichthyosaurus, with its short neck, powerful jaws, and lizard-like body, seems admirably suited to range through the deep waters, unrivalled in size or strength, and monarch of the then existing world; the Plesiosaurus, smaller in size and inferior in strength, shunned its powerful antagonist, and, lurking in shallows and sheltered bays, remained secure from the assaults of its dangerous foe, its long neck and small head being well adapted to enable it to dart on its prey, as it lay concealed amid the tangled sea-weed.

This has been called by geologists the "age of reptiles;" their remains are found in great numbers in the lias, oolite, and wealden strata. These creatures seem to form a connecting link between the fishes of the previous era, and the mammalia of the Tertiary age; the Ichthyosaurus differed little from a fish in shape, and its paddles or feet are not unlike fins; the Plesiosaurus, on the contrary, as its name denotes, partook more of the quadruped form. Dr. Buckland in describing it says: "To the head of a lizard it united the teeth of a crocodile; a neck of enormous length, resembling the body of a serpent; a trunk and tail having the proportions of an ordinary quadruped; the ribs of a camelion, and the paddles of a whale." Besides these animals we find the Pterodactyle, half bird and half reptile; the Megalosaurus, or gigantic lizard; the Hylæosaurus, or forest lizard; the Geosaurus, or land lizard, and many others, all partaking more or less of affinity to both the piscatory and saurian tribes.

Passing on now to the period when the great chalk rocks which prevail so much in the south-eastern counties of Great Britain were deposited, we find the land in many places submerged; the fossil remains are eminently marine in character, and the earth must literally have presented a "world of waters" to the view. Sponges, corals, star-fish, and marine reptiles inhabited the globe, and plants, chiefly of marine types, grew on its surface. Although, however, a great portion of the earth was under water, it must not therefore be supposed that it was returning to its ancient desolation and solitude. The author whom we last quoted, in speaking of this subject says: "The sterility and solitude which have sometimes been attributed to the depths of the ocean, exist only in the fictions of poetic fancy. The great mass of water that covers nearly three-fourths of the globe is crowded with life, perhaps more abundantly than the air and the surface of the earth; and the bottom of the sea, within a certain depth accessible to light, swarms with countless hosts of worms and creeping things, which represent the kindred families of low degree which crawl upon the land."

This era seems to have been one of peculiar tranquillity, for the most part undisturbed by earthquakes or other igneous forces. The prevailing characteristic of the scenery was flatness, and low continents were surrounded by shallow seas. The earth is now approaching the state when it will be fit for the reception of man, and in the next age we find some of the existing species of animals.

It is worthy of observation, that at the different periods when the world had attained a state suitable for their existence, the various orders of animal and vegetable life were created. In the "dark ages" of geological history, when the globe had comparatively lately subsided from a state of fusion,¹ it was barren, sterile, and uninhabited; next, the waters having become cool enough, some of the lowest orders of shell-fish and zoophytes peopled them; subsequently fishes were formed, and for ages constituted the highest order of animal life; after this we enter on the age of reptiles, when gigantic crocodiles and lizard-like forms dwelt in fenny marshes, or reposed on the black mud of slow moving rivers, as they crept along towards the ocean betwixt their oozy banks; and we now reach the period when the noblest order of animal life, the class to which man himself belongs, Mammalia, begun to people the earth.

The world now probably presented an appearance nearly similar to what it does at present. The land, which in the chalk formation was under water, has again emerged, and swarms with life; vast savannahs rich in verdure, and decked in a luxuriant garb with trees, plants, grasses, and shrubs, and inland lakes to which the elephant, the rhinoceros, and the hippopotamus, with many extinct races of animals, came to slake their thirst, form the principal characteristics of this period.

There is something peculiarly interesting in looking back to this early age, while Adam was yet dust. We picture to the mind's eye the gigantic Deinotherium, the largest creature of terrestrial life, raking and grubbing with its huge tusks the aquatic plants that grew in the pools and shallow lakes, or, as Dr. Buckland describes it, sleeping with its head hooked on to the bank, and its nostrils sustained above water so as merely to breathe, while the body remained floating at ease beneath the surface. We see its twin-brother in greatness, the Megatherium, as it comes slowly stalking through the thick underwood, its foot, of a yard in length, crushing where it treads, and its impenetrable hide defying the attacks of rhinoceros or crocodile. In the waters we behold the mighty whale, monarch of the deep, sporting in the pre-adamite seas as he now does amid the icebergs of the Arctic ocean; the walrus and the seal, now denizens of the colder climes, mingling with the tropical manati; while in the forests the owl, the buzzard, and the woodcock dwelt undisturbed, and the squirrel and monkey leaped from bough to bough.

Arrived at the close of the pre-adamite history, after having traced it from the earliest ages of which we possess any evidence, down to the eve of human existence, the reflection that naturally presents itself to the mind is the strangeness of the fact, that myriads of creatures should have existed, and that generation after generation should have lived and died and passed away, ere yet man saw the light. We are so accustomed to view all creatures as created solely for human use, rather than for the pleasure of the Divine Creator, that we can at first scarcely credit the history, though written by the hand of nature herself; and the human race sinks into insignificance when it is shown to be but the last link in a long chain of creations. Nevertheless that such, however humbling it may be, is the fact, we possess indubitable evidence: and when we consider, as Mr. Bakewell observes, "that more than three-fifths of the earth's present surface are covered by the ocean, and that if from the remainder we deduct the space occupied by polar ice and eternal snows, by sandy deserts, sterile mountains, marshes, rivers, and lakes, that the habitable portion will scarcely exceed one-fifth of the whole globe; that the remaining four-fifths, though untenanted by mankind, are for the most part abundantly stocked with animated beings, that exult in the pleasure of existence, independent of human control, and in no way subservient to the necessities or caprices of men; that such is and has been for several thousand years the actual condition of our planet; we may feel less reluctance in admitting the prolonged ages of creation, and the numerous tribes that lived and flourished and left their remains imbedded in the strata which compose the outer crust of the earth."

"Your family, though not a nunnery, may be a religious house; seeing God hath multiplied you into a whole convent; I mean the fourteen children which you have at this present: I say 'have;' for this reason is rendered why the children of Job, after his restitution, were not doubled unto him as his cattle were,—because they were utterly foregone, his children only gone before: on which account those six removed from you into a better world still remain yours. God, in due time, translate you and your worthy husband, in a good old age, into the same place of happiness.”—FULLER: Church History of Britain; Book VI. Dedication of Sect. III. to Lady Mary Fountaine.

The beautiful poem of Wordsworth, “We are Seven,” which embodies, in a familiar form, the leading idea in the above passage of Fuller, is engraven on many a memory, and dear to many a heart. I would gladly set down the whole of it here, were I not apprehensive that it would occupy more space than may conveniently be allotted to it; but let me quote the stanzas which it may be thought specially interesting to compare with the preceding extract from the quaintly eloquent church historian:—

* * * * *

“ ‘Sisters and brothers, little maid,
How many may you be?’
‘How many? seven in all,’ she said,
And wondering look’d at me.

“ ‘And where are they? I pray you tell.’
She answer’d, ‘Seven are we;
And two of us at Conway dwell,
And two are gone to sea.

“ ‘Two of us in the churchyard lie,
My sister and my brother;
And in the churchyard cottage I
Dwell near them with my mother.’

* * * * *

“ ‘How many are you then,’ said I,
‘If they two are in heaven?’
The little maiden did reply,
‘Oh, master, we are seven.’

“ ‘But they are dead; those two are dead!
Their spirits are in heaven!’
’Twas throwing words away: for still
The little maid would have her will,
And said, ‘Nay, we are seven!’”

When thinking on the subject illustrated in this article, the biblical reader will naturally call to mind the sublime language uttered by our Great Teacher, when confuting the grand error of the Sadducees:—
“He is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto Him.”—St. Luke xx. 38.

“ ‘Oft, on a plat of rising ground,
I hear the far-off curfew sound,
Over some wide water’d shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar:
(Or, if the air will not permit,
Some still removed place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
Teach light to counterfeit a gloom:
Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth,
Or the bellman’s drowsy charm,
To bless the doors from nightly harm.”

Il Penseroso.

From Milton’s fire-light reverie let us now turn to Cowper’s:—

“Just when our drawing-rooms begin to blaze
With lights, by clear reflection multiplied
From many a mirror, in which he of Gath,

Goliath, might have seen his giant bulk,
Whole without stooping, towering crest and all,
My pleasures too begin. But me perhaps
*The glowing hearth may satisfy awhile
With faint illumination, that uplifts
The shadows to the ceiling, there by fits Dancing uncouthly to the quiv’ring flame.*
Not undelightful is an hour to me
So spent in parlour twilight: such a gloom
Suits well the thoughtful or unthinking mind,
The mind contemplative, with some new theme Pregnant, or indisposed alike to all.”

The Task, B. IV.

The kitchen twilight of a more humble bard shows us a different scene, and gives us an agreeable opportunity of contrasting a peep at social life in a rustic circle with the glimpses we just now had of lonely poets in their sequestered musings.

“Him,” though the cold may pierce, and storms molest,
Succeeding hours shall cheer with warmth and rest;
Gladness to spread, and raise the grateful smile,
He hurls the faggot bursting from the pile,
And many a log and rifted trunk conveys,
To heap the fire, and wide extend the blaze,
That quiv’ring strong through every opening flies,
Whilst smoky columns unobstructed rise.
For the rude architect, unknown to fame,
(Nor symmetry nor elegance his aim,) Who spread his floors of solid oak on high,
On beams rough-hewn from age to age that lie,
Bade his wide fabric unimpair’d sustain
The orchard’s store, and cheese, and golden grain;
Bade from its central base, capacious laid,
The well-wrought chimney rear its lofty head;
Where since hath many a savoury ham been stored,
And tempests howl’d, and Christmas gambols rour’d.

*Flat on the hearth the glowing embers lie,
And flames reflected dance in every eye:*
There the long billet, forced at last to bend,
While gushing sap froths out at either end,
Throws round its welcome heat:—the ploughman smiles,
And oft the joke runs hard on sheepish Giles,
Who sits joint tenant of the corner-stool,
The converse sharing, though in duty’s school;
For now attentively ’tis his to hear
Interrogations from the master’s chair.
‘Left ye your bleating charge, when day-light fled,
Near where the hay-stack lifts its snowy head?’”

&c. &c. &c.
BLOOMFIELD’S Farmer’s Boy.—Winter.

XVI.

The “Master,” (see last article,) after reminding the boy of the duty of humanity towards the animals entrusted to his charge, recommends to him content with his own lot, by representing his labours and trials as a trifle in comparison with the dangers and hardships of the sea-boy;—

* * * * *

“Thine utmost sufferings in the coldest day
A period terminates, and joys repay.
Perhaps e’en now, while here these joys we boast,
Full many a bark rides down the neighb’ring coast,
Where the high northern waves tremendous roar,
Drove down by blasts from Norway’s icy shore.
The sea-boy there, less fortunate than thou,

(1) The Farmer’s Boy.

Feels all thy pains in all the gusts that blow ;
His freezing hands, now drench'd, now dry, by turns ;
Now lost, now seen, the distant light that burns,
On some tall cliff upraised, a flaming guide,
That throws its friendly radiance o'er the tide.
His labours cease not with declining day,
But toils and perils mark his wat'ry way ;
And whilst in peaceful dreams secure we lie,
The ruthless whirlwinds rage along the sky,
Round his head whistling ;—and shalt thou repine,
While this protecting roof still shelters thine ? ”

—curiously enough, though very naturally, suggesting a train of thought in strong contrast with that which Shakspeare, in a well-known passage, ascribes to Henry IV. when comparing his situation with that of the sailor-urchin :—

—“ Sleep, gentle sleep,

* * *

O thou dull god, why liest thou with the vile,
In loathsome beds ; and leav'st the kingly couch,
A watch-case, or a common 'larum-bell ?
Wilt thou upon the high and giddy mast
Seal up the ship-boy's eyes, and rock his brains
In cradle of the rude imperious surge ;
And in the visitation of the winds,
Who take the ruffian billows by the top,
Curling their monstrous heads, and hanging them
With deafning clamours in the slippery shrouds,
That, with the hurly, death itself awakes ?
Canst thou, O partial sleep ! give thy repose
To the wet sea-boy in an hour so rude ;
And, in the calmest and most stillest night,
With all appliances and means to boot,
Deny it to a king ? Then, happy low, lie down !
Unconscious lies the head that wears a crown.”

Olcon. “ O, let those cities, that of Plenty's cup
And her prosperities so largely taste,
With their superfluous riots, hear these tears !
The misery of Tharsus may be theirs.”

Shaksp. (?) Pericles, Prince of Tyre, Act I. Sc. IV.

... “ If we could from the battlements of heaven
Cape how many men and women at this time lie fainting and dying for want of bread, how many young men are hewn down by the sword of war, how many poor orphans are now weeping over the graves of their father, by whose life they are enabled to eat ; if we could but hear how many mariners and passengers are at this present in a storm, and shriek out because their keel dashes against a rock, or bulges under them, how many people there are that weep with want, and are mad with oppression, or are desperate by too quick a sense of a constant infeli-city ; in all reason we should be glad to be out of the noise and participation of so many evils. This is a place of sorrows and tears, of great evils and a constant calamity : let us remove from hence, at least in affections and preparations of mind.”—JER. TAYLOR. Holy Dying, Chap. I. end.

“ Ah ! little think the gay licentious proud,
Whom pleasure, power, and affluence surround,
They who their thoughtless hours in giddy mirth,
And wanton, often cruel, riot waste ;
Ah, little think they, while they dance along,
How many feel this very moment death
And all the sad variety of pain.
How many sink in the devouring flood,
Or more devouring flame. How many bleed
By shameful variance betwixt man and man.
How many pine in want and dungeon glooms,
Shut from the common air, and common use

Of their own limbs. How many drink the cup
Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread
Of misery. Sore pierced by wintry winds,
How many shrink into the sordid hut
Of cheerless poverty. How many shake
With all the fiercer tortures of the mind,
Unbounded passion, madness, guilt, remorse ;
Whence, tumbled headlong from the height of life,
They furnish matter for the tragic Muse.
E'en in the vale, where Wisdom loves to dwell
With Friendship, Peace, and Contemplation join'd,
How many, rack'd with honest passions, droop
In deep retired distress. How many stand
Around the death-bed of their dearest friends,
And point the parting anguish. Thought fond Man
Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills
That one incessant struggle render life,
One scene of toil, of suffering, and of fate,
Vice, in his high career, would stand appall'd,
And heedless, rambling Impulse learn to think ;
The conscious heart of Charity would warm,
And her wide wish Benevolence dilate ;
The social tear would rise, the social sigh,
And into clear perfection, gradual bliss,
Refining still, the social passions work.”

THOMSON.—Winter.

The reader may find it interesting to compare the particulars of the mass of “ evils that are in the world,” selected respectively by the Preacher of Golden Grove, and by the Poet of the Seasons : the conclusions drawn by them are not inconsistent ; though differing, to suit the immediate purpose of each writer. [Thomson's opening lines may remind one of the passage quoted from “ Pericles.”]

XVII.

After the picture presented in the preceding article, of this scene of trial considered in its more gloomy aspect, it may be just, as well as pleasing, to give some quotations, (all variations on one leading theme,) which convey a lesson drawn from the contemplation of “ the face of things from another point of view.”

“ If earth (that is provided for mortalitie, and is possessed by the Maker's enemies) have so much pleasure in it, that worldlings think it worth the account of their heaven ; such a sunne to enlighten it, such an heaven to wall it about, such sweet fruits and flowers to adorne it, such variety of creatures, for the commodious use of it : what must heaven needs be, that is provided for God himselfe, and his friends ? How can it be less in worth, than God is above his creatures, and God's friends better than his enemies ? I will not onely be content, but desirous to bee dissolved.”—JOS. HALL. Meditations and Vowes. Century I. 21. (1621.)

“ Although the traveller's first and chief delight is the recollection of his home, which lies as a cordial at his heart, and refreshes him everywhere, and at all seasons, this does by no means prevent him from taking that pleasure in the several objects presenting themselves on the road, which they are capable of affording, and were, indeed, intended to afford. He surveys, in passing, the works and beauties of nature and art, meadows covered with flocks, valleys waving with corn, verdant woods, blooming gardens, and stately buildings. He surveys and enjoys them, perhaps much more than their owners do, but leaves them without a sigh, reflecting on the far greater and sincerer joys that are waiting for him at home. Such, exactly, is the temper and disposition with which the Christian traveller should pass through the world. His religion does not require him to be gloomy and sullen, to shut his eyes, or to stop his ears—it debars him of no pleasure of which a thinking and reasonable man would wish to partake. It directs him not to shut himself up in a cloister, alone, there to mope away his life—but to walk abroad, to behold the things which are in heaven and earth, and to give glory to him who made them—reflecting, at the same time, that if in this fallen world, which is soon to be consumed by fire, there are so many objects to entertain and delight him, what must be the pleasures of that world which is to endure for ever, and to be his eternal home!”—Horne's Sermons: Life a Journey.

* * * * *

“O God! O good beyond compare,
If thus thy meaner works are fair,
If thus thy mercies gild the span
Of ruin'd earth and sinful man,
How glorious that abode shall be Where thy redeemed dwell with Thee!”

HEBER.

I know not how to stop without adding yet one more quotation.

.... “It is really like the ‘garden of the Lord,’ and the ‘Seraph Guard’ might keep their watch on the summit of the opposite mountains, which, seen under the morning sun, are invested in a haze of heavenly light, as if shrouding a more than earthly glory. Truly may one feel, with Von Caunitz, [see the story and poem in Sermons, vol. iv. note B.] that if the glory of God's perishable works be so great, what must be the glory of the imperishable,—what, infinitely more, of Him who is the author of both! And if I feel thrilling through me the sense of this outward beauty, innocent, indeed, yet necessarily unconscious, what is the sense one ought to have of moral beauty,—of God the Holy Spirit's creation,—of humbleness, and truth, and self-devotion, and love! Much more beautiful, because made truly after God's image, are the forms and colours of kind, and wise, and holy thoughts, and words, and actions; more truly beautiful is one hour of old Mrs. Price's [an old woman in the almshouses at Rugby] patient waiting for the Lord's time, and her cheerful and kind interest in us all, feeling as if she owed us anything,—than this glorious valley of the Velinus. For this will pass away, and that will not pass away: but that is not the great point; . . . there is in the moral beauty an inherent excellence which the natural beauty cannot have; for the moral beauty is actually, so to speak, God, and not merely His work: His living and conscious ministers, are—it is permitted us to say so—the temples of which the light is God Himself.”—*Travelling Journal: July 20, 1840. “Johnson—‘There is a witty satirical story of Foote. He had a small bust of Garrick placed upon his bureau. ‘You may be surprised (said he) that I allow him to be so near my gold; but, you will observe, he has no hands.”—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

On reading the above paragraph, I was reminded (whimsically enough, the reader may think,) of an old classical story, though the circumstances, &c., are very different.—

“A little before I [Plutarch] visited Athens, the following adventure is said to have happened:—A soldier being summoned to appear before the commanding officer upon some misdemeanour, put the little gold he had in the hands of the statue of Demosthenes, which were in some measure clenched. A small plane-tree grew by it, and many leaves, either accidentally lodged there by the winds, or purposely so placed by the soldier, covered the gold a considerable time. When he returned, and found his money entire, the fame of this accident was spread abroad, and many of the wits of Athens strove which could write the best copy of verses, to vindicate Demosthenes from the charge of corruption.”—Plutarch's Lives: (Langhorne's:) Demosthenes.

“Who knows not, and who loves not, delightful Goldsmith's delightful ‘Vicar of Wakefield?’ But may I frankly own I do not feel perfectly satisfied with good Dr. Primrose's morality in one particular? . . . “when any one of our relations was found to be a person of a very bad character, a troublesome guest, or one we desired to get rid of, upon his leaving my house I ever took care to lend him a riding-coat, or a pair of boots, or sometimes a horse of small value, and I always had the satisfaction to find he never came back to return them.”——Doubtless in this case

. . “the pleasure was as great
In being cheated as to cheat;”

yet, in spite of the saying, “Volenti non fit injuria,” a severe casuist might not quite approve of this mode of putting in people's way temptations to cheating. However, I suppose it was an understood conventionality among the clan of Primrose.

The politician as well as poet, Prior, might have ‘put up’ the vicar to such an ‘artful dodge;’ witness his Epigram, written to the Duke de Noailles.

“Vain the concern which you express,
That uncalled Alard will possess
Your house and coach both day and night;
And that Macbeth was haunted less
By Banquo's restless sprite.
With fifteen thousand pounds a-year,
Do you complain you cannot bear
An ill you may so soon retrieve?
Good Alard, faith, is modest
By much, than you believe.
Lend him but fifty Louis-d'or;
And you will never see him more:
Take the advice; Probatum est.
Why do the gods indulge our store,
But to secure our rest?”

THE DUKE OF KENT.

MR. NEALE's Life of the Duke of Kent has been published somewhat late in the day; rather too much in the afternoon of the events to which it is related. Nevertheless, even at the present period, it is worthy of consideration, and may agreeably entertain the reading public for a season. It would seem, indeed, that this Edward, Duke of Kent, was really, as Dr. Maton styled him, "a most princely-minded man;" not merely a prince by birth and station, but a prince also among the lofty aristocracy of noble minds. As his life was a troubled and eventful one, and his memory has been long lying under some unmerited suspicions, it is highly proper that an authentic record of his actual deeds and character should be rendered public, for the satisfaction of a reasonable curiosity, and also as a means of vindicating a reputation that has been in some respects aspersed and unfairly represented.

Such a record, having every appearance of faithfulness and credibility, Mr. Neale has here produced. He had many qualifications for the work. He knew the Duke; retains an "indelible recollection of his courtesy and kindness," during a certain "memorable interview;" has been at different times acquainted with several persons competent to speak of his habits, peculiarities, and circumstances; had opportunities of gaining large access to documents necessary to be consulted; possessed sufficient industry and patience for their due investigation, and the needful ability for arranging and reproducing them in a shape readable and convenient: he is, moreover, a man of evident candour and calm judgment; knows and respects all the conventional amenities; and has the aptitude and talent requisite for a delicate handling of his subject. His object, as he affirms, is "to do justice to a noble-minded man," whom he conceives to have been throughout his life "most harshly, unfairly, and spitefully treated." By such a sentence, Mr. Neale evidently casts blame on somebody; and it is only fair that it should fall where it is due: this is his intention, and for the rest, he leaves his book to fate.

Feeling the interest of the work, and supposing that sundry readers—in these days of competition, agricultural hardship, over-population, dreadful stress of pauperism, and a ruinous weight of taxes—may not care to spend fourteen shillings on a single volume, it is proposed, for their benefit, to select some of the main particulars it contains, and to present them for larger circulation in the present pages. Let the reader bear in mind the straitness of our space, the severe brevity that must be practised, and believe that we design to do the utmost that is possible for his curiosity; and then, perhaps, he may realize a state of mind which may incline him to be thankful for what he gets.

Edward Augustus, fourth son of George III., was born at Buckingham House, at noon, on the second of November, 1767. In allusion to his birth, he was sometimes heard to say,—"My arrival was somewhat mal-à-propos. The month was gloomy, November; the court was enveloped in gloom, for it was a season of mourning; one of my uncles, a great favourite with my father, was then lying dead in his coffin; his funeral, in fact, took place some twenty-four hours after my birth. Sometimes the thought has crossed me, whether my inopportune appearance was not ominous of the life of gloom and struggle which awaited me."

"The Duke's childhood," says Mr. Neale, "as that of princes generally, may be passed over as affording little scope for observation; but at an early period of life, he was placed under the care of an earnest and judicious instructor, Mr. Fisher, subsequently Canon of Windsor, and successively Bishop of Exeter and Salisbury." This gentleman worthily fulfilled his trust, and continued to the end of a long life to cherish the most affectionate feelings of regard for his royal pupil. In 1824, at a party in his own house, in Lower Seymour Street, the good bishop entertained his guests with some of his recollections of the prince, referring to the period of his early life. "I may well be proud of him," said he; "a prince with whom the love of truth was paramount to every consideration; a prince whom nothing could induce to dissemble; even in childhood it was the same. At Kew Palace there was a timepiece, highly prized by George III.: it was a clumsy affair; there was nothing particular in its construction, or ingenious about its movement. The only attraction it possessed arose from its historical associations. It had belonged, if my memory rightly serves me, to the youthful Duke of Gloucester, son of Queen Anne. One morning the pedestal of this relic was found vacant, and the timepiece itself lying on the ground, a wreck. It had been battered by some heavy instrument, and lay shivered in fragments. Repair was hopeless. The dial was damaged irreparably. The king's displeasure was not light; and immediate inquiries were instituted. They issued in no satisfactory result; the culprit could not even be guessed at; no one had witnessed the disaster; no one could explain its occurrence. After many hours elapsed, by mere chance a question was put to Prince Edward. 'I did it,' was the instant and unhesitating reply. 'But,' said one party [probably the tutor], anxious to screen the intrepid boy,—'your royal highness did it by accident?' 'No; I did it intentionally.' 'But your royal highness regrets what you have done?' 'No; not at all.' 'Not sorry?' 'No; I may be sorry for it to-morrow, but I certainly am not sorry for it now.' It was impossible to get over this avowal. The Prince was punished, and not slightly. But when," added the Bishop, "was it otherwise, in childhood or manhood?—when and where?" Emphatic interrogatory!—which, had it been uttered sooner, might have prevented Mr. Fisher from knowing the comforts of a bishopric. The capacious memory that retained a lively recollection of a "Pigeon Paley," might easily have remembered (for no good) the insinuated censure of the Prince's tutor.

Having chosen the profession of arms, the prince, in his eighteenth year, was sent to Luneburg, then forming a part of the electorate of Hanover, there to prosecute his military studies, under the superintendence of Baron Wangenheim. "Farmer George," as the prince amusingly styled his father, granted him an annual allowance of a thousand pounds; most of which, however, was privately appropriated by the "Governor:" the said Baron being of opinion that it was the best policy for himself to keep his pupil short of cash. "One guinea and a-half per week, sometimes melted down by military forfeits to twenty-two shillings," was all that found its way into the prince's purse for personal expenses of every description. Rather tight reining for a colt of the royal blood! Meanwhile, his "military duties" were enforced with unrelenting punctuality and severity. There was no pause or respite in the grim old Baron's discipline. The order of every day was "parade and drill;" parade and drill to the utmost weariness of soul and body. A spirited sprig of royalty, not unnaturally, found such a kind of destiny a bore. He grew disgusted with the "Governor;" disgusted with wretched, poverty-stricken, gloomy, insufferable old Luneburg; disgusted with his "professional duties;" in every respect immeasurably disgusted.

After a year's residence at Luneburg, the prince was removed to Hanover, where apartments were provided for him in one of the royal palaces. "It was a change of scene," said he, "but with it came no remedy of existing evils. The same niggardly allowance was dealt out; the same system of espionnage was carried on; my letters were intercepted; several never reached the King; he was displeased at my apparently undutiful silence; false representations were made to him respecting my conduct: I was described to him as recklessly extravagant. I had the means of being so, undoubtedly, on a guinea and a half a-week! Much of the estrangement between my royal parent and myself—much of the sorrow of my after life, may be ascribed to that most unwise and most uncalled-for sojourn in the electorate."

Nevertheless, the sojourn at Hanover and Luneburg was not wholly overshadowed with disgust and gloom. The close of it was rather pleasantly lit up by a little candlelight of professional promotion. On the 30th of May, 1786, he learns that he has been gazetted Colonel in the army by brevet. On the 3d of the following month he is elected Knight of the Garter. Luneburg and Hanover shall soon be things of simple recollection. In October 1787, by the King's command, he goes into quarters at Geneva. Here he had the opportunity of making the acquaintance of several English noblemen of his own age. "The charms of companionship there awaited him. The worth of youthful friendship was proffered to him. In the situation of the city itself there was much to interest him. Nowhere does nature appear more lovely and attractive than on the shores of Leman's lake. And marvellously fair is the city which is mirrored in its crystal waters."

In this picturesque environment, a prince, with ready money, might have had a chance of pleasantly enjoying life. Unhappily, the fate of Tantalus was a doom which the prince might think upon, and draw comparisons. Although the sum paid to the old Baron, for maintaining the establishment of his royal pupil, was now six thousand pounds per annum, the beggarly dole of thirty-one and sixpence was all that the young colonel received from week to week as private pocket-money. The Baron was extremely considerate of the cash, and liked to make a profit by his undertakings. The Baron shall have praise among the crafty, but, nevertheless, behold the consequences. "From not having any of those indulgences allowed him which other young Englishmen of his own age, with whom he was living, enjoyed, and who were the sons of private gentlemen, the Duke incurred debts by borrowing money to procure them:" debts which were a burden to him during the remainder of his life. "In truth," as Mr. Neale remarks, "the inadequacy of his income, for many years, to support him in the style of living which, as a prince, he was called upon to adopt, was a perpetual and unmerited source of discomfort and disquiet." Till he came to reside at Geneva he had not any kind of equipage, nor had even been the owner of a horse. No rideable sort of animal—unless, perhaps, it might be some elderly and degenerate donkey—could, of course, be purchasable out of an income so unprincipally as thirty-one and sixpence by the week, liable to fines.

Anybody who has been in debt knows what it is to hear a knock at the street door. Debt, when the debtor is a prince, may be easily contracted, but, by a prince extremely scant of cash, cannot so readily be paid. We suspect his royal highness came to be acquainted with the astonishing perseverance of a dun. To a prince of the royal blood, extremely well disposed to pay, but always destitute of change, the frequent visitations of individuals having pecuniary demands were likely to grow burdensome. Appeals to the Baron are like asking compassion of a flint; appeals to the paternal majesty are not a whit the more successful. The prince declares at last: "I have so seldom found a gracious answer to any of the little, trifling requests I have made him, that I am now very shy of asking." Other annoyances are not wanting: his valet is a spy upon him, and much in favour with the Baron; the Baron is a sort of Satan in disguise, and obstinately opposes him in all his wishes, right or wrong; on all hands he feels himself most miserably straitened. What were it advisable for a prince, feeling his situation to be intolerable, to think upon, and do? It occurs to him that, like the young man in the parable, he will "arise and go unto his father," and see what kind of fatted calf, or other prodigal's provision, will be there prepared for him. He is now of age, and believes himself entitled to an impartial hearing: perhaps "Farmer George" may be pleased to be considerate.

Accordingly, on a certain night in January, 1790, the young Prince suddenly arrives in London, taking up his quarters at an hotel in King Street, St. James's. Notice of his arrival is sent to the Prince of Wales, who immediately goes to visit him, and brings him home to Carlton House. Here the two are joined by the Duke of York, by whom, it is agreed, intelligence of the event shall be communicated to the King. But who shall express the extreme and unappeasable displeasure of his majesty! The rage of Achilles is understood to have been rather terrible; but the rage of George III. is even still more awful to encounter. Tremble intensely, O Edward! for thou art now to be its victim. To every extenuating circumstance suggested in the Prince's favour by his brothers—and it seems that their conduct on this occasion was most disinterested and affectionate—the King sullenly replied, "Edward has quitted his post without leave; he is now in England without my cognisance or consent. His presence here is an act of the most daring and deliberate disobedience; and you call on me to sanction it! Not so," said his majesty. And the majestic mind straightway formed its own decision; a decision that was unalterable, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. For thirteen days, the Prince sought every opportunity to see the King; but prospered nothing in his enterprise. On the thirteenth day he received a sealed official paper. He opened it with impatience, and read, with astonishment and sorrow, a peremptory order to—embark for Gibraltar within the space of four-and-twenty hours! On the night of his departure, he was allowed an audience of five minutes, and then dismissed. On the 1st of February, he sailed from England, with the "insignificant sum of 500*l.*" advanced for his use to Captain Crawford. "He did not receive with his orders one single sentence to soothe, to cheer, or to satisfy him as to what his stated allowance would be when he should arrive at his destination. Such was the reception, and such the treatment measured out to the Duke of Kent."

"Now," says Mr. Neale, "when one recalls the numerous escapades of his elder brother, the Prince of Wales—the debts which that expensive gentleman contracted, and which were again and again defrayed by the nation; the messages which, in rather rapid succession, came down to parliament, relative to the pecuniary difficulties, perplexities, and embarrassments of the first gentleman in Europe; the manner in which he more than once contravened the royal authority and was forgiven—hard measure seems to have been dealt out to the youthful Edward." His offence, considering the circumstances, was of quite a venial description; since there are grounds for believing that his main object was personally to represent his position to the King, and thus obtain some means of providing for his pecuniary obligations.

As no opportunity was granted him for this purpose, and no provision made on his account, one of the first results attendant on his new appointment, was an immediate increase to his difficulties. In the first place, he was compelled to provide his outfit at an enormous cost, as he had to purchase it in a colony, at prices extravagantly exceeding what he would have had to pay in England. Instead of paying off old debts, he found it impossible to avoid contracting new ones. One satisfaction, however, he possessed to comfort him—he was everlastingly quit of the old Baron; Governor Wangenheim could fret and worry him no more. He had, besides, the fortune to be placed under a much more generous tutelage. Colonel Symes was deputed by General O'Hara, then in command at Gibraltar, to take the Prince under his special superintendence. In the Colonel he finds a friend, who makes repeated efforts to get him relieved from his embarrassments. In one of the communications sent to the Home authorities there is this admission:—"The Prince's general conduct has been perfectly to the satisfaction of General O'Hara, and has met the approbation of the whole garrison." If the Prince had any fault, it seemed to be a tendency to rather rigorous discipline. He had drawn his notions from the Baron, the only military disciplinarian he was hitherto acquainted with. These notions, it is said, he subsequently abandoned; though it is admitted that while at Gibraltar, he attached too much consequence to trifles. While Colonel of the Royal Fusiliers, his strict habits rendered him unpopular with the men. Before long, representations relative to their dissatisfaction were transmitted home; and the result was that his Royal Highness was shortly ordered to embark with his regiment for America. At his departure, however, the officers gave him a splendid banquet, at a cost of 250*l.*; when the warmest assurances of esteem for his character and person were unanimously presented him. In an account of the fête, drawn up by Captain Fyers, of the Royal Engineers, allusion is made to the unfavourable representations understood to have been circulated in England to the Prince's prejudice. "We, however," says the writer, "know that these rumours can only find credit amongst those that are strangers to his character. His conduct, whilst here, has been most meritorious; and were we to inquire what young man in Gibraltar has shown himself to be the most attentive and diligent in the discharge of his public duties, as well as the most regular and temperate in his private hours, the answer would be 'Prince Edward.'" Such a testimony, we suppose, is quite sufficient to show the estimation in which the Prince was held among those to whom he was best known in Gibraltar.

From Gibraltar to Quebec, was not the pleasantest change of climate. That, however, might have been endured, had his income been such as to enable him to provide for his pecuniary engagements. But the most arbitrary and inconsiderate course had been all along pursued towards him. After several months' residence at Gibraltar, he had learned that his yearly allowance was fixed at 5,000*l.* a year—1,000*l.* less than was granted to Baron Wangenheim for the expenses of his establishment at Geneva, where he was completely under the control of his governor, and had no stately appearances to support; while at Gibraltar, he had "a definite public position to maintain, with private and professional claims on him on all sides." Surely, if 6,000*l.* were required at Geneva, 5,000*l.* was miserably inadequate at Gibraltar. On quitting for America, he entered into arrangements with his creditors, by giving bonds to them for sums amounting in the whole to 20,000*l.*, payable at the expiration of seven years. He was induced to take this course under the impression that before the arrival of that period he should obtain his "parliamentary establishment," and from it be enabled to cancel the bonds, the interest of which was in the meanwhile to be paid quarterly—a stipulation faithfully carried out, but which absorbed a fifth of his current income. The debts incurred at Gibraltar the King subsequently undertook to discharge; but, for some reason or other, never fulfilled his promise.

After his arrival in America, the Prince found that his position as a prince and a field-officer was utterly incompatible with his means, and that instead of diminishing his difficulties, he was daily constrained to add to them. Living in such a coil of harassing entanglements, he naturally grew anxious for any change that would divert his attention from them. He accordingly sought, and readily obtained, an appointment to serve under Sir Charles Grey, who was then engaged in the reduction of the French in the West Indies. On joining Sir Charles, an honourable post was immediately assigned him; and in the first despatch from the invaded island of Martinique, he is described as "commanding at Camp la Coste, with great spirit and activity."

During the progress of this campaign, his daring bravery procured him the general admiration of his companions in the contest. He distinguished himself in several engagements, and so freely exposed himself to danger as to obtain an unusual degree of popularity among the soldiers. At the capture of Guadaloupe, in April 1794, the Prince led on the first division, consisting of the first and second battalions of grenadiers, and 100 of the naval battalion, to the attack of the post on Morne Marcot; which was performed with such exactitude, spirit, and ability, "as," in the language of Sir Charles Grey, "to do the officer who commanded it, and every officer and soldier under him, more honour than he could find words to convey an adequate idea of, or to express the high sense which he entertained of their extraordinary merit on the occasion."

He has thus, at the age of twenty-seven, gained a creditable reputation for skill and courage in the field. The Parliament of England hears of it, and both Houses pass a vote of thanks to him for his "gallant conduct and meritorious exertions." The Irish Parliament does the like; so that, as far as honour goes, the Prince may deem himself to have been tolerably rewarded. Honour is pleasant; but then, as Falstaff said, "honour cannot set a leg." It has "no skill in surgery." Neither is it adequate to replenish one's finances. To a prince so utterly "hard up," that "when he arrived at Martinique he was destitute of all but the clothes upon his person," parliamentary praises must have been comparatively indifferent. Had the parliament been pleased to grant that long expected "parliamentary establishment," it would have done something which the Prince could have been grateful for. Whether he expected it at this period does not definitely appear; but there were precedents for expecting it even earlier, since his brother, the Duke of York, had obtained his provision at the age of twenty-one, and the Duke of Clarence at the age of twenty-four. The latter, indeed, received 16,000*l.* in addition to his income, as mere "pecuniary assistance"—10,000*l.* of which was given to help him to set up housekeeping. Contrasted with these liberal allowances, the indifferent provision made for Prince Edward indicates a negligence of his interests and comfort quite unworthy of the father of a family. One asks, with Mr. Neale, Whence arose this insensibility to his position? And, as the Yankee said, with reference to an inquiry which he made in the halls of his respected ancestors—"Echo answers, 'Really, I don't know!'" Mr. Neale gives us the impression that the Prince was always disliked at court; that he was distinctly slighted by the King, and treated with a systematic disregard of all his natural claims. Whether this was because the Prince was supposed to have rather liberal political tendencies, or whether there be any other reasons, or none whatever, to account for it, Mr. Neale is not able to inform us. The Prince, however, had an impression of his own. In a letter, full of bitterness, he says, in allusion to his career in the West Indies—"The wish entertained about me, in certain quarters, when serving there, was that I might fall." Are we to understand that such a wish was attributed to George III.? If so, one cannot suppose that Queen Victoria can much respect her grandfather.

The West Indian campaign having been concluded, his Royal Highness received orders to return to Canada. But he never took a step without increasing his embarrassments. An extraordinary combination of untoward circumstances—the loss of several equipments through capture of the vessels in which they were conveyed,—in a few months added to his debts not less than 14,000*l.*; a sum completely lost, but for which he was nevertheless answerable. Upon the whole, when he quitted North America, he was far more seriously involved than when he entered it. An unexpected circumstance, which occasioned his departure, was probably a relief to him. In October, 1798, as he was "returning from a field-day of the garrison," he sustained an accident from the falling of his horse, in the streets of Halifax; and for the benefit of surgical advice he immediately repaired to England.

In the spring of the following year, the House of Commons granted him his first parliamentary income of 12,000*l.* per annum. But, as if to signify the royal partiality, the King provided that the Duke of Cumberland, though four years younger, should have his public allowance settled on him at the same time. Respecting this arrangement Mr. Neale remarks:—"It requires but the operation of a very simple rule in arithmetic to show that, by the postponement of Prince Edward's parliamentary allowance, the country was, on every principle of equity, his debtor to the amount of 48,000*l.* Either this was the case, or his younger brother, Prince Ernest, had received his parliamentary provision four years too soon, and was therefore a debtor to the country in the like sum."

Allowing all this to pass, as we needs must, we go on to tell, that on St. George's day, 1799, the Prince was raised to the dignity of "Duke of Kent and Strathearn in Great Britain, and Earl of Dublin in Ireland;" and on the 7th of May in the same year he took his seat in the House of Lords. On the 10th he was promoted to the rank of general in the army, and on the 17th received the appointment of commander-in-chief of the forces in British North America, whither he proceeded in July. His stay, however, was brief; for, "in the ensuing autumn, a severe bilious attack, followed by alarming symptoms, rendered it necessary that he should obtain immediate leave of absence, and return forthwith to England."

After his recovery, he availed himself of his presence in England to press, in person, his claims to remuneration for the repeated losses he had sustained in his removal from place to place, by order of his sovereign, and in the service of his country. During an audience with Mr. Pitt, he also pointed out the singular and invidious delay that had taken place with respect to his parliamentary provision. To which representations the minister replied, that "the Prince having been abroad for so many years on foreign service, his provision had been totally overlooked—an omission which was entirely his (Mr. Pitt's) fault; and for that he took shame to himself: but that so far as pecuniary loss was concerned, his Royal Highness should receive amends." Ultimately he promised, that if the Prince were not placed on an exact footing with the Duke of Clarence, and so invested with a grant of 96,000*l.*, in compensation for eight years' arrears of his parliamentary income, he should at least enjoy the same advantage as the Duke of Cumberland, and be paid an arrear of four years, or 48,000*l.*—a promise which greatly brightened the Prince's prospects, and gave him hope of redeeming himself from his embarrassments. Unhappily, a prime minister's promises are not the most stable things to put one's trust in; they depend on so many circumstances; and, after all these years, Mr. Neale writes it down with an exclamation, "NEITHER SUM WAS EVER AWARDED!"

The fact is, the great Pitt had quite enough to do to get money to keep his ministerial pot boiling. Moreover, he retired from office, and was succeeded by Mr. Addington, who also promised—promised in a manner the "most positive and unqualified"—but eventually "forgot, or made a show of forgetting, the assurances he had uttered." The Duke obtained nothing from Pitt or Addington, unless it were an impression that all prime-ministers are liars.

After many equivocations, Minister Addington seems to have adopted the confession of St. Peter—"Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have I will give unto thee,"—that is to say, a place. Here is the vacant governorship of Gibraltar: go into that, and be comforted." The Duke hesitates, but finally accepts the offer. He is given to understand, however, that the "state of things" in the garrison is very bad; that there is much drunkenness and insubordination among the soldiers, which must be put down; that his Royal Highness will be required to put it down, and is, indeed, considered the proper man to do it; but that in the discharge of his arduous duties he shall have the "fullest support from Government." One of his "instructions" ran as follows:—"It is essential that your Royal Highness should be made aware, previous to your assuming the command at Gibraltar, that too great a proportion of the garrison has been usually employed on duties of fatigue; that, in consequence, discipline has been relaxed, and drunkenness promoted; that it will be the duty of your Royal Highness to exact the most minute attention to all His Majesty's regulations for disciplining, arming, clothing, and appointing of the army, from all of which not the most trifling deviation can be allowed."

The Duke was appointed to the government on the 27th of March, 1802, and reached his destination on the 10th of May. From the statements previously made to him, he was prepared to find the troops in a most irregular and licentious state, and the garrison thronged with abuses in every department. But the representations made to him in England fell infinitely short of the actual immorality, insubordination, and open laxity of all military rule which he found prevailing. On the very day he landed, he had an immediate opportunity of forming a judgment of the terrible task he had undertaken, from the exterior appearance of the troops, as they assembled in "review order" on the Grand Parade, and afterwards formed a line from thence to the lieutenant-governor's quarters, where the Duke at first took up his residence. "To describe the slovenliness of their appearance," says Mr. Neale, "the total want of uniformity in their dress and appointments, the inaccuracy of their movements, and the unsteadiness of both officers and men, is beyond the power of language." Moreover, the grossest irregularities characterised the bearing of the men in the public streets, and in their personal intercourse with the inhabitants. They might be seen roving about in scores, in a state of the most riotous intoxication. Discipline was a thing of mere tradition; and every man did that which was "right in his own eyes,"—which was usually the grossest wrong that his drunken head could think of.

The Duke looked on for several days, a silent, inactive, and disgusted spectator. He ponders a variety of plans for cleansing this Augean stable, and thinks at last, with Hercules, that he can do it best by turning a little water through it. Water, to be sure, is a scarce element in Gibraltar, but of wine there is an evident superabundance. He may not be able greatly to increase the supply of water; but he fancies something may be done to diminish the supply of wine. When less wine shall be obtainable, it is a reasonable inference that, in a hot climate, there will be a larger use of water: a beverage well known to be considerably more conducive to sobriety. There were in Gibraltar about ninety licensed wine-houses, all mainly supported by the soldiery. At the risk of some of his revenue, the Duke determines to suppress as many of these as possible. He therefore issues an order to shut up thirty; selecting such as were in the immediate vicinity of the barracks, and in by-lanes and obscure places favourable for drinking on the sly, and allowing those to remain which stood prominently in the public streets. In cancelling the licenses, he was, however, careful to distinguish between parties who could support themselves without the wine trade, and those who depended upon it solely for subsistence—avoiding a too rigid interference with the latter.

This arrangement being made, he took steps for providing the soldiers with more regular occupation. He established a roll-call at sunrise; a dress parade morning and evening; insisted that the men should regularly attend meals; and that after firing the second evening gun, a report should be made that they were in their barracks. He also instituted regular periods for drill and exercise; provided for the regiments being off duty in succession, so that the commanding officers might see their men together once a-week; and enforced a system of operations to effect a general uniformity throughout the garrison.

These checks upon drunkenness and idleness were of some avail, but other and more stringent measures were found necessary. The Duke eventually considered it expedient to prohibit the soldiers from buying liquor of the retail vendors, and to restrict them to the use of the regimental canteens established in the barracks for their convenience—a regulation which soon issued in a violent catastrophe. The soldiers rose in mutiny; instigated, it is said, by many of the officers. There was, however, a want of unanimity, and the conspiracy therefore failed. According to the evidence of an old soldier—probably a mutineer—whom Mr. Neale encountered in his researches, the affair was a sad “blunder.” “You see, sir,” said he, “the men warn’t quite unanimous. On Christmas Eve the Royals broke out in mutiny, and went to the quarters of the 25th regiment, and expected the men would join them. But they didn’t. On the 26th of December, the 25th broke out and went to the Royals, and expected the Royals to join ’em, and then they wouldn’t—and so the mutiny was crushed. But if, on the first outbreak, on Christmas Eve, both regiments had been unanimous, the Duke would have never seen England again.” This communicative veteran declared that the officers were at the head of the conspiracy. “You say, sir, that it was the men as mutinied. You say very wrong. It wor not. It wor the officers. They mutinied fast. I say they did fast; for I wor a mess waiter, and heerd much of their talk; and bitter agen the Duke’s sartinly wor. It soon reached the ranks. It set all wrong there: for it pisoned the minds of the men; and the head mutineer was ——— himself. That’s gospel truth; and I’ll maintain it to the death.” But who is Blank? Why should the supreme offender in the business continue shrouded in impenetrable anonymity? Had he been a private soldier nobody would have scrupled to publish forth his name; his feelings, if he were living, nobody would have cared to spare; consideration for his friends would not have been for a moment entertained: why should a mutinous villain, in commission, be so tenderly concealed? If Blank were really the “head mutineer,” he ought in all justice to have been hanged with the three convicted “ringleaders,” who were but subordinate mutineers. It is true, your “supreme villain” is often difficult to be detected; and in this instance, as in others, appears to have escaped. But if his name be really known, it ought, in all fairness and honesty, to be divulged. As the charge stands, all the other officers who were then at Gibraltar are liable to the suspicion of being implicated; any one of them may be regarded as the very Blank referred to as the grand anonymous miscreant. With all his desire to clear up this affair of mutiny, Mr. Neale has not cleared it up, and cannot clear it up, while he is satisfied to tell us upon hearsay that the principal offender was an officer named—Blank.

The declaration of Henry Salisbury (a transported mutineer), made in 1804, very distinctly charges the origin of the mutiny upon the officers. They are also described as being of the first rank. He says, they formed a committee for directing the proceedings, and for the payment of the men who were most active in disorder. A plan was likewise made for seizing his Royal Highness, and forcibly placing him on board one of the ships of war, with orders not to return on pain of death. The signal for this outrage was to have been given by an officer. The scheme was not executed, because the committee were informed that the Duke had become acquainted with it. The names of the officers stated to have been most prominently mutinous are (apparently) given in Salisbury’s confession; but they are printed here as—“Captain ——— and ——— of the Royals, and two officers of the name of ——— and ———.” Some of these Blanks are probably still living in respectable society; while the three subordinate “ringleaders” that acted under their instructions were hanged at Gibraltar! Justice, in this world, is often done imperfectly: it is so extremely difficult to detect a “supreme scoundrel,” particularly when, as often happens, he is clothed in the regimentals of respectability.

From what has been related of this mutiny, it is very evident that, however excellent may have been the Duke of Kent’s regulations and intentions, his administration rendered him exceedingly unpopular with both officers and men. The officers were as much provoked by the strictness of his discipline as the common soldiers, since it involved an unusual demand upon their time, and unpleasant limitations of their amusements, to carry it out in actual exercises of military duty. They had long been accustomed to freer ways, and desired a continuance of the old courses. So much parade, so much drilling, was not agreeable to their sensations, nor adapted to their notions of convenience. They were interrupted in their billiards, and could not sit so long or so delightfully over their wine. As to the men, they naturally hate "parade," especially in warm climates; and to be dobarred from drinking, when they had money in their pockets, seemed to be the height of practicable severity. "The Duke of Kent!" said an old Chelsea pensioner, "I recollect him well. He was a very bad man. He WOULDN'T LET US DRINK. He was wus than any teetotaller going. Much wus. He said a soldier might do without drink! An impossibility! A rank, sheer, downright impossibility. And then his hours—he was up before the sun! And the parades—he never missed one. There was one word always foremost in his Prayer-book—the word DUTY—and by that he swore." And yet it seems the Duke commanded some respect. "He was noble-looking," said the pensioner—"noble-looking was the Duke, sir,—noble, noble,—but had rather too much iron in him. Few of his officers stood by him—very, very few—about the wine-houses particularly. In that matter he stood alone, almost, if not altogether alone. . . . To be sure, 'twas surprising how the deaths in the garrison diminished after many of them wine-shops were shut up. The sick list was wonderfully shortened. Perhaps the Duke meant us well. But about parades and wine-shops, his notions were most cussedly onaccountable." The probable mutinger, before quoted, bears a somewhat similar testimony to the Duke's excellent intentions, and more particularly to his kindness, though he has the self-same reservation respecting his restraints on drinking. "There wor a deal o' kindness about the Duke, too. He never forgot the sick soldier; went to the hospital, saw that justice was done to the poor fellows there; and would listen patiently to any request a poor devil had to make. But, for a soldier, mark you—for a soldier—he wor—he certainly wor—loo temperate. That's Gospel truth."

As far as we can see into this affair, as far as we have the means of estimating the Duke's conduct in it, we think, with Mr. Neale, that there is nothing in the matter which the "most ardent admirer of the Duke need shrink from contemplating." His administration was marked by no features of cruelty, partiality, vindictiveness, or cupidity. Much exaggeration has been circulated respecting the "strings of executions" that succeeded to the mutiny, and about the general severity of his discipline: but, on examination, it is found that the only string of executions was the small string of three—the three convicted ringleaders of the conspiracy, who, in like circumstances, under any governor, must have suffered the same fate. His severity, again, was simply that which the state of the garrison at Gibraltar needed, to bring it under appropriate regulation. He found it abandoned to intemperance—licentious, insubordinate, every way disorderly; and it was his special mission, deputed him from England, to reduce it into order. In reference to the "pretty pass" to which things had come before the Duke arrived, let us once more quote our before-mentioned "probable mutineer;"—"The men were part slovens and part rebels. And as for the women creatures, they could neither stir in the streets, nor rest quiet at their homes, especially at night, on account of the soldiers being all about on the stroll,—wicked,—drunk, and audacious lively. The quiet ones—the civilians, and such like—what complaints they did make, surely, of what they called 'military license!' However, the Duke soon put all that down." A state of things evidently requiring to be put down. And the Duke seems to have put it down wisely, temperately, and effectually. If by his efforts to this end he indirectly produced a mutiny, he was nowise chargeable with the consequences. Neither were his punishments inflicted on the mutineers any way excessive. They were the common penalties for such offences, and were apparently awarded with a conscientious reference to the amount of delinquency proved against the offenders. He was personally convinced of the infidelity and culpability of many of the officers, though he had no means of tracing the crime of mutiny home to them; but, in spite of their apathy and opposition, he effected a considerable reformation; and, for three months prior to his recall, the troops were in regular and real subordination, and perfect tranquillity was established in the garrison.

Three months after the restoration of order, the Duke was not a little surprised to receive the King's command to return to England, "upon the consideration that it might be desirable that the different departments of his Majesty's government at home should have the advantage of some personal communication with his Royal Highness, upon the recent events in Gibraltar." "The Duke," says Mr. Neale, "in order that every possible mortification might be heaped on him, was bidden to resign his trust into the hands of his second in command—General Barnett:" a man whose indifference to the irregularities in the garrison had greatly hindered the success of the Duke's endeavours. The Duke resisted this, and remained until the arrival of the new Lieutenant-Governor. On reaching England he demanded an immediate investigation into his conduct. He desired to waive all the privileges of his rank, and requested that a court-martial might be forthwith assembled to sit in judgment on his entire course of proceeding at Gibraltar. His suit, however, was negatived. The assembling of "a court-martial to adjudicate upon the propriety or impropriety of the actions of an officer of his rank, was manifestly inexpedient." "No court of inquiry could be granted." He then pleaded for the summoning of any other tribunal to which the charges, "whispered rather than made," against him, could be referred. This, again, was negatived. He then demanded permission to return to his government; but was answered that that too must be withheld: though why withheld, no reason was assigned. Though the commander-in-chief at the Horse Guards was his brother the Duke of York, he was so far from being a friend to him, that he was even one of his principal opponents.

To call a man from a distant government under pretence of requiring explanations from him, and then to afford him no opportunity of giving the explanations which might possibly justify his conduct, was, to say the least of it, extremely shabby treatment. This, however, seems to have been the treatment to which the Duke of Kent was subjected. By no effort or solicitation could he obtain even so much as a statement of the reasons which had induced the members of the government to recall him from Gibraltar. All his applications to be reinstated in his appointment were capriciously repelled. No inquiry was instituted which might have offered him the chance of vindicating his character against insidious misrepresentations. He was left to bear the imputation of misconduct in his administration, without being permitted to do anything to clear himself, or to justify his doings before the public. All his entreaties to obtain what he designated "common justice" were contemptuously disregarded; so that, at length, he was constrained to relinquish the attempt; to renounce his claims of any further employment in the public service; and to betake himself to the humbler career of private and unambitious usefulness.

For several years the Duke lived a comparatively sequestered life. There is, indeed, little that is important to be related of him until his marriage. His pecuniary embarrassments had not, in the meanwhile, been very considerably diminished. Several of his creditors were occasionally rather pressing. Though he often renewed his applications for the payment of large sums which he had lost, or made use of, in the public service, and repeatedly received promises that his claims should be favourably considered, he never obtained any material assistance. After many delays, and manifold experience of the futility of relying upon ministerial assurances, he finally determined to make an effort to reduce his obligations by personal self-denial, and a rigid exercise of thrift. Accordingly, in 1807, he conveyed "one-half of his income to trustees, for the express purpose of liquidating his debts; at the same time reducing his establishment and limiting his arrangements, with the hope of effecting his purpose within a certain definite period." This scheme suffered some partial interruption, owing principally to the numerous demands made upon the Duke's liberality; but in 1815 he made a further and more considerable effort to accomplish his creditable object. "After many conferences with his friends, he resolved to constitute a committee of them, to assign over three-fourths of his income into their hands until the complete liquidation of his debts was effected; to give them complete control over his income; and to limit his own expenditure to a sum not exceeding the remaining fourth part thereof, with which he agreed to content himself." This plan being matured, "the Duke parted with many of his servants, and made reductions to a large extent in every part of his establishment, the admirable results of which were speedily visible; for, by the strenuous exertions and judicious arrangements of his friends, more was done in the first twelve months that followed the general retrenchment than was accomplished in the eight years preceding."

In order to carry his plan more effectually into execution, the Duke quitted England, and, in 1816, settled himself at Brussels. From hence he made frequent excursions into Germany, for the purpose of visiting several branches of his family. On one of these occasions he became acquainted with the Princess of Leiningen, a young and amiable widow, to whom he was ultimately induced to tender matrimonial proposals. The Princess was the sister of Prince Leopold of Saxe Cobourg; and, at the age of sixteen, had been married to the hereditary Prince of Leiningen—a somewhat venerable suitor, eight-and-twenty years older than herself, and, it is said, "in no one respect, either of person, manners, qualifications, or habits, suited to her." The prince was a sort of Squire Western, being entirely devoted to his hunting, and the victim of a temper "singularly irritable and uncertain." The union lasted twelve years,—“a period not without its trials,” but marked throughout, on the part of the youthful princess, by the most guarded and exemplary discharge of her domestic duties. At the death of the prince, her two children, a son and a daughter, were confided to her guardianship. Her widowhood was characterised by the most dignified and irreproachable demeanour. To a man inclined to wed, and not objecting to a widow, the princess was a woman worthy of the wooing. The Duke of Kent perceived this, paid his addresses, and succeeded. They were married at Cobourg on the 29th of May, 1818; the marriage, according to courtly customs, being subsequently re-solemnized, at Kew, on the 13th of July.

A marriage, whether in high life or low, is commonly attended with expense. Though the Duke's had been "conducted with every possible regard to economy," it cost him nevertheless a considerable sum of money. It is said the ministry had led him to expect an outfit of 12,000*l.*; but it appears that not a farthing of it was ever granted him. "His committee were therefore obliged to make a commensurate advance from the funds destined to the liquidation of his debts; and thus the period of his deliverance from his encumbrances was still further protracted." Under these circumstances his Royal Highness was constrained to persevere in his plan of residing on the Continent. Accordingly, after a few weeks' stay in England, he proceeded to Amorbach, the residence of the Prince of Leiningen, which the duchess, who had been appointed regent of the principality during her son's minority, had occupied in the period of her widowhood.

The next year, however, it became necessary to return. The Duchess was in an "interesting situation," and it was desirable that the infant should be born in England. But a grand difficulty intervened, and was well-nigh hindering the journey: the Duke was absolutely "hard up" for travel-money. The Duchess was "far advanced" before they could set out: "being literally prevented," as the Duke expressed it, "from moving until then, through the want of means to meet the expenses of the journey."

But how, and by whom, think you, were the means at length provided? Not by the "luxurious Sybarite at Carlton House;" not by Lord Liverpool, the premier; not by any of the Duke's family or state connexions,—though all were perfectly aware of his straitened circumstances, and of the situation of the Duchess;—but by a few devoted, untitled, and, comparatively speaking, humble friends, who, hearing of the urgency of the case, raised the requisite remittances, and thus enabled his Royal Highness to surmount the difficulty. He and the Duchess soon after reached this country in safety; and on the 24th of May, 1819, at Kensington Palace, a little princess made her appearance in the world, who is at present known to us as Victoria, Queen of England.

The Duke now desired to remain in his fatherland. His debts, however, were a continual burden to him, and the source of incessant anxiety and concern. As a last effort to be delivered from them, he determined to dispose of his valuable residence of "Castle-bar Hill," which was estimated by a London land-agent to be worth upwards of fifty thousand pounds. The times, unfortunately, were very unfavourable for the sale of such a property; and therefore, to avoid a loss, the Duke sought to obtain the sanction of the House of Commons to dispose of it by lottery. After much debate about the matter, the House decided against the Duke's proposal. Mr. Neale thus sums up the measure of indignity and annoyance to which the Duke was necessitated to submit. "Ministers would neither mete out to the Duke of Kent common justice; nor fulfil the promise solemnly made him by Lord Sidmouth; nor grant him the arrears fairly due to him of his parliamentary allowance; nor remunerate him for the heavy losses which he had sustained by the destruction of equipment after equipment in the public service; nor pay his debts, which he did not ask; nor afford him facilities (which he did) for discharging them himself. They were content only to harass, impede, and annoy him."

But now, in the meantime, the health of the Duchess, which had "suffered from the unwearied solicitude with which she fulfilled her maternal duties," seemed to demand a warmer climate. The royal pair therefore went to Sidmouth to spend the winter; intending to return early in the spring to their former residence at Amorbach. From Walbrook Cottage, on the 29th of December, the Duke writes thus to a friend with whom he had long freely corresponded: "My little girl thrives under the influence of a Devonshire climate; and is, I am delighted to say, strong and healthy; too healthy, I fear, in the opinion of some members of my family, by whom she is regarded as an intruder: how largely she contributes to my own happiness at this moment it is needless for me to say to you, who are in such full possession of my feelings upon this subject." This was one of the Duke's last letters. On the 23d of January (1820) he died of inflammation of the lungs, caught a few days previously from sitting in wet boots.

With this event we are brought to the end of the Duke's history. There remains little further for us to say respecting him. He appears to have been a man of solid worth, fair talents, and Christian principles; a man much respected and regretted by the nation, on account of the liberality both of his opinions and practices; a man also considerably ill-treated by his family and the ministerial powers of the day, because of his sympathy with the popular aspirations after a greater political freedom than was consonant with the sentiments of the prevailing administration. In the promotion of charitable and philanthropic objects the Duke laboured with a steady and resolute consistency. With his name and with his purse he aided almost all the religious and benevolent associations of the day. Had he not been so much embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances—through the debts which he contracted, partly in the heedlessness of youth, and partly under peculiar emergencies while engaged in the public service—there is every reason to believe that his beneficence would have been still more largely and liberally exercised. So greatly did these embarrassments oppress the Duke, that a considerate mind regrets he cannot now be made acquainted with the fact, that they have all been since honourably and thoroughly extinguished; not by the nation, nor by the generosity of his admirers, but by the united savings and self-denial of the duchess and her daughter. It is a fact in the highest degree honourable to them both. For this, as for many things, shall Queen Victoria be respected; nor can the worth, the devoted love, the lofty-mindedness of her noble mother, be likely to pass away from the memories of Englishmen. The Queen's course hitherto has been smoother than her father's; but, as far as we can see, she carries her head well under prosperity; and we believe it is the wish of the nation's heart that her fortunes may never be overclouded by any sadness or disaster.

EGYPT AND ITS GOVERNMENT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LEVANTINE FAMILY."

THE present political condition of Egypt is interesting to study in itself, and may hereafter prove a subject practically important to this country. A very complete change has lately taken place in the depositaries of authority, but time has scarcely been allowed for deciding how this change will manifest itself in the condition of the people at large. The speculations indulged in towards the close of the life of Mohammed Ali, must, in some respects, be at fault; for the expected ordeal of military government under Ibrahim Pasha has been mercifully averted from the valley of the Nile.

Let us, however, for the better comprehension of our subject, transport ourselves back to the time when the sway of the celebrated viceroy had produced its ultimate results—when Egypt panted under the stationary atmosphere of a consolidated despotism; for we shall thus have an idea of its present state, except that the guiding power is less firm, no new impulse having as yet been imparted. In a few words, we shall endeavour to sketch not the apparent but the real position of Egypt at that epoch. This distinction is important; because those persons who have usually undertaken to give Europe the requisite information have almost purposely confined themselves to descriptions of institutions which certainly exist in name, but which have little more effect on the condition of the country than the Armenian college at Paris has upon the prosperity of Auvergne: positively not so much as the India House exerts on the manners of London. The only writers we know who have avoided this method are M. Schælcher, and, at a more remote period, Mr. J. A. St. John. The latter traveller, it is true, enlarges on the European improvements of the Pasha; but at that time they were in the full vigour of youth. In fifteen years, despite the constant renewal of the material aids, they died away by inches; and when we reached the country, resembled the dried up stalks of exotic plants, carelessly thrown down by an ignorant gardener, in a soil and beneath a climate totally unfitted for them.

Setting all these things aside, as soon as their vanity appeared, we determined to ascertain what was the real action of the government. We looked first at the appearance of the people, and found that, as a rule, whilst enjoying the equivocal health and strength vouchsafed to most southern races, they were ill-clad, and for the most part evidently ill-fed. The exceptions occurred only in those cases where contact with Europeans afforded a sufficient explanation. Their huts were even more miserable than of yore; and wretched mud villages were every day swallowing up the populations of the brick-built towns. Alexandria alone was increasing in size and population—the only sign of an increasing commerce which, in a healthy country, would have been accompanied by the increasing well-being of every Fellah even to the very southern frontier.

In a moral point of view it was equally evident that no improvement had taken place; for we do not call improvement the extinction of the persecuting spirit, the absence of active bigotry. Travellers, of course, find this very convenient. They are charmed with their intercourse with a people whom they may order about as they please, and, if the spirit move them, insult and ill-treat without danger; but they do not know, or choose to overlook, the fact, that this humility is the result of the crushing despotism which Mohammed Ali organized in the country. Education, properly speaking, is perfectly unknown. As of yore, a good many Arabs learn to read; but their erudition is confined to some chapters of the Koran. A newspaper, partly in Turkish and partly in Arabic, is published at Cairo; but its circulation is entirely a forced one among the officers in the Pasha's service, from whose pay the price is deducted. The best proof that the Egyptian mind remains stationary is, perhaps, that all the public offices almost are filled, as before, by lazy Turks, wily Armenians, and sneaking Copts.

These remarks, as the form in which they are made will imply, are as applicable now as they were during the period to which we more particularly refer—the latter years of Mohammed Ali's government. At that time we took especial care to observe in what way public business was carried on; and the result was curious enough. Wherever indifferent matters were concerned, or it was desired to throw dust into the eyes of European visitors, all manner of forms were resorted to; and it positively appeared at times that civilization had penetrated into the country. But, after all, the only really important occasions upon which an Egyptian comes in contact with power are in the administration of justice, and the levying of taxes. A few words on each of these subjects may be both amusing and instructive.

There exists, properly speaking, no law in Egypt. Every case is decided by what may be called ecclesiastical rules—that is to say, according to the Koran;—or by the arbitrary pleasure of the judge. I remember a curious circumstance, which will illustrate the danger of allowing English subjects to depend for protection on the laws of the country in which they may reside. A man was murdered on the Marina in Alexandria. The watch found him lying in the middle of the street; and on examining the neighbourhood, fell in with six sailors, landed to spend the evening from some Liverpool vessel. According to the laudable custom of our countrymen, they were all half seas over; and being able to give no account of themselves, were taken, with much ill-treatment, to the house of the head of the police, and locked up, being accused of having stabbed the poor Arab whose body had been found. Next day, our consulate claimed them; and they were transferred to the British prison—a miserable hole, it is true, but a paradise to the poor fellows in comparison with an Arab lock-up. Here they amused themselves by a variety of attempts at escaping—whilst a careful investigation was set on foot. It was clear as noonday that they had nothing to do with the crime that had been committed; but when a judicial decision to this effect had been given, the native government—indignant at the inefficient action of European justice—applied for the six men to be given up, in order that they might be nabooked—that is, tortured with the stick into a confession.

Another case is equally characteristic. Some produce was stolen from a boat belonging to a Frank; and, a complaint being lodged, the crew of an Arab kanjia was suspected of the delinquency. An inquisition, however, discovered not the slightest proof of guilt, which fact was announced to the consul of the complaining party in a letter from the Ministre des Affaires Etrangères—commonly called by the wags, the Ministre des Etranges Affaires—Artim Bey. "The innocence of the accused parties being manifest," concluded this document, of which we obtained a copy, "it may seem hard to punish these poor wretches. However, in order that the desire of His Highness the Viceroy to act according to the laws of justice may shine with reluctance, the reis shall receive condign punishment." The usual compliments followed; and the Minister signed in full—no doubt perfectly persuaded that he had acted so as to secure respect and admiration. In spite of an answer to the effect that under the circumstances nothing was expected to be done, the poor reis (captain) fell a victim to an obstinate fit of love of justice, and was sentenced to the galleys for life!

A Trieste merchant forwarded to Egypt some cases of the best steel for sale. They were placed in the hands of a Muslim, who kept them for a long time without giving any account. At length, in answer to a strenuous remonstrance, he said he had been unable to sell; and sent back cases of bad iron cut of the same size. The fraud, being complained of, was denied. The Kadi was appealed to, and without any serious examination of the affair, ordered the man to be beaten for thirty-nine minutes; so that he never properly recovered. No other redress could be obtained; but a representation was made to the viceroy on the barbarity of the punishment inflicted—which was so great that Europeans would be generally deterred from seeking redress for the future. The answer was that, as a reparation to the injured feelings of humanity, the judge should be awarded the same punishment! Complaint of one barbarity, therefore, only led to another.

This is the way in which justice is administered, even when Europeans are mixed up, in all cases where the influence of government is supposed to be compromised. When mere natives are concerned, there is no limit to the cruelties committed. The stick governs Egypt as well as China. Every other man seems to have been nabooked at least once; and wonderful is the apathy with which the awful infliction is borne. Death rarely ensues unless the blows are purposely calculated to produce that effect. The best known instance is that of a Coptic clerk, beaten to death by order, for a supposed error in his accounts, in presence of the Pasha and two European consuls; happily, not of first-rate standing. They represented Greece and Belgium.

When the government is not directly interested, a rough kind of justice is administered occasionally; but the system of bribes is carried to a very great extent. A man once murdered his wife, by throwing her down a well. Her parents seized the guilty husband and dragged him before the governor of Cairo. The case was so flagrant, the evidence so irresistible, that every one expected a capital condemnation. But no! if report be not a liar, the accused contrived to forward a promise of a large sum of money to the upright judge, and a loophole was instantly formed for his escape. "The Koran saith," quoth the upright judge, "that revenge for murder shall be sought by the nearest relation of the deceased. Doth the nearest relation demand blood?" "Yes," cried the father of the poor woman. "I demand blood. I am the nearest relation." "Not so," replied the upright judge. "The nearest relative is the child of the woman, now two years old. When he cometh to man's estate, he may demand justice. Until then I dismiss the case."

These facts, which might be multiplied ad infinitum, explain the astonishment and suppressed ridicule with which were received in Egypt the pedantic propositions of the French government, who demanded before 1840, that Mohammed Ali should grant "a charte, a national representation, trial by jury, and all modern institutions." At this price, it is said, they were ready to guarantee his absolute independence. After 1840, the agents of Louis Philippe, we are sorry to say, became as easy as they had before been puritanical; and we have seen a letter in which the French consul-general refused to interfere for the redress of an injury, because, on the eve of his departure for France, he did not wish to create an ill-feeling against himself in the Pasha's mind.

A very few words will explain the fiscal arrangement of the Egyptian government. The principle in the collection of the revenue, is to take from the people as much as possibly can be taken, no matter by what means. An able politician, long resident in the country, calculated that the fellahs pay ninety-five per cent of the produce of their labour. This will easily be imagined, when we know, that from a population of less than two millions and a half, a sum exceeding 4,000,000*l.* is annually got into the treasury. The taxes are levied by the governors of the provinces and their subordinates, who are all guilty of enormous robbery. No appeal is possible; and the result is that about three halfpence per day is the average amount upon which the inhabitants of this rich country are reduced to live. The principle of mutual responsibility, invented for the Pasha, to their disgrace, by his French advisers, is rigidly applied. Neighbour pays for neighbour, village for village, district for district; so that the man or set of men whose backs and feet are well hardened, can shift off payment upon those who are more delicately constituted.

It may easily be imagined that, under such a system, much difficulty is experienced in keeping the population stationary, in spite of the proverbial love of the Arab for his village. Great blame has been thrown upon the English government for depriving Syria of the benefits of Mohammed Ali's enlightened rule; but facts are stubborn things. The eastern provinces of Lower Egypt are absolutely depopulated by emigration to Syria; and if a slight relaxation of rigour had not taken place in them, they would soon have been converted into a desert. The province of Shargieh was once under the government of a certain Abderahman Bey, who, finding difficulty in getting in the tribute, absolutely sawed many fellahs in two between planks, as an example to the other tardy tax-payers. Fifty thousand people are said to have left Egypt and fled across the desert to escape from this awful rule; and it was thought prudent to sentence the Bey to the galleys for three years, especially as an opportunity was thus afforded for the confiscation of the wealth he had amassed. When his period had elapsed, the services of so good a collector were again put in requisition in the same place; and whilst we were in Egypt, he left his chains at Abukir, and returned to the Shargieh with instructions to be a little less zealous for the future.

There is scarcely a fellah—that is, agricultural labourer—who would not, if he were able, leave the country to take refuge in the cities of Alexandria and Cairo, where the mere agglomeration of men constitutes some protection from despotism. To put a stop to this process, very severe measures have been adopted. The peasant who escapes is flogged and sent back to his village, whilst the punishment of death is sometimes inflicted on the person who receives him. I remember an instance in which the presumed concealer of that contraband article, a peasant, was hanged before his own door. The representative of a European power, I believe of France, made a strong remonstrance, but too late. The justice of Mohammed Ali was expeditious. It turned out afterwards that an innocent person had been punished by mistake for the guilty one; whereupon the regenerator of Egypt mercifully remarked that one life was enough for one offence, and the real culprit got off scot-free.

The great viceroy's intellect began to decline some years before he was admitted to be totally incapable of holding the reins of government; and some very curious anecdotes might be related of his doings. But some of them are too Eastern, and others are tolerably well known. Towards the end of 1847, very unequivocal signs of madness manifested themselves, and in the month of June, 1848, it became necessary to put him under some restraint, and substitute a piece of pasteboard for the blade of his sword, which he sometimes wished to use against his own relatives. Great was the excitement among the political circles of Egypt. Two very well defined parties existed,—one advocating the arranged succession of Ibrahim Pasha, the other predicting, and consequently desiring, that Abbas Pasha, upon the death of his grandfather, would make a bold stroke for the vicereignty. Ibrahim, the seraskier, or generalissimo, as is well known, was supposed to stand in the same relation to Mohammed Ali that Eugène Beauharnais did to Napoleon. The genuine descendant, therefore, was persuaded that he had a better right. The claims of both were equivocal, so far as the interest of the country was concerned. Ibrahim, who had public opinion in Europe in his favour, had little else to recommend him. His qualities as a general, by no means of the first order, were not likely to stand him in much stead in the government of a country. On the contrary, his ambition was all military, and he showed a marked propensity to play at soldiers. It was true, he had exhibited some taste for agriculture, and possessed magnificent gardens and rich farms; but he could not be said to encourage industry of any kind. His character even exhibited itself in a worse light from this point of view than from any other. His lands, flourishing and verdant as they were, were always abodes of the profoundest misery. This arose partly from his having been also a manufacturer, paying his agricultural labourers in sugar and tarbooshes at an arbitrary value! He ruined a whole town by seizing on the inhabitants, and compelling them to enter his works. He was a hard master, and punished the slightest offences most unmercifully. Many respectable Turks might be seen at his palace at Koobbeh, near Cairo, working in chains. This private jurisdiction of the great people of Egypt reminds one of the middle ages. Ibrahim and other folks high in rank had prisons of their own in Alexandria and Cairo; and hopeless, indeed, was the lot of whoever was thrust into them. To proceed—the seraskier was universally acknowledged to be sanguinary. We do not give examples, because the most characteristic are unrepeatable. It will be sufficient to say, that the women pronounced his name with a shudder, and invariably added the epithet, Zalem, "tyrant." This was a dreadful judgment in a country where Mohammed Ali was described by the people as, after all, "not a very bad man." Ibrahim affected European politeness, shaking hands, wearing tight breeches, and doing many things in a Frankish style, quite disgusting to the Moslems; but he was only a cruel and debauched Turk, a little Frenchified in externals.

Abbas Pasha "enjoyed" also a very bad character for debauchery, but, had he tried, could not have surpassed his uncle. He was said not to be cruel, and has since not given any proof that this good opinion was unfounded. He delighted chiefly in horses, and his challenge to the Jockey Club is well known. Ram-fighting, also, he considered a great amusement; and he would shake his enormous paunch and roar with pleasure at every exploit of the horned combatants. Some people, wiser than their neighbours, maintained that all this was deep policy, and that, whilst leading apparently a frivolous life, Abbas was organizing a deep conspiracy among the bigoted part of the Turks to oust Ibrahim in case of the viceroy's death. When we were in Cairo we heard much talk of these doings, and plausible enough were the reasons brought forward in favour of the project. In the first place, it was said with some truth, the celebrated arrangement concluded after the Syrian war, by which the succession was to pass down through Ibrahim, had not in reality been guaranteed by England. All depended on the mere promise of the sultan; and this promise might be set aside for political reasons. The seraskier was known to be profoundly hated by the people, and was suspected, moreover, of wishing to make some arrangement with the French (perhaps the cession of Alexandria or some fort commanding it), in order to procure the recognition of his independence. On these and other grounds it was thought probable that if the sultan refused the investiture to the supposed son of Mohammed Ali, and bestowed it upon his real grandson, there would be but a nominal violation of faith.

For our part, although we preferred a government on pure Turkish principles, such as was expected from Abbas Pasha, to a bad imitation of French centralization, we looked with indifference upon all those intrigues, being perfectly convinced that ever since the word amelioration was first sounded in Egypt, the cart had been systematically put before the horse, and that all the schemes of improvement that had been constructed, owed their origin to speculators who did not know or did not care where the shoe pinched. Every man believed that there was nothing like leather. The engineer proposed the introduction of machinery and the construction of such works as the Barrage; the soldier recommended a regular army; some insisted on the utility of manufactures, others on the introduction of cotton; canals were the great panacea of one man, railroads of another. All these things were very good—most excellent in a special point of view, except the military establishment. The great mistake was, that they could not be introduced under the barbarous auspices of Mohammed Ali, without absolutely crushing the staple industry of the country—agriculture. Every innovation threw whole districts out of cultivation, and whilst public works multiplied on all sides, the population visibly diminished. Had any solid results been obtained, we might perhaps have justified in some respects all these fine doings. But the machinery when once imported is generally allowed to rust and go to pieces; the army is transformed into a huge gang of half-paid forced labourers; the Barrage, three times commenced, is abandoned; and so on. The country is covered with fields that ask for labourers, and are gradually disappearing under the encroaching desert. The diminished population cannot even now glean a sufficient subsistence from the fertile plains that remain, but wander, like Australian savages, amidst the richest crops in the world.

The remedy for all this misery is easy enough, but no reasonable plans are attended to in Egypt. Perhaps this is why they are so rarely made. Mohammed Ali listened only to the anachronisms which filled the conversation of his French friends. They proposed to destroy the cataracts in order to facilitate the navigation of the Nile, to deepen the bed of the river, (which shifts every year,) to enlarge the ports and harbours, and to introduce a vast system of canalization, to establish model farms, schools of design, colleges, universities, and what not. All these grand projects were to be carried out by means of additional taxation. Nobody ever condescended to reflect whether the country could bear the slightest increase of its burdens without absolutely perishing; much less did it occur to any one that all these improvements should begin with the fellahs themselves. They should be not forced, but encouraged to develop the resources of the land. Instead of being weighed down by taxes, they should be assisted in a manner proportioned to their knowledge and their intellects. Instead of being oppressed and dazzled by the prodigious superiority of Europeans, they should be incited to trust in themselves, to improve by slow degrees, to perfect gradually their own agricultural implements and modes of cultivation. A vast amount of labour is thrown away in Egypt by the miserable means employed to raise water: a few steam-engines here and there would have done incalculable service, as would indeed an improved water-wheel, the present one wasting at least one-third of the quantity raised each turn. All attempts to graft European civilization on Egypt have hitherto failed. Could not an Egyptian civilization be developed? "Reduced taxation" would be our great panacea; spend less in costly importations of carriages, jewels, and machinery doomed to rust; burn the fleet, dismiss the army, entice new settlers instead of driving away the old; abolish especially the capitation tax. Above all, let no magistrate or governor have anything to do with levying money; establish a revenue department, send all the Copts to the plough, and if you employ Europeans on anything, employ them in this branch. Have English collectors, with Arabs under them, if you raise direct taxes at all—if the revenues of the port of Alexandria do not suffice to defray all legitimate expenses. An honest governor, with a firm character, acting on these principles, would soon raise Egypt to a state of unexampled prosperity, a state on which she would not look back with regret to the most brilliant period of the Pharaohs.

LEWIS ARUNDEL;

OR, THE RAILROAD OF LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XLIII.

ANNIE GRANT TAKES TO STUDYING GERMAN, AND MEETS WITH AN ALARMING ADVENTURE.

WHETHER the sight of Annie's tears would have produced any change in Lewis's determination, had their tête-à-tête continued uninterrupted, is a question in regard to which psychologists may arrive at any conclusion which pleases them—for Walter having literally, or figuratively, caught his butterfly, rejoined his companions almost immediately, and under cover of his puerile volubility Annie contrived to dry her eyes, and outwardly regain her composure.

In the course of the following morning, Lewis found an opportunity of making the important communication. General Grant heard him with grave attention, and when he had concluded, observed,—

"This alters the whole aspect of the affair. Any man may commit a fault, but if he sees his error and is willing by every means at his command to atone for it, it behoves all generous-minded persons to forgive him. I perceive that I have, in this instance, acted hastily, and owe Lord Bellefield reparation. I shall write to him immediately, and have to thank you, Mr. Arundel, for affording me this information, which may give me an opportunity of effecting a reconciliation with one, on whom I had long since decided to bestow my daughter's hand. Your disinterested, I may say magnanimous conduct in this matter, entitles you to my fullest confidence. I shall make it an express stipulation that Lord Bellefield convices for the future all due consideration towards you."

And this speech, and the haunting memory of Annie's tears, were Lewis's reward for doing his duty.

The result of this communication was, that the General wrote a long letter to Lord Bellefield, using many words to express his meaning, which might have been advantageously compressed into half the number; however, it satisfied its composer, who considered it a miracle of diplomacy, and a model of style. Lord Bellefield's answer was cold and haughty; his pride had been wounded, and his was not a mind frankly to forgive an injury of that nature; still he did not reject the General's overtures. He was going to travel in Greece, (he wrote,) but on his return to England, he would see General Grant, and refute the calumnies which had been spread to his disadvantage; he was aware that he had enemies who might be glad to avail themselves of any opportunity to vilify his character, but he trusted to the General's sense of justice, to discourage such attempts. And the contents of this letter were communicated to Annie by her father, together with a rebuke for having so easily believed reports to her cousin's disadvantage, which lecture somewhat failed in its effect from the unlucky fact, that, in this particular instance, the lecturer's practice happened to have been diametrically opposed to his preaching; but the rebuke led to one evil result, viz. it crushed in the bud a half-formed project which Annie had conceived, of acquainting her father with her growing disinclination to a union with her cousin, and of imploring him to take no step towards a renewal of the engagement. Moral courage (save when her feelings were very strongly excited) was not one of Annie's attributes, and as the evil she feared was not a proximate one, she trusted to chance to postpone it still further, if not to avert it altogether. Thus, being naturally of a light-hearted joyous temperament, she ere long recovered her usual gaiety, and an occasional sigh, or a quarter of an hour's unwonted abstraction, alone attested her recollection of this dark speck on the horizon of her future life.

The return to Broadhurst appeared to produce a soothing effect upon Lewis also—it gave him an opportunity calmly to review his position; and a new idea struck him, generalizing from which, he sketched out a system different from that which he had hitherto pursued in regard to Annie Grant. True, he could never hope to call her his—love was forbidden him—but friendship, warm, ardent friendship,—love elevated, spiritualized, purified from the slightest admixture of passion,—this he might enjoy safely; it only required a strong effort of will, a determined uniform exercise of self-control. To be enslaved by hopeless love was mere weakness; to crush the sentiment entirely was Quixotic, and uncalled for; but to control and regulate it,—to fix limits which it should not exceed, and thus to convert a curse into a blessing, this was an effort worthy of a reasonable being, and this he would accomplish. In order to carry out this design, he determined no longer to avoid Annie as he had done; it was cowardly to fly thus from temptation; besides, it was evidently useless to do so; imagination supplied the deficiency, and the evil was but increased. No, he would face the danger and subdue it. Thus, too, he might be of use to her, for with all his admiration of her character, he read it aright, and saw that there were weak points which required the aid of principle to strengthen them; that her pursuits were frivolous, her mind uncultivated, and her existence practically aimless, because her views of life were confused and indistinct, and her standard of excellence a visionary one. All this he saw, and seeing, felt that he could remedy; and while he pondered on these things, Annie recalled an old wish to study German, and asked her father's permission to be allowed to do so, if Mr. Arundel could find time to give her lessons; whereupon the General, having a great respect for any language of which he was personally ignorant, preferred her request to Lewis, and that young gentleman was graciously pleased to accede thereunto. Miss Livingstone of course played duenna, and but for one circumstance, would have performed her character with a degree of cold-blooded virulence worthy of the most fractious tigress that ever mangled "lovers tender and true." This fortunate circumstance was, that the lessons, being usually taken by way of dessert after an early dinner, invariably sent Minerva to sleep. In vain did she bring out her "poor basket," in which receptacle lay hid certain harsh under clothing for infant paupers; in vain did she attempt sewing the seams of Procrustes-like pinafores, which, solving the problem of the minimum of brown holland capable of containing a living child, were destined to compress the sturdy bodies of village urchins; the "calathivæ Minervæ" were unable to resist the attacks of the god Somnus, and ere Annie had stretched her pretty little mouth by the utterance of a dozen double bodied substantives, the lynx-eyes were closed in sleep, and for all practical purposes Miss Livingstone forfeited every right to the first half of her patronymic.

Reader, if you are of the gender which uncourteous grammarians are pleased to designate the worthier, tell me,—in strict confidence, of course,—did you ever read German with a pair of bright eyes turning from the crabbed Teutonic characters to look appealingly into your own optics, while two coral lips, formed for pleasanter purposes than growling German gutturals, complain of some enigmatical sentence, which has not got a right meaning to it, the said eyes and lips being the outward symbols of a warm heart and quick intelligence, ready to discern and feel the grandeur of Schiller, the Shakespeare of the Fatherland, or thrill to the trumpet blasts of young Körner's warrior spirit, or trace the more subtle thinkings of Goethe, that anatomist of the soul of man? Tell me, did you ever read with so desirable a fellow-student? If you have done so, and can honestly say you did not think such schooling delightful, the sooner you close this book the better, for depend upon it there is little sympathy between us. Lewis at all events had no cause to be dissatisfied with his pupil, who was equally docile and intelligent, and in a marvellously short space of time was able to read and translate with tolerable fluency; while the few German sentences in which her instructor from time to time saw fit to address her, appeared less like heathen Greek to her at each repetition. As soon as she had sufficiently mastered the difficulties of those aggravating parts of speech, the compound separable verbs, and acquired moderate control over other equally necessary and vicious parts of the grammar, they commenced translating that most poetical of allegories, La Motte Fouqué's Undine; and Annie as they read, took it all at first au pied de la lettre, and imagined, with a degree of shuddering horror, which, as it was only a tale, was rather pleasant than otherwise, all the supernatural uncomplaisances Huldbrand underwent in the Enchanted Forest, and admired all the generous impulses of the heroine's singular uncle-and-water, Kühleborn, whom however she considered would have been better adapted for family purposes, if he had been rather more of a man and less of a cataract. Then Undine herself, the capricious, fascinating, tricky spright—the thoughtful, loving, feeling woman—how Annie sympathised with, and adored her! For Huldbrand she felt a species of contemptuous pity, but Bertalda, oh! she was sure no woman was ever so heartless, so utterly and wickedly selfish. And then, when Lewis unfolded to her his view of the Allegory, (every one is sure to form a particular theory of his own, as to the meaning of Undine, and to think he only has discovered the author's intention,) and Annie learned, that the tale shadowed forth the mighty truths which through the passage to eternity, and, symbolizing the struggle between good and evil, showed how Principalities and Powers wage throughout all time an undying warfare—the breast of man their battle-field—her pulses quickened and her cheek flushed; for she felt for the first time the solemn realities of existence, and saw dimly, how a single life might be a link between the Ages, and a portion, however insignificant, of the mighty whole. What wonder then, if part of the reverence, the awe, chastened by a deep solemn joy, with which she recognised the workings of Infinite power, and Infinite love, cast their spell around him who had first awakened these perceptions within her?—what wonder if unconsciously comparing him with those around her, she grew to believe him a being of another and a higher nature, and so to hang on his slightest word or look, to dread his frown, and deem his smile sufficient compensation for hours of unwonted study?

The German lessons seemed to agree particularly well with Lewis also; for his eye grew brighter and his step more free, the extreme paleness of his complexion changed to a manly brown, a slight tinge of colour imparted a look of health to his cheek, and—unromantic as it may appear—his appetite increased alarmingly. Would the reader learn the secret of this improvement? It is soon told. Living in the present, blinding himself to the truth, he was happy! His system, he told himself, had succeeded,—his theory had been tested, and proved a true one,—resolution had conquered, and the insanity of love had cooled down to the reasonableness of a delightful friendship.

Lewis was excessively pleased with himself at this result. At length, then, he had attained that complete and perfect degree of self-control he had so long endeavoured to acquire; his feelings were reduced to a due submission to his will; and henceforward his happiness was in his own hands. And thus basking in this gleam of sunshine, he shut his eyes to all beyond, and dreamed that he possessed an elixir to dissipate every cloud, and that henceforward storms would disappear from the horizon of his destiny, and become mere myths, existing only in memory. And these were some of the earliest results of the German lessons.

About this time, a small but unpleasant adventure occurred to poor Annie, which occasioned her a severe fright, and rendered her nervous and uncomfortable for many days afterwards. She had been on an expedition to the cottage of a poor neighbour, who was suffering from illness; and as the sick woman lived beyond a walk, Annie had gone on horseback, attended by an old coachman, who had lived in the family many years. Having accomplished her mission, she had ridden about a quarter of a mile on her return, when she discovered that she had left her handkerchief behind; and, directing the servant to ride back and fetch it, she proceeded at a foot's pace in a homeward direction. The road she was following wound round the base of a hill, thickly covered with trees and underwood, the spreading branches of the oaks meeting across the lane, and making a species of twilight even at mid-day.

As Annie Grant was passing under one of the thickest of these trees, a tall gaunt figure sprang from behind its knotted trunk and seized the bridle of her pony. Gazing in alarm at her assailant, Annie perceived him to be a man of unusual stature, his features were pale and emaciated, and an unshorn grisly beard added to the ferocity of their expression; his clothes, which were torn and soiled, hung loosely about him, while the long bony fingers which clutched her bridle-rein, the sunken cheeks and hollow glaring eye-balls, gave evidence that his herculean proportions had been reduced almost to a skeleton leanness, by disease or want. Annie had, however, little time to make observations, for, accosting her with an oath, the ruffian demanded her purse. Drawing it forth, she held it to him with a trembling hand. He seized it eagerly and examined its contents, his eyes glittering as he observed the sparkle of gold. Hastily concealing it about his person, he next demanded her watch, which Annie, after a hopeless glance in the direction from which she expected the appearance of the servant, also relinquished. Having secured his plunder, the fellow paused, apparently reflecting whether by detaining her longer he could gain any further advantage; as he did so, the sound of a horse rapidly advancing struck his ear, and immediately afterwards a turn in the road enabled him to perceive the figure of a servant on horse-back, the sunshine glancing from his bright livery buttons. The moment this object met his view, he started, and shading his eyes with his hand, gazed fixedly at the approaching horseman. Having thus satisfied himself as to the man's identity, he exclaimed with an oath, "It is the old bloodhound's livery, and the girl must be his daughter. Oh, what a chance I have thrown away! Yes," he continued, turning fiercely upon poor Annie, and threatening her with his clenched fist, "if I had guessed you were the daughter of that — old Grant, you should not have got off so easy, I promise you." He paused, as a new idea struck him, and his face assumed an expression of diabolical revenge—placing his hand in his breast, he drew forth a pistol, cocked it, and muttering "There is time yet," levelled it at his trembling victim. With a faint scream, Annie dropped the reins, and clasping her hands in an agony of fear, murmured a petition for mercy. The ruffian stood for a moment irresolute, but, desperate as he was, some touch of humanity yet lingered in his breast, a softening recollection came across him, and muttering—"I can't do it, she looks like poor Jane," he uncocked and replaced the pistol.

At this moment the servant, having heard Annie's scream, came up at a gallop, and the robber, uttering a fearful imprecation, sprang back into the wood, and disappeared among the trees.

It was some minutes before Annie, who was on the verge of fainting, was able to give a coherent account of the adventure which had befallen her; as soon, however, as she had in some degree recovered from the effects of her terror, she desired the servant to ride close behind her, and, urging her pony into a rapid canter, made the best of her way home. Here she found matters in a state of unusual bustle and confusion; the General had received information that Hardy the poacher had broken out of H— gaol, effected his escape unperceived, and was supposed to be concealed somewhere in the neighbourhood of Broadhurst. Accordingly he was marshalling all the available males of his establishment, preparatory to setting out on an expedition to search for, and if possible to apprehend the escaped felon.

Great was his horror and indignation, when he learned the danger to which his daughter had been exposed, and ascertained from the description she gave of her assailant, that the man who had robbed her, and even threatened her life, was none other than the ruffian Hardy.

The preparations which he had already made, he now considered insufficient for ensuring the success of the expedition; he accordingly despatched a mounted groom to procure the assistance of a couple of policemen, and sending for Lewis, begged him to lead a party to search the country in one direction, while he proceeded with a second division of the household forces in another. As the young tutor heard of the alarm to which Annie had been subjected, his cheeks flushed, and his compressed lips quivered; he said little, however, but returning to his room, placed a brace of small pistols in the breast of his coat, attached spurs to the heels of his boots, then mounting a horse which was in readiness for him, rode off. The tenants were roused, the game-keepers summoned, the policemen arrived—General Grant remained absent till nearly ten o'clock at night, and his daughter became alarmed to the last degree for his safety. At length he returned—their search had been unsuccessful; but Mr. Arundel and some of the men would remain on the watch all night, and he would himself resume the pursuit next morning.

For three days and nights Lewis never entered a house, and was scarcely out of the saddle; the fourth day the police received a report from the authorities at Liverpool, stating, that an individual in some degree corresponding to the description of Hardy, had taken his passage in a vessel bound for the United States, and that the wind being favourable, the ship had sailed before they had been able to search her; and with this unsatisfactory report, the family at Broadhurst were forced to content themselves.

CHAPTER XLIV.

IS CALCULATED TO "MURDER SLEEP" FOR ALL NERVOUS YOUNG LADIES WHO READ IT.

THE incident related in the last chapter produced a strange and alarming effect upon Miss Livingstone; in fact, it may be said to have laid the foundation of a species of monomania, which haunted her to the day of her death. From this time forth, she laboured under the delusion that a man trained from his youth up to rob and murder his sleeping fellow-creatures, was secreted at one and the same moment under every bed and behind all the window curtains in the house. A singular and alarming property belonging to this ambushed ruffian, was the extraordinary shadow cast by his legs and feet. Miss Livingstone was perpetually scared by discovering it in the most unlikely places and positions; indeed the statistics of these shadowy phenomena tended to show that it was this villain's ordinary custom to stand upon his wicked head. Then the noises he made were most strange and unearthly, and a habit he possessed of moaning whenever the wind was high, really exceeded anything human nature could be expected to put up with. The trouble he occasioned everybody was inconceivable; for at least a month after Anna's adventure, the butler almost lived in Minerva's bed-room, so constantly was he summoned to unearth this lurking traitor; and yet, although Miss Livingstone was quite certain the monster was there, for she had seen the shadow of his boots with the soles upwards, upon the tester of the bed, by some dreadful fatality, he always contrived to evade the strictest search. Once Miss Livingstone thought she had got him, for, having summoned assistance on the strength of hearing him snore, she actually enjoyed the satisfaction of being sworn at by him, when she looked under the bed and poked for him with a large umbrella; but this time he turned out to be the cat. The servants became so harassed by these repeated alarms, that at length the butler gave bond fide warning, while the footmen, when there was nobody to hear them, vehemently protested they were not hired as thief-catchers, and that Miss Livingstone had better set up a private policeman of her own, if she chose to be so subject to house-breakers. Lewis was not at all pleased with this adventure; in the first place it interrupted the German lessons, for poor Annie had been so seriously frightened—not without cause—that it made her really ill, and for some days she remained on a sofa in her own room. In the second place, Lewis had been so deeply affected when he first heard of the danger to which she had been exposed, that for a moment a doubt crossed his mind whether such a degree of sentiment was exactly consistent with that mild imposition yecept platonic friendship. In the third place, he had used his best endeavours to catch Hardy once again, and had been thoroughly and completely baffled. Time, however, that wonder-working individual, passed on, and by his assistance Annie's nerves recovered their tone, and the German lessons were recommenced, Miss Livingstone saw fewer visions of reversed legs, and confined her researches after the concealed one to a good peep under the bed night and morning. The General made a great fuss about the whole affair, and severely reprimanded several individuals for permitting Hardy to escape, who never had it in their power to prevent his doing so. Having relieved his mind by this judicious exercise of authority, he applied himself to other pursuits, and speedily forgot the whole transaction.

About two months after the occurrence of the robbery, Lord Bellefield wrote to announce his return, and General Grant went to London alone in order to meet him. Before his departure, Annie, whose dislike to the interrupted engagement appeared to increase rather than to diminish, determined to make a great effort, and to acquaint her father with her disinclination to the proposed alliance; and to entreat him to take no steps which might lead to a renewal of the matrimonial project. The General heard her attentively, and then observed,—

"I perfectly understand and appreciate your feelings, my dear Annie; they are such as, under the peculiar circumstances, become my daughter. Remember, my dear, that the matter is in wiser and more experienced hands than yours; and rest assured that nothing shall be done of which even your punctilious delicacy and true sense of honour can disapprove." Then, seeing Annie was about to speak, he continued, "Any further discussion is not only unnecessary, but, as the matter now stands, would appear to imply a doubt of my capability of acting for you; which I should consider, to say the least, disrespectful. You will oblige me by withdrawing, my dear Annie." Thus saying, he rose; and opening the door with all the frigid courtesy of the Grandisonian school, ushered her out. And so poor Annie's attempt proved a signal failure.

On the following morning the General left Broadhurst, having given Annie a very unnecessary caution against riding out with merely a servant, and made it his especial request that Lewis and Walter should accompany her, by way of escort; a proceeding of which neither tutor nor pupil appeared to disapprove.

General Grant was absent for more than a fortnight; and as the weather was unusually fine during the whole of the time, Annie and her attendants rode out every day. Oh, those rides! what delightful expeditions were they. By a tacit consent between Lewis and Annie, all allusion to the future was avoided, in word or thought; they lived in the present, those loving hearts; they were happy, and that sufficed them; and the trees appeared greener, and the flowers more brilliant, and the sunshine brighter, than they had ever seemed before; all was like a fairy dream, and dream-like did it pass away.

A letter from the General, announcing his intended return, was in Annie's hand, as, bending over a ponderous volume of crabbed characters, she awaited her German lesson. The windows of the breakfast-room in which she was seated opened on to an ample lawn, interspersed with groups of shrubs and gay flower-beds. In crossing this lawn, Walter had contrived to intercept Lewis, and inveigle him into a game at ball.

Flushed by the exercise, his eyes sparkling with excitement, and his dark curls hanging in wild disorder about his brow, the young tutor approached the window at which Annie was seated. Concealed by the heavy folds of the window curtain, the girl watched him unperceived: involuntarily she contrasted his frank and easy bearing, his free and elastic step, and the smile half proud, half playful, which parted his curved lips and sparkled in his flashing eyes, with the cold reserve which usually characterised his demeanour, and for the first time she became aware what a bright and noble nature had been obscured and warped by the false position into which circumstances had combined to force him. Who could blame her, who rather would not love her the better, and thank God that He has implanted such beautiful instincts in every true woman's heart, if she felt that she should wish no fairer destiny than to devote her life to bring back the sunshine of his, and by her affection restore the youth of soul which misfortune had wrested from him!

Little guessing the thoughts that were passing through her mind, Lewis advanced towards the window, exclaiming: "Miss Grant, I have a petition to urge—the day is so lovely it is quite wicked to remain in-doors; can I persuade you to use your influence with Miss Livingstone, to allow us to transfer the site of our German lesson to the bench under the lime-tree? I will promise to arrange a most seductive seat for her in the very shaded corner."

"My aunt has departed on a charitable mission," was the reply; "she received a message to say that an unfortunate child whom she has been doctoring out of that dreadful medicine chest of hers, is much worse, and she has rushed off armed with pills and powders."

"To give it the coup de grace, I suppose," interrupted Lewis.

Annie shook her head reprovingly, and continued—"In the excitement of the occasion, she appears to have entirely forgotten our poor German lesson."

"In which case the decision as to place rests with you!" resumed Lewis eagerly, "the matter is therefore settled,—you will come." The accent upon the "will" was intended to be one of entreaty, but somehow the tone in which it was uttered, partook largely of command, and Annie, as she obeyed, said with a smile,—

"I must come,—that is clearly your meaning, Mr. Arundel; however, I see Walter and Faust are already en position, and I must not set them an example of disobedience, so if you will find the books, I will join you immediately."

It was, as Lewis had declared, a lovely evening; the sky was of that deep clear blue which indicates a continuance of fine weather, a soft breeze sighed through the blossoms of the lime-tree beneath which they sat. Faust lay at Annie's feet, gazing up into her face, as though he loved to look upon her beauty, which perhaps he did, for Faust was a dog of taste, and particular in the selection of his favourites. Walter, stretched at his length upon the turf, was idly turning over the pages of a volume of coloured prints. Lewis opened the work they were translating; it was that loveliest of historical tragedies, Schiller's Piccolomini, and Annie read of Max the true, the noble-hearted, and thought that the world contained but one parallel character, and that he was beside her. They read on beneath the summer sky, and tracing the workings of Schiller's master mind, forgot all sublunary things in the absorbing interest of the story. The scene they were perusing was that in which Max Piccolomini describes the chilling effect produced upon him, when he for the first time beholds Thekla surrounded by the splendours of her father's court, and says—(I quote Coleridge's beautiful translation for the benefit of my un-German readers, and in consideration of the shallowness of my own acquaintance with the language of the Fatherland.

"Now, once again, I have courage to look on you,
To-day at noon I could not;
The dazzle of the jewels that play'd round you
Hid the beloved from me.

* * * * *

This morning when I found you in the circle
Of all your kindred, in your father's arms,
Beheld myself an alien in this circle,
Oh! what an impulse felt I in that moment
To fall upon his neck and call him father;
But his stern eye o'erpower'd the swelling passion,
I dared not but be silent—and those brilliant
That like a crown of stars enwreath'd your brows,

They scared me too—Oh! wherefore, wherefore should he
At the first meeting spread, as 'twere, the ban
Of excommunication round you?—wherefore
Dress up the angel for the sacrifice,
And cast upon the light and joyous heart
The mournful burthen of his station? Fitly
May love woo love, but such a splendour
Might none but monarchs venture to approach."

As Lewis read this speech, the bright happy look faded from his face, and his voice grew deep and stern; there was in the whole scene a strange likeness to his own position, which pained him in the extreme, and brought back all his most bitter feelings. Engrossing as was this idea when once aroused, he could not but observe the unusual degree of taste and energy which Annie, who appeared carried away by the interest of the drama, infused into her reading, and the tones of her sweet voice did ample justice to the friendly, confiding tenderness with which Thekla endeavours to console her lover. After her appeal to the Countess Tertsky,—

"He's not in spirits, wherefore is he not?
He had quite another nature on the journey,
So calm, so bright, so joyous eloquent;"

she turns to Max, saying—

"It was my wish to see you always so,
And never otherwise."

Annie spoke the last words so earnestly that Lewis involuntarily glanced at her, and their eyes met. It was one of those moments which occur twice or thrice in a life-time, when heart reads heart, as an open book, and sympathetic thought reveals itself unaided by that babbling interpreter the tongue. Through weary years of sorrow and separation that look was unforgotten by either of them; and when Annie bent her eyes on the ground with a slight blush, which told that the large amount of womanly tenderness that she fain would show, was not unmingled with a portion of womanly love which she would as fain conceal, and Lewis dared not trust himself to speak lest the burning thoughts which crowded on his brain should force themselves an utterance, neither of them was sorry to perceive the figure of Aunt Martha, rustling crisply through the stillness, as, burthened with boluses, Minerva appeared before them, to give a triumphant account of her victory over Tommy Cradle's catarrhal affection, of which ailment she promised Annie a reversion for her imprudence in sitting out of doors without a bonnet.

When Lewis retired to his room that night, he sat down to think over in solitude the occurrences of the day. Had he been deceiving himself, then? was his unhappy attachment still unsubdued; nay, had it not strengthened, under the delusive garb of friendship? had not Annie's society become necessary to his happiness? Again—and as this idea for the first time occurred to him, the strong man trembled like a child from the violence of his emotion—had he not more than this to answer for? Selfishly engrossed by his own feelings, madly relying on his own strength of will, which he now perceived he had but too good reason to mistrust, he had never contemplated the effect his behaviour might produce upon a warm-hearted and imaginative girl. Lewis was no coxcomb, but he had read that in Annie's manner which convinced him that she was by no means indifferent to him. True, it might be only friendship on her part—the natural impulse of a woman's heart to pity and console one who she perceived to need such loving-kindness—and with this forlorn hope Lewis was fain to content himself. Then he began to form wise resolutions for the future: he would avoid her society—the German lessons should be strictly confined to business, and gradually discontinued; and even a vague notion dimly presented itself of a time—say a year thence—when Walter might be entrusted to other hands, and he should be able to extricate himself from a situation so fraught with danger. And having thus regarded the matter by the light of principle and duty, feeling began to assert its claims, and he cursed his bitter fortune which forced him to avoid one whom he would have braved death itself to win. He sat pondering these things deep into the night; the sound of the clock over the stables striking two at length aroused him from his reverie, and he was about to undress, when a slight growl from Faust, who always slept on a mat in Lewis's dressing-room, attracted his attention, and as he paused to listen, a low whistle, which seemed to proceed from the shrubs under his window, caught his ear. Closing the door of the dressing-room, to prevent Faust from giving any alarm, he walked lightly to the window, which, according to his usual custom, he left open all night, and silently withdrawing the curtain, looked out. As he did so, a window on the ground-floor was cautiously opened, and the whistle repeated. After a moment's reflection, he became convinced that the room from which the signal whistle had been replied to was occupied by the new butler, who had replaced the individual harassed into the desperate step of resigning by Minerva's incessant crusades against the Under-the-bed One. At the sound of the signal whistle, the figures of four men appeared from the shrubs, amongst which they had been hidden, and noiselessly approached the window. The candle which Lewis had brought up stairs with him had burned out; and although his window was open, the curtains were drawn across it; he was therefore able, himself unperceived, to see and hear all that was going on. As the burglars, for such he did not doubt they were, drew near, the following conversation was carried on in a low whisper between their leader, a man of unusual stature, and Simmonds the butler.

"You are late; the plate has been packed and ready for the last two hours."

"There was a light in the ——d tutor's room till half-an-hour ago," was the reply; "and we thought he might hear us, and give the alarm, if we did not wait till he was in bed."

"It would not have much signified if he had, when you were once in," returned Simmonds: "the grooms don't sleep in the house; the valet is in London; so there's only the tutor, the footman, and the idiot boy, besides women."

"Where is the old man?" inquired the other.

"Not returned," was the answer.

A brutal curse was the rejoinder, and the robber continued,—"The girl is safe?"

"Yes."

"And the tutor?"

"Yes. What do you want with them?"

"To knock out his ——d brains, and take her with us," was the alarming reply. Simmonds appeared to remonstrate, for the robber replied, in a louder tone than he had yet used,—

"I tell you, yes! Old Grant shall know what it is to lose a daughter, as well as other people."

Afraid lest the loudness of his voice should give the alarm, the other exclaimed, in an anxious whisper, "Hush! come in;" and, one after the other, the four men entered by the opened window.]

VENICE, AND GENERAL PÉPÉ.

THOUGH we have accused our countrymen, in some of our preceding pages, of a general indifference to the Italian struggles for that freedom which is our own most just and proudest boast, we yet are willing to acknowledge that they have expressed towards Venice somewhat more of that sympathy that one generous people ought to show towards another, engaged in a cause which they themselves would be the first to embrace, under similar circumstances.

For this manifestation of a feeling which we should have been glad to have seen displayed upon a more extended basis, many reasons might be brought forward, which did not apply to other parts of the oppressed and misunderstood land whose cause we advocate, simply because it is oppressed and misunderstood.

In the first place, Venice is a maritime country, and as such is brought into nearer commercial acquaintance and interest with our own. True, she has for centuries styled herself the Queen of the Ocean; but that is a title never to be conceded by us, whilst the flag of our own Queen flies triumphant over every ocean, to our colonies and settlements in every part of the habitable globe. Yet Venice looks so beautiful, as she surveys herself in the bright mirror of her beloved Adriatic, all her marble palaces reflected in its bosom, along with the blue sky which canopies them, that it would be impossible to dispute with her the more poetic title of Goddess of the Waves; to which she has as much right, from her origin and her charms, as had her prototype, the Cytherean Venus, when rising from the silvery foam of the Archipelago. Yes, no doubt the impression of her beauty, transmitted in song, and stamped indelibly upon the memory of the traveller, the poet, and the painter, has had its share in the compassion which the fall of Venezia la ricca has awakened, even in hearts "unused to the melting mood!" but there are likewise graver remembrances of her fourteen centuries of gradually increasing power—her infant struggles with the Franks and Huns, at the very entrance of her canals; her maturer combats with the people of Dalmatia and Istria, of Ancona and other maritime cities, by the conquest of which she acquired the domination of the Adriatic, at the expense of the blood of her bravest sons, with which its waters were dyed; her subsequent victories over the Hungarians, the Saracens, the Greeks, the Pisans and the Genoese; her gradual acquisition of Padua, Verona, Vicenza, and other Italian states; her valorous expeditions into the Holy Land, and her successful wars against the Turks; her long intervals of prosperous peace and wise neutralities; during which she amassed her vast stores of wealth at home, and increased her power and her influence abroad. Then rises before us the dignity of her Doges, the imposing solemnities of her government, the wide extension of her commerce, her proud republican independence, her fierce struggles to maintain that independence in all its vigour, and even the insufficiency of her utmost efforts to preserve it; all subjects of interest to every reflective mind.

It is not, however, upon the remote past of Venice that we wish to dwell; it is solely upon her recent struggles, the wrongs under which she has laboured ever since she was first subjected to the yoke of Austria, and the respect to which she is entitled from the noble exertions she has made to cast that yoke aside.

It is difficult for the generality of persons to fully comprehend and feel for any particular class of misfortune or hardship, with which they themselves have never been tried. In our own country we have many things to complain of; many that would admit of improvement or correction; many that loudly call for it; for where can be pointed out the human code of government, which is perfect alike in its theory and administration?—but we have far more, yea a hundredfold more, to be grateful for, than to complain of; and one of our chief causes of thankfulness ought to be that we have no foreign intervention, no insolent dictation of strangers over us, in public matters, or intrusion of spies and secret informers, in the privacy of our own firesides. Indeed we know of no grievance to which Englishmen would less patiently submit. Witness the jealousy with which the admittance of German troops, or German officials, in any way, has been watched, and guarded against by us, ever since the accession of the House of Hanover. What should we say if we saw every public office filled with salaried Germans, and every regulation submitted to German laws, and German administration of them? Yet this was the treatment to which the Venetians were subjected by the Austrians, and will be again, and with increased severity.

Under the Austrian rule in Venice all criminal processes were carried on in writing; and a citizen might be accused, arrested, imprisoned, tried, condemned, sentenced, and executed, without ever seeing the face of his judge, or being confronted with his accusers. The taxes and imposts were enormous, and the method of gathering them most unjust; if a tax-gatherer ran away with the sums he had collected, the parties thus robbed were compelled to pay the amount a second time. The Austrians paid all their employés, both civil and military, in base coin, of which they would only receive one third back again in taxes, requiring the rest in gold. No Venetian was allowed to serve in the Austrian army, but as a volunteer; and that without pay: whilst, on the other hand, all the most responsible public offices were filled by Austrians, often ignorant of the Italian language, at disproportionate salaries. No newspaper was allowed to be published in Venice, or to be translated from other countries, till examined and permitted by the police. No Venetian could leave Venice without personally applying for a passport, some days beforehand; and stating every particular of his residence, the condition and number of his family, his own occupation, the business on which he was going, and the distance; when, in case of his account of himself satisfying his interrogators, he was allowed to depart, upon payment for his passport, and the security of two substantial housekeepers for his return. If, however, he happened to be a person of rank, he did not get off so easily: in that case he had to apply direct to the Secretary of State, at Vienna, for leave of absence; and often he had to wait for months, before he obtained it; and not seldom was it finally refused—nor was it ever granted without the deposit, in addition to the payment for the passport, of a zecchino per month, for the amount of time specified as wished for. To Vienna itself, however, the local governors had orders to deny all passports whatsoever: do our readers desire to know why? we can inform them; it was to prevent, by any chance, the complaint of the hardships under which the Venetians laboured, from reaching the Imperial ear; for, ignorant and despotic as the Emperor was known to be, it was yet believed that he was not aware of the extent to which his authority was abused. Imagine such a system of things among our merchants or nobility! But it would be endless to enumerate the grievances of the Venetians—the frequent confiscation of their palaces; sold in many instances to the Jews, for the bare value of their building materials; the vexatious delays in their shipping interests; which often, by frivolous regulations, caused a vessel to be detained as many days as she had been hours in making her voyage from Trieste or other ports, before she could discharge her cargo. Let us leave all those separate tyrannies, both petty and great; each of which ought to be enough to excite the honest indignation and generous sympathy of every Englishman—let us enter at once into the last and most heroic stand of the Venetians, in the endeavour to regain their ancient liberties and national rights, as it is depicted in the manly and truthful, and we may add, as far as concerns himself, most modest and unobtrusive narrative of the brave and honourable General P  pe.

The romantic and chivalrous early life of this veteran warrior, an exile in the cause of liberty at the age of seventeen, passing the next twenty years alternately in chains or in camps, and a victorious liberator of his country at the head of fifty thousand men before he had attained the age of thirty-eight, might well detain us at our outset, did not our limits confine us to the latest transactions of his eventful career, as connected with the defence and fall of Venice.

After an animated picture of the politics and position of Ferdinand II. at Naples in 1848, the general proceeds to make us acquainted with the situation of the Lombard-Venetian provinces under the Austrian rule, at the same period; and his remarks will fully bear us out in those which we have already made on this subject.

"In the space of a few years, two thousand millions [of lire,] (a fabulous sum, when the size of our territory, not more than an eighth of the monarchy, is considered)—two thousand millions had been buried in the imperial treasury; to our great misfortune, and without real advantage for the finances of the empire: such is the ignorance and corruption which in Austria rule public affairs! Everywhere commerce languished, hampered as it was by the fetters of prohibitive laws, and enormous taxes; while, on the other hand, smuggling increased excessively, and was one, though not the only cause, of the universal immorality. There were no longer any cannon foundries, nor manufactories of arms, or of linen cloth. Native industry was ever sacrificed to that of its rivals, Austria, Moravia, and Bohemia. No encouragement was given to agriculture, the principal source of municipal wealth. The delays of the administration were incredible, and law-suits eternal. The conscription was intolerable; every year the flower of our youths were transported into Hungary, Moravia, Bohemia, and latterly into Galicia. Talent was either bought by the police, shackled by the censorship laws, or left to die in chains. Information, that social di grace, owed its growth to Austria; and this horrid pest had penetrated the very heart, and corrupted the very marrow of society. There were spies in the piazzas, spies in the cafés, in the theatre, in the churches, in the most intimate family privacy. Many honoured citizens, because they were suspected by the government, without any other reason, were imprisoned; many were, from the same cause, torn from the sanctuary of their own homes, and sent as exiles into a foreign land."—Narrative of Events in Italy, by General Pèpe, vol. i. p. 45.

And this is the state of things under which some Englishmen have pronounced the Lombards happy and contented; or, at any rate, that they ought to have been so! Many are the interesting instances that the General gives us of the magnanimity, the devotedness of the Milanese in defence of their social rights and their native walls.

"Delicate women and tender children were seen tearing up the stones in the roads, and carrying them into their houses, to throw on the heads of their assailants. Some prepared oil, some boiling water; some sharpened their knives, or got ready their fowling-pieces; some a simple stick with an iron point. Hundreds of barricades arose in the city, while at the windows of the citizens waved, as on a day of rejoicing, the tri-coloured banner. . . . While a brave people were thus fighting for their franchises and their independence, the more intelligent part were labouring to find means to finish the unequal conflict happily. The astronomers made observations on the steeple tops, and with their telescopes spied the movements of the enemy, and every hour rendered an account of them to the war committee. Ingenious artifices were used to make cannons of wood, strengthened with hoops of iron, and capable of withstanding a certain number of discharges. The chemists prepared gunpowder and gun-cotton. Others melted lead for balls, and others were employed in preparing cartridges. . . . A citizen, who had lost his right hand in the combat, was seen to discharge his gun with the left hand: one of his companions having charged it for him, and he fired it repeatedly thus with wonderful perseverance. A young man who was the first to enter the viceroyal palace, shouting 'Viva l'Italia!' was struck by fifteen balls: when almost cold, this heroic youth still murmured 'Viva l'Italia!' A dying man wrote on the walls with his own blood, 'Courage, brothers!'—and expired.

"But ability and valour were not the only ornaments of our people. The charity shown in Milan during these days was universal. In many houses the wounded were collected, and expert doctors and surgeons gave them every sort of succour and assistance. Ladies of all ages prepared lint and bandages. The rich distributed bread and wine gratuitously to the poor. The denunciations of patricians and people, so senseless in modern times, disappeared, and with them the pride of the one and the envy of the other. During five days Milan presented a spectacle which was worthy of the angels, and too beautiful for men! It was truly a city of friends and brothers! And the good Milanese, after beating the Austrians and the Croats, saluted them, too, with the appellation of brothers: if naked, they clothed them, if hungry, they fed them, if wounded, they were placed under the loving care of the sublime city. Their hostages were guests. Among the numerous examples of humanity and moderation which we might cite, we will limit ourselves to two. The family of Baron Torresani Lanzanfeld, head of the police, remained in our power: this family was treated with the most delicate consideration. Conte Bolza, a noted tool of the police, had not succeeded in escaping: he hid himself in a hay-loft, like a wolf pursued by hunters. He was dragged from thence by another of these bailiffs, who had discovered the place of his concealment. A brave-hearted man said to them,—"If, in these circumstances, you kill him, you will perform a just act; if you do not kill him, you will have performed a holy action;" and this magnanimous people touched not a hair of the head of this wretch, who deserved the severest treatment. It was an incontestable fact that our people were as generous as they were terrible in combat,—only too generous in victory!"—Vol. i. p. 69.

To this testimonial we can give our full credence, because we have ourselves witnessed the exhibition of the same valour, the same humanity, we might add courtesy, under similar circumstances in Rome. But we must not linger on our way; our present business is with Venice.

It was on the 9th of December, 1847, that Giovanni Battista Mazzari, a central deputy of Lombardy, issued his report, in which he incited the Central Congregation to nominate a commission from its body, for the purpose of inquiring into the means of establishing a good understanding between the government and the governed, in order to remove the danger of that fatal collision between them, which the daily increasing discontents of the people rendered but too probable. Encouraged by this example, the advocate Daniel Manin made a similar motion in the Central Congregation at Venice, on the 21st of the same month, specially demanding public trials and other reforms, particularly in criminal cases. This was speedily followed by another from Nicolo Tomasco, a man of letters, and universally esteemed, touching the restrictions on the press, and other abuses. All these acts, however, were legally performed, and the petitioners confined themselves strictly to the limits of the sovereign patent. Finally, also, the Venetian Central Committee, after secretly ascertaining the wish of the government, appointed a commission to collect and transmit to Vienna the complaints of the people.

The promulgation of all these demands for reform soon excited great fermentation in the public mind. The police at first thought to quell it by terror, and arrested Manin and Tomaseo, but these measures only increased the excitement. The walls were covered with placards in favour of the independence of Italy: liberal demonstrations took place at the theatres, and meetings were held, and speeches made, in the public piazzas, amid the applauses and vociferations of the people.

"Recourse was then had by the government to arms, and the lower people were driven away, at first with the bayonet, and, on the following day, were fired at, from a short distance. The Venetian people were unarmed. They pulled up stones, and breaking them, attacked in their turn, and then ran on the soldiers, and seized the bayonets from their guns. Children of ten or twelve years old were conspicuous in these encounters; they beat a waltz under the very fire. The wounded bound up their wounds, and returned to the attack. There were some both wounded and killed, an earnest of what they were capable of enduring, and of what they afterwards effected; and a lasting example of magnanimity and devotion to the cause of emancipation."—Vol. i. p. 98.

The news that a constitutional government was published at Trieste, increased the enthusiasm of the people. The portrait of Pio Nono, at that time the supposed liberator of Italy, was crowned with a garland, and carried to the Piazza of San Marco, and the passers-by were compelled to take off their hats before it; the theatre, previously deserted, was that evening filled, and a tri-coloured flag was hoisted from the balcony, and only torn down by government with the aid of the military. Thus things went on until the 17th of March, when the people, unable any longer to restrain their feelings, decided upon liberating their courageous advocates, Manin and Tomaseo. The governor, alarmed at this intimation, sent orders for their release; but the populace had already reached the prison, forced the doors, and were in the very act of carrying their champions round the Piazza of San Marco, on their shoulders. Manin then made a long harangue, under the very windows of the governor, until, exhausted by the excess of his own energy, he fainted, and was taken home by the sympathising people. Three days after, a deputation was sent from the municipality, to intimate to the governor that the Austrian government must renounce its power, and the civil governor resign his functions to the military governor, Zichy, who must sign a convention, by virtue of which Venice should be evacuated by the Austrian troops, ceding the command, which, in expectation of a provisional government about to be instituted, was secured to the members of the deputation. While these events were passing in the palace, the arsenal was strongly occupied by a portion of the civic guard, and Manin, taking from thence a standard with the ancient emblem of St. Mark, was conducted along in triumph, proclaiming the Venetian republic to the people.

The same night the members of the deputation resigned, and the following day, the 23d of March, the commandant of the civic guard, Mengaldo, drew out two of his battalions on the piazza, and after obtaining from the patriarch the benediction of their banners, he proposed a provisional government, with Manin at its head, to which all the magistrates, both civil and judicial, gave in their adherence, as did also the Venetian provinces, as soon as they were evacuated by the Austrian troops, which were concentrated in Verona.

At this time Pôpé, starting at the call of Italian independence from the forced repose of his long exile, like a war-horse at the sound of the trumpet, had repaired to Naples, in order to endeavour to persuade its falsest and most cruel of kings to send an expedition of land and sea forces to the aid of Venice, in her struggles to regain her ancient liberty and her place among nations.

"The dawn of the 29th of March," says he, "when we discovered the Gulf of Naples, was to me a moment of overpowering emotion. Not only had my long sojourn in the north made its beauty more striking, but other recollections rushed to my mind, already agitated with tender feelings. There was Castellamare before me, whither, twenty-seven years before, in this same month of March, I had gone, not without great danger, in order to embark in a Spanish vessel for Barcelona, esteeming myself fortunate to be sent on a long exile, instead of leaving my head under the axe of princes who thirsted for my blood.

"Turning my eyes towards the tremendous and poetical Vesuvius, I perceived the mountains which concealed Avellino, from whence, in 1820, I had passed them with an army, which I conducted to the capital; not to punish the cruel king, who, in 1799, had sent to the scaffold the flower of my contemporaries, to the number of three hundred, all the honour of Italy and of humanity, but respectfully to impose on him a liberal constitution. Viglieno next caught my view, recalling the flag of those Calabrian heroes, who, faithful to their magnanimous vow of dying free, set fire to the powder magazine, and were followed by their conquerors into eternity. I invoked them to rise from their tombs, and admire how, at last, their sacrifice was becoming fruitful."—Vol. i. p. 107.

His first interview with the king is thus described:—

"On entering the room appropriated to the officers on duty, I was saluted as a person of high position, and immediately introduced to the king. He retained no trace of the boy of ten years old whose beauty I had then admired: with added years he had become colossal, and his countenance did not indicate tenderness of heart. Yet his manner to me was only too gracious; he invited me to sit down on a magnificent sofa, while he took a light cane chair for himself. 'Sire,' I said, 'this is my place, the other belongs to your majesty.' He began by inquiring after the health of Florestano (the general's brother, who had gained much reputation for his military services in Sicily in 1820), and this inquiry he never failed to repeat in all my subsequent visits. After asking whether my voyage had been prosperous, he talked of France. I told him that when first the French republic was proclaimed, no one believed it, but soon after I had convinced myself, and I remained convinced, that a throne would not speedily be re-established in France. We discoursed of the embarrassment in which the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and other German princes found themselves placed. I said, 'Sire, an example is offered to princes, as useful as it is agreeable to follow, in the person of the King of the Belgians, who has conducted himself in such a manner that his people unanimously entreated him not to abandon them.'

"Having conversed some time on the political condition of other states, without saying a word of his own, he pressed me to return again the following day.

"On leaving him, I turned my eyes towards that chamber, temporarily converted into a chapel, where Ferdinand's worthy ancestor in 1820, in presence of his ministers, myself, and other notabilities, swore on the Evangelists, and said to me, weeping, 'This time, general, I assure you I swore from my heart,' on which he placed his hand; and I, admiring in this gesture a grey-headed old man seeming to repent his perjury, wept at his tears, and incurred the reproaches of not a few of my contemporaries, who were not present at the scene which excited and excused my emotion. In that palace, too, I called to mind the feigned reasonings of the Regent, afterwards Francis I., and the father of Ferdinand II. This prince, the most dissembling of men, pretended to be a warm partizan of constitutional government, and in order to make himself believed, he studiously advanced arguments in favour of that system."—Vol. i. p. 121.

A lively picture follows of the profound dissimulation of the king, and the hollowness of his professions, with regard to Austria; though he admitted to P  p   that it was a power he had always detested, notwithstanding he had married an Austrian princess.

Having dissolved his ministry the day after the General's first audience, his Majesty sent to him to propose that he should form a cabinet; taking himself the presidency of the council, and the double posts of Minister of War and of the Marine; and moreover the charge of the organization of the National Guard throughout the whole kingdom; so well was the manner remembered in which he had maintained internal peace and order in Naples, during the stormy period there of 1820 and 1821. General P  p   willingly accepted this arduous task, in the honest hope of acquitting himself of it, to the benefit of his country, and the public weal. He therefore lost no time in drawing out a programme for the government, and a list of the new ministry. But quick as he was in acting upon the royal will, his Majesty was quicker still in changing it; and the programme was returned as soon as received, with the information that the King conceived he should "fail in his duty towards his country, by altering the Constitution already granted."

Partly, perhaps, to make amends for this sudden dereliction of his own proposition, and partly because he was afraid of standing out longer against the wishes of the people, the king at length made up his mind to send 40,000 men, including the corps of reserve, against the Austrians, and to offer the command of them to General P  p  ; an offer which he accepted without a moment's hesitation, and from the moment he did accept it, his whole soul was filled with impatience to lead his troops to the aid of Venice.

But while he was bent upon this army being speedily organized, and so effectually as to gain the palm of victory for Italy, the king was resolved that it should be numerically feeble, deficient in all the material requisites, incapable, in short, of rendering any important service to the Italian cause. The base subterfuges employed by the king, and his courtiers, superior officers and generals, to delay the preparations for entering on the campaign at last threw poor P  p  , who all that time scarcely took a moment's repose, into a violent fever, which confined him to his bed for six days. The original plan of the expedition had been that seven battalions should go at once in steam frigates, and disembark, under the command of P  p  , in the Lagoon. But the king took the advantage of the General's temporary illness to oppose the embarkation of the troops, and it was finally decided that they should go by land. Accordingly, after many other vexatious and frivolous delays, the brigade, composed of 17,000 men, started; but just before his departure P  p   received a letter from the Minister of War, informing him on the part of his Majesty, that on arriving at the Po with the troops, he was to concentrate them on the right bank of the river, and "there wait for instructions from the regal government as to the active part they are to take in the present war for the liberation of Italy from a foreign yoke." This letter, P  p  , with honest indignation, informs us he placed in his private portfolio, "with the firm intention of considering it as not received."

"What general, trained to warfare," he asks, "would have been so chicken-hearted as to consent to remain on the right bank of the Po—to say to the Sardinians, to the Venetians, 'Expose your lives for the national cause, for its honour, for its independence, I will remain here, and read your seats in the newspapers, until I receive orders to pass the great river, orders which will never arrive!'"—Vol. i. p. 147.

Arrived at Bologna, with his staff, the General found a letter from Manin, setting forth the perilous position of Venice, threatened with blockade both by sea and land, and earnestly calling upon him, and the "generous Neapolitans" under his command, to hasten to its succour with both land and sea forces. This letter redoubled P  p  's ardour, but whilst he was dying with impatience to cross the Po, and fancying he held the liberty of the Peninsula in his hand, a despatch arrived from Naples, commanding, in the name of the king, the immediate return of the troops, laying down the plan of their homeward route, and stating that in case of General P  p   not thinking proper to take the command of the troops in their retreat, it was to be assumed by Lieutenant-General Statella. So much for the good faith of King Ferdinand II. Thus in an instant were darkened all the sanguine hopes and brilliant anticipations of the brave and ardent P  p  .

"With a heart oppressed with anguish," says he, "with sufferings more acute than if my last moment of life had arrived, I gave Lieutenant-General Statella orders to take the command of the brigade, and follow the directions of the Government."—Vol. i. p. 170.

! Soon, however, recovering from his first despair, and encouraged by the enthusiastic assurances of the Bolognese that they would support him, he wrote to annul his letter to Statella, who seemed equally glad to renounce the command of the brigade, as Pèpé was to resume it. We must pass over many interesting details that follow, for it is not our intention to give a continuous history of the Venetian war; but only to lay before our readers some of the many glorious instances it afforded of patriotism, courage, patience under the severest privations, and devotedness to the cause of Italian liberty.

It was on the 13th of July, 1848, that Pèpé arrived in Venice, after a succession of anxieties and difficulties, with the few troops that had preferred remaining with him in the cause of freedom, to returning to Naples to fire upon their own countrymen, under the order of the "bombarding King." It was at a critical moment, and he was received with the warmest acclamations. He was immediately waited upon by Manin the President of the Republic, to inform him exactly of the situation of Venice at that time, and to propose to him that he should take the command in chief of all its land-forces.

"I accepted this command," says Pèpé, "for I had ever considered Venice the most important military position to preserve in Italy, since it is from thence that the Austrian empire must be attacked. The fortifications in the lake were almost abandoned, and the excellent Neapolitan officers of the engineer-corps who had followed me were most useful. The militia whom I found in Venice, when joined by those I had brought with me, amounted to 22,000 men, including a fine battalion of marines, and one of gendarmes, all old soldiers, but who could rarely be occupied in the defence, as they were employed in preserving internal order. The rest of the militia were divided into different regiments, into battalions, and into many subdivisions, and were chiefly commanded by adventurers. Each corps had rules of discipline, and ordinances, peculiar to itself, and, what is more extraordinary, they were paid and armed in different ways. Often in one company might be seen four different kinds of muskets. Garrison-service was wholly unknown. Amongst others, the garrison of Malghera, the key of Venice, was composed of 3,000 of the civic garde mobile, who not finding sufficient room to lodge themselves in the two barracks which were there, lay on the ground in the open air, or within the barrack which they were beginning to construct."—Vol. i. p. 237.

The defenders of Venice did indeed at that time include a motley mixture of Neapolitans, Romans, Venetians, Lombards, Tuscans, and even Piedmontese; along with many Italian deserters, and refractory conscripts, from the Austrian army; inasmuch that Tomaseo, then constituted the Minister of the Interior, distrusted their utility, and wrote to Pèpé, upon the subject, as follows:—

"Venice, June 17.
"DEAR GENERAL,—This troop of idle, undisciplined men is more dangerous than useful to Venice. We beseech you to send them away as soon as possible. Form a camp, which is earnestly demanded by every one. To you is confided our destiny, and perhaps that of all Italy. It is superfluous to recommend ourselves to you. Adieu, with affection."
"TOMASEO."

"I produce this letter," says the General, "for the honour of Italy; where it appears that a vagabond set of youths, unused to arms, in a short time became disciplined troops, who assaulted with success a warlike enemy, not once or twice, but repeatedly.

"But if among so many thousand militia many deserved the appellation of vagabonds, many others, perhaps a good half of the entire garrison, had left their families, who were more or less in easy circumstances, through love of Italy. Oftener than would be believed, I found in the ranks young volunteers of high families, either from the city or the provinces. . . . I generally met with so much kindness of feeling in these enthusiastic young men, that when I questioned them, first one and then another, concerning their wants, they concealed from me the privations they suffered, to avoid giving me pain; for not one of them was ignorant that I loved them as my sons. About 300 young men of respectable families had formed themselves into a company to serve as artillery men during the siege. They suffered privations with such patriotism, and exposed their lives with so much valour, that you might have thought them the contemporaries of Lycurgus."—Vol. i. p. 240.

Much of the credit of this order and improvement was due to General Pèpé's incessant activity and attention to the wants of all under his command; blending almost parental kindness with the strictest discipline, he soon made himself equally respected and beloved. Everywhere his pages bear witness to the bravery and fortitude of the troops that defended Venice so valiantly to the very last moment, when they had no longer ammunition to defend her with, or bread for their own sustenance. The Neapolitans, in particular, who had followed him despite the royal order for their return, signalized themselves on all occasions, and were particularly admired by the Venetians, not more for their valour, than for the perfect dexterity and promptitude of all their military movements. With what double lustre does their courage in the generous cause of their country's freedom shine, when compared with the cowardice of those 10,000 Neapolitans who, advancing towards Rome, under the command of their trusty monarch, Ferdinand il Bomba, fled before Garibaldi, like frightened hares.

The mention of a few of the many brave whom General Pèpé has handed down to fame, in his narrative, is a debt due to their merits, the payment of which will, we trust, be as pleasing to our readers as it is to ourselves. And, first of all, honour to the dead. It was a favourite observation of General Pèpé's, that "if Tasso had come to Malghera, he would have found the originals of some of his heroes;" and pursuing this idea, he distinguished Lieutenant-General Rosaroll, a Neapolitan by birth, by the name of "the Argante of the Lagoon." He distinguished himself greatly at the defence of the fort of Malghera, and met a glorious death whilst directing the fire of the battery of St. Antonio, on the railway bridge, which Pèpé used to tell him should be called his god-daughter. Though he had been severely wounded in Charles Albert's army a few months before, and was suffering much from fever at the time, he could not be persuaded to stay away from the first battery of the bridge.

"At three o'clock," says General Pèpé, "a bomb from the enemy burst a powder deposit; Rosaroll immediately repaired the damage, continuing all the while the fire from our guns. Five hours later, while from a parapet he was observing the Austrians, a fatal ball struck his right shoulder, and he fell. 'To your guns, to your guns!' he imperiously cried to the artillery-men who ran to assist him. The General-in-Chief went to him, and found him gasping for breath; he pressed his hand, and spoke words of consolation. But the noble warrior, recalling all his strength, said, 'Not I, expiring, but our Italy, should be the object of your care;' and a few minutes later his valiant soul had taken its flight to the regions of immortality."—Vol. ii. p. 248.

Close upon the death of this brave man, Pépé commemorates another, also of Naples,—Alessandro Poërio, who, worthy of long remembrance, met death in the sortie of Mestre, whilst advancing with desperate valour.

"It was in this affair," says the General, "that Baron Alessandro Poërio, a volunteer on my staff, received a musket-shot in his leg; he continued to advance, and received a second in the right knee; and while lying on the ground, the enemy wounded him on the head with his own dagger. While his right thigh was being amputated, this brave Poërio conversed calmly of his beloved Italy,—the heroes of Plutarch might have used the same language while speaking of Athens or Sparta."—Vol. ii. p. 340.

But to this account we wish to add a somewhat more lengthened one from the pen of Count Opprandino Arrivabene, himself an accomplished man of letters, a scion of an illustrious Mantuan family, and a warm upholder of the Italian cause:—

"Italy," says he, "has offered up another illustrious victim on the altar of her independence. In the very hour of victory, obtained by the Italian troops at Mestre, on the 27th ultimo, Alessandro Poërio fell, having received in his knee two Croatian bullets, by the side of General Pépé, in the thickest of the fight; into which he had advanced to set the example, that he who would live free ought to know how to die. He fell, crying out, 'Viva l'Italia;' being conveyed into Venice by his victorious companions in arms, still speaking of his country, he appeared insensible to the pain of amputation, to which it was found necessary he should submit; within four days from this time, surrounded by his brave and weeping friends, he serenely expired, in the calm expectation that from the same tomb into which he was about to enter, Italy herself would arise, glorious, and contented with him who had so greatly loved her.

"Alessandro Poërio, born about the commencement of the present century, was the son of the erudite Baron Joseph Poërio, a Calabrian, whose name is frequently mentioned in the history of his time by Colotta. Early made sensible of the tyranny of despotism, Alessandro was condemned to exile, together with his father and his worthy brother Carlo. He pursued his studies in Germany, in Paris, and in Florence; well skilled in Greek and Latin, he also spoke the modern Greek, the Spanish, the Portuguese, the German, the English, the French, and the Polish languages: and at the same time he was not neglectful of his own, which he cultivated with the strongest affection, and both wrote and conversed in it with the greatest purity and elegance. Profound in historic lore, and deeply learned in philosophy, his quick and brilliant imagination gave birth to many splendid poetical effusions, which abundantly testify as to the valuable qualities of his mind and heart. A small collection of these was published about five years ago, at Paris, by Didot, without the author's name, under the title of 'Aleune Ariche.' It may be said that all those who were acquainted with him, in Germany, in France, and in Italy, were his friends, seeing that he was as good, as modest, as affectionate, as he was learned and ingenious."

"Of a weak constitution, infirm, and prematurely old, he yet braved the dangers of the field, sustained by his patriotism, and by his confidences in the justice of a cause which to him was a sacred one; which he believed would finally triumph, as most assuredly it will.

"It is needless to say more of him; his rare intelligence, and the purity of his life, are in the knowledge and the affectionate remembrance of so many; and worthier pens will not be wanting to celebrate his merit, and to invite the whole nation to deplore his loss, as Venice has already done, when on the 4th instant the governor of the city, the generals and officers of the army, together with the civic guard and all ranks of citizens, assisted at the sad and solemn ceremony of his funeral. He could not die otherwise than happy, for at the very moment of his departure he saw his country's standard triumphant, and heard the distant sound of the breaking of our chains in Vienna, and he rejoiced in his inmost soul at the assured passage of Europe's deliverance."—Roman Advertiser, Nov. 16, 1848, p. 840.

But our pages would swell into volumes were we to attempt the chronicling of one-half the heroes conspicuous in the Italian cause, whose names deserve rescuing from oblivion. We must content ourselves with a very brief mention of some of those who still live to claim the gratitude of their country; and foremost among them we will place Captain Cattabeni, who "bold, even to temerity," as Pépé says of him, undertook, in the same affair in which Poërio received his death wound, to drive out, in conjunction with Rossaroll and Sirtori, with a handful of brave Lombards, house by house, the Austrians who had entrenched themselves in Mestre, and thus to open the way for the Venetian troops to occupy the city. Being subsequently recalled to Rome, he took his place as deputy, and likewise defended the barricades, during the siege of the city, along with the brave and honourable Cernuschi and Caldari. He had already made himself conspicuous by his valour on many occasions. Of one of these, when the enemy had unmasked their batteries before Malgherra, and sent a shower of bombs, shells, and shot, all along the line, Colonel Ulloa, the commander of that most important fortress, thus speaks:—

"And here it becomes my duty to signalize with peculiar praise, a company of the Sile legion, who, guided by their distinguished Captain, Cattabeni, at the moment in which we were receiving a shower of the enemy's balls, went, amidst the shouts and acclamations of the garrison, to the distant dwelling of their commander, from whence they brought back their flag in triumph, traversing great part of the fort."—Vol. ii. p. 180.

He is now, with other Italian refugees, in London, supporting his compatriots by the example of as much philosophy in exile as he had before shown courage in the field.

Cosenz and Morandi, Noaro, Bignami, Zambeccari, Zanetti, and Montecchi, all signalized themselves repeatedly by acts of valour. But where so many are deserving of commendation, it seems almost invidious to particularize any; and full as many instances of the most devoted courage and fidelity might be given from the privates and lower classes. One poor fellow, a grenadier from Calabria, exclaimed, whilst enduring amputation of his right arm, "I would give this other arm for Italy." Antonio Zorzi, a boy of twelve years, sprang into the sea, to recover the flag of the boat in which he was serving, and which was carried away by a cannon ball from the enemy; he succeeded in regaining it amid showers of grape-shot, and triumphantly fastened it on the prow, shouting all the while, "Viva l'Italia!" That cry was indeed on the lips even of the wounded and the dying.

But alas! in despite of all her heroism, all her devotedness, the situation of Venice became every day more and more hopeless. The King of Sardinia, struggling with his own misfortunes, had been obliged to withdraw both his fleet and land forces from her assistance, at the very moment when she most required them. The Roman States, threatened with Austrian invasion, required all their strength to meet it; and accordingly the four Roman legions, which had been foremost to march to the defence of the Lagoon, were sent back, with the exception of a single battalion of one thousand men, to their native provinces; with the most honourable testimonials from the commander-in-chief, to the bravery and the fortitude with which they had, for the seven months they had been under his command, endured difficulties, privations, and sickness, that might have tried the resolution of even veteran troops.

But yet another evil was threatening her—and that was poverty. On the population of the Lagoon, which at the utmost did not exceed two hundred thousand men, devolved the maintenance of all the forces, both of sea and land, and, moreover, the supplying of them with clothing and household requisites. The Venetians had already sacrificed nearly all their private property to the general good: eighteen of the wealthier and more influential families, not content with largely guaranteeing the paper money, which the exigencies of the state had required to be put into circulation, contributed among themselves the sum of eighteen millions of lire, which they placed at the disposition of their country. In the same manner, the public functionaries voluntarily proposed such deductions in their salaries as left them barely enough to subsist upon; and the sailors of the fleet gave up half their pay. The ladies, also, nobly presented their jewels and ornaments; and indeed persons of every grade contributed to the utmost of their means. Even the poor mountaineers of Friuli, who themselves live almost entirely upon chesnuts, brought their humble offering of 270 lbs. of butter, for the sick and wounded in the hospitals, and a chamois, to be disposed of by lottery; and this offering, brought, like the widow's mite, "who of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living," from the simplest abodes of poverty and labour, derived additional value in the eyes of the brave men to whom it was made, from knowing that the poor fellows who brought it had done so at the risk of their lives, the Austrians having made a decree, by which any person or persons detected going into Venice with provisions or ammunition, were instantly to be shot.

In order to gain funds for carrying on the war, General P  p   proposed pecuniary aid being solicited throughout the Italian states, and set a noble example himself, of generosity, in giving up the remaining half of the salary allotted him by the Venetian Government, of 70,000 francs a-year, having relinquished the first half from the time of his receiving it. And here we are proud to add, that some of our English nobility and merchants sent contributions. One of the first to do so was Mr. Charles Alexander Scott, who sent a thousand lire to Manin, with a note, as follows:—

"WORTHY CITIZEN PRESIDENT,—Deign to accept the slight contribution of a thousand lire, towards the urgent wants of the heroic and beloved Venice; and may Heaven crown your noble efforts with full success!"

And now another evil advanced—provisions became every day more and more scarce; and the bread was obliged to be mixed with rye and other grain of inferior quality. In consequence of this, the increasing heat of the season, and the crowded state of the sleeping-places, fever broke out, with cholera—that scourge of later years—in its train; and the veteran general had the grief to see the Venetian army thinned, day after day, more by them than even the enemy's fire. He thus expresses his feelings on the occasion:—

"These daily losses," said he, "one after another, of young men, belonging to good families, whose names were known to us all, grieved me to the soul. I was also much afflicted to see the hospitals and barracks filled with the wounded and the invalids, whose greatest agony was that they were unable to fight by the side of their companions. . . . Both the troops and people bore, with constant resignation, the scarcity and bad quality of the bread and other eatables, which, at the same time, were extremely dear. I sent four carriage horses myself to the butcher. . . . The attitude of all classes of the people was such as to do honour, not only to the Lagoon, not only to Italy, but to the human race. Providence, in permitting that a people so noble, so energetic, should fall into servitude, seems to tempt our limited understandings to doubt its intervention. The grief of bidding adieu to house and home, the certainty of meeting with disasters and privations without end, the inevitable sufferings of so many tender youths, never drew from a single mouth the desire of a treaty for peace."—Vol. ii. p. 255.

But it is painful to dwell upon the final defeat of a brave people. Let it then suffice to say, that it was not till famine stared them in the face, and they had no longer even powder with which to return the enemy's fire, till the bombs and grenades reached over half the city and the balls over two-thirds, that the Venetians made an honourable capitulation.

"Thus fell Venice," says General P  p  , "not vanquished by a great empire, but because she had neither bread nor powder. She fell, after sustaining a thousand misfortunes, and after sacrifices on the part of the population which are almost incredible."—Vol. ii. p. 318.

His own narrative of the events connected with the siege will go down to posterity, in confirmation of the many proofs that have already been recorded in the page of history, that the struggle for independence in Italy, in the middle of the nineteenth century, was throughout supported by persons of all classes, from the highest to the lowest, and headed by men of honour and of ability, both in the cabinet and in the field.

Reflections.

THE PRELUDE, BY WORDSWORTH.

THE recent death of William Wordsworth has prepared the public for many comments on his genius; and a paper has already appeared in this magazine, in which a tribute was paid to his memory, and a brief sketch of his life and character presented. But the publication of a posthumous poem,¹ forming another portion of the great unfinished work on which his fame will mainly rest, justifies a further reference to the literary reputation of the departed poet, and tempts us to enlarge at greater length on some of his peculiar merits.

It is pleasing to reflect, that before the grave had closed over Wordsworth full but tardy justice had been done to his commanding genius. The length of days with which a benignant Providence had blessed him, had brought with them some peculiar privileges. He had outlived detraction and injustice; his reputation had silently widened; and every thoughtful mind in the realm which gave him birth acknowledged and blessed his influence, and appreciated the importance of his mission. He had fairly earned the popularity—if such a word aptly describes the due recognition of genius—which he had scorned to pursue by any unworthy artifice, or by the sacrifice of a principle or conviction; and having pursued the even tenor of his way through evil and through good report, he was recompensed at last, in his quiet seclusion, for the ridicule and misapprehension to which his theories had exposed him, by the expressions of admiration, sympathy, and respect which reached him from far and near, and by the full assurance which his own heart vouchsafed him, that he had not failed in the high and laudable aim of his honourable life.

On the intellectual growth of the present generation, it is universally admitted that the genius of Wordsworth has exercised a most potent and beneficial influence. Our best poetry and philosophy are impregnated with his spirit. In spite of some theories carried to an absurd extent, and a spirit of literary dogmatism which naturally provoked opposition, the poetical creed which at the outset of his career he propounded to the world, had sufficient vitality to effect many salutary reforms, and to influence many powerful minds. He endeavoured to enlarge the domain of song. In opposition to the prevailing prejudice, he boldly declared that there was nothing too lowly or too mean to become the subject of poetry. From "the short and simple annals of the poor" he has deduced his highest lessons of truth and wisdom. The American philosopher, Emerson, has noticed, as one of the "auspicious signs of the coming days, as they glimmer already through poetry and art, through philosophy and science, through church and state," the significant fact, that, "instead of the sublime and beautiful, the near, the low, the common, are explored and poetized." "That which had been trodden under foot," he says, "by those who were harnessing and provisioning themselves for long journeys into far countries, is suddenly found to be richer than all foreign parts. The literature of the poor, the feelings of the child, the philosophy of the street, the meaning of household life, are the topics of the time. It is a great stride. It is a sign—is it not?—of new vigour, when the extremities are made active, when currents of warm life run into the hands and the feet. I ask not for the great, the remote, the romantic; what is doing in Italy or Arabia; what is Greek art or Provençal minstrelsy; I embrace the common, I explore and sit at the feet of the familiar and the low." Even so was it with Wordsworth. He laboured with all his might to shock the prejudices of those extremely nice-minded persons, who supposed that poetry had nothing to do with the feelings, occupations, and pursuits of the vulgar. With the courage of the philosopher, and the zeal of the philanthropist, he vindicated under its lowliest aspects the nobility of our common nature. His mind was penetrated with a profound reverence for the works of Providence, and he devoutly believed that none of His creatures had been created in vain. Thus the wayside beggar on the Cumberland hills appeared to him a being of high and holy interest—a constant incentive to acts of benevolence and kindness—a living memorial of the charity which blesses the giver more than the receiver.

"While thus he creeps
From door to door, the villagers in him
Behold a record which together binds
Past deeds and offices of charity Else unremember'd.

—Man is dear to Man; the poorest poor
Long for some moments in a weary life
When they can know and feel that they have been,
Themselves, the fathers and the dealers out
Of some small blessings; have been kind to such
As needed kindness, for this simple cause,
That we have all of us one human heart."

As the poem which has just been published, and which we are about to review, was commenced at a very early period, and carries us back to the morning of Wordsworth's life, before we make any comments upon it we will briefly refer to some of the first productions which bore the stamp of his peculiar genius, and gave him a poetical individuality. And first of the Lyrical Ballads. It has already been said that Wordsworth aimed at effecting some important reforms in our poetical literature. He did so, first in the choice and treatment of his subjects, and, secondly, in the language he employed, and the metrical construction of his poems. With regard to the former point, we have but few more remarks to make. In addition to taking his themes exclusively from humble life, he declared, according to the preface which he prefixed to the second volume of his Lyrical Ballads, that each poem, however trivial the subject might appear, had its definite object and purpose, and that it contained the result of the author's reflection and meditation on some particular topic. For instance, in the well-known stanzas, entitled "We are Seven,"—and which commence, it will be remembered, with the beautiful verse—

"A simple child, dear brother Jim,
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb,
What should it know of Death?"

it was his object, in his own words, "to show the perplexity and obscurity which in childhood attend our notion of death, or rather our utter inability to admit that notion." And so with respect to the other poems in the collection:—all of them were intended to be distinguishable from the popular poetry of the day, and to be written with a distinct purpose. Next, with regard to the style and language of these early poems. His principal object, as he avowed, was "to choose incidents and situations from common life, and to relate and describe them throughout, as far as was possible, in a selection of language really used by men." He determined to disregard, and even studiously avoid, what was usually called poetic diction, and to adopt in its place the ordinary form of oral communication between man and man. For pomp of sound and lofty array of phrases, he wished to substitute a natural simplicity. In support of his theory, and in order to prove the inferiority of the ordinary poetic diction to a more simple and straightforward form of expression, he has quoted (in the preface to the Lyrical Ballads) Johnson's laboured paraphrase of a well-known passage in the Proverbs, from which we will extract a few lines, accompanied with the original, that our readers may form their own judgment on the correctness of his strictures on the prevailing taste.

"Turn on the prudent ant thy heedless eyes,
Observe her labours, sluggard, and be wise;
No stern command, no monitory voice,
Prescribes her duties, or directs her choice;
Yet, timely provident, she hastes away,
To snatch the blessings of a plentiful day;
When fruitful summer loads the teeming plain,
She crops the harvest and she stores the grain.
How long shall sloth usurp thy useless hours,
Unnerve thy vigour, and enchain thy powers?"

And more to the same effect. "From this hubbub of words," says Wordsworth, "pass to the original. 'Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest. How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? when wilt thou arise out of thy sleep?'"

"By sitting to metrical arrangement a selection of the real language of men in a state of vivid sensation," (to use his own words,) Wordsworth imagined that he might fulfil all the higher purposes of poetry. To test his theory, he chose advisedly some of the rudest and commonest themes, and employed the plainest and baldest language of common life. We know with what a storm of ridicule and disapprobation the attempt was received. Even those who had recognised his genius, very properly, though gently, condemned the puerilities and affectation into which he had been betrayed by blind devotion to a theory. In spite of all his reasoning and explanation, few persons could be seduced into a warm admiration of his singularly unadorned strains of rustic life. Though he would not confess it, he was obviously in the wrong; he had mistaken rudeness for simplicity; he had gone to far. After the conventional phrases and mechanical structure of much of the poetry of the eighteenth century—the florid rhetoric of Darwin and his imitators, and the laborious nonsense of the Della Crusceans—a return to truth and nature was most desirable; and Cowper and Burns had already afforded examples of dignified simplicity, and paved the way for the introduction of a purer style of poetical composition. Wordsworth was a still stronger type of the reactionary spirit, and was deeply affected by its influence. Like many other zealots, he started with a theory, for which, in the first instance, for consistency's sake, he made large sacrifices. Disregarding it at length, though without any formal recantation, he followed the bent of his genius, and instead of affecting a prosaic baldness and inelegance, he endeavoured, in obedience to juster principles of taste, to raise the low, to dignify the humble, to elevate the common and the mean.

We have not space to notice in detail his subsequent poems; nor will our readers thank us for a catalogue. It is enough to say that many of his smaller pieces have been perfect in their kind, and that those most admired, and most likely to stand the test of time, are those which have been framed in most flagrant violation of his early theories. The lines on Tintern Abbey, a large proportion of the Sonnets, the ode on the Intimations of Immortality in Early Childhood, and, above all, his Laodamia, we may speak of as compositions which will be read with pleasure at all seasons by all thoughtful persons, and which may be regarded at the same time as examples of a refined and polished style.

Having made these few preliminary remarks, in a spirit which we hope our readers will not misunderstand, we approach the great work to which Wordsworth dedicated all his unrivalled powers of thought—the unfinished temple, glorious in its vast proportions and fragmentary grandeur,—of which the Prelude was intended to form part. In the preface to the Excursion, published in 1814, the poet had briefly shadowed forth his great design. Some years ago, he said, he had "retired to his native mountains with the hope of being able to construct a literary work that might live;" and having taken a careful review of his own mind, he determined "to compose a philosophical poem, containing views of man, nature, and society, and to be entitled the 'Recluse,' as having for its principal subject the sensations and opinions of a poet living in retirement." We are now told that the Recluse, if it had been completed, would have consisted of three parts. Of these the second part alone, viz. the Excursion, was finished, and given to the world by the author. The first book of the first part of the Recluse still remains in manuscript, but the third part was only planned." The length to which such a work would have extended can be estimated by that of the Excursion, and of the poem now published; reviewers and authors were formerly, when the war of literary contention ran high, extremely witty on the subject; and it must be confessed, with Wordsworth's tendency to diffuseness, and occasional flatness and monotony, it is very questionable whether the completion of the design would have been advantageous to his fame. The publication of the Excursion, however, was an era in literary history. That it is the greatest philosophical poem in the language is not now denied. Notwithstanding the contemptuous "This will never do," of the Edinburgh, and the ridicule of contemporary writers, where is the work, in verse or prose, of the same period, at all equal to it in merit and importance? When Byron superciliously described it as "A drowsy, frowsy poem called the Excursion, Writ in a manner which is my aversion," how little was he able to estimate its probable effect on literature and modes of thought!

The Prelude to the Recluse, now for the first time published, will be ranked among the most interesting, if not most valuable, of the poet's performances. In the preface to the Excursion he has thus alluded to it, and our readers may not be displeased with his ingenious and fanciful remarks. "The preparatory poem is biographical, and conducts the history of the author's mind to the point when he was emboldened to hope that his faculties were sufficiently matured for entering upon the arduous labour which he had proposed to himself; and the two works have the same kind of relation to each other, if he may so express himself, as the ante-chapel has to the body of a Gothic church. Continuing this allusion, he may be permitted to add, that his minor pieces which have been long before the public, when they shall be properly arranged, will be found by the attentive reader to have such connexion with the main work as may give them claim to be likened to the little cells, oratories, and sepulchral recesses ordinarily included in those edifices."

The outward life of Wordsworth was not diversified by many incidents of a startling character. But it is to his inner life that the autobiography principally refers; and illustrating as it does the growth of his intellectual nature, we need scarcely add that it is full of serious and important matter. The first and second books of the Prelude are devoted to childhood and school-time. He was born amid scenery, and reared under circumstances, well calculated to develop the latent powers of his mind, and to quicken the imaginative faculties. This indeed he has gratefully acknowledged:—

"Fair seed-time had my soul, and I grew up
Foster'd alike by beauty and by fear;
Much favour'd in my birth-place, and no less
In that beloved Vale to which ere long
We were transplanted."

His vivid reminiscences of the pastimes and pleasures of a happy boyhood are full of beauty. Into all childish sports he plunged with intense delight, and every season had its peculiar pleasure.

"We were a noisy crew; the sun in heaven
Beheld not vales more beautiful than ours;
Nor saw a band in happiness and joy
Richer, or worthier of the ground they trod.
I could record with no reluctant voice
The woods of autumn, and their hazel bowers
With milk-white clusters hung; the rod and line,
True symbol of hope's foolishness, whose strong
And unproved enchantment led us on
By rocks and pools shut out from every star,
All the green summer, to forlorn cascades
Among the windings hid of mountain brooks.
—Unfading recollections! at this hour
The heart is almost mine with which I felt,
From some hill-top on sunny afternoons,
The paper kite high among fleecy clouds
Pull at her rein like an impetuous courser;
Or from the meadows sent on gusty days,
Beheld her breast the wind, then suddenly
Dash'd headlong, and rejected by the storm."

As the years stole on, a taste for "calmer pleasures" was gradually formed; and in the presence of the sublimest features of nature, the dormant passions of his soul were awakened. Here is a recollection of school-time:—

—"When summer came,
Our pastime was, on bright half-holidays,
To sweep along the plain of Windermere
With rival oars; and the selected bourne
Was now an island musical with birds
That sang and ceased not; now a sister isle
Beneath the oak's umbrageous covert, sown
With lilies of the valley like a field;
And now a third small island, where survived
In solitude the ruins of a shrine
Once to Our Lady dedicate, and served
Daily with chaunted rites. In such a race
So ended, disappointment could be none,
Uneasiness, or pain, or jealousy:
We rested in the shade, all pleased alike,
Conquer'd and conqueror. Thus the pride of strength,
And the vain glory of superior skill
Were temper'd; thus was gradually produced
A quiet independence of the heart;
And to my friend who knows me I may add,
Fearless of blame, that hence for future days,
Ensued a diffidence and modesty,
And I was taught to feel, perhaps too much,
The self-sufficing power of solitude."

The serious delights of study—the acquisition of varied information, must be also numbered amongst his youthful pleasures:—

—"Many are our joys
In youth, but oh! what happiness to live
When every hour brings palpable access
Of knowledge, when all knowledge is delight,
And sorrow is not there!"

(1) With these words Jefferys commences his review of the Excursion. See his collected Essays.

Thoughtful beyond his years, there must have been many characteristic traits by which Wordsworth at this early period was distinguished from his school-mates. He was no common boy, and yet so gentle and unobtrusive, that it is probable he was not generally recognised as a genius. He loved long walks with a quiet friend, and tranquil communings with nature.

—"My morning walks

Were early ;—oft before the hours of school,
I travell'd round our little lake five miles
Of pleasant wandering. Happy time ! more dear
For this, that one was by my side, a friend,
Then passionately loved ; with heart how full
Would he peruse these lines !"

At length his "seventeenth year was come." He had long "walked with nature,"—had grown up in constant communion with her grandest and loveliest scenes,—and his mind had been gradually formed and strengthened by her sublime influences. In the fulness of his heart he "saw blessings spread around him like a sea."

"From Nature and her overflowing soul,
I had received so much, that all my thoughts
Were steep'd in feeling."

Mountains, lakes, and cataracts had schooled him into submission, love, and heavenly-mindedness. With "grateful voice," and in a strain of poetry rarely equalled, he has thus acknowledged their benign influence:—

"If in my youth I have been pure in heart,
If, mingling with the world, I am content
With my own modest pleasures, and have lived
With God and Nature communing, removed
From little enmities and low desires,
The gift is yours ; if in these times of fear,
This melancholy waste of hopes o'erthrown ;
If, mid indifference and apathy,
And wicked exultation when good men
On every side fall off, we know not how,
To selfishness, disguised in gentle names
Of peace and quiet and domestic love,
Yet mingled not unwillingly with ancers
On visionary minds ; if, in this time
Of dereliction and dismay, I yet
Despair not of our nature ; but retain
A more than Roman confidence, a faith
That fails not, in all sorrow my support,
The blessing of my life ; the gift is yours,
Ye winds and sounding cataracts ! tis yours,
Ye mountains ! thine, O Nature ! Thou hast fed
My lofty speculations ; and in thee,
For this uneasy heart of ours, I find
A never-failing principle of joy
And purest passion."

About the year 1787, when he was still a stripling of seventeen, Wordsworth became a student of St. John's College, Cambridge. He at once entered a new world. The pleasurable features of academic life filled him at first with transport ; and, like all youths suddenly transplanted from school to college, he felt a strange self-importance, as he moved amongst the novel scenes by which he was surrounded. Who that has not quite forgotten the hey-day of his youth, will not sympathise with the joyous and buoyant feelings expressed in the following lines ?

"My spirit was up, my thoughts were full of hope ;
Some friends I had, acquaintances who there Seem'd friends, poor simple school-boys, now hung round

With honour and importance : in a world
Of welcome faces up and down I roved ;
Questions, directions, warnings and advice,
Flow'd in upon me from all sides ; fresh day
Of pride and pleasure ! to myself I seem'd
A man of business and expense, and went
From shop to shop about my own affairs,
To Tutor or to Tailor, as befel,
From street to street, with loose and careless mind."

In the round of college labours, rivalries, and endeavours, Wordsworth failed to distinguish himself ; for he had little ambition for academic distinction. He frankly confesses—

"Such glory was but little sought by me,
And little won. Yet from the first crude days
Of settling time in this untried abode,
I was disturb'd at times by prudent thoughts,
Wishing to hope without a hope, some fears
About my future worldly maintenance,
And, more than all, a strangeness in the mind,
A feeling that I was not for that hour,
Nor for that place."

The "first delight" that flashed upon him in these new scenes passed away, and he found that "his nature's outward coat" had "slowly and insensibly" changed. His experience, at this point, is similar to that of hosts of others. He plunged into gaiety ; worked by fits and starts, and made and broke many good resolutions,—as light-hearted gownsmen have done before and since his time.

—"Companionships,
Friendships, acquaintances, were welcome all.
We saunter'd, play'd or rioted ; we talk'd
Unprofitable talk at morning hours ;
Drifted about along the streets and walks,
Read lazily in trivial books, went forth
To gallop through the country in blind zeal
Of senseless horsemanship, or on the breast
Of Cam sailed boisterously, and let the stars
Come forth, perhaps without one quiet thought."

Some genial intellectual pleasures were intermixed with physical enjoyments, and they are beautifully recorded :—

"Beside the pleasant Mill of Trumpington
I laugh'd with Chaucer in the hawthorn shade ;
Heard him, while birds were warbling, tell his tales
Of amorous passion. And that gentle Bard,
Chosen by the Muses for their Page of State,
Sweet Spenser, moving through his clouded heaven
With the moon's beauty and the moon's soft pace,
I call'd him Brother, Englishman, and Friend.
Yea, our blind Poet, who, in his later day,
Stood almost single ; uttering odious truth—
Darkness before, and danger's voice behind,
Soul awful—if the earth has ever lodged
An awful soul—I seem'd to see him here
Familiarly, and in his scholar's dress
Bounding before me, yet a stripling youth—
A boy, no better, with his rosy cheeks,
Angelical, keen eye, courageous look,
And conscious step of purity and pride."

On the whole, it appears that his college life was aimless and desultory. In a given round of studies, in the appointed task-work of the universities, the highest order of second-class minds are perhaps more likely to achieve excellence than the world's ruling intellects. Wordsworth is not the first great poet or great man who has failed to grasp the honours, or fitly seize the varied opportunities, of an academic career. Genius is always wayward; it will work out its own purpose in its own way. His failure, if failure it can be called, the poet attributes more to himself than to others. He was "a spoiled child, bred up mid Nature's luxuries," and "ill-tutored for captivity" or restraint. Still, he ventures to maintain that the discipline of the university was somewhat in fault; and his fancy pictures a scene dedicated to youthful study, where it might have been otherwise with him; where

"The congregating temper that pervades
Our unripe years, not wasted, should be taught
To minister to works of high attempt—
Works which the enthusiast would perform with love."

And where—for the following lines are too characteristic to be omitted—

"Youth should be awed, religiously possess'd
With a conviction of the power that waits
On knowledge, when sincerely sought and prized
For its own sake, on glory and on praise
If but by labour won, and fit to endure
The passing day; should learn to put aside
Her trappings here, should strip them off abash'd
Before antiquity and steadfast truth
And strong book-mindedness; and over all
A healthy, sound simplicity should reign,
A seemingly plainness, name it what you will,
Republican or pious."

After these visions of University Reform, a backward glance is naturally cast on the reverent piety, the abstemious lives, and patient labour of the distinguished scholars of former days; and a glorious allusion is made to the story of Bucer, Erasmus, and Melancthon, reading by the moonlight, "before the doors or windows of their cells," for lack of taper light.

After all, he had perhaps little reason to complain of Alma Mater. His time was not altogether mis-spent within her walls, and in the following sentence he intimates as much:—

———"For myself
I grieve not; happy is the gown'd youth
Who only misses what I miss'd, who fails
No lower than I fell."

The next book brings us to a summer vacation, passed in the "sweet valley" where he had been reared, and where he renewed his acquaintance with the sublime features of natural scenery. But new and interesting topics of contemplation now began to occupy his mind.

"A freshness also found I at this time
In human life, the daily life of those Whose occupations really I loved;

The peaceful scene oft fill'd me with surprise,
Changed like a garden in the heat of spring,
After an eight-days' absence."

With new delight he noted the habits and the characters of the simple-minded inhabitants of his native place; and the portrait of "a grey-haired dame" whom he had known in childhood, is drawn with a vigour and apparent faithfulness which few poets could emulate.

———"Her smooth domestic life,
Affectionate without disquietude,
Her talk, her business, pleas'd me; and no less
Her clear though shallow stream of piety,
That ran on sabbath days a fresher course;
With thoughts unfelt till now, I saw her read
Her Bible on hot Sunday afternoons,
And loved the book, when she had dropp'd asleep,
And made of it a pillow for her head."

Meanwhile, the poet was not insensible or disinclined to the more seductive pleasures of youth. He shared in the gaiety which the neighbourhood afforded, and was ready at "the feast and dance." But at this period an incident occurred, which he has thought worthy of notice, as having an influence on his future life. One memorable night had been spent in dance and revelry, and he was returning home in the early morning light, when a scene presented itself which awoke some solemn emotions:—

———"Ere we retired
The cock had crow'd, and now the eastern sky
Was kindling, not unseen, from humble copse
And open field, through which the pathway wound,
And homeward led my steps. Magnificent
The morning rose, in memorable pomp,
Glorious as e'er I had beheld: in front
The sea lay laughing at a distance; near,
The solid mountains shone, bright as the clouds,
Grain-tinctured, drench'd in empyrean light;
And in the meadows and the lower grounds
Was all the sweetness of a common dawn—
Dews, vapours, and the melody of birds,
And labourers going forth to till the fields.
Ah! need I say, dear friend! that to the brim
My heart was full; I made no vows, but vows
Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
A dedicated spirit. On I walk'd
In thankful blessedness, which yet survives."

The poet's experience of books is next detailed. We need not dwell on his early fondness for imaginative literature—his love of popular legends, tales, and traditions. All this might be taken for granted:—but we cannot pass over his lofty commemoration of the transcendent influence of the mighty volumes and magic strains which have, in all ages, stirred the heart, and sway'd the popular mind.

———"Yet is it just
That here, in memory of all books which lay
Their sure foundations in the heart of man,
Whether by native prose, or numerous verse,
That in the name of all inspir'd souls,
From Homer the great thunderer, from the voice
That roars along the bed of Jewish song,
And that more varied and elaborate,
Those trumpet-tones of harmony that shake
Our shores in England,—from those loftiest notes

*Down to the low and wren-like warblings, made
For cottagers and spinners at the wheel,
And sunburnt travellers resting their tired limbs,
Stretch'd under way-side hedgerows, ballad tunes,
Food for the hungry ears of little ones,
And of old men who have survived their joys:
'Tis just that in behalf of these, the works,
And of the men that framed them, whether known,
Or sleeping nameless in their scatter'd graves,
That I should here assert their rights, attest
Their honours, and should, once for all, pronounce
Their benediction; speak of them as powers
For ever to be hallow'd; only less,
For what we are and what we may become,
Than Nature's self, which is the breath of God,
Or His pure Word by miracle reveal'd."*

The vacation over, Wordsworth returned to college, and "in his own unlovely cell" sat down again, "in lightsome mood." Henceforth he lived more to himself; and though still unreconciled to academic rules, read and thought more earnestly. Thus employed, time hurried on with rapid strides.

"Two winters may be pass'd
Without a separate notice; many books
Were skim'm'd, devour'd, or studiously perused,
But with no settled plan. I was detach'd
Internally from academic cares;
Yet independent study seem'd a course
Of hardy disobedience towards friends
And kindred, proud rebellion and unkind."

A hurried tour among the Swiss and Italian Alps was the next great event of the poet's life.

"When the third summer freed us from restraint,
A youthful friend, he too a mountaineer,
Not slow to share my wishes, took his staff,
And sallying forth, we journey'd side by side,
Bound to the distant Alps."

In some respects the excursion was rather imprudently timed; for, as the poet confesses, it implied "a hardly slight

"Of college studies and their set rewards;"

and was calculated to give some uneasiness to those to whom his worldly interests were dear. But the young enthusiasts were moved by the fervour of the times, and the spirit of revolution which had swept over a neighbouring nation seemed to give a charter to irregularities; for Wordsworth does not omit to state, that

"Europe at that time was thrill'd with joy,
France standing on the top of golden hours,
And human nature seeming born again."

"Lightly equipped," the young travellers took a brief farewell of the white cliffs of Albion, and journeyed southward through France. Under the "vine-clad hills of Burgundy," and on "the bosom of the gentle Saone," they glided onwards. It was an era of national rejoicing and enthusiasm, and the strangers had but to mention the country from whence they came, to be received everywhere with welcome and delight.

"We bore a name
Honour'd in France, the name of Englishmen,
And hospitably did they give us hail,
As their forerunners in a glorious course."

The travellers passed quickly from place to place with youthful eagerness;—

"A march it was of military speed,
And earth did change her images and forms
Before us, fast as clouds are changed in heaven."

With bounding hearts they gazed upon Mont Blanc, and "the wondrous Vale of Chamouny, stretched far below." Every scene was full of novelty, and political events gave an additional interest to their journey. As they bent their steps homewards, they noticed, with transports of delight, the "triumphant looks" which were then "the common language of all eyes;" and the last incident of the expedition quickened their revolutionary sympathies:—

"We left the Swiss exulting in the fate
Of their near neighbours; and, when shortening fast
Our pilgrimage, nor distant far from home,
We cross'd the Brabant armies on the fret
For battle, in the cause of Liberty."

On his return from this excursion, the poet tells us that he soon bade farewell to the university, and being undetermined as to the course of life he should pursue, and having a space of "intermediate time at full command," he took up his residence in London. The narrative henceforth appears to us more flat and prosaic, although many graphic and interesting passages occur. A period of six years had intervened since the poet had poured out his "glad preamble to this verse;" and the difference of style between the early and later portions is very perceptible. In embodying his reminiscences of London, he dwells first on his early impressions of the great metropolis, and the wondrous tales of its magnificence which had reached him, when a boy, among his native hills. He then describes, with graphic minuteness, the various scenes which attract the attention of a stranger, and, amongst other resorts, "half-rural Sadlers' Wells" is mentioned with due respect.

"Though at that time
Intolerant, as is the way of youth
Unless itself be pleased, here more than once
Taking my seat I saw (nor blush to add,
With ample recompense) giants and dwarfs,
Clowns, conjurors, posture-masters, harlequins,
Amid the uproar of the rabblement,
Perform their feats."

Although his earnest mind still derived its most intense pleasure and satisfaction from observing and reflecting on the incidents of real life, yet he tells us that at this period "the theatre was his dear delight."

"The very gilding, lamps, and painted scrolls,
And all the mean upholstery of the place,
Wanted not animation, when the tide
Of pleasure ebb'd but to return as fast
With the ever-shifting figures of the scene,
Solemn or gay."

He visited the Houses of Parliament, and listened with rapt attention to the eloquence of Burke, then the leading orator of the Commons; and, passing from the Senate to the Pulpit, he ridicules with some power, and even humour, the affectation of certain dandified preachers of the day :—

"There have I seen a comely bachelor,
Fresh from a toilette of two hours, ascend
His rostrum, with seraphic glance look up,
And, in a tone elaborately low,
Beginning, lead his voice through many a maze
A minuet course."

A graphic description of St. Bartholomew's fair is also introduced.

The next book is entitled "A Retrospect;" the argument being "Love of Nature leading to the love of Man." Up to a certain period of his life,—until, in fact, not less "than two-and-twenty summers had been told,"—Nature had occupied the first, and Man the second place in the poet's affections and regards :

—"A passion, she,
A rapture often, and immediate love
Ever at hand; he, only a delight
Occasional, an accidental grace,
His hour being not yet come."

But the course of his life, and especially his residence in London, filled him with new sensations. In the crowded city he found matter for serious meditation; and his thoughts were thus, "by slow gradations," drawn

"To human-kind, and to the good and ill
Of human life."

A residence in France during the stormy period of the Revolution added to his stores of experience, and enabled him to contemplate mankind under some new aspects. The early sentiments of Wordsworth with regard to politics are boldly expressed in this part of the narrative; and, distasteful as they may be to some readers of the "Prelude," they have not been suppressed, or softened down by subsequent alteration. Like Southey, and his friend Coleridge, he was at this period an ardent republican. He had made up his mind for a brief sojourn

"in a pleasant town Wash'd by the current of the stately Loire;"

and on his way thereto he stayed for some days in Paris, then stirred by the fierce fervour of revolutionary excitement. The young stranger visited the "National Synod and the Jacobins;" and strove to arouse his feelings of enthusiasm by surveying the ruins of the Bastille :—

"Where silent zephyrs sported with the dust
Of the Bastille, I sat in the open sun,
And from the rubbish gather'd up a stone,
And pocketed the relic, in the guise
Of an enthusiast; yet, in honest truth,
I look'd for something that I could not find,
Affecting more emotion than I felt."

Having hastened to his "more permanent abode," he formed an acquaintanceship with some military officers, stationed in that city,—men of birth and education, who did not conceal their discontent at the new order of things. With these gentlemen the poet disputed on political matters, and his arguments were treated with more courtesy and indulgence than he had any right to expect.

—"An Englishman,
Born in a land whose very name appear'd
To license some unruliness of mind;
A stranger, with youth's further privilege,
And the indulgence that a half-learn't speech
Wins from the courteous; I, who had been else
Shunn'd and not tolerated, freely lived
With those defenders of the crown, and talk'd,
And heard their notions; nor did they disdain
To wish to bring me over to their cause."

One kindred spirit he found in this military band, with whom he indulged in many lofty dreams of republican glory and human perfectibility;—a sincere and single-minded enthusiast,—in fact, a man after his own heart :—

"A patriot thence rejected by the rest,
And with an oriental loathing spurn'd,
As of a different caste. A meeker man
Than this lived never, nor a more benign,— Meek though enthusiastic. Injuries
Made him more gracious, and his nature then Did breathe its sweetness out most sensibly,
As aromatic flowers on Alpine turf
When foot hath crush'd them."

Great events had taken place when the poet, homeward bound, returned to Paris. The king had fallen—and dire cruelties, to be mentioned with horror by all future generations, had been enacted in the French capital. With strange interest, and "with ardour heretofore unfelt," the poet ranged the city, and in his progress passed

"The prison where the unhappy monarch lay,
Associate with his children and his wife
In bondage; and the palace lately storm'd
With roar of cannon by a furious host."

In his chamber that night,—high and lonely—he "felt most deeply in what a world he was." He was surrounded with terrible mementos of revolutionary excess, and distant only a few weeks from one of the bloodiest events recorded in history :—

"With unextinguish'd taper I kept watch,
Reading at intervals; the fear gone by Press'd on me almost like a fear to come.
I thought of those September massacres,
Divided from me by one little month—
Saw them and touch'd; the rest was conjured up
From tragic fictions or true history,
Remembrances and dim admonishments."

The poet returned to England, without having changed his political creed. His sympathies were on the side of the French Republicans, now menaced on all sides by powerful enemies, and he exulted in their success, although his hopes were paralysed by the system of terrorism that had been adopted.

"Meanwhile the invaders fared as they deserved;
The herculean commonwealth had put forth her arms,
And throttled with an infant godhead's might
The snakes about her cradle."

* * * * *
And as the desert bath green spots, the sea
Small islands scatter'd amid stormy waves;

So that disastrous period did not want ;
Bright sprinkling of all human excellence,
To which the silver wands of saints in heaven
Might point with rapturous joy."

His faith, however, was shaken at last by the course of political events. Frenchmen became oppressors in their turn, and changed a war of self-defence into a war of conquest. His dream of human perfectibility faded, and the failure of his youthful hopes sank deep into his heart. In a saddened mood, he retired once more to the Cumberland hills, and endeavoured to restore his imaginative powers, which disappointment had somewhat impaired, by communion with the scenes of his youth. Still believing in the innate nobility of the human heart, he studied the manners and habits of simple and uneducated peasants, and determined thenceforth to make them the subject of his verse. Our readers will not now fail to see the source of the theories to which we alluded at the commencement of this paper. The poet's unsatisfied spirit shrank from the formalities of artificial society, and found repose and confidence in the simplicity and wisdom of peasant life.

—"There I heard
From mouths of men obscure and lowly, truths
Replete with honour; sounds in unison
With loftiest promises of good and fair."

Such literary powers as he possessed, matured as they were by observation and experience, he determined to devote to the truthful description of rural life and the manners of country people: the world knows the result:—

"Here might I pause, and bend in reverence
To nature, and the power of human minds,
To men as they are men within themselves.
How oft high service is perform'd within,
When all the external man is rude in show,—
Not like a temple rich with pomp and gold,
But a mere mountain chapel, that protects
Its simple worshippers from sun and shower."
Of these, said I, shall be my song; of these,
If future years mature me for the task,
Will I record the praises, making verse
Deal boldly with substantial things."

We have felt some interest in following thus far the Poet's narrative, regarding it as a minute revelation of his feelings, and as tending to illustrate the scope and character of his genius. From the extracts we have printed, our readers will judge of the merits of the poem. To us it appears to abound with Wordsworth's beauties, and with Wordsworth's faults. It contains many single passages of the highest poetical excellence; but we cannot help admitting that much of the narrative, especially in the later books, is flat, prosaic, and common-place.

We must not omit to state that the friend to whom the poem is addressed, was Samuel Taylor Coleridge, to whose genius more than one beautiful and appropriate tribute is paid.

PEACE LYRICS.

MR. ADAMS has in a few elegant lines very nearly saved us the trouble of reviewing his little volume of poems;—the trouble we have inadvertently said, but that is a professional phrase—whatever the reviewer may do, the reader will find no trouble, but a pleasure in perusing these beautiful lyrics. Our author, speaking of his Poetical Creed, says:—

"I sing no song of chivalry,
I wake no sounding lyre,
The deeds of knights in tourney-fights
May not my soul inspire;
I look not unto ages past,
Nor dream of by-gone days,
The toil and strife of present life,
These better suit my lays."

These lines sufficiently indicate that Mr. Adams belongs to that class of poets which the present days have called forth, and who may, without any impropriety, be called the "poets of progress." These writers are distinguished by the singleness of their aim,—the attainment of some practical good, affecting chiefly the masses of society. Each poem, or collection of poems, of theirs, is devoted to the advocacy of some one truth, palpable enough, probably, to all, but apt to be cast aside by the bustling and active, and forgotten altogether by the quiet and indolent.

This school of poetry, in which perhaps we may consider Ebenezer Elliott as having taken the lead in point of time, is more distinguished by terseness and energy of versification, than by melody of numbers; more by pointedness of argument, than by imaginative scenery; more by elevation of sentiment than by grandeur of style. Not that there is any marked deficiency of harmony and elegance, but the leading characteristics are as we have said.

From the pen of the same author, we have a pretty, cheap, little serial, named "British Songbirds," in which ornithology and poetry are happily combined. Works of this description are of the greatest value in diffusing information and a taste for nature through the community at large, and have our hearty commendation and good wishes.

Music, perhaps, is hardly within the sphere of our editorial remarks; yet we feel bound to recommend—to our clerical readers in particular—two recent publications,—"The Church Musician," and "The Church Hymn Book,"—issued by Rivingtons; as being admirable auxiliaries to a genuine system of music for the services of the sanctuary; selected from the best masters, and adapted to the different festivals of the Church. They are well worthy of the notice of such as desire to promote a wholesome reformation in this particular branch of the worship of God.

DENMARK AND THE DUCHIES.

It is no new remark that we often know least of what lies nearest to us, and tend to disregard whatever is easy of attainment. We have known old Londoners who had never seen the Tower; people born within twenty miles of the Giant's Causeway, who have never visited it; and the present writer has a guilty recollection of having once, when travelling on the Continent, been unable to answer from personal observation a question put by a foreigner concerning Richmond Hill, not having at that time ever set eyes on it. Railways and steamboats are, it is true, now doing their best to prevent such delinquencies for the future, but the same principle may still be seen in operation. Our countrymen overrun Switzerland and Italy, and on the Nile the English flag is scarcely more a stranger than at the Nore; but it is the rarest thing possible to find any one, unless business have carried him thither, who knows anything of the opposite shores of the North Sea—countries lying a day or two's sail off, and with which we have the strongest affinities in blood, in language, in the best and soundest parts of our national character. If we speak of Denmark, we recall, perhaps, if our auditor be occupied with commercial affairs, some facts connected with Sound duties, or Rendsburg butter tubs; if otherwise, it may be the regal phantom of King Canute, gravely quizzing his courtiers, or a vision of Hamlet and the ghost goes wandering by. The recent unhappy quarrel has, however, lately turned public attention in that direction, and may therefore perhaps induce some tourists, who are not content to run always along the beaten track, to undertake a pilgrimage to the home of our Scandinavian forefathers—the really old England on the Baltic. In the land of the Angles, still called by the same name, (Angeln), he might suppose himself in the county of Kent, and should he chance to be a Northumberland man, he would find himself quite at home, and be able to make himself well understood in the peninsula of Jutland. In some of the Frisian islands, as that of Amrum, which lies geographically nearest to England, many words are almost the same as those commonly in use amongst us. The irregular verbs, for instance—the English think, thought, is in Friesish theenk, thought; bring, brought, is bring, broaght. "How many miles?" says the Englishman. "Hu mani mile?" says the Amramer. Indeed, the similarity has given rise to a proverb—

"Butter, bread, and green cheese,
Is good English, and good Friesch."

The duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, with the loss of which the King of Denmark has been lately threatened, (indeed, the issue of the struggle is still uncertain,) form, beyond comparison, the most valuable portion of his dominions. Even the small district of Lauenburg, it is said, brings in more revenue to his crown than did formerly the whole kingdom of Norway for which it was exchanged. But a very imperfect idea of the fertility of these countries would be formed by the tourist who should merely pass along the frequented route from Hamburg to Kiel, as it lies over a central ridge of heath which intersects the whole peninsula from the Elbe to the extremity of Jutland. On the eastern side lies a lovely region of gentle hills, crowned with beech woods, and intersected with blue sparkling fords; on the west, an extensive tract of some of the richest marsh land in the world: The broad green strip which extends along the whole eastern shore of the North Sea, forming the coast of Holland, Hanover, Oldenburg, Holstein, and Schleswig, is wholly the product of the fine matter brought down by the Elbe, the Weser, the Scheldt, and other rivers, thrown up into banks and islands by the action of the sea; afterwards protected by dykes, and rendered productive by human labour.

Between the free city of Hamburg and Gluckstadt, on the right bank of the Elbe, we find the first of these marshes; then proceeding along the sea-shore northward, the marshes of Krempe and Wilster, then the renowned Ditmarshes, and finally, crossing the Eider, the marshes of Schleswig, which extend to Jutland, where the rich alluvial deposit ceases, and is exchanged for barren shifting sandbanks and dunes.

The marshes, having never been disturbed by any action from beneath, present to the eye a perfect level, strikingly contrasting with the central ridge of volcanic origin running through the Danish peninsula, which forms the skeleton on which they have been deposited. This hilly barren land—geest-land, as it is called by the people of all these countries—runs out into the flat marsh in tongues and promontories of all shapes and sizes, but is always perfectly distinguishable from it. Some even of the islands lying along the coast, which had been raised from the bed of the ocean before the formation of the alluvial soil, consist half of "geest" and half of marsh, and the country people have no idea that all the lands on the globe do not exhibit a similar distinction of soil, and will ask a foreigner whether his country is "geest" or "marsh."

These two kinds of land present many contrasts besides those of a flat and a hilly surface. The marsh is treeless, the geest partially wooded; the former nowhere shows sand or heath, but the richest vegetable soil, field after field, meadow after meadow, and teems with abundance; the geest, on the contrary, is to a great extent uncultivated. The marsh has no spring of fresh water, but is intersected by straight canals; on the geest we find springs, and brooks, and rivers, and these contrasts in the physical aspect of the two portions of the country, are fully equalled by those of the moral character and mode of life of the inhabitants.

The peculiar constitution of their country has rendered necessary a peculiar kind of agriculture; has determined the occupation and the manner of life, and had, unavoidably, the greatest influence on the manners of the people. The incessant watchfulness required to defend the country against the attacks of the sea, the construction and preservation of the dykes, and sluices, and canals, demands so much practice, and such peculiar kinds of knowledge, that it could scarcely be performed effectually by any but a people long resident on the spot. After the Dutch and Frieslanders, the Italians are the most skilful water architects and marsh occupants of Europe, and have done for Venice what the Dutch have for Amsterdam. They have their marenne as the Dutch their marshes, and the delta of the Po is canalised and dyked like that of the Rhine.

Is both English in guth Friesch.*"

The resemblance is of course more striking to the ear than to the eye; but the orthography is after all scarcely so alarming as that of our Phonetic friends.

The riches that the inhabitants draw from their marshes have contributed to render them independent and somewhat haughty in spirit. The possibility of defending their country and their freedom from hostile invasion by artificial inundations, has served to strengthen this spirit; and thus from Holland and the mouths of the Maes to the peninsula of Jutland there have arisen in the marshes a series of more or less independent little democracies, which, though they have gradually lost their sovereign rights, are still almost all regarded as distinct communities, and endowed with peculiar privileges. For centuries long, the Counts of Holland and Oldenburg, the Dukes of Schleswig, the Kings of Denmark, and others, waged fierce and sanguinary wars with them, but it is to be observed that these, on the side of the marsh people, were purely defensive.

There are few villages in the marsh countries, but the houses of the farmers lie scattered singly all over them: each raised on an artificial hillock of from ten to fifteen feet high, which affords a refuge in times of inundation. Along all the shores of the lower Elbe, the Weser, and the Ems, and a great part of the Netherlands, we find the same contrivance, for a similar reason, and in many places also where from the strength of the dykes they are really unnecessary. The sloping sides of these hillocks serve to grow vegetables, for which the level is too moist, and sometimes on the summit, close to the house, is seen a small tree, the only specimens of their kind to be found in the marshes. The houses are of red brick, long and low, and without such a profuse expenditure of wood as in Holland; over the door is invariably a narrow snow-white arch, which appears to constitute a sort of national distinction of the people of Frisian origin. Near this are two iron rings to tie horses to, for during the autumn and winter it is almost impossible to traverse the marshes on foot, and the architect has often endeavoured to give additional firmness to the walls, by fastening them together with huge iron cramps, sometimes in the form of the initial letters of his name. The top of the hillock is almost always laid out as a garden, and exhibits a profusion of bushes and blooming flowers, so that each hillock rises like a little island of blossoms out of the level sea of verdure beneath. The interiors of the houses are exquisitely clean, and the walls usually laid with Dutch tiles, whose glazed surface will not easily retain the smallest impurity, and even if it should, will only require the application of a damp cloth to restore it to its pristine beauty.

One of the most characteristic features of the landscape, is the network of dykes, which cross the meadows in long lines, and which are distinguished into outer, or sea, and inner dykes. The latter have mostly been at one time sea-dykes, but have become inner dykes, as more land has gradually been formed and dykes constructed beyond them. They are usually left standing, partly because of the expense and trouble of removal, and also because they may still serve as a needful defence, in case of the bursting of the outer wall; besides that they are useful as roads, when, after long rain, the marshes have become impassable. It is often, however, forbidden to drive along the top of the sea-dyke, for fear of the injury that might result from the shaking of the carriages. When it is permitted, a curious contrast is presented to the traveller by the two sides of the picture. From a wall about five-and-twenty feet high, he looks down on two worlds; here, the sunny green pastures, with herds of grazing cattle, the rich corn-fields, and the snug homestead with all its comforts; on the other side the "wandering fields of barren foam," seals and dolphins, and the uncouth monsters of the deep, and flights of seamews screaming for their prey.

Beyond the outer dyke, in many places, embankments stretch out like long arms into the sea, and serve as well for the protection of the dyke, as to favour the formation of new land. First, coarse sand and pebbles are left lying within the space thus protected, and gradually, as this accumulates, and the water becomes shallower, and consequently more tranquil, finer and finer particles are deposited. As soon as it has reached such a height that it is no longer covered twice a-day by the ordinary tide, a few plants of a peculiar character begin to grow upon it. They take root in the sand, and are not only able to endure being frequently covered by the salt flood, but are admirably adapted to promote the growth of land, as they consist of bunches of fine roots and fibres, on and behind which the particles of soft matter deposit themselves, so that the receding wave cannot easily wash them away.

When the soil has gained something in fertility, a new species of plant—a sort of coarse grass—makes its appearance, and disputing possession with the first comer, at length gains the mastery, and takes its place. In the course of years, the ground improves still more, the coarse grass is superseded by finer sorts, and it is now never covered by the sea but in spring, or extraordinary high tides. When it has advanced thus far, the inhabitants of the marshes begin to turn it to account, by driving their cattle upon it, though this exposes them to some danger, for the floods sometimes advance with such rapidity that there is not time to draw the herds back within the protection of the dyke, and they are drowned.

In this stage of the business the question arises, whether the new piece of land is sufficiently valuable to pay the expense of dyking; and this depends partly on the form it has assumed. If it has run out far into the sea, and is narrow, it will require more dyke than it is likely to be worth; if the land to be gained is considerable in proportion to the length and strength of the required dyke, the question will probably be decided in the affirmative; but there are so many points to be considered in the conditions of the undertaking, that twenty or thirty years will sometimes elapse before the work is begun, and in the meantime, Neptune may step in some wild winter night and sweep away the whole subject of dispute for his own share.

This is one of the difficulties of the case—whether to wait for the formation of more land, and by so doing run the risk of losing it altogether; or to incur a greater proportional expense and secure it at once. Commissions are usually appointed to examine the state of the sea-lands, and perhaps one commission will decide for, and another against the dyking. Then it has to be settled whether the government, which claims all new lands, shall undertake the dyking, or grant it on certain conditions to individuals. Companies are formed to buy the land, and each tries to outbid the other, and thus, after Nature has employed hundreds of years in forming the land, fifty or sixty more will be required to bring it fairly under cultivation. Amidst such physical and moral storms have these little fertile districts been wrested from the barren sea. The whole organization of such a country, and the construction of dykes, roads, canals, bridges, sluices, &c.—to say nothing of houses and churches—of course requires an enormous expenditure of capital, and to induce people to invest their property in such undertakings, the Danish government has often been compelled to offer many tempting privileges and advantages, such as perfect freedom from taxation for twenty or thirty years, independent commercial government, the use of the pastures of the outer dykes, &c.; and tens of thousands of dollars are yearly spent in repairs, of which the unpractised eye would not perceive a trace.

This is one of the cases in which the advantages of co-operation are most immediately obvious, and accordingly "Dyke Unions" have for a long period subsisted in this country, and have served as the basis of other associations with different objects. The lines of dyke that lie like a network over the land, have thus also become bonds to draw society together. Nothing unites men like a common effort against a common danger, and the sea is for the inhabitants of these countries the common enemy, whose presence keeps perpetually alive the feeling of brotherhood and humanity. There are no absentee landlords in the marshes; they belong wholly to the cultivators, a homely race from the old Saxon stock, whose national banner exhibits no more heroic symbol than that of a kettle upon the fire. But it is a symbol under which they have often fought most valiantly; and it has at least the advantage of being well understood; of awakening sympathies in which all can share, and of being free from the objections on the score of sound morals, that might be raised against such animals as lions and eagles, who, as Franklin said, "do not get their living honestly." Beneath the kettle flames the motto, "Liever dued us Slav," literally "Rather dead than a slave;" but which might be freely rendered, "Let us rather die than go without our tea." Historical truth, however, compels us to add, that in these marshes it is not so often tea as gruel that furnishes "the cup which cheers, but not inebriates."

Crossing the heathy district, which is very thinly peopled, and in many parts only occupied by a semi-savage race of wandering shepherds and their black-faced flocks, and numerous tribes of gipsies, we come to a country, which at the first glance we perceive to differ widely from the one we have just left. In the first place, it is extremely well wooded. The oak, birch, ash, lime, and willow, grow in abundance, though, singularly enough, the fir, from which Denmark is said to derive its name, is nowhere to be seen, unless where it has been artificially planted. But the great ornament of the country is the beech, which grows here to almost unrivalled size and beauty—now scattered about in groups of two or three dozen; now falling into rich masses of extensive woodland, or fringing the shores of the beautiful little bays or firds, encircling some fairy lake, or forming a superb setting to some emerald gem of a meadow.

Instead of a wide watered shore, intersected by long lines of dyke, we have here small enclosures, high hedges, and, as we have said, a country strikingly resembling England, especially the eastern parts of the county of Kent, with its steep banks and roads running as in a hollow way. The people of the western marshes are chiefly occupied in fattening cattle for the market; but here is the most pleasing of pastoral occupations, that of dairy farming, and you see pretty milkmaids come tripping along with their little straw hats and bright painted pails, instead of the uncouth milk-men common in so many countries.

This side of Denmark abounds in Scandinavian antiquities, and the character even of the popular superstitions betrays a similar origin. You find a huge mass of granite, and are told it was flung from one of the neighbouring islands by a certain giantess, who used her garter on the occasion for a sling. In the west, the legends seem to take their colour from the physical features of the country. The figures of men on horseback or on foot, or of carriages moving along the tops of the dykes, their dark outlines marked out against the sky, have often a strange spectral appearance, and it is not surprising that these form the favourite ground for the exploits of all ghosts, demons, and evil disposed spirits.

Many of the dykes, from one side of which you look down on pleasant farms and homesteads, and all the charms of rural and pastoral life, show you on the other the wide howling waste of the desolate ocean. Here goblins may shriek and gibber to their heart's content amidst the noise of winds and waters; here will come spurring along on its phantom steed the ghost of some wicked governor of the olden time; here the terrible spirit called the "Wrestler" will watch for the lonely traveller on the top of the dyke. He sees nothing, hears nothing, but he feels himself embraced in dreadful ice-cold arms, and then ensues a struggle which mostly ends by the traveller being dashed down into the flood that foams beneath; sometimes he is only thrown breathless and exhausted to the ground, and lies there till the first ray of morning dawn puts the goblin to flight.

(1) The word is usually derived from Fenne Mark, the Country of Fir.

In the heathy districts that lie between the two, the supernatural population bears more resemblance to our own fairies. When a traveller lingers late at eve upon the moorland, or loses his way among the pools covered by great water-lilies, he will hear from a hundred small voices at a time cries of "Good evening! good evening!" He looks about, but can see no one; but at length peering into the cups of the large lilies, he sees troops of tiny men and women, and as he runs off with all possible speed, the moor rings with their laughter; but whoever will stand steady, and not be frightened, may be sure of having some pretty fairy gift to take home with him. Even in these things the distinction of character in these various parts of the country is strikingly preserved.

Among other differences of the east and west coast, may be mentioned that the whole extent of the marsh country shows only a single estate belonging to a noble, but the east from Lubeck, northwards to Jutland, exhibits an uninterrupted series, above two hundred and forty of such, in which the landlords exercise many old feudal privileges, including that of private jurisdiction. The contrast is partly explained from the nature of the soil, requiring in the marshes an expenditure of energy and intelligence, that would scarcely have been made by any cultivators but those who worked on their own land. Such a country could hardly have been peopled by any but peasant proprietors. Another solution is offered in the republican tendencies of the Frisian race, by which the marshes are inhabited. We may recollect, however, that this race has always been found in regions of a similar character; and that, consequently, their political tendencies are to be regarded rather as effect than as cause. Up to 1559, almost every parish constituted a separate little republic, managing its own affairs in the most independent manner, and only occasionally, in matters that concerned the whole community, referring to the decision of a sort of federal government composed of forty-eight regents.

A great part of the land in the east of the peninsula is also distributed amongst what are called peasant proprietors, but their position differs in many respects greatly from that of the rich thriving peasantry of the marshes, and as their farms are by law entailed on the eldest son, they constitute a sort of lower aristocracy. As the ordinary correlative of such institutions, we find also a large and increasing class of very poor labourers, such as are entirely unknown in the west.

There are few great towns in the Danish dominions; with the exception of Copenhagen, there is only one whose population reaches to nearly 30,000, and the greater part fall considerably below 10,000. Copenhagen itself is perhaps, (unless for the amiable and hospitable manners of the inhabitants) less worth visiting than almost any other spot in the country. It is a well built, well behaved, orderly, and convenient city; one of the newest capitals in Europe, but has a certain character of mediocrity in all things. Its streets are mostly broad and handsome, but not equal in these respects to Petersburg, and Berlin; one part, which is intersected by canals, will remind you of Amsterdam, but is inferior to Amsterdam in its peculiar style; another bears a likeness to Paris, but of a second-rate Paris; it has a good picture-gallery, a good museum, but there are better elsewhere. It would be scarcely possible to point out any characteristic feature, peculiar to itself; and of the quaint and picturesque beauty of the old German cities there is not a trace. This may be accounted for, from the fact of its newness; for though it existed as a fishing village from time immemorial, most of the buildings now existing are of a very recent date. But whatever may be the general mediocrity of its character, Copenhagen, in one point, must be allowed to claim precedence of all others. There is not a capital in Europe that has been so often bombarded; no other citizens have been so often called upon to fight for their hearths and altars, and as a natural consequence, none are more patriotic. They do not, however, like some other patriots, manifest their love for their own country, chiefly by their hatred of others. Even the taking of their fleet (in 1807), sore grief as it was, for the Danes are passionately fond of a fleet, and are indeed a nation of sailors, seems to have been forgotten and forgiven, and the feeling of hostility to the English which it excited, to have long since died away. "It is a long time ago," they say, "and we've got another fleet now. Besides, the English people did not do it, but only their government. As for those who were guilty, the grass has grown on their graves." On the whole, these our Scandinavian kindred seem to regard us with a sort of brotherly or cousinly pride, as relations who have made a figure in the world, and done honour to the family.

The situation of Copenhagen, on the animated Sound, is really beautiful, but the advantage of this is in a great measure lost to the inhabitants by its being entirely enclosed within a circle of the strongest fortification. It is, we believe, the only city in which not even a suburb is found extending beyond these imprisoning moats and ramparts, by which, more or less, so many foreign cities are disfigured; but which, happily for them, are almost unknown to the inhabitants of English towns.

THE PRINCE'S TOWER;

OR, LA HOGUE BIE.

A LEGEND OF THE ISLAND OF JERSEY.

BY J. M. W.

MANY years ago,—so many, that we care not to count them,—there dwelt in Neustria, (Normandy,) in a strong castle, near the coast, a powerful and wealthy young baron, called the Sieur, or Lord, of Coutances.

In all Normandy there was not a handsomer, a gentler, or a braver knight. It was a notorious fact that all the women strove to please, and few of the men cared to offend the young Baron de Coutances. In all Normandy there was not a layman so learned as this young knight. He astonished many of the Monks themselves, for he could write a billet, and read it when it was written, which was more than some of their reverences could do.

In all Normandy there was not a better bard. He could make verses and sing them to his own music on the harp; his style was altogether matchless; at least, so said the Jongleurs who dined in his Hall as frequently as they wished.

Beau Garçon!—Preux Chevalier!—Savant!—Trouveur!—What marvel that the Baron de Coutances was successful in love! The gentille damoiselle, to whom his vows and his verses were addressed, was Marguerite, only child of the Conte de Granville, his neighbour. Loudly did De Coutances proclaim his lady love to be the pearl of pearls, the very day's eye, for brilliancy of beauty; and often did he make her name pre-eminent at feast and tournament. He pronounced her to be oltre le più belle bella, and fiercely did he defy to mortal combat any ill advised person who should venture to dispute the fact.

As was the mode in those days, the fair Marguerite passed her life for the most part shut up in what was called her "bower;" that is to say, in a small room with very thick walls and two narrow slits therein instead of windows, which served to let in a strong draft and very little light. Thus caged up, except on some rare occasion, when she was allowed to be present at a tournament, few persons, saving the members of her father's household, had an opportunity of admiring her loveliness. So that when the Baron de Coutances brought home his bride, the multitude of his vassals and retainers, who had assembled at the castle gate to see their new mistress, were surprised and delighted by her wonderful beauty. They shouted for joy, crying, "Long live the Baroness! Long live the beautiful Lady de Coutances!"

She returned their greeting with a smile so sweet and a bearing so gracious and modest, that even the stern Bertrand de St. Ouens, the baron's seneschal and confidential counsellor, was moved as he gazed on her;—a thing which those who did not see could not believe, on account of the proverbial hardness of the man. Those who remarked him on this occasion said that his large eye shot forth flame—that the red blood mantled in his swarthy cheek—that his arm trembled visibly as he lifted the lady from her palfrey to the floor of the vast and gloomy hall of which he gravely hailed her mistress. St. Ouens had been averse to the marriage, and might be angry that it had taken place; at all events he expressed no admiration of the bride, not even to the happy Baron.

Months and years passed on. The Baron de Coutances was the father of two fair boys, and his lady loved him ever more and more, while his affection for her was so great, that during all that time he left not his estates for a single day; which was no doubt much to the advantage of the estates themselves, and all those who lived on them. The sight of rust on his good sword—the tales of warlike deeds done in the south—St. Ouens's urgings that he should away to the wars, and not pass his days thus in ignoble peace and obscurity, all prevailed not against his love for the fair and noble-minded Marguerite.

It chanced one day that a large boat approached the coast near the Castle of Coutances; it was filled with men, women, and children, who seemed to be full of grief and alarm. They landed beneath the Castle and went up to the gate-way, praying for food and shelter. The hospitable Baron ordered his servants to supply their wants immediately; and to bring one of their number before him, that he might learn from whence they came and why they had left their homes.

A silver-haired man appeared before the Baron and Baroness, and with pale lips and a troubled countenance told his tale. He and his companions were natives of an island across the sea, which was visible from the turret-tops of the Castle of Coutances—the island of Augia, (Jersey,)—they had always lived peaceably and happily there until lately. About a month before, a huge dragon had suddenly issued from a thick wood, near the centre of the island, and having devoured many of the people and caused as many more to die with fright, had retired again within the wood. Nothing more had been seen of this terrible monster until this very day, when he had come forth again and repeated his work of devastation. The old man concluded by saying that he and his companions, fearing for their lives, had come to Neustria for security, and to obtain assistance for those who remained behind. He was in hopes that some of those doughty knights of Neustria, whose fame had reached even to the ears of the peaceful Augians, would venture over to the island and attack this formidable dragon.

The old man retired, and the Baron began to pace the apartment in deep thought, for his heart was roused by the strange recital. Suddenly he exclaimed, "I will fight against this dragon!"—and turning to the Baroness, he added,—“and thou, Marguerite,—even thou, who hatest war, wilt arm me for such a combat.”

“Surely will I, my lord; for, it is the cause of the defenceless!” she replied, looking at her husband with proud satisfaction.

And soon there was busy motion and eager talk throughout the castle; for the Baron had issued orders to embark on the morrow for Augia. He judged a large force needless for his purpose. He said, "Doubtless these poor peasants have much magnified the terrors of the monster; I, with my good St. Ouens and two men-at-arms, will easily slay him."

On the morrow the Baron de Coutances bade farewell to his wife and children. The Baroness did not attempt to dissuade him from the undertaking, though many strange and sad forebodings had taken possession of her soul. She strove to say farewell with a cheerful aspect; but it was in vain she strove. She could not account to herself for this change in her feelings; but, now, she would have sacrificed much that she valued to detain her lord from this enterprise. Her lips were white and trembling, as she pressed his cheek with yet another lingering kiss, while her brow was crimson with the life-blood from the heart, which had suspended its calm pulsation.

"Why dost thou tremble, my pearl of pearls?" said the Baron, looking tenderly into her sad eyes. "Thou, who art wont to be as brave as thou art gentle and loving!"

"If I should never see thee more!—If thou shouldst perish!" and the noble lady dropped her head on his mailed breast and wept.

"Nay, nay, my own sweet wife! this must not be," said de Coutances. "Thou must be a brave woman; at least, till we return. I must leave thee to command the Castle and to protect our children. Thou knowest that I have enemies abroad in this country who are eager for my ruin. I cannot endure the thought that any of my possessions should pass away from the inheritance of our children; for their sakes I would keep good watch and ward over our noble lands. I may have to tarry long ere I find this dragon; but, from time to time, I will send over Bertrand de St. Ouens, with tidings of me, and with instructions for thy conduct here. But, my Marguerite! in these days there is much treachery abroad. We cannot be too cautious, therefore credit no messenger from me but Bertrand; and promise me that whatsoever commands he shall bring thee from me thou wilt obey to the letter."

"By the Holy Virgin, I promise, and by my love to thee," replied his wife. "But send thou always a letter, however short, and thy signet ring."

"It shall be so, my dear wife; once more farewell!—In truth, I like not this parting better than thou. One more embrace!—now for my bark and the bright green sea."

The baron departed, and the fair Marguerite watched his bark till it became a dim speck on the horizon and then she wept. But the daily duties pressed on her from without, and the melancholy sighs within were stifled; and, from time to time, came Bertrand de St. Ouens from her husband, with cheering news. But the dreaded dragon had not yet been seen again; and de Coutances began to be anxious and troubled about his return, for there were warlike doings in Normandy, and he feared that his enemies might attack the castle during his absence, when only his wife was there to command. Meanwhile she obeyed implicitly all his injunctions.

Her lord had been absent four weeks, when Marguerite sat alone one evening in the chamber of her sleeping children. Suddenly, she heard the sound of footsteps,—the tapestry was withdrawn from the entrance, and St. Ouens stood before her,—pale, blood-stained, and with downcast eyes. In a low, hoarse whisper, the lady spoke.

"Speak, Bertrand!—Quickly—Speak the truth, in God's name!—What hath chanced to my dear lord?"

He moved not—he spoke not,—and without raising his eyes to her face he presented the accustomed ring and letter. The Baroness walked with an unsteady step to a lamp in the apartment;—read the letter, and fell senseless to the ground.

This was the letter, written in an uncertain hand,—

"I am dying, my beloved Marguerite! That fearful monster is slain, at last; but he has cost me my life, and those of the two men-at-arms. And now, my soul is racked with fears for thee and our children. There is but one sure way to protect you all. Remember thy solemn promise to obey all my commands. This, then, is my last. When I shall have been dead twelve months, marry Bertrand de St. Ouens. He is my best friend. He will guard well my children's heritage. God bless thee, my wife, my beloved Marguerite!—We shall meet in heaven. Adieu! Adieu!—On earth we can meet no more.

Thy loving

COUTANCES."

On the morrow Bertrand de St. Ouens called together the vassals of Coutances, and told them the story of their lord's death. The dragon had been destroyed; but, alas! in the desperate combat the two men-at-arms had been killed, and the noble Baron de Coutances himself was mortally wounded!—he had but time to write a few words to his lady, containing his last will, which she, in due time, would make known to them. At present, she was plunged in deep affliction and could not attend to her worldly-affairs; therefore, she had appointed him governor of the castle until her recovery.

The vassals mourned their master's death sincerely, for they loved him. They could not forget his noble bearing—his kindly word and eye. He was their liege lord; and they mourned him, not as servants mourn a master, but as children mourn their parents. Bertrand de St. Ouens they loved not in their hearts, and they marvelled greatly at the event which took place at the end of twelve months from the baron's death. The Lady Marguerite caused her lord's dying will to be read aloud to his vassals by her chaplain, and after a few weeks delay she married St. Ouens. The retainers and the neighbouring nobles made strange comments on the matter. There was no joy or feasting at the marriage, for the lady was sad and sorely indisposed.

Time passed on. The baroness still lived; but she lived for her sons alone, whom she loved with all a mother's tenderness and all a father's pride. To her new husband she showed herself cold, silent, and sternly proud; for she hated him in her heart.

It was now the third anniversary of the Baron de Coutances' death. At midnight the wretched lady lay awake, when deep groans from Bertrand de St. Ouens struck her ear. She heard him mutter words of fearful import, and her heart stood still. Again those words! Oh! what is there in a little word to rouse such horror? Could that indeed be truth? She moved gently from his side, and, bringing a lamp, held it over the sleeping man. The working of his features was dreadful to look upon. She shut her eyes, and with trembling limbs stood to listen while the dreamer's incoherent words revealed, but too clearly, the dark deed he had wrought three years before. His sword lay at her feet. By a sudden impulse she stooped to lift it in vengeance. But her strength failed her; and she sank on her knees, in prayer to the Blessed Virgin for counsel and for aid in this terrible strait.

On the morrow the Lady Marguerite sent a messenger to Augia, secretly. He stayed several days; at length he returned, but not alone. He brought with him one of those men-at-arms who had accompanied the baron to the island, and whom Bertrand had declared to have been slain. This man was conducted by a private way to the Lady's apartment, and remained alone with her. She found that her suspicions were truth. St. Ouens had stabbed his patron and friend after they had slain the dragon. One of the men-at-arms had shared his lord's fate, and he who remained to tell the bloody tale had fled, and afterwards, fearing St. Ouens' power, had kept the guilt secret, and remained concealed from the perpetrator. Alas, for the Lady Marguerite! She clasped her children to her bosom and wept;—but not long. She had another duty to perform.

Before a tribunal of Norman nobles stood Bertrand de St. Ouens, charged by his wife with the crime of murder. He stood silent while the horrible tale was told. The proofs of his guilt were too clear to be much discussed in that august assembly; he was soon pronounced guilty, and worthy of death.

When he heard his sentence, Bertrand de St. Ouens replied nothing to his judges; but he turned him face to face with the accuser—the stern, wan, grief-worn Marguerite,—and said, in a broken voice of deep emotion,—"Yes! guilty! And thou the cause. Woman! I have stained my immortal soul with the blood of my dearest friend, for the love of thy beauty. Thou hast repaid my love with hate—so have I been accursed beyond the punishment of murderers. Thou hast tormented me on earth—thou hast cast me out of heaven. Yet art thou dear to me, and neither justice nor heaven itself, can tear thy loved image from this accursed soul."

And Bertrand de St. Ouens was borne away to his death. And Marguerite—the wretched, hopeless Marguerite—alas, for her! She crossed the sea to Augia, she sought the place where the remains of her beloved lay, and she would fain have stretched herself there to die; but she remembered that she was a mother. Her children—his children—needed her care; and, kneeling on the grave, she strengthened her soul by prayer, to bear the heavy burden of life.

She sent for the most skilful masons in her country, and caused them to build a high tower, over the grave of her murdered lord,—a tower so high that she might see it plainly from her castle at Coutances; that the spot where he lay might be ever in her sight as it was in her thoughts. The fair Marguerite faded away year by year, and when her eldest son attained the age of eighteen, Marguerite died, and was buried by her children beside their father's remains, under the high tower in Augia, called La Hogue Bie.

On the spot where this ancient town once stood there is now a small tower called "Prince's Tower," or "La Hogue Bie." It is very nearly the central point of the island of Jersey, and is now used by the lovers of the picturesque, as from its summit the best view of the lovely island and the adjacent coast of Normandy may be obtained. The legend, which I have related above, has long been current in Jersey, and, until the last dozen years or so, had not travelled beyond it.

ITALY.

A CONVENT FESTA.

BY S. LEY WOLMER.

THE celebration of Saints' days in Italy is frequently attended by peculiar and interesting ceremonies. In the cities, the churches are then magnificently adorned, the altar is covered with gold and silver, or gilded ornaments, vases of flowers, crucifixes, and lamps; and numerous wax candles are lighted up, not only at the principal but at all the minor altars. Festoons of cloth, fringed with tinsel, cover the columns, and sometimes the walls, so that the appearance of the interior of the churches is quite changed; all bears the air of a festive occasion, and, in addition to the usual masses, the services have a peculiar reference to the saint to be celebrated, and in whose honour the treasures of the church, in the shape of relics, are produced for veneration. Even the outside portals are festooned with ornaments and garlanded with flowers.

In many country places still greater attractions are offered; the festa, or feast day, becomes an era in the year, and its recurrence a scene not only of devotion, but of high recreation. Religion and amusement go hand in hand. Whilst at Nice the returning festa day of the patron saint was to be celebrated at the convent of Cimies, and I availed myself of the occasion to visit the convent and attend the services.

We are accustomed to consider convents as places for the ladies; in Italy it is just the reverse; the convents are occupied by monks, the monasteries by nuns. An hour's mule ride through a picturesque road brought me, on the festal day, to the summit of one of the range of mountains which forms the picturesque background of Nice. There stands the Convent of Cimies, built on the site where once stood a Roman prætorial palace. In the neighbourhood are the remains of an amphitheatre, a temple, and of public baths, which are all that now tell of a once flourishing city which the invasions of barbarians, the pestilence, and the lapse of time have succeeded in destroying. The situations for monastic institutions have generally been well chosen for commanding the finest points of view, and obtaining the greatest amount of natural advantages; and Cimies is pre-eminent for both.

The convent establishment of Cimies is on a large scale. There are extensive buildings for the habitations of the monks, cloisters for meditation, gardens for recreation, a church adjoining for worship, and a cemetery for their burial. Some fine old trees shade the front of the buildings, and an elegant cross of white marble, on a twisted column, stands before the church. On the cross is an image of the Saviour, with wings covering the fore part of the body, and also with wings at the feet, to symbolize, as I was informed, that, although suffering crucifixion, he was soon again to arise. Above the crucifixion is a sculptured representation of a pelican feeding her young with her own blood.

Under the portico entrance to the convent are various frescoes covering the walls. Amongst them are the heraldic demonstrations of the order of the Franciscans; a curious emblazonment, on which, instead of the usual adornments of arms, two angels are the supporters; the crown of thorns forms the crest, and the reed, the cross, the ropes, and the bleeding wounds of the Saviour, are all introduced on the shield. Some paintings on the walls represent the history and sufferings of many martyrs of the Franciscan order, who were put to death by the Turks; whole rows of these sufferers are represented as suspended on crosses, whilst the turbaned infidels are looking quietly on.

A tablet near the door of the church of the convent, which is dedicated to the Holy Virgin, announces various extraordinary advantages with which the church has been enriched; and extraordinary indeed they are—if true. One pope has declared that the establishment at Cimies shall participate in some of the indulgences annexed to the favoured church of St. John of Lateran, at Rome,—which, no doubt, are very special. Another promises forgiveness of half the amount of sins, and another the remission of the whole, on the performance of worship at a particular time at Cimies, under certain conditions, including, however, confession and communion. Another indulgence offers the reduction of some of the punishment of purgatory.

By the side of the church is the entry to the clausura, or cloisters; the walls are covered with various fresco paintings of scriptural subjects. From thence I passed into the garden and enjoyed a splendid view of the surrounding country and the expanse of the Mediterranean. Some of the monks were walking about, and I soon received from one of them, whom I knew from eleemosynary visits he had paid me, a courteous welcome. He soon presented me to others of the fraternity, and I heard from them some of the rules of their order. Amongst them, they were forbidden to have possessions of any kind; they have nothing but their clothes; and they state that they live entirely on the charities offered to them, receiving gifts of bread, wine, and other necessities, which they seek from house to house; the lay brethren of the order bearing over their shoulders a sack to collect the contributions in their weekly visits.

The dress of the Franciscans consists of one garment only, of the coarsest brown stuff cloth, with a hood or cowl at the back; a rope of cord is tied round the body at the waist; no linen is permitted to be worn, and the feet are either bare, or only protected by a leathern sandal, and, according to their own accounts, they sleep in their unchanged dress. The vows of the fraternity are those of chastity, poverty, and obedience to their superiors. The monks with whom I conversed told me they had been many years in the convent; they were happy enough, and found a life of abstraction from the world conducive to their spiritual good; that the habitual fastings had ceased to become painful to the body, and that their scanty regimen tended to keep them in health. They admitted that great difficulty was experienced in the seasoning for such a life, and that many sunk under it, whose constitutions were not vigorous enough to combat its early discipline.

After passing through the gardens, we entered an enclosure, where appeared many massy pieces of ruined walls. "There," said my companion, "are the remains of the Roman proconsul's palace—our convent grounds now occupy its former site." What a contrast do the present occupants offer to the former! The Roman governor and the cowed monk may be taken as the types of the different epochs as they affect this kingdom.

The cemetery of the convent closely adjoins the establishment; the passage from one to the other is but a step, and the monks, as if carrying out their principle of abstraction from the world, leave no remembrance of themselves after they have passed away—there are no stones of memorial to record the names, or any particulars of the departed brethren of the order.

My monkish companions had now to take their part in the services of the day, and I left them to take a survey of the specialties of the place. The church doors had been thrown open at an early hour, and the population, from all quarters, were thronging to the neighbourhood of the Convent. Outside the church were hung printed notices of advantages to be obtained by attention to the services going forwards. "Indulgentia plenaria," (plenary indulgence,) appeared in large characters over the principal entrance, amongst other invitations to the faithful to come and avail themselves of the liberal offers of the Church. Within the church crowds of peasants were on their knees before the altars and shrines, whilst a numerous auditory surrounded the pulpit, and were listening to the animated discourse of a monk of the convent, who was urging the importance of confession and penance.

I took the opportunity of looking around me to inspect some of the cases of relics which, on these feast days, are exposed to the public gaze. There were skeletons, said to be those of martyred saints; bones and relics of various kinds, neatly labelled. In one part of the church, under an altar, from which the curtain had been drawn aside, was a wax figure, lighted up by lamps, representing the Saviour as laying in the tomb. In the sacristy, amongst the pictures, was one of St. Francis, the founder of the order, receiving, as the legend of the saint reports, the stigmata, or marks, in his own hands, feet, and side, the same as those of the Saviour, whom he is represented as steadfastly regarding, and from whose wounds streams of communication are flowing, and fixing themselves in the same parts of the saint's body, and which are alleged ever afterwards to have remained there.

The scenes on the outside of the church presented a strange contrast to those of the interior, for, on leaving the congregation, who were apparently very attentive to the service and devotion going on, no sooner had I passed the curtain of cloth which hung before the principal entrance, than "Indulgentia plenaria" for very different than church purposes seemed to be in full operation. The large space before the church was quite a fair, and the peasantry of the whole neighbouring country, in their gay and picturesque attire, seemed to be fully enjoying themselves—in honour, of course, of the saint. Booths and tents were fixed all around, and the tables and counters in them were covered with eatables and drinkables, pictures of the saint and medals in his honour, rosaries blessed by the priest, and crosses to be worn round the neck, both for men, women, and children. Mendicants appeared in every variety of wretchedness, and with the most incongruous distortions of body, imploring charity for the saint's sake. The beggars who assemble during the season at Nice, are an amusing set of fellows, and many of them make a regular vocation of exhibiting infirmities either real or apparent. The mendicant Lazzaroni present all varieties of wretchedness. Many of their dresses seem held together by the attraction of cohesion only; and as for their sufferings, it would seem as if the malformations of a whole country were there congregated together. To speak of men without legs or arms, would be but common casualties; there are some fellows without noses, others without ears, some without eyes, or whose eyes, noses, and mouths seem in wrong places. One or two would wish to convey to you that they had no faces at all, so carefully are they bandaged up, to be opened only to display eyes dreadfully red, a place where a nose ought to be, or a distorted mouth; and I should not be surprised to see some beggars making the experiment of walking about with their heads under their arms.

In the midst of the motley group, assembled outside the convent of Cimici, several men, women, and children, instead of begging, were at least making the show of employment by holding up small relic-boxes, cases containing figures of the Virgin, or the saints, and then requesting you to prove your respect for them by a small donation to the exhibition. In the meanwhile the monks are associating with the visitors, giving, possibly, useful and ghostly advice to their children, as they are pleased to call the people, who, in return, constantly salute them with the pleasing appellation of Papa, "Mio padre," which is the common form of salutation. But monks may hide a gallant as well as a religious heart under the cowl and the rough vest; and it is not always safe to trust ladies, at least if they be fair and young, to the whisperings of monks even outside a convent. It must be the fault of the ladies themselves if they will be caught within forbidden domains, as we shall soon see. I should have mentioned that, whilst I was viewing the interior, I was obliged to leave a fair lady, who had accompanied me on my visit to Cimici, on the outside of the convent door. She sat beneath a wide-spreading tree—for the rules of the order did not permit any female form to pass the threshold—the daughters of Eve are no fit beings for monastic walls when there are monks to be tempted within them; but when I rejoined my fair friend, and gave a tempting account of the scenes within the garden, of the monks, and of the ruins, I was met by a storm of indignation that women should be excluded from any place they wished to explore; which ended in a determination, on the lady's part, in defiance of popes and priests, to see all that was to be seen. At this critical juncture several of the brethren appeared, and my monkish friend amongst them. I heartily begged permission for the lady to enter; they told us their regard for us was very great, but they were not willing to incur the risk of an anathema to gratify such secular desires. Even a dispensation from the pope would be necessary. But who ever heard of female curiosity being disappointed, when fairly set on the qui vive? Our friends left us to ourselves, and the lady to her disappointment. Now, there was a side gate, leading into the garden, which was left temptingly open as the monks retreated, and the prohibitory word, "Clausura," fairly written up as a warning, stared us in the face; the lady said there was no harm in at least peeping in, and certainly no lady is expected to understand Latin; and if English ladies are to be kept out, then notices in proper English should be posted about. She did peep in; not a monk was in the place. Now, who ever peeped into forbidden ground without either wishing to go, or actually going, further? "Surely I may go in," my young friend thought, "only to pick that pretty flower against the wall!" To the wall she went, and then from wall to wall—and further and further was led on not only into the midst of the garden, but all around and about the convent. Fear was gone, and prohibitions and anathemas were laughed at! but out came the monks, and there was a pretty scene—the lady ran, and the monks ran, too; but, once outside the gate, there was nothing more to be done. The monks said they would all be excommunicated, and the lady laughed, and then the monks laughed also, and then went away, carefully locking the door after them, to sprinkle the garden, no doubt, with purifying waters from the contamination of the visit.

My friend of the convent soon rejoined us again on the outside, and, of course, was very severe on the enormity committed, and he gave a due lecture on the subject. As the lady was reseated on her mule, I left her in charge of the monk, whilst I returned for a few minutes again within the convent. On my return I found a most animated conversation going forward in that very musical language which adds so much grace to the expression of feeling and sentiment, and I ceased to wonder why monkish institutions prohibit the entrance of ladies.

"You are an angel!" were the first expressions that fell on my ear as I drew near. Whether ladies are really angels, or merely like them, may be left to the varying opinions of those who are best acquainted with the sex; but certainly a monk retired from the world might as well have kept his particular opinions to himself—the lady in question was not an angel, but a human creature, whom it would be as difficult, as unnecessary to describe; one of those fair forms happily realized by most of us in a land where they abound:—

"The loveliness at times we see
In momentary glidings—the soft grace,
The youth, the bloom, the beauty which agree
In many a nameless being we retraced."

"Although we think the sex angelic," I remarked to the rather astonished monk, "we are not in the habit of telling them so, at least on so short an acquaintance."

"May she always continue the angel she is," was the reply given to me, with the gravity of a bishop. It appeared almost as if it had been the utterance of a benediction, instead of a compliment.

My young friend saw no reason at all why, if gentlemen thought ladies were angels, they should not tell them so, and highly commended the gallantry as well as the sincerity of the monk, and wished certain other persons had a little more of the same spirit. How far the complimentary language of convents on Festa days is associated with similar observances in every-day life, of course, I know not. I presume it is quite of a different character, for the monk hoped that his conversation might be attended with benefit. He had, it is true, told the lady that she was an angel; and, if it had been possible, he would have compared her to something better; but he had endeavoured also to convince her that, being a Protestant one, if she continued in such a communion, and did not put on a pair of catholic wings, she would certainly go to a very improper place for such a lovely form and such beauty as hers.

And, therefore, when pretty ladies visit festas and convents, and will peep into forbidden gardens, they may possibly meet, not only attacks on their hearts, but on their orthodoxy also! And it may be questioned whether they will not, under such self-sought circumstances, make some excuses for the latter, and not be very angry with the other. At least I was obliged to observe in after days that the mules we rode were unaccountably often turning up the little stony road that leads to the convent at Cimies.

But the day of the ceremony passes on. The morning part has been crowded by the poor and the peasants; the afternoon portion is reserved for the visits of the rich and the gay, who now throng to the scene, first to perform some devotion, and then to put an offering in the begging-boxes, or on the altars, which performance, in the estimation of the monks, is not the least important portion of the services; and then, both old and young, rich and poor, gentle and simple, with good humour and hilarity, return homewards, all appearing highly pleased, if they have not been much edified, by the festa of the day. The monks themselves, after their pious labours, retire, as we may charitably suppose, to a frugal repast; not forgetting to rejoice in the additional resources which the festa day has brought to the convent; and some of the brethren, it may be feared, will have their rest disturbed by visions of angels, coming in the shape of English ladies, to interfere with the tranquillity of monastic life.

THE FORTUNATE MAN.

BY F. H. K.

CHAPTER IV.

SICKNESS, even in its least revolting forms, has much to harrow the human heart. Feeling within us, as we perpetually do, the yearnings and instigations of the deathless and immutable spirit, we are prone to forgetfulness of the fact that the clay in which it is caged is ill able to second its energies; and when the conviction is forced upon us that, with all our proud aspirations and boastings, we are the mere creatures of the things we most despise,—that a breath will agitate us,—that a straw will weigh us down,—that sickness will make the strong man more powerless than the insect, and death leave him the banquet of the worm,—it is a sore trial to that pride which would fain deem itself as invulnerable as immortal. But while there is much that is humbling to the pride of intellect, there is also much that subserves some of the highest purposes of Providence; and amongst the foremost we may rank the power which sickness possesses of softening the heart. The feelings that are so dominant in the season of health—the over-weening delicacy—the fear of incurring the charge of affectation or parade—the dread of pressing too rudely on oversensitive feelings, and thereby incurring the risk that the plant of friendship, which has been years in attaining its growth, may be nipped by the frost-breath of a night—these thoughts rarely approach the sick-bed. The tide of natural feeling, like the flooded river, bursts its ordinary barriers, and sweeps down all that attempt to oppose it, in the resistless force of its torrent. And while nature thus asserts her rights with those who surround the sick-bed, she is not less busy, and not less omnipotent with its occupant. If he has entertained any hard thoughts of those around him, he wonders how he could have done so; if he has always loved them, he now loves them tenfold. Every kind act, every comforting word, every sympathising look, sinks deeply into the soul, and so arouses and expands its best and purest affections, that the invalid often feels more than recompensed for his sufferings by their having knit his heart so closely to those whose worth and affection he never fully knew before, and now feels that he can never sufficiently return.

Edward, in the long and dangerous illness with which he was now afflicted, had a fitting object for the exercise of such feelings, in the person of Dacre. That faithful friend rarely left his bedside; administered his medicines himself, read to him or conversed with him as he saw him able to bear it, and watched the turns of his disorder with an anxiety ill concealed by his affected cheerfulness. And while the physician exerted his art on the diseased body, the friend gradually began to probe the wounds of the spirit. He was as surprised as delighted not to find the amount of difficulty which the past had led him to apprehend. We have already observed that sickness is a great softener of the human heart. Even to those whose step has been but in the sunbeam,—when that sunbeam and all the bright things that danced in it are withdrawn—when the things of earth recede into dim distance, and, standing at the portal of the invisible world, the spirit seems already pluming its wings for flight into a dark and fathomless unknown, harder than triple adamant must be that soul which can look down into the gulph without awe, and without some anxious thoughts as to what it may find beyond. Few are the men to whom, in such circumstances, outward things wear not another form, and speak not in another tone than they were wont to do—to whom the fairest human objects look not faint—the highest human enjoyments poor—the strongest human associations fragile. Easily may it be conceived then, that Edward, who had so lately been compelled to write Ichabod on the doors of the temple wherein he had shrined all his sublunary happiness, should feel the influence of this softening spirit—this blessed manna of the soul—to its fullest extent. What for him had been the world he had worshipped? What had it given him in return for the devotion of years, for the dedication of his best energies, for the sacrifice of those higher feelings and nobler principles, which had lost him much pure and rich enjoyment in time, and well-nigh shipwrecked his hopes of eternity? What but treachery, callousness, and ingratitude—a bankrupt home, a wasted body, and a bruised spirit? Well might he turn from it with loathing and disgust; and as he heard of One who, though he had been outraged, was still willing to forgive—who, though he had been forgotten in pride, yet remembered in mercy—who, though he had been forsaken for the potsherds of earth, was yet waiting to bestow on the penitent prodigal the glorious treasures of heaven,—there was a spirit that burned within him as he listened. It seemed as if he had but then begun to live. Every thing took a new form; everything appeared under a different aspect; for the heart of him who looked upon them was changed.

Now it was that Dacre reaped the rich reward of all his toils and anxieties. If there is in the human heart one feeling more nearly allied than any other to those which actuate superior natures, it is the mingled joy and gratitude which swells it when it beholds the success of its efforts to turn a soul from darkness to light: when it sees the being it has “allured to brighter worlds” treading the path which leads to them with gladness and alacrity; when the ice which had bound the spirit melts before the genial beams of the Sun of righteousness, and gives indications that the winter of the soul is past, and that the bud and blossom are at hand which will ripen into that fruit which is the food of eternity. This feeling, so pure, so removed from the taint of mortality, and at the same time so exquisite, Dacre experienced in its full luxury; and the bedside of him whom he now felt a pride in calling his friend, seemed hallowed to him by the associations which he would now connect with it. Nor were these associations less vivid or less delightful to the invalid himself; though he was at first surprised and bewildered at the change. He could not comprehend how it was that with his worldly substance lost, his rank in society vanished, his frame weak and enfeebled, and all which he had been accustomed to take pride in become “the baseless fabric of a vision,” he felt an inward peace, a positive contentment, which he had never experienced when in the full possession of his former enjoyments. He had not yet discovered the solution of his own riddle; he had ceased to put his trust in these things: he had found nobler riches, higher rank, spiritual health, and purer sources of enjoyment; and as his heart became more and more fixed on these, his former objects had naturally less and less interest, until he began to wonder that the loss of what had so little intrinsic value could ever have pained him so deeply. And when his malady had done its allotted work, and departed—when the tide of health began again to flow through his veins, and he once more felt the balmy breath of spring upon his cheek, it seemed to be laden with more than its natural sweetness: it seemed the breathing of myriads of unseen angels swarming round him on every side, and all engaged in offices of goodness and mercy—waking up the plant from its winter’s sleep—painting the blossom of the young flower, and the plumage of the unfledged bird—forming the germ of the future fruit—bringing the essences of life, of growth, of colour, and of fragrance from their far off storehouses in the spirit land, and teaching them how to fill the visible creation with redolence and beauty. Every bud, every leaf, every grass blade seemed so full of the goodness which had placed them in their various spheres to contribute in a thousand ways to the pleasures or necessities of man, that he was amazed at his not having been struck with it before. He remembered not that the sweet melodies of nature make no music for the deaf, and that her forms of loveliness have no beauty for the blind.

Edward was scarcely sufficiently recovered to be capable of exertion, when he began to recollect that all his property had been absorbed by the late events, and that he was now a burthen on the generosity of his friend. He felt that he had already taxed that generosity too deeply, and became urgent for some means of being, in a pecuniary sense, independent of it. Dacre, who felt the wish to be at once natural and right, did not oppose it, and by the exertion of his influence, Edward saw himself clerk in a mercantile establishment, on the principals of which he would have looked down with ineffable contempt a few short months before.

These few short months, however, had done the work of years within him. The film had been removed from his eyes, and he no longer saw things through the deceptive medium of former days; he had learned to consider himself merely as a traveller on his road homeward, who regards but little the quality of the inns where he may have to rest awhile by the way. Accordingly he entered on his new duties as if he had never had a thought above the stool he occupied, and behaved to his new superiors with the same respectful deference that they would formerly have shown to him. Dacre had not been wholly without apprehensions of the effect which so great a change might have on his neophyte's principles, and was delighted to find him not merely resigned, but cheerful and contented. Having arrived at a thorough conviction of the fact that—“Honour and shame from no condition rise;

Act well your part, there all the honour lies;”

and feeling conscious that he acted his part much better under the new regime than he had done under the old,—having now, moreover, attained a consolation far beyond the reach of earthly things to change or weaken,—the little acerbities of his new station were no more to him than a few occasional inequalities in the road of the mountain traveller, which may disturb his equanimity for a moment, but are literally mere dust in the balance when weighed against the objects of his journey.

CHAPTER V.

EDWARD was returning one evening from his usual avocations, when he was roused from a reverie by a low voice soliciting his charity. The last time we saw his name in connexion with that word, he was rolling in affluence, but could not afford to give. Now the cry came to his heart with a force of appeal not to be resisted. He had known adversity himself.

On turning to look at the party who had thus arrested his attention, he saw at his side a boy of about ten years of age. His whole appearance bespoke poverty, but there was no attempt to make a parade of it. His little jacket was old and threadbare, but it was not ragged; his face and hands were thin and pale, but they were clean; his hair was neatly combed and parted, and there was a slight inclination to a wave in it, which gave additional interest to his intelligent, though sharp and emaciated features: there was, moreover, an unmistakeable sincerity in the expression of his eye and the tone of his voice, as he renewed his petition,—

“Do, sir, please to give me something for poor little Tommy.”

“And who is poor little Tommy?” inquired Edward.

“My little brother, please, sir,” replied the child, coming up to him in confidence at the kind sound of his voice, and looking full up in his face as he spoke; “he has not had a morsel of food since yesterday, and he is crying as if his heart would break. And it will soon, I am sure, if he has not something to eat. But you will give him something, won’t you, sir, please?”

“I will, indeed, if he requires it,” said Edward; “but you must tell me what the nature of your distress is, and how it happened.”

His young companion evidently desired nothing better than to relieve his overcharged heart by such a recital. His tale was a common one, but told in an uncommon manner. He said his name was Henry Warner. His father, who was a respectable mechanic, had brought up his family in credit and respectability, till a severe illness had deprived him of the ability to labour, and at once cut off their means of subsistence. They had supported themselves for some time by the sale of what small articles of value they possessed, but this scanty source was soon exhausted, and now, when the violence of the disease had abated, and the invalid required a double portion of nourishment to recruit his exhausted strength, the means of obtaining it had utterly failed.

“I could not bear to look into his poor thin face, sir,” said the child, “nor to hear poor little Tommy crying for something to eat, so I just ran out to see if God would not put me in the way of getting some for them, for father teaches us to pray to Him every night and morning, and tells us that He will always take care of us if we are good. And though I know I am not good, because I slapped one of my sisters yesterday, father said God would not be angry about that, as I was sorry for it. So I ran out to see if I could not get some, and I tried to ask several of the people as I came along, but I could not do it. Whenever I tried to speak, there was a big something of I don’t know what, that came into my throat as if it was choking me. So at last I looked in your face, sir, and I found I could speak to you; though I could not get courage at first, but I thought of poor little Tommy, and so I tried again, and the choking did not come a bit. And you will give me something for him and my poor father, won't you, sir, please?"

His little heart was evidently full, but he turned hastily aside with a manner beyond his years, and brushed off the falling tear with the cuff of his jacket, as if ashamed that it should be seen. Edward spoke kindly to him, and asked if he could show him where his father lived.

"Oh, yes, sir, that I will. And will you come and see him? Oh, I am so glad!" and the little fellow began to trot along so briskly, that Edward was obliged to call to him to slacken his pace.

"Yes, sir," said the boy, doing as he was desired; "I did not think of it, sir. I was thinking how glad father and mother would be, and my sisters, and poor little Tommy, when they know I have brought a good, kind gentlemen to see them; and I didn't know I was going fast, sir; I am very sorry, sir, indeed."

"Never mind, my little fellow," said Edward; "only if I do not keep you in sight, you know, I am not likely to see your father at all."

The child had evidently not thought of this either, but no sooner was it suggested, than it became quite the prominent idea in his mind, so much so, indeed, that if his eagerness now and then led him a yard or two in advance of his companion, or he was separated from his side by any of the passers-by, he was sure to turn with an anxious look, to satisfy himself that so dreadful a calamity had not actually occurred. Nor did he even venture to take one of the numerous turnings which they had now to make, (for their road began to lie through a number of narrow lanes and alleys,) without carefully stopping at the corner, to look up in Edward's face, and say, "This way, sir, please."

They proceeded for some time in this manner, through an obscure quarter of the town, in which everything seemed to indicate wretchedness and poverty. The streets, or rather lanes, were paved only with rough pitching, except here and there where a few flag-stones had been laid down before a house of more decent appearance than the rest; and even these unwonted pieces of fluery were in most instances either broken in the centre, and running off into curves and angles that would have sorely puzzled a mathematician to classify, or else loosened from their beds, and squirting portions of dirty water over every passenger that set his foot on them, as if in revenge for the indignity inflicted. The houses were all built with the overhanging fronts, and low, small paned windows of former days, and many of these were in the last stage of dilapidation—some actually propped up from the outside to prevent their falling—and all looking as if a generation had passed away since they had been conscious of the presence of paint or colouring. The dirty state of the windows would have sometimes left it doubtful whether they were glazed or not, if the doubt had not been removed by the frequent appearance of a bundle of rags thrust through a hole, as a temporary expedient till the aperture could be more permanently filled up with a sheet of paper pasted to the frame,—the general mode of remedying breakages in the neighbourhood, as the number of panes thus filled up in white, blue, green, or brown, as caprice or necessity might dictate, bore ample testimony. The mean and squalid appearance of the inhabitants themselves was in melancholy keeping with that of their dwellings. Misery seemed to look out from every door, and even the free and beautiful air of heaven felt sickly and impure as it wound its way through the narrow and choked-up channels, or sped with seeming haste over the masses of filth which appeared to accumulate wherever they could find room, like the lawful denizens of the soil. And within a trifling distance of these miserable hovels, in one or other of which dwelt every kind and every degree of wretchedness, and perhaps every kind and every degree of vice—hovels which regularly furnished their melancholy quota for the poor-house, the mad-house, and the prison—rose the splendid palaces of rank and opulence, within whose gorgeous walls dwelt those whose lightest wishes were supplied with a rapidity and magnificence which almost seemed to realize the magic talisman of Aladdin; within whose precincts not merely earthly wants to the occupants themselves, but the sound of such a thing as affecting others, had never dared to penetrate, and where the sickly pinings of pampered luxury dissipated sums which would have snatched many of their wretched neighbours from disease and famine, and the unhallowed grave of the suicide and the felon.

Pausing at last at a low door, which opened with some difficulty on its one hinge—the other had been long since rusted and broken off—Edward's conductor led the way along a dark and narrow passage, with as dark and narrow a flight of stairs at the end, up which the new comer with some difficulty groped his way. Almost every stair creaked as he set foot on it, as if scarcely able to bear his weight, and the banisters by which he assisted his ascent were loose and broken. Four pair of these had been slowly surmounted in succession, when his guide suddenly flung open a door, which the obscurity had before rendered invisible, and his long pent up emotions found vent in a shout, "Father! mother! here is a good gentleman come to give us some victuals, and do us all good; and we shall never have to cry any more;" and he began capering round the room like a young kitten.

By the time Edward had reached the door in his turn, the father had quieted the boy with a sign, and stood up to greet his unexpected visitor. He was a man who would have been called in the prime of life, if the operations of time on the human frame were not to be measured less by the lapse of years than by the nature of the events which have filled them. Thus, in this instance, sickness and want, and that dreadful anxiety which to the disabled father of a poor family is worse than either, had written threescore on a brow whose numerical years had scarcely reached forty. He had risen, but could not stand without the support of a stick; his voice was weak and tremulous, and want spoke so eloquently in every line of his haggard face, that without another word, Edward beckoned his late companion to his side, and placing half-a-crown in his hand, gave him a few hasty directions as to what he was immediately to purchase with it.

The little fellow's eyes grew twice their former size as he gazed upon a coin of such magnitude, and scarcely waiting to understand what he was to do with it, he gave a crow of delight.

"We shall have some breakfast at last. Jump about, Tommy—no don't: it will make father's head bad. Come along with me, and see what nice things I am going to get."

And catching up in his arms an infant of about three years old, whose long golden ringlets and pale and unnaturally transparent features scarcely seemed to belong to a being of this world, he danced out of the room.

Edward now heard a confirmation of the poor family's story, and discovering, in the course of the narration, that Warner was in a similar line of business to that in which he was now employed himself, at once perceived that by interesting his principals in his behalf, he might be of much more permanent benefit to him than as a mere casual donor. The difficulty was to supply the family's wants till the father should have acquired sufficient health to avail himself of this, or any similar opportunity that might offer. Edward's resources, and, by consequence, his enjoyments, were now on a very limited scale, but the change in his views and feelings was not merely nominal, and he was not slow to remember that his establishment, moderate as it was, included some things which were not absolute necessaries. These he unhesitatingly determined to sacrifice for the time, and in devoting the amount of them to this more praiseworthy object, already felt that he should be securing to himself a far higher and nobler gratification than they were now procuring him. Having, therefore, left something further to relieve the immediate wants of the morrow, he hastily escaped from the thanks of those whose sorrow he had turned into joy; and though a humbler supper was one of the privations which he had resolved upon, it was eaten that night with a sweeter relish than had formerly attended his most sumptuous repasts, and his sleep was peopled with visions of joy and gladness, though somewhat grotesquely made up of smiling angels, gentle music, smoking joints, family feasting, a respectable healthy-looking man sitting by a cheerful fire, with his arm thrown round his wife; fairies, with tiny shovels and pickaxes, knocking down a temple of despair, and one bright-eyed, golden-haired, cherub-faced child singing, and laughing, and dancing through it all.

CHAPTER VI.

THREE years had rolled away since the occurrences detailed in the last chapter, and Dacre, who had watched all Edward's movements with close and anxious scrutiny, had the gratification of observing nothing to indicate that the views and sentiments which he had imbibed upon his sick-bed had been at all altered or swerved from. The once proud and vain man was now humble and diffident; excess had given place to abstemiousness; haughtiness to gentleness; profanity to reverence; selfishness to philanthropy; gaming to charity. He had succeeded in obtaining Warner a permanent engagement with his own employers, and while he thus saw himself the means of restoring a destitute family to comfort and happiness, he had the further gratification of receiving the thanks of his principals for having procured them a workman of such skill and steady industry. His own feelings at witnessing the change abundantly repaid him for the sacrifices which he had made to effect it, but the gratitude of the family was continually evincing itself in such little memorials as lay within their power. In the winter Mrs. Warner could knit for their benefactor a comforter or a pair of woollen wristbands, of superior fabric to what he could buy, and in the summer, the choicest fruit in their little garden was scrupulously set aside for the use of "the good gentleman," and his table rarely lacked a bouquet of fresh flowers, simple in themselves, but valuable as the sincere yet delicate offering of honest gratitude. Edward, too, on his part, was continually dropping in to see how they were, and would as soon have thought of walking to their cottage without his hat, as without having his pockets filled with cakes and comfits for the girls, with a book for his friend Henry, and a toy or a piece of gingerbread for little Tom.

Matters were in this state, when Dacre one evening invited himself to his tea-table.

"I cannot tell you how gratified I have been," he said, "at witnessing the undeviating steadiness of your late conduct, and it is the more praiseworthy, as it must sometimes have been a sore trial to you."

"Do not give me more credit than I deserve. It certainly gave me some trouble at the outset to conquer the force of habit; but I have long been so much happier—or I should rather say, for the first time in my life so really happy—that I every day see fresh cause to bless the providence that wrought the change in my worldly circumstances. I believe nothing else would have awoken me from my guilty sleep. I was not fit to be trusted with riches."

"You were not, and the providence was a merciful one, as all our dispensations are, though few are so ready to acknowledge it. But you are awakened now, and if your former path lay before you, have been taught, by past experience, how you ought to walk in it."

"A few years since I should have readily agreed with you, but the same experience has taught me to distrust myself. I have looked into my own heart, and seen its weakness, and with the recollection of the precipice to the brink of which that weakness led me, I am so far from wishing to stand upon the dizzy height again, that I am thankful that my path will henceforward be a safe one in the valley below."

"None of us know what is in the womb of the future, nor is it fitting that we should."

"Of course I only spoke of probabilities; but you will agree with me that mine are so small, that it would require Lord Ross's telescope to find them out."

"Perhaps not."

"What do you mean, Dacre?" cried Edward, the smile that had gathered on his lip at the last remark leaving it as if touched by an enchanter's wand.

"My meaning is very simple," replied Dacre; "you lost your property through the perfidy of a villain: ever since his flight I have been endeavouring to trace him, though I said nothing of it, as I did not wish to disturb your mind from that wise and victorious train of feeling into which I saw it settling. My agents have been successful at last; the cormorant has been forced to disgorge, and you are now once more a rich man."

As the speaker uttered these words, Edward's countenance blanched to the paleness of marble, while every muscle of his frame seemed frozen to statue-like rigidity. It was some moments before he spoke, and when he did, his voice was husky and nearly inarticulate with emotion.

"I know I ought to thank you, Dacre, but I cannot. You have been instigated by the same noble feelings which have marked the whole of your conduct towards me since we have known each other; but I cannot rejoice at what you tell me. I have been so happy in my humble station, and felt so thankful that I was no longer exposed to my former temptations, and now this is dragging me back again. Do not speak of it, Dacre. Let me stay as I am, and do with the money as you will."

"I neither can nor will do any thing with it, but restore it to its proper owner," said Dacre. "Listen to me, Stanley. Riches are one of the choicest gifts of Providence, for they enable us, in humble imitation of it, to scatter blessings round our path wherever we move. To this use of them—their only true use—you were dead: you abused the precious gift, and it was taken from you. Since then you have become a wiser and a better man, and the Disposer of all things is willing to give you another trial in the situation where you were once so unfaithful. Should you shrink from the trust? Should you not rather rejoice that He has so far approved your penitence and recent conduct, as to count you worthy of an opportunity of recovering the high standing you have lost?"

"But I am so weak," urged Edward.

"I know it," replied Dacre; "so are we all. But is it necessary to remind you where strength is to be obtained?"

Edward's eye mechanically followed the upward direction of his companion's finger, and then he buried his face in his hands without a word. Dacre turned noiselessly away, and it was some minutes before either disturbed the meditations of the other.

When Edward at last looked up, his face was still pale, but there was a calm expression on his countenance, which showed that much had passed within him during that brief interval of silence.

"Dacre," he said, in his usual composed and quiet tone, "I accept the omen as you read it; and will hope that the fact of the trust being again confided to my charge, is a proof that my former unfaithfulness is pardoned. May I be strengthened to acquit myself henceforth more worthily!"

"Doubt it not, my friend," replied Dacre: "the strength that is asked in sincerity is never withheld."

"Let me hasten to speak of one thing," continued Edward, "a thing which has been often in my thoughts, and has pained me more than I cared to speak of. You remember I promised you fifty pounds towards an almshouse—a promise which I was too worldly-minded to redeem. You must let me give you five hundred pounds out of the recovered property as a thankoffering."

"Willingly," said Dacre; "it is a pleasing duty to assist the aged and infirm, and we have many claims on us which we lack means to satisfy. That sum will smooth the dying-pillow of many grey-headed Christians, and their blessings will be remembered when time shall be no more. And I take the fact of its being the first thought of your heart under its altered circumstances, as a token that riches in your hands will henceforth be applied to their legitimate use. The lesson you have received on that point has been severe, but the severity was necessary. Prosperity is a dangerous trial; its perpetual temptations to enjoy the present, and be forgetful of everything beyond, have wrecked many that gave fair promise for eternity; and many more might have been added to the gloomy catalogue, but that the poisoned cup was dashed in mercy from their lips, and after being purified by the sweet uses of adversity, they have been enabled to say, 'Before I was troubled, I went wrong; but now have I kept Thy word.'"

DEBORAH'S DIARY.

POST SCRIPTUM.

Spitalfields,
1880.

A GENEROUS mind finds even its just resentments languish and die away when their object becomes the unresisting prey of death. Such is my experience with regard to Betty Fisher, whose ill life hath now terminated, and from whom, confronted at the bar of their great Judge, father will, one day, hear the truth. As to my step-mother, time and distance have had their soothing effect on me even regarding her. She is flourishing like a green bay-tree down in Cheshire, among her own people; is a hale, hearty woman yet, and will very likely outlive me. If she looked in on me this moment, and saw me in this homely but decent suit, sitting by my clear coal-fire, in this little oak-panelled room, with a clean, though coarse cloth neatly laid on the supper table, with covers for two, could she sneer at the spouse of the Spitalfields weaver? Belike she might, for spite never wanted food; but I would have her into the nursery, shew her the two sleeping faces, and ask her, Did I need her pity then?

(1) Concluded from p. 132.

Betty's death, calling up memories of old times, hath made me somewhat cynical, I think. I cannot but call to mind her many ill turns. 'Twas shortly after the rupture of Anne's match with John Herring. Poor Nan had over-reckoned on her own strength of mind, when she promised father to speak of him no more; and, after the first fervour of self-denial, became so captious, that father said he heard John Herring in every tone. This set them at variance, to commence with; and then, Mary detecting Betty in certain malpractices, mother could no longer keep her, for decency's sake; and Betty, in revenge, came up to father before she left, and told him a tissue of lies concerning us,—how that Mary had wished him dead, and I had made away with his books and kitchen-stuff. I, being at Hackney at the time, on a visit to Rosamond Woodcock, was not by to refute the infamous charge, which had time to rankle in father's mind before I returned; and Mary having lost his opinion by previous squabbles with mother and the maids, I came back only to find the house turned upside down. 'Twas under these misfortunate circumstances that poor father commenced his "Sampson Agonistes;" and, though his object was, primarily, to divert his mind, it too often ran upon things around him, and made his poem the shadow and mirror of himself. When he got to Dalilah, I could not forbear saying, "How hard you are upon women, father!"

"Hard?" repeated he; "I think I am anything but that. Do you call me hard on Eve, and the Lady in 'Comus'?"

"No, indeed," I returned. "The Lady, like Una, makes sunshine in a shady place; and, in fact, how should it be otherwise? For truth and purity, like diamonds, shine in the dark."

He smiled, and, passing his hand across his brow to re-collect himself, went on in a freer, less biting spirit, to the encounter with Harapha of Gath, in which he evidently revelled,—even to making me laugh, when the big, cowardly giant excused himself from coming within the blind man's reach, by saying of him, that he had need of much washing to be willingly touched. He went on flowingly to

"But take good heed my hand survey not thee;
My heels are fetter'd, but my fist is free," and then broke into a merry laugh himself; adding, a line or two after,

"His giantship is gone, somewhat crest-fallen;

... there, girl, that will do for to-day."

Meantime, his greater poem had come out, for which he got an immediate payment of five pounds, with a conditional expectance of fifteen pounds more on the three following editions, should the public ever call for 'em. And truly, when one considers how much meat and drink one may buy for twenty pounds, and how capricious is the taste of the critical world, 'tis no mean venture of a bookseller on a manuscript of which he knows the actual value as little as a salvage of the gold-dust he parts with for a handful of old nails. At all events, the sale of the work gave father no reason to suppose he had made an ill bargain; but, indeed, he gave himself very little concern about it; and was quite satisfied when, now and then, Mr. Marvell, Mr. Skinner, or some other old crony, having waded through it, looked in on him to talk it over. Money, indeed, a little more of it, would have been often acceptable. Mother now began to pinch us pretty short, and lament the unsaleable quality of father's productions; also to call us a set of lazy drones, and wonder what would come of us some future day; insomuch that father, turning the matter sedately in his mind, did seriously conclude 'twould be well for us to go forth for a while, to learn some method of self-support. And this was accelerated by an unpleasant collision 'twixt mother and me, which, in a hasty moment, sent me, with swelling heart, to take counsel of Mrs. Lefroy, my sometime playfellow Rosamond Woodcock, then on the point of embarking for Ireland; who volunteered to take me with her, and be at my charges; so I took leave of father with bursting heart, not troubling him with an inkling of my ill-usage, which has been a comfort to me ever since, though he went to the grave believing I had only sought my own well-doing.

We never met again. Had I foreseen it, I could not have left him. The next stroke was to get away Mary and Anne, and take back Betty Fisher. Then the nuncupative will was hatched up; for I never will believe it authentick—no, never; and Sir Leoline Jenkins, that upright and able judge, set it aside, albeit Betty Fisher would swear through thick and thin.

Sure, things must have come to a pretty pass, when father was brought to take his meals in the kitchen! a thing he had never been accustomed to in his life, save at Chalfont, by reason of the parlour being so small. And the words, both as to sense and choice, which Betty put into his mouth, betrayed the counterfeit, by savouring overmuch of the scullion. "God have mercy, Betty! I see thou wilt perform according to thy promise, in providing me such dishes as I think fit whilst I live; and when I die, thou knowest that I have left thee all!" Phansy father talking like that! Were I not so provoked, I could laugh. And he to sell his children's birthright for a mess of pottage, who, instead of loving savoury meat, like blind Isaac, was, in fact, the most temperate of men! who cared not what he ate, so 'twas sweet and clean; who might have said, with godly Mr. Ball of Whitmore, that he had two dishes of meat to his sabbath-dinner,—a dish of hot milk, and a dish of cold milk; and that was enough and enough. Whose drink was from the well;—often have I drawn it for him at Chalfont!—and who called bread-and-butter a lordly dish;—often have I cut him thick slices, and brought him cressets from the spring! Well placed he his own principle and practice in the chorus's mouth, where they say,

"Oh, madness! to think use of strongest wines
And strongest drinks our chief support of health!"

So that story carries its confutation on the face of it: Ned Phillips says so, too. As to what passed, that July forenoon, between him and uncle Kit, before the latter left town in the Ipswich coach, and with Betty Fisher fidgetting in and out of the chamber all the time . . . he may or may not have called us his unkind children; for we can never tell what reasons had been given him to make him think us so. That must stand over. How many human misapprehensions must do the same! Enough that one Eye sees all, that one Spirit knows all . . . even all our misdoings; or else, how could we bear to tell Him even the least of them? But it requires great faith in the greatly wronged, to obtain that calm of mind, all passion spent, which some have arrived at. When we can stand firm on that pinnacle, Satan falls prone. He sets us on that dizzy height, as he did our Master; saying, in his taunting fashion,—

"There stand, if thou canst stand; to stand upright Will ask thee skill;"

but the moment he sees we can, down he goes himself!—falls whence he stood to see his victor fall! This is what man has done, and man may do,—and woman too; the strength, for asking, being promised and given.

ALBUM VERSES.

BY A QUONDAM FOLLOWER OF THE MUSES.

ADDRESSED TO MISS E. K.

LINES for an Album! Is that what you ask?
Write verses for an Album! Dreadful task!
Alas! no tropes come thronging, good or bad,
No thoughts, sublime or tender, blithe or sad.
My brain is parch'd, my Hippocrene is dry;
The will remains, but not the power to fly.
Dull as an epicure who has largely dined,
I cannot think, however much inclined.
Thought is the great corroder of the mind,
And, like high feeding, 'tis beyond all question,
Promotes the gout, and causes indigestion.
My Pegasus, once famed for strength and speed,
A courser of the true Parnassian breed,
In short a "veray parfit gentil" steed,
Now, like some jaded hack, is hardly able,
Tired with last long flight, to leave his stable.
But as the first of duties is to please,
And few can do so with more perfect ease,
Perhaps you'll not reject such rhymes as these.

HOUSES AND HOMES.

BY M. J. J.

It is surely a very pardonable pride, that which is aken by the Englishman in his home. We may even forgive him the air of pitying disdain with which he looks down on his Gallic neighbours, and taunts them with their lack, not only of the word, but of what it signifies. "Homes are indigenous only in England," says he, complacently; "elsewhere they are exotic. They don't take kindly to a foreign soil. You've plenty of fine houses—palaces, even; but no homes—no homes!" And he puts on his most John-Bullish air of uncompromising adherence to his opinion; and his eyebrows, knitting together in stern defiance, say plainly, "I'm right: and nothing shall convince me that I'm wrong." And yet,—in spite of his triumphant exultation, in spite of the many examples we see daily of the justice of his argument,—even in happy England, if we could penetrate into every house in a street, every cottage in a village, what a multitude of men's dwellings should we find, into which the Spirit of Home has never entered, or from whence it has departed!

It is such a subtle thing—the invisible essence which converts a house into a home, and the mysterious atmosphere which ever pervades it. There are abodes that never succeed in catching it, strive as they may. There are many mansions, handsome and spacious enough, that are always mere mansions and nothing else, notwithstanding the comforts and luxuries strewed about the rooms. But the peculiar nest-like look of home cannot be imparted by the upholsterer, though he ransack his ware-rooms in the endeavour; neither can the house decorator aid him, though he have orders to proceed "regardless of expense." We have all experienced sometimes in our lives, the sudden chill of stiff propriety that overcomes us on entering the stately reception-room of a house of this kind, (they abound in London, particularly in the vicinity of — Square,) with its costly furniture, its unexceptionable appointments, its soft carpet into which the feet sink noiselessly as if they trod on snow, its heavily curtained windows, and its atmosphere of musky mustiness. The stalking "man servant" (a being peculiar to this order of house) makes his exit, and leaves the visitor to look wonderingly on the splendour (— Square splendour, be it understood,) which surrounds him. No pictures,—for it is supposed to be unfashionable to decorate drawing-room walls with anything save gilding and satin-paper hangings, and — Square people will be fashionable if they die for it. No books, except a gorgeously-bound album, full of butterflies and sonnets; and two or three of the most approved annuals. But then the table is very handsome, of inlaid woods, and exactly in the centre there is a card-basket of filigreed silver, with the visiting tickets of all Mrs. —'s acquaintance, the titled ones put uppermost. There is a grand piano-forte, called by the family "a hundred-and-sixty-guinea instrument," but it is jealously locked, and if opened will probably be much out of tune, as, like the British crown and other magnificent things in the world, it is only used on state occasions. On a marble slab there is a large vase of Sevres porcelain, filled with flowers; but let not the rash visitor draw nigh, thinking to inhale their fragrance, for they are but artful combinations of rag and wire—they are artificial. Well, they are more costly than real blossoms; any one, with a few pence, can obtain a nosegay culled from a garden; but the best French flowers, gathered from the shelves of Madame B—, in Regent-street, can only be possessed by the wealthy few.

In such a room as this, is it possible to imagine a laughing group drawn round the winter fire, talking the lively sense and pleasant nonsense that constitute the conversation of a friendly circle? Or can we imagine such an apartment forming the scene of a joyous family party: the father and mother seated in their arm-chairs, and watching their children, wights of various ages, from the demure lassie of sixteen who is netting a purse for her papa, down to the wee toddling elf whose legs are not yet quite equal to the dignity of supporting his body, and who rolls about the room much after the fashion of an almost spent tee-to-tum?

No! As soon could Mrs. — be conceived attired in anything but gorgeous silks and velvets; or talking of anything but her dinner parties, her house, and her daughters: as soon could those daughters—upright, proper, and uncomfortable to behold as they are—be imagined talking and laughing like young girls; having, and confessing, girlish tastes for long rambles in the country, nutting parties, and looking in at the shop windows in Regent-street.

There is another class of residences that are not Homes,—lodging houses! Oh, the dreary desolation of a London “furnished apartment!” The worn Kidderminster carpet, too small for the floor, and eked out with druggit; the straight, hard chairs, ranged round the room, with their uncompromising look, an air of holding their arms down to their sides, as saying, “You shan’t be comfortable in me, at any rate;” the creaking table, with a wedge under one leg to keep it steady, and the card-table at the side, very old and very dirty, with an immense tea-caddy standing thereupon, that being opened always diffuses a mingled odour of mice, mould, and dust. The mantelpiece is probably painted to imitate marble, and on it are placed two “spill-holders” of perforated card, with bouquets worked in silk on each, the colours of which are long since faded. Besides these, there are two little white china dogs, with baskets in their mouths; a coloured glass jar of particularly awkward shape, and perhaps a pair of spotted shells. Sometimes there are pictures on the walls, a family portrait or two, of the landlady and various of her connexions. A very ambitious one represents Mrs. Robinson beautifully dressed, seated in an arm-chair so as to display her wedding-ring and guard and one foot; Mr. Robinson leans over her with a pensive air; and two young Robinsons, small children of four and five years old, are standing amicably together, with arms wound about each other’s necks, staring at the beholder with all their might. More frequently, however, these family portraits consist of two or three profiles in black and bronze, which, as they all bear an indefinite resemblance to everybody, are not so interesting to examine.

Marvels are wrought sometimes, though; and it is possible to make a home even in a furnished lodging. There are some beings, human doves, who always bring peace and serenity under their wings; home beams from their eyes, and springs up beneath the tread of their gentle feet. Women, of course! Men, with all their glorious gifts, are never so gifted; and it is rare, even among women, to find one who possesses the spell of Home-making.

But one of these was Alice Horton. Charles Horton, a briefless barrister, fell in love with the only child of a poor schoolmistress in the country; and when the mother died, and Alice was left friendless and almost penniless, Charles hastened to her, persuaded her, almost against her better judgment, to marry him directly, and brought her up to London to his lodgings, his cross landlady scarcely being notified of the fact that he was no longer the “single gentleman,” to whom she had originally let her apartments.

It was a pleasant thing to note the vast change which took place in the dreary sitting-room, soon after Alice’s arrival. There was her pet bird in its little cage, hanging at the window; there were her favourite books strewed about in that happy disorder which is yet not untidiness; there were some flowers, which in their china vase made the mantelshef look sumptuous; and there was a little work-basket on the table. Better than all, there was Alice seated beside it, working busily, ever and anon looking up at her husband, and answering his half-misgiving gaze, with a bright smile, as who should say, “Don’t fear for me; you see I am at home already!”

The young couple had to experience many troubles, doubtless; it was inevitable, considering the scanty and uncertain nature of their resources; but eventually the abilities of Charles Horton met with their reward. There is no saying how much his sweet wife unconsciously influenced his destiny, or how large was her share in bringing about the prosperity that was at length theirs. Nevertheless, his was a dangerous experiment; and we are far from advising any one to follow his example. There are many excellent, true-hearted women in the world, who are yet not Alice Hortons.

Empty houses are melancholy objects. In London they are dreary, dirty, desolate beyond all telling;—one wonders by what possible miracle they can ever again become homes. The windows seem to defy all human efforts to clean them; the doors creak harshly on their hinges, as though grumbling at the unaccustomed intrusion of living beings across their thresholds; dust lies thick on the floors, and the walls and ceilings are black with cobwebs and dirt; it seems almost desecration to imagine the chambers tenanted with bright faces, and the walls echoing the sounds of pleasant voices, laughter, and music, again!

“Life and thought have gone away

An uninhabited house in the country, on the other hand, is less dreary, but infinitely more melancholy. More particularly do we feel provoked, if there is a large garden attached to the residence,—a garden gay with flowers in all their summer luxuriance, budding, blossoming and withering, unseen and uncared for. It is painful to behold so much loveliness wasted; and we are apt to feel a most immoral sympathy with the little boys who climb over the entrance gate, and gather huge nose-gays for themselves; albeit they possibly take pleasure, not so much in their beautiful spoil, as in the excitement of the theft. It is aggravating, too, to see how from neglect of pruning, training, and weeding, the parterres are crowded with a conglomerated mass of self-sown flowers and weeds. Beauty is absolutely choking itself with its own excess! The shrubs intertwine their overgrown branches as if wrestling fiercely with each other for space to grow in: while roses, mignonette, lupins, fuchsias, poppies, geraniums, larkspurs, and a hundred other varieties of flowers, are all involved together in an inextricable confusion, in which all grades of horticultural vegetation, patrician and plebeian, even to the canaille of groundsel and chickweed, seem engaged in a floral civil war for the possession of the soil. The grass has been uncut so long, that it has become lank and coarse, and a plentiful crop of dandelions has sprung up amongst it: the gravel paths are green with weeds; while, to add to the neglected look of the place, the dead leaves of last year are scattered in every direction, giving to the whole domain something of the appearance of a slovenly beauty, with her hair in papers.

Glancing into the house itself, how forlorn everything is; the more so, that we instinctively picture to ourselves what it might be, what it has been, perhaps, and ought to be again. The rooms are airy and cheerful, the walls tastefully papered, and the windows all commanding delicious prospects. That apartment, especially, with the window opening to the ground, it is easy to imagine furnished, not only with chairs and tables, but with that pleasant litter of books and work, and all kinds of graceful knick-knacks, which constitute the real appurtenances of a home. Pictures deck the walls, birds in cages hang in the windows, flowers in vases and glasses and jars are placed in all parts of the room; a spaniel is stretched lazily in the sun; the papa luxuriates in his easy-chair, and reads the newspaper; the mother and daughters are seated, one by the window, at work, another at her drawing table, and a third in her favourite shady corner, reading and thinking over her own especial poet, her head leaning on her hand, and her dark tresses falling on the page—a pretty picture of a student!

Alas! we awake from our reverie,—the scene vanishes, and only the desolation of the empty house remains,—doubly desolate now, for the transitory delights with which our imagination invested it. Truly, a house such as this, charming, yet lacking the crowning charm of tenants, is a forlorn and aggravating object to look at, or think about. We almost pity it for its neglected and deserted condition, and we gaze sadly on it, as we might on a nest forsaken by the birds, or a shrine bereft of all that is holy and beautiful.

Nevertheless, a despoiled shrine is less pitiable than a profaned one; and even the dreary vacancy of bare walls is infinitely preferable to the dismal and hopeless misery of a house, which, though occupied and furnished, and replete with comforts and conveniences, is yet no home to one of the human beings who dwell therein.

We have all, some time in our lives, beheld specimens of various kinds of these abodes. One house is always untidy and dirty; the disorder is in fact so complete, that only to behold it plunges people's brains into a temporary chaos. On the other hand, there is another mansion which is kept by its notable mistress so scrupulously clean, so mathematically neat and well arranged, that the unhappy inmates dare scarcely stand, or sit, or move, for fear of doing mischief; in dirty weather, a keen espionage is kept on the boots of all visitors, and mats are significantly placed at short intervals along the lobbies and staircases. It appears necessary, in fact, before entering into the glories of the drawing-room with its Wilton carpet and satin damask hangings, to go through the same ceremony practised by true believers previous to passing the threshold of their mosques. This is the house which, except on gala days, is kept in a deshabille, ugly and unbecoming as the loose wrapping gown worn by its mistress when she is dusting her china ornaments. The chairs and sofas wear brown holland pinafores; the looking-glasses and picture-frames are closely veiled in yellow leno, the roses and lilies of the carpet are smothered under green balse, and sheets of muslin envelope the silken curtains. Woe betide the little children if they dare venture within this charmed apartment; luckless wights are they if their mamma should behold them poking about the furniture with their tiny fingers, rolling on the sofas, touching the ornaments, or dancing to their images in the pier glasses! The children, and even the husband, sometimes, are secondary considerations to the furniture. The master of the house, when he comes home from business, finds no "refuge, still and bright," from the cares and annoyances of the day, in his wife's smiles, and his children's merry prattle. The latter are confined to the nursery, because they always make "such a mess" in the parlour, pull about the chairs and the little tables, and create a disturbance. The lady herself can find no subject for conversation with her wearied husband, except the fruitless one of her house and servants.—She tells him how the rosewood sofa-table has three scratches upon it, and the left-hand window-curtain in the back drawing-room has evidently had a glass of wine spilt over it; she confides to him her suspicions of the culprit, she entreats him to puzzle himself as to whether it could be any one else. Then follows a chapter of grievances about her servants. Sarah was half inclined to be insolent, when desired to remove the print of the baker's dog's paws from the door-step; and Jane had broken one of her handsomest dessert-plates. He is requested to sympathise, and if he wishes for peace and quietness he must, although his mind is already bewildered with business vexations, and he would fain be left to his book and his arm-chair,—his only companionship—his nearest approach to home!

We might multiply these disagreeable instances of miserable households, to infinity, save that we have other matters to discourse of, before finally leaving the subject, and already our paper extends apace. But its writer may be pardoned if he was garrulous. Home is always an engrossing theme to an Englishman,—how much more so when he is old, and all his life's bliss is concentrated in that one word!

Truly, one of earth's most gladdening and exhilarating spectacles is that of a happy home, sunshined, so to say, by bright faces with kind hearts looking forth from the eyes, and made musical with cheerful voices and silver laughter. After leaving such a dwelling, we feel our inmost souls pervaded with the serene contentment that seems to hang about its very walls;—we think better of human nature, and are at peace with the world! But alas! there is another side to the picture, as melancholy as this is joyous. There are many hearths, happy as these once, which are desolate now: hearths where misfortune has been and scattered the members of the flock, sending them to wander in various parts of the universe, separate, estranged, and homeless, till they shall all be reunited in another—an eternal home! Saddest of all to think of, are the ruined homes into which death has come and borne away those who blessed and beautified them. These are, indeed, the most hopelessly dreary of all. While our loved ones live, there can be no complete desolation for us:—the world which contains them must always be beautiful. Not till they leave us does the earth become utterly dark. It is when all our life's sunshine has departed that the night comes!

A short time ago, while wandering about one of the pleasantest London suburbs, we bethought ourselves of an old acquaintance who lived thereabouts, of whom we had lost sight for some time; but of whose pleasant cottage home, with its books and birds inside, and its flowery domain without, we retained a very vivid recollection. But it was in vain that we sought for the pretty cottage and its well-tended garden. All had vanished, and it was with a keen pang of regret that we at length discovered the site where it had once stood, all built over by that innovating giant, the railway. The poor little dwelling and its garden! their fate was dismal enough; and for the inmates of the cottage, the cultivators of the garden—where were they? But the story must be told from the commencement.

It was years ago when we first became acquainted with Lieutenant Heathcote, an old half-pay officer who resided with his young granddaughter in the aforesaid tiny cottage. It was a very humble place, for they were poor; but it was extremely pretty, and there were many comforts, even elegancies, to be found in the small rooms. The old gentleman delighted in cultivating the garden; the window of the sitting-room opened on it, and beneath this window, grew the choicest roses and pinks, so that the atmosphere of the apartment was in summer laden with their fragrance. The furniture was poor enough. Mrs. — of — Square would have said with a genteel sneer, that "all the room contained was not worth five sovereigns." To her—no! but to the simple hearted inmates of the cottage, every chair and table was dear from long association, and they would not have exchanged them for all the grandeur of Mrs. —'s drawing-room suite, albeit her chairs were of inlaid rosewood, and cost six guineas a-piece.

If you went into that little humbly-furnished parlour about four o'clock on a summer's afternoon, you would find Lieutenant Heathcote seated in his easy-chair, (wheeled by careful hands to the precise angle of the window that he liked,) his spectacles on, and the broad sheet of the newspaper spread before him. Occasionally he puts down the newspaper for awhile, and then his eyes rove restlessly about the room, till at length they light on the figure of his unconscious granddaughter. Once there, they stay a good while, and when they turn to the newspaper again, there is a serene light in them, as though what they had seen had blessed them.

Yet an ordinary gazer would have found little or nothing attractive in the appearance of Rose Heathcote, for she was but a homely, innocent-looking girl, such as we meet with every day of our lives. Her eyes were neither "darkly blue," nor "densely black,"—her tresses neither golden, nor redundant. She had, to be sure, a sufficient quantity of dark brown hair, which was very soft and pleasant to touch, her grandfather thought, when he placed his hand caressingly on her head, as he loved to do: and this hair was always prettily arranged—braided over her forehead in front, and twisted into a thick knot behind,—a fashion which certainly showed to advantage the graceful form of her head, the solitary beauty, speaking critically, which the young girl possessed. However, Lieutenant Heathcote thought his little Rose the prettiest girl in the world. Eyes that look with love, lend beauty to what they gaze on. And no one who knew Rose as she was in her home, could fail to love her.

She was always up with the lark, and busied in various employments till her grandfather came down to breakfast. Then she poured out the tea, cut the bread-and-butter, or made the toast, talking and laughing the while, in the spontaneous gaiety of her heart. To eke out their little income, she had pupils, who came to her every morning, and whom she taught all she knew, with a patient earnest zeal that amply compensated for her deficiency in the showy accomplishments of the day. So, after breakfast, the room was put in order, the flowers were watered, the birds were tended, grandpapa was made comfortable in his little study, and then the school-books, the slates, and copy-books were placed in readiness for the little girls:—and then they came, and the weary business began, of English history, geography, arithmetic, and French verbs. The children were not very clever—sometimes, indeed, they were absolutely stupid, and obstinate, moreover: they must have tried her patience very often; but a harsh rebuke never issued from her lips: it was a species of selfishness in her not to chide them, for if she did so, though ever so mildly, the remembrance of it pained her gentle heart all day, and she was not quite happy until the little one was kissed and forgiven again.

The children loved her very much, and her pupils gradually increased in number. Dazzling visions danced before her eyes, visions of wealth resulting from her labours;—yes, wealth! for, poor innocent, the four or five golden sovereigns she had already put by, her first earnings, multiplied themselves wonderfully in her sanguine dreams. She had magnificent schemes floating in her little brain of luxuries to be obtained with this money,—luxuries for her grandfather; a new easy-chair, cushioned sumptuously, and a new pair of spectacles, gold mounted, and placed in a case of her own embroidery. Thoughts of possible purchases for her own peculiar enjoyment sometimes intruded. There was a beautiful geranium she would like, and a new cage for her bird,—a new bonnet, even, for herself; for Rose was not free from a little spice of womanly vanity,—which is excusable, nay, loveable, because it is so womanly,—and she was quite susceptible of the pleasure most young girls feel in seeing themselves prettily dressed.

That these dreams might be realized, Rose worked hard. She sat up late at night, arranging the exercises and lessons of her pupils, and rose early in the morning, in order that none of her household duties should be neglected. And in the course of time, this unceasing exertion began to injure her health, for she was not strong, although, hitherto, she had been but little prone to ailments. One morning she arose languid, feverish, and weak; she was compelled to give herself a holiday, and all day she lay on the sofa in the sitting-room, in a kind of dreamy yet restless languor she had never felt before. Her grandfather sat beside her, watching and tending her with all the care of a mother, reading aloud from her favourite books, ransacking his memory for anecdotes to amuse her, and smiling cheerfully when she raised her heavy eyes to his. But when she fell into a fitful doze, the old man's countenance changed; an indefinable look of agony and doubt came over his features; and involuntarily, as it seemed, he clasped his hands, while his lips moved as if in prayer. He was terrified by this strange illness; for the first time, the idea occurred to him that his darling might be taken away from him. The young sometimes left the world before the old, unnatural as it seemed; what if she should die? We always magnify peril when it comes near our beloved, and the old man gradually worked himself into a frenzy of anxiety respecting his child. The next day she was not better—a doctor was sent for, who prescribed rest and change of air if possible, assuring Lieutenant Heathcote that it was no serious disorder—she had overworked herself, that was all.

It was the summer time, and some of Rose's pupils were about to proceed to the sea-side. Hearing of their dear Miss Heathcote's illness, they came to invite her to go with them, and the grandfather eagerly and joyfully accepted the offer for her, although she demurred a little. She did not like to leave him alone; she could not be happy, she said, knowing he would be dull and lonely without her; but her objections were overruled, and she went with her friends, the Wilsons.

It was pleasant to see the old man when he received her daily epistles. How daintily he broke the envelope, so as not to injure the little seal, and how fondly he regarded the delicate handwriting. The letters brought happier tidings every day; she was better, she was much better, she was well, she was stronger and rosier than ever, and enjoying herself much. Those letters—long, beautiful letters they were—afforded the old man his chief pleasure now. His home was very desolate while she was away; the house looked changed, the birds sang less joyously, and the flowers were not so fragrant. Every morning he attended to her pets, himself, and then he wandered about the rooms, taking up her books, her papers, and her various little possessions, and examining the contents of her work-basket with childish curiosity. In the twilight he would lean back in his chair, and try to fancy she was in the room with him. Among the shadows, it was easy to imagine her figure, sitting as she used to sit, with drooped head and clasped hands, thinking. At these times, her letter received that morning, was taken from his bosom and kissed, and then the simple, loving old man would go to bed and dream of his grandchild.

At length she came home. She rushed into her grandfather's arms with a strange eagerness: it was as if she sought there a refuge from peril; as if she fled to him for succour and comfort in some deep trouble. Poor Rose! she wept so long and so passionately; it could scarce have been all for joy.

"Darling! you are not sorry to come home, are you?"

"Oh no! so glad, so very, very glad!" and then she sobbed again, so convulsively, that the old man grew alarmed, and as he tried to soothe her into calmness, he gazed distrustfully in her face. Alas! there was a look of deep suffering on her pale features that he had never seen there before; there was an expression of hopeless woe in her eyes, which it wrung his loving heart to behold.

"Rose!" he cried, in anguish, "what has happened? you are changed!"

She kissed him tenderly, and strove to satisfy him by saying, that it was only the excitement of her return home that made her weep; she would be better the next morning, she said. But she was not better then. From the day of her return she faded away visibly. It was evident, and he soon saw it, that some grief had come to her, which her already weakened frame was unable to bear. He remembered, only too well, that her mother had died of consumption, and when he saw her gradually grow weaker day by day, the hectic on her cheek deepen, and her hands become thin till they were almost transparent, all hope died in his heart, and he could only pray that heaven would teach him resignation, or take him too, when she went.

For a little while, Rose attempted to resume her teaching, but she was soon compelled to give up. Only, till the last she fitted about the cottage, performing her household duties as she had ever done, and being as she had ever been, the presiding spirit of the home that was so dear to her grandfather. In the winter evenings, too, they sat together, she in her olden seat at his feet, looking into the fire, and listening to the howling wind without, neither speaking, except at rare intervals, and then in a low and dreamy tone that harmonized with the time. One evening they had sat thus for a long time, the old man clasping her hands, while her head rested on his knee. The fire burnt low and gave scarcely any light; the night was stormy, and the wind blew a hurricane. At every blast he felt her tremble.

"God help those at sea," he cried, with a sudden impulse.

"Amen, Amen!" said Rose, solemnly, and though she started and shivered when he spoke, she kissed his hands afterwards, almost as if in gratitude.

There was a long pause; then she lifted her head, and said in a very low voice:—"Remember, dear grandpapa, if at any time, by-and-by, you should feel inclined to be angry, vexed, with—any one—because of me; you are to forgive them, for my sake: for my sake, my own grandpapa.—Promise!"

He did so, and she wound her arms lovingly round his neck, and kissed his brows, as of old she had done every night before retiring to rest. And then her head sunk on his shoulder, and she wept.—In those tears how much was expressed that could find no other utterance!—the lingering regret to die that the young must ever feel, even when life is most desolate; the tender gratitude for the deep love her grandfather had ever borne her; sorrow for him, and for herself! And he, silent and tearless as he sat, understood it all, and blessed her in his heart.

The next day she died quietly, lying on her little bed, with her pale hands meekly folded on her breast; for her last breath exhaled in prayer for her grandfather—and one other. It happened that the Wilsons and some other acquaintances came in the evening to inquire how she was. For sole reply, Lieutenant Heathcote, whose tearless eyes and rigid lips half frightened them, led them where she lay. They retired, weeping, subdued and sad, and as they were leaving the cottage, he heard Mrs. Wilson say to her friend, while she dried her eyes:—"Poor girl, poor girl! She was very amiable; we all liked her exceedingly. I am afraid though, on one occasion, I was rather harsh to her, and, poor child, she seemed to take it a good deal to heart. But the fact was, that our Edward, I half fancied,"—there followed a whispering, and then, in a louder tone—"but his father, thinking with me, sent him off to sea, and there was an end of the matter."

An end of the matter! Alas! think of the bereaved old man, wandering about his desolate abode, home to him no longer; with the sad wistful look on his face of one who continually seeks something that is not there. The cottage, too, was very different now to what it had been; the home that was so beautiful was gone with her. He set her little bird at liberty the day she died; he could not bear to hear it singing, joyously as when she had been there to listen. But for this, the parlour always remained in the same state it was in on that last evening. The empty cage in the window, a bunch of withered flowers on a chair where they had fallen from her bosom, and the book she had been reading, open at the very page she had left off. Every morning the old man stole into the room to gaze around on these mute memorials of his lost darling. This was the only solace of his life now, and we may imagine what it cost him to leave it. But when they came and told him he must give up possession of his cottage, that it was to be razed to the ground shortly, he only remonstrated feebly, and finally submitted. He was old, and he hoped to die soon, but death does not always come to those longing for it. He may be living yet, for aught we know; but he has never been heard of in his old neighbourhood for years, and we may hope that he is happier, that he has at length gone home to her.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF JOHN BRITTON.

"I do love these ancient ruins;
We never tread upon them, but we set
Our foot upon some reverend history;
And, questionless, here, in this open court,
(Which now lies naked to the injuries
Of stormy weather,) some men lie interred,
Who loved the church so well, and gave so largely to it,
They thought it should have canopied their bones
Till doomsday. But all things have their end:
Churches and cities, which have diseases like to men, Must have like death which we have."

WEBSTER. Duchess of Malfy.

We are pleased to meet with this noble tribute, paid by the old dramatist to departed greatness, in any work dedicated to topography or archæology; and having to make a few remarks on the subject of topographical science, and on the career of one who has devoted a long and laborious life to the illustration of English antiquities, our readers will not think it ill-chosen, as a motto for our paper.

The study of English topography and antiquities has so many interesting bearings, that we cannot be surprised at its having found some zealous and able devotees. Regarded merely in its connexion with historical investigation, the science of archæology is entitled to hold a high place in our esteem. To the student of British history, there is assuredly no occupation more delightful than that of visiting the scenes of remarkable events, and examining the mouldering relics of ancient days,—battle-fields, cathedrals, castles, and monastic ruins; comparing the architectural remains of different ages, and, by the aid of previously-acquired knowledge, and the habit of investigation and research, forming or endeavouring to form a judgment on the degree of artistic skill, or social refinement, to which a particular period may have attained. The study of topography, or archæology, has also this advantage, that it makes every county, nay, almost every market town in old England, an object of interest; affords a plea for excellent excursions, by rail or road, and induces a healthy habit of taking periodical journeys for change of air and scene, which, having the merit of being undertaken for a purpose, in an earnest spirit, and with congenial companions, are free from the insipidity of some so-called pleasure trips; whilst they minister to the health of the mind and body, by leading to long walks and vigorous rambles, enlivened by entertaining disquisitions, and the constant flow of friendly discussion.

Among those who have done much—more, in fact, than is generally believed or admitted—towards the diffusion of a general taste for the study and investigation of English antiquities, (and for their careful preservation also,) we may unhesitatingly distinguish the literary veteran, John Britton, a portion of whose autobiography is now before us,¹ and whose life and labours will form the subject of the present paper. At a period when only a few individuals, and those laborious and plodding antiquarians, with a sufficiency of learning, but with little taste, were engaged in such pursuits, the class of topographical works written or projected by Mr. Britton, being rendered as attractive as possible in character and appearance, and addressed to a wide range of readers, had a material influence in forming the public taste, and in popularising antiquarian science. The impetus which has since been given to these studies, and the powerful combinations which have been formed for their advancement, have thrown the efforts of the zealous topographers whom John Britton may be said to represent somewhat in the shade; but we ought not to forget that in their generation they were most useful men, and, according to their means and opportunities, laboured most successfully.

It will now be necessary for us to state some of the circumstances connected with the publication of Mr. Britton's autobiography. It appears that a few years since a number of friends who had long appreciated his usefulness and admired his character determined to present him with some testimonial of their esteem. A subscription was set on foot, and a considerable sum of money raised. Mr. Britton was consulted as to the application of the fund; and he then intimated that the most agreeable testimonial which could be presented to him, would be the publication of a narrative of his own life, which he himself engaged to write. To quote the words of his prospectus: "Instead of applying the money thus collected to purchase a piece of plate, or any fanciful but comparatively useless article, he considered that it would be more consonant to his pursuits in life, and to that occupation whereby he has attained his present respectability and competency, to produce a volume which would at once tell its own story, and explain the extent and characteristics of the numerous literary works he had projected and executed, whilst it might likewise serve as an incentive and exemplar to future aspirants for similar distinction." The work is as yet incomplete; though for the last four years, Mr. Britton, (who has now passed his seventy-ninth year,) has laboured upon it incessantly, and made all the efforts of which his declining strength was capable to bring it to a completion. Having been unable to accomplish his wish within the time he had intended, and finding infirmities stealing over him which required a respite and relaxation from literary toil, he has been induced to publish a portion of the work, that he might be left more at leisure to complete the remainder.

Our readers may not be displeased with a brief sketch of the disposition and habits of the literary veteran; and in the opening pages of the autobiography he thus introduces himself: "On the 31st day of December, 1846, with the thermometer at 22°, and in the 76th year of my age, I commence writing a work which is intended to embrace a faithful and circumstantial memoir of my own public life and literary works. As that life has been protracted beyond the period scripturally ascribed to man,—much longer, in fact, than that of any other member of my family,—and certainly exceeding the reasonable calculation which a Life Assurance Company would have assigned to it at any given time within the last fifty years, it may afford amusement to the student of longevity to be made acquainted with the constitutional peculiarities, as well as the vicissitudes of sickness and health, which I have encountered from infancy to old age. These will be narrated in the course of the present narrative. . . . It may be necessary, however, to premise that I am not, and never was, of a gloomy, morbid temperament; but, on the contrary, when in a fair state of health, I am, and always have been, sanguine, cheerful, hopeful, and confident. I have never sunk under ennui or despair; but, on the contrary, have looked forward and around for relief from present ailments and difficulties, as well as for the means of guarding against others." This happy temperament has carried Mr. Britton triumphantly through many troubles, and enabled him to surmount difficulties and obstacles of a most formidable character. But we will not anticipate his narrative.

He was born at Kington, a small village in Wiltshire, on the 7th of July, 1771; "being the first son, and fourth child, of parents who had been settled in their own copyhold premises about eight years." His father's occupations were those of baker, maltster, shop-keeper, and small farmer; and up to a certain period he was prosperous and successful in these various pursuits. But it was to his wife that he was mainly indebted for his success. Her active mind and lively disposition formed a strong contrast to his dulness and want of animation: she was "warm-hearted, animated, sanguine, anxious, and passionate," whilst he was "cold, saturnine, reserved, and phlegmatic." When, at length, the mother's time and attention became entirely occupied by an increasing family, the management of the business devolved on her husband; and "the consequences," observes the son, "were natural and inevitable. Customers contracted debts, and never paid them; the miller sent in bad flour, which made bad bread; rivals in trade secured the customers who were in debt; and ruin—complete and distressing ruin—was the result. My dear mother died broken-hearted; my sister Mary, at the age of about sixteen, was left to hold possession of the house, with a little furniture, and to take charge of two young brothers, aged about six, and eight."

The picture of Kington, during Mr. Britton's boyhood, may serve to amuse the reader, and is not without its value as a faithful sketch of the rural life and manners of the period. "In part of my boyish days," he writes, "Kington had no resident 'squire, clergyman, or person above the rank of farmer, or village tradesman. There were ten agriculturists who kept horses, cows, and sheep, and about the same number of tradesmen, or 'dealers and chapmen;' but I do not think there was a newspaper or magazine purchased by one of the inhabitants before the year 1780, when the London riots were talked about, and wondered at. Five or six years afterwards, 'The Lady's Magazine' was taken in by one of the farmer's daughters, and lent by her to my sister Elizabeth, who was fond of reading. One of the Bath papers was afterwards introduced to the village, and created an epoch,—food for the gossip of the whole village. Farmer Robbins, our opposite neighbour, and Thomas, alias Tommy Collard, an old bachelor, both of whom seemed to live upon tittle-tattle, were the bearers and special messengers of all such news as they could comprehend and talk about through the whole extent of Kington; retailing it by pieces and scraps at the carpenter's, the tailor's, and the blacksmith's shops. At each of these houses they would devote about an hour to social converse, or rather, to colloquy; for the tradesmen, if employed on work, continued their occupation, and rarely interrupted the talkers with anything beyond,—'Well, well!'—'Indeed!'—'Is it true?'—'Strange!'—'What! in foreign parts?'—'That Lunnon is a mortal queer place.'—'Well, I shall never see it, nor any of the papishes.' Roman Catholics, papists, and devils, were synonymous at Kington, and in many other country villages. I often accompanied my old news-friends in their daily rounds, and consequently listened with intense curiosity to their narratives. Mr. Robbins was aged, occupied a small dairy farm, which required but a very small portion of his time; and Mr. Collard lived upon a small annuity of about 30*l.*, and was called Gentleman."

In his childhood and youth Mr. Britton tells us, that he was "ever active, inquisitive, emulous, ambitious, and sensitive, whether in play, at school, or at work;" but it was his misfortune that he found no one to direct those natural tendencies "in a right and laudable course." "It is true," he says, "I was placed under one schoolmistress, and, with some intervals, under four successive masters, all of whom were wholly unfitted for the arduous and important task of instructing their youthful pupils in the principles, or elements, of scholastic, and what may be called more useful knowledge. The masters were completely ignorant of science, of literature, and of manners; and, consequently, could not impart either to their pupils." The first of these pedagogues was named Moseley—a Baptist minister, whose spiritual performances, which took place in a sort of shed, dignified by the name of a chapel, were regularly attended by his scholars; but the worldly instruction received from this man was very trifling, and the only personal trait of which his pupil retained any recollection, was his powdered head, "with large formal curls over his ears, and mane-like, close-cropt hair around the neck." His next instructor was a Mr. Sparrow, who was "very unlike the Baptist; for he could write a good hand, knew the common rules of arithmetic, and could measure and calculate the acreage of a piece of land. He could also engrave cyphers and crests on silver spoons, and he even painted a White Horse, and a White Swan, for certain sign-boards." With a schoolmaster possessed of these extraordinary qualifications, he made rapid progress; but having remained with him as a boarder two years, he was summoned home, and was kept in idleness for the next twelvemonth.

He was then placed with a Mr. Stratton, "a dull, plodding, illiterate man," whose wife, however, was a clergyman's daughter, "and of manners and attainments superior to the station in which marriage had placed her." He remained here a year, and he does not omit to inform us that his constant playmate was his schoolmaster's daughter, for whom he was afterwards destined to entertain a tender passion, which appears to have been suddenly kindled, and easily extinguished. The octogenarian⁽¹⁾ thus describes this early love passage, and the young lady's subsequent career. "The Strattons," he says, "removed to Bath, where they established a school, and where the daughter displayed some qualifications for writing verses. After I had served an apprenticeship in London, I visited Bath, where I renewed my acquaintance with them, became fascinated with the writings, conversation, and person of the young poetess, and, after some months' correspondence, offered to make her my wife. Prudently and candidly she declined the overture, but we continued friends and correspondents till her decease, (unmarried) but a short time since. For many years she belonged to the Salisbury dramatic corps, and enacted successfully most of the heroines of tragedy and comedy. Her letters from several towns, describing the adventures of herself and her 'vagabond' companions, as players are often uncharitably termed, are very curious and interesting."

The last school to which he was sent, was that of his old tutor, Mr. Sparrow, who had removed to the neighbouring town of Chippenham, and opened a day-school there. Although he had possessed but few advantages, and had been generally consigned to the care of illiterate men, his school-time was a happy period. In spite of the ignorance and perverseness of the pedagogues, to whose care he had been generally committed, "School," he says, "was always delightful to me, and its succession of tasks and duties was easily and rapidly performed. The smell of new paper, a new copy-book, and any other novelties, were always exhilarating. I do not remember to have seen a dictionary before I visited London, in my seventeenth year. Geography, history, and books of instructive amusement, were unknown in that part of the country; nor did I ever hear of such periodicals as newspapers or magazines before I was fourteen."

At the age of thirteen he left school, and was required by his mother to assist in making bread, and in attending to the farm. He was now compelled to rise early—on baking mornings at about four o'clock—"and materially contribute towards converting a bag of flour into good and unadulterated bread; some of which he afterwards carried, on horseback, to villages and farm-houses."

We pass over all the other reminiscences of his village life, and proceed to detail the circumstances which led to his leaving Kington. His mother had a brother in London, named Samuel Hillier, moving in rather a genteel sphere of life, and holding a responsible and "respectable situation in the Chancery Office." This gentleman was in the habit of passing his Long Vacation in Wiltshire or Gloucestershire, and his rustic nephew was often invited to "make one of his party," during his stay in the country. The boy was naturally struck with the superiority of London manners; he contrasted the clownish deportment of his village associates with the refinement of his London relatives, and eagerly panted for an introduction to the great metropolis. Until he reached the age of sixteen, he visited his relatives as an equal; but after that period he was expected to serve them in a menial capacity, and he found his uncle (who, like all his mother's relations, was very passionate) a harsh and strict task-master. At length, at the close of one Long Vacation, it was decided that he should accompany Mr. Hillier to London; and on the 25th October, 1787, he took leave of his native village, "receiving, on his departure, two small tokens of remembrance from his mother,—a crown piece, and a pair of silver knee-buckles."

On his arrival in London, his uncle immediately apprenticed him for six years to Mr. Mendham, of the Jerusalem Tavern, Clerkenwell-green. He now entered on the most dreary and cheerless portion of his life. Engaged in a melancholy and monotonous routine, with nothing to interest him, or to call forth any powers of thought, his position was truly deplorable. He laboured all day in a dark cellar—a damp, gloomy, London cavern—constantly occupied in bottling and corking wine. Accustomed to the fresh air of the country, his health soon became impaired, and, as may be readily imagined, he was very wretched indeed. One solitary half-hour in the morning, between seven and eight o'clock, he daily stole out of his prison-house, to look at the sky, breathe a little fresh air, and to visit two bookstalls in the neighbourhood. In this way, and by reading at occasional intervals, "not of leisure, but of time abstracted from systematic duties" (and which he was compelled to make up for by extra toil), he was enabled, during his "term of legal English slavery," to pick up some miscellaneous information, and to run through a variety of books on science, theology, and general literature.

Towards the end of his apprenticeship, Mr. Britton became acquainted with a person named Essex, who "obtained a very respectable livelihood by painting the figures on watch-faces," and who was fond of reading and rational conversation. Through Mr. Essex, he was introduced to two gentlemen then engaged in the profession of literature—the Rev. Dr. Trusler, and the Rev. Dr. Towers—and he at the same time formed an intimacy with Mr. Brayley, with whom he was afterwards closely associated in many of his literary undertakings. The two learned doctors were naturally regarded by the young tyro (as yet uninitiated in literary pursuits) with the deepest reverence; though it must be admitted they were not very exalted members of the craft. Trusler is best known as the author of "Hogarth moralized." At that time he lived in Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell. "He had studied and practised physic," says Mr. Britton, "for some time; then took orders, and occasionally officiated as a curate." This divine adopted the notable expedient of printing sermons in type resembling manuscript. The speculation was highly successful; but it is said that the Bishop of London remonstrated with him on the impropriety of the scheme, as affording encouragement to clerical indolence; whereupon the doctor prudently replied "that he gained 150*l.* a-year by his publication, but, if his lordship would give him a living of that value, his script types should no longer be put in requisition." Dr. Joseph Towers was a voluminous compiler of the same class, and at one time kept a bookseller's shop in Fore-street.

At length Mr. Britton was released from his galling servitude in the wine-cellar, and, to adopt the motto at the head of one of the chapters in his autobiography,—

"Never did captive with a freer heart Cast off his chains of bondage."

But the period between his emancipation and his adoption of literature as a profession, involved, he tells us, seven years of vicissitudes, privations, and hardships. "In very poor and obscure lodgings," to quote his own words, "at eighteen-pence per week, I indulged in study, and often read in bed during the winter evenings, because I could not afford a fire. When my finances allowed, I frequented free-and-easy, odd fellows', and spouting clubs; but my expenses never exceeded sixpence a-night at any of these associations of smokers, drinkers, and convivialists." One all-absorbing subject, however, engaged his attention on the expiration of his apprenticeship. In defiance of prudence, and following the dictates of a warm imagination, which pictured a fairy future, he had fallen head over ears in love. The object of his passion was a young lady's-maid from Devonshire, who had been in attendance on the wife of his late master, Mr. Mendham, junior. During the last two years of his apprenticeship, he had made love very earnestly and sincerely to this young woman; but poor Mr. Britton soon found, and acutely felt, that the course of his passion was not destined to run smooth. The Mendhams interfered, and, considering the attachment a species of infatuation, gave it a sudden check by sending the fair lady's-maid back to Devonshire. Mr. Britton informs us that he was "too deeply smitten, and too intensely enthralled, to listen to or heed the influence of reason." He urged his suit, and "explained the misery he endured;" in frequent letters to the absent fair one, to which she rather coldly responded by entreating him "to forego all hopes of marriage." However, as soon as he could obtain his liberty, he formed the project of walking into Wiltshire, remaining a few months with his relatives there, and thence proceeding on foot to Plympton, a distance of 216 miles from London, where "his Betsy" lived. Sustained by the warmth of his passion, he bravely accomplished this design, but was doomed, alas! to a bitter disappointment. He found "his fair, but faithless Dulcinea, sought an interview, and was soon convinced that he was wrong and foolish in making such a tour." The lady altogether failed to appreciate his romantic passion; the Devonshire walk did not soften her heart; and poor Mr. Britton was plunged into the extremity of despair. He returned to his inn, he tells us, "disconsolate and almost deranged;" his hopes were literally blighted; "there was no cheering gleam in the future;" and he thought of consumption and early death. "In this state of hopeless despair," he directed his infirm steps towards London. Sometimes he attempted to read by the wayside; but he found no consolation in the pocket companions, which, under other circumstances, might have cheered and amused him. Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," Lord Chesterfield's "Principles of Politeness," and Goldsmith's Poems, afforded no balm or relief to the wounded lover. Dreadful to relate, he more than once meditated self-murder; and, what was a more sensible thing, he "drank mummy glasses of rum and milk, his only favourite beverage, in the hope that it would banish care, and exhilarate the spirits." Believing that there may be many, even among the readers of this magazine, who, like Mr. Britton, have "loved not wisely, but too well," we have condensed for general edification these touching reminiscences of his hopeless passion; and we would more particularly draw attention to the last-mentioned mode of alleviating sorrow and soothing the pangs of blighted affection!

The love-stricken swain returned to London in a piteous plight; he was well-nigh penniless, shoeless, and shirtless, and his abject poverty had compelled him, in spite of the struggles of filial affection, to change the crown piece, and sell the silver knee-buckles, which his poor mother had given him at parting. At length he obtained employment as cellar-man at the London Tavern,—an irksome and slavish situation, and full of grievous discomforts. He was afterwards engaged as "clerk and cellar-man to a widow in Smithfield, whose cajoling and bland language flattered his youthful vanity." She called him "sir," and treated him as a confidential clerk, but kept him in a disagreeable state of suspense by making him responsible, out of his miserable wages, for every light shilling and bad guinea taken in her establishment. "During this engagement," he informs us that he "lodged with a tinman in Smithfield Bars, having a bed-room, about nine feet by seven, for which he paid 1s. 6d. per week." This tinman was a devout Huntingdonian, or follower of the strange fanatic, William Huntington, S.S.;¹ but his young lodger was anything but edified by his devotions.

Mr. Britton's next engagement was "with Mr. Simpson, an attorney, in Holborn Court, (now called South Square,) Gray's Inn; where and with whom he continued three years, at the humble wages (dignified with the name of salary) of fifteen shillings a-week." But though the remuneration was small, the employment was more congenial to his disposition than his previous occupations; and as Mr. Simpson had not much business, he found ample time for reading; although he confesses that the books which then engaged his attention were of rather a frivolous nature. "During nearly the whole of these three years," he tells us that it was his "custom to dine at an eating-house in Great Turnstile, Holborn, on very cheap and moderate fare; the cost of the meal, with beer, seldom exceeding ninepence." The parlour of this humble establishment was occasionally frequented by some remarkable characters; amongst others, by the Chevalier d'Eon, whose story is well-known, and who had then assumed female attire, after having been distinguished in the male character as a soldier and diplomatist; and Sir Charles Dinely, Bart., one of the Poor Knights of Windsor, famous for his harmless eccentricities and matrimonial mania. Whilst residing with Mr. Simpson, he also paid some professional visits to Mr. Joseph Ritson, who then practised as a special pleader, and was occasionally employed by Mr. Simpson. Mr. Britton thus describes the appearance of this learned and estimable man: "He was small in person, thin, consumptive in appearance, reserved in manners, and, at the time I knew him, had but little professional practice. Attorneys in general, though there are many laudable exceptions, have not much respect for poetry or poets, and consider that the man who devotes his time and thoughts to polite literature, can have little partiality for the dull verbiage of the Statutes at Large, or the sophisticated and delusive language too often employed in special pleading." If Mr. Ritson was no favourite of the attorneys, he amply revenged himself on them for not properly appreciating his merits by wholesale and indiscriminate vituperation. "His opinion of the attorneys," adds Mr. Britton, "is too strongly

(1) We need scarcely remind our readers that Huntington adopted these letters to signify that he was a "saved sinner;" though, in lieu of this title, blasphemously conferred upon himself, Mathews, the comedian, suggested, as Mr. Britton informs us, that the letters should be interpreted, "sad scoundrel."

expressed: 'I have found them (thus speaks Mr. Ritson, the special-pleader) not only the most ignorant and capricious, but the most insincere, unprincipled, and, in every respect, the most worthless of men.'

The death of Mr. Simpson, in 1798, threw Mr. Britton out of employment; but, "after some weeks of inquiry and suspense," he obtained an engagement with Messrs. Parker & Wix, Solicitors, of Greville Street, Hatton Garden, at a salary of 20s. a-week. In this establishment he formed the acquaintance of a young gentleman, who was professedly reading for the Bar, under the guidance of Mr. Parker; but "whose volatility of temperament and poetical mind," (though he was repeatedly advised and admonished,) "could not be induced to take an interest, or find amusement, in the dull technicalities and prolix verbiage of law-books." Like many young men of ardent imagination, similarly situated, he neglected his Blackstone and Coke upon Littleton, for private theatres and debating societies. Mr. Britton's partiality for the theatre, and the interest which he took in literature, raised him in the estimation of the warm-hearted student, and they quickly became close friends. They visited together the principal debating societies in the metropolis, where the rising spirits of the age tried their powers of oratory, and where Mr. Hughes (for that was the student's name) was a fluent and successful speaker. These pursuits might not be considered altogether useless to the future barrister; but, unfortunately, Mr. Hughes also plunged deep into private theatricals, and his time and attention were often occupied in inditing farces, and in preparing for their representation. Mr. Parker was greatly displeased, and reproved both his pupil and his associate in suitable terms; but, in the end, the former forsook the law, was appointed to an official post in the West Indies, and married a rich widow.

Although unable to take a very prominent part in their proceedings, Mr. Britton informs us that he continued to attend the various spouting clubs and debating societies with which the metropolis was then rife. His recitations were generally in the comic style, "and were often received," according to his own statement, "with vociferous and clamorous applause." He was a regular member of the "School of Eloquence," in Old Change, Cheapside, where a number of young men, "who aspired to the honours of Demosthenes and Cicero," assembled once a-week. "My old friend, Mr. R. A. Davenport," adds Mr. Britton, "who has, since that time, written a vast number of volumes on poetry, history, and biography, threatened the members of the 'School of Eloquence' with a satirical exposé of their oratorical proceedings, and gave the following lines as the motto of his Philippic:—

"Shade of Demosthenes! couldst thou but view
This ranting, blundering, language-murdering crew,
Much should I wonder if, in furious ire,
Thou didst not kick them to their sooty sire."

(1) The speakers were in the frequent habit of invoking the "Shade of Demosthenes."

Many political societies, where the characters of public men and measures were freely discussed, were also at this period in active operation, and were often frequented by Mr. Britton. Most of them had been called into existence by the outbreak of the French Revolution, and the principles of democracy were warmly and strenuously advocated by the leading members.

We must now pause. Mr. Britton has not yet carried the narrative of his life beyond this point; but having derived much amusement from the slight portion with which he has favoured his friends, we heartily wish him health and strength to complete it. He informs us, in his explanatory address, that little more than one-third of his autobiography is now presented. "That portion," he says, "reviews the period of boyhood and adolescence, and describes a desultory mode of life, with reference to debating societies, private theatres, and some public events and persons, before my final devotion to literature, in my thirtieth year. Henceforward, to the present time, all my energies have been devoted, most anxiously and industriously, to reading, writing, and the technical management of book-publishing. An extensive intercourse has thereby been created with artists, stationers, printers, booksellers, and publishers; with professional and amateur critics; with the ordinary purchasers and readers of books; and with the class, now almost extinct, of bibliomaniacs. My intercourse with these, and other public persons, will furnish abundant materials for the continuation of the First Part of the Autobiography."

Our readers will be able to judge from the foregoing extract of the course the narrative is likely to take, if Mr. Britton is able to complete it. Perhaps the most interesting portion will prove to be the relation of early struggles, trials, and difficulties which we have attempted to follow in this paper, and which now breaks off abruptly at a critical period of Mr. Britton's life. In the next section he promises to narrate his first crude attempts in literature, and the remainder will be devoted to a general account of his professional career.

Mr. Britton's works, of which a list is given in the Second Part of the Autobiography, consist almost entirely (as we need perhaps scarcely remind our readers) of industrious compilations on topographical subjects, which have the paramount merit of clearness and accuracy. Mr. T. E. Jones, who has edited this portion of the work, has thus eulogized, and we cannot say altogether extravagantly, his friend's productions. "In every page of every work," he says, "from 'the Beauties of Wiltshire,' in 1801, to 'Junius Elucidated,' in 1843, candour and explicitness prevail. An earnest desire to record 'the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth,' an enthusiastic ardour in investigation, a liberality of sentiment, an honesty in acknowledging obligations to others, and the strictest accuracy of reference,—these are qualities of which any author might be proud, and in these it may be confidently asserted, that John Britton is not surpassed by any writer."

In referring to the enumeration of Mr. Britton's topographical works, we find a large portion devoted to the history and antiquities of his native county; and it may be here remarked that the parish of Kington St. Michael, in which Mr. Britton was born, was also the birth-place of the renowned antiquary, John Aubrey. Mr. Britton's career, as a topographical writer, commenced with the Beauties of Wiltshire, of which the first volume was published in 1801. When first urged to undertake this work, he confesses that he "was but little qualified for the duties of a topographer," and that he was "hardy enough to put to sea, without either rudder, compass, or chart." Having made a pedestrian tour with Mr. Brayley, in the summer and autumn of 1800, and acquired considerable experience and information, he proceeded with more confidence to fulfil his engagement; and subsequently, in conjunction with Mr. Brayley, he wrote an account of Bedfordshire for the "Beauties of England and Wales," a work of some magnitude and popularity, commenced in 1801, and completed in 1816; and upon which it is said the publishers expended upwards of 50,000*l*. To this publication Mr. Britton afterwards contributed the history of Wiltshire, and also materially assisted in the compilation of other portions. Mr. Britton's labours in the illustration of English cathedral antiquities are worthy of especial notice, and will confer upon him a lasting reputation. Commencing with the "History and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of Salisbury," in 1814, he proceeded to describe in succession most of the other cathedral churches of England, and the series was brought to a conclusion in 1835. Many works on biography, antiquity, and the fine arts have also proceeded from Mr. Britton's pen, which bear witness to his industry, extensive information, and facility of composition.

We must not omit to state that an appendix of gossiping essays is annexed to the second part of the Autobiography; in which, we are informed that "it has been the writer's wish and earnest endeavour to show to the young author, and to other emulous readers, what may be effected by zeal and industry, with very humble talents, and without academic learning." First in order, we have some "Essays on the Characteristics of Shakspeare: with Lines on the Stratford Bust, by Henry Neele," (whose early death was a calamity to literature;) and as the latter were addressed to Mr. Britton, and are full of beauty, we will quote the commencement.

"His was the master-spirit; at his spells
The heart gave up his secrets: like the mount
Of Horeb, smitten by the prophet's rod,
Its hidden springs gush'd forth. Time, that grey rock
On whose bleak sides the fame of meaner bards
Is dash'd to ruin, was the pedestal
On which his genius rose; and, rooted there,
Stands like a mighty statue, reared so high
Above the clouds and changes of the world,
That Heaven's unshorn and unimpeded beams
Have round its awful brows a glory shed,
Immortal as their own."

In conclusion, we congratulate the subscribers to the Britton Testimonial on the mode which has been adopted to do honour to their old friend; and we trust, moreover, that before long the completion of the Autobiography will impose upon us the agreeable task of recounting the remaining incidents of Mr. Britton's useful and laborious life.

"Then faint not, Church of Scotland!

COX'S BALLADS. Scotland.

WHEN I last appeared before the readers of SHARPE, it was as a fireside traveller. It is, indeed, in that capacity that I chiefly make my excursions; nor is such travelling unpleasurable. Crazy boilers, careless drivers, unattended rails, affect it not. If it wants the stir, it at least escapes the pains,

"Of moving accidents by flood and field."

There are also no uncomfortable yearnings about home,—no wondering about the non-arrival of letters,—no uneasiness attending their arrival when they convey not all we wish, or intimate something we wish not,—no danger of being placed beyond the reach of domestic intelligence of any kind. The fireside traveller at least travels easily; nor is his journey so dull as the corporal tourist may suppose. His very tranquillity fits him to observe and enjoy the objects which present themselves to his view, and so absorbed in these he sometimes becomes, as often to be unaware that he is ceasing to become a fireside traveller, till the sensible reduction of his temperature turns his eye mechanically on his almost empty grate. Then again, after all, an inn is a poor conclusion to a tourist's day, compared with what his fireside rival may command. He must, indeed, be rarely desolate, I would hope, who "May sigh to think that he has found

His warmest welcome at an inn."

At any rate, the sedentary wanderer, whose reveries are brought to a stand by the announcement of the evening meal, and who rests from his journeyings amid frank and loving hearts, may afford to reflect without envy on his solitary brother, discussing his supper with no more genial smiles to season it, than those of the waiter, or even of the host himself.

Yet, agreeable as is this mental locomotion, the corporeal, too, is very far from despicable, and, on occasion, I am not backward to indulge in this also. An opportunity was afforded me of so doing this summer, which I readily embraced, though the occasion was melancholy. One whom I had known with deepest intimacy from the earliest dawn of memory, whose every secret thought and feeling was open to me, had experienced a grievous bereavement. To recruit his health and spirits after this dark dispensation, he resolved to ramble for a short time among localities with which he was unfamiliar, which could not possibly associate themselves with the scene or occasion of his troubles, and which, by the power of their own beauty, might disengage his contemplations from the more distressing features of what he had witnessed and endured. The spot chosen for the purpose was the Scottish Highlands, and his companion was myself, who had, indeed, never been separated from him in joy or sorrow.

Poets and fireside travellers may exclaim against locomotives and steamers amid scenes whose charms are loneliness and wildness, and the associations arising from historical, poetical, or romantic incident. Wordsworth's muse was nervous at the sight of a steamer on Windermere. I am not sure I should not sympathise with her, as indeed once I did, had I not received practical convictions which I may not gainsay. Place a poetical grumbler in the noise and smoke of Glasgow, and show him that, thanks to modern prosaic vehicles, he may rise in the fresh infancy of morning, and be lauded in the lusty maturity of day amid the hermit beauties and splendours of the Trosachs, having previously admired, and at leisure too, the waters, islands, banks, and mountains, that make up the glories of Loch Lomond and Loch Katrine: with leisure, moreover, to inspect "lovely" Loch Achray, (as Scott calls it by no poetical or other fiction,) and Loch Vennachar, and go on to Ben Ledi and Callander, or linger, if he prefer, in the haunted glades of Glenfinlas. Such a compensation may surely reconcile the most splenetic child of romance to the substitution of the paddle for the shallop-oar, or the engine-wheel for the palfrey. Neither, if I may venture to broach the paradox, do I hold steam conveyances to be anti-poetical or even unpoetical; nay, I will take courage to assert the contrary. The powers and results of science are nearer to the enchantment of fable than any thing that the world has witnessed; and if great powers and great results elevate the mind by contemplation, these contain the elements of true poetry. They want, it is true, the mellowing hues of antiquity, and as yet, so far as I know, "carent vate sacro." But those hues are extraneous and ornamental, not essential to poetry. Besides, they are imperceptibly gathering day by day. I will be bold enough to affirm that, had steamboats existed in the days of the Stuarts, they would have been a frequent and favourite image with the poets of our time. Be this as it may, by their aid we were enabled in one day to traverse the poetical region I have mentioned, to track the clear bounding Teith, overleaping rocks and crags in endless succession and variety, and freshening with its soft silvery music our path, overhung with birch and hazel, and brightened by heather, broom, and eglantine; and to repose ourselves under the shadow of Ben Ledi, in the fair town of Callander.

It was our intent, from the first, to spend our coming Sunday at Trinity College, Glenalmond; an institution with which we were well acquainted by reputation, and which has even been celebrated by an American bard; the locality of which we consequently expected to find notorious all over Scotland. Nevertheless, Black, the most recent and popular of Scotch Guide-book writers, takes no manner of notice of it; nor did we fall in with any person who could give us a notion of its "whereabout," till we were within four miles of it; few indeed had ever heard of the place. Whether the external circumstances, or the nature and extent of its destination be regarded, this is equally unaccountable. A noble building, after the style of English university colleges, and actually surpassing in extent and display many colleges at the English universities, pitched down in a lonely glen, would, it might be thought, be an object sufficiently remarkable to excite curiosity and conversation; and its purpose, the education of the clergy and laity of an influential communion in Scotland, might, we surmised, very generally have attracted attention. Indeed, we almost expected the way to Glenalmond, from the Trosachs Inn, or from Callander at the very least, to be as well ascertained as that from an English town to Oxford or Cambridge. Glenalmond itself is nothing but the valley of the river Almond; we could only therefore discover by our map the limit within which we might expect to find the College,—and this might be about twenty miles. Uncertain, therefore, what pedestrian route to choose, as not knowing how our time and distance would agree, we resolved on visiting Stirling, where we knew we could find a friend who would give us the requisite information, and whence Perth, which would certainly be within a day's walk of the College, is accessible by rail. I am particular on these matters, for the advantage of those who may be anxious to combine a visit to Glenalmond (which will amply repay one) with a tour in the Highlands. I may be pardoned here for writing a page for the guide-books, as it is a page which none will be found to contain. Let then the tourist go from Edinburgh to Stirling, visiting Linlithgow by the way. Hence let him proceed to Perth, from which the College is only ten miles, though there is no public conveyance to it. From the College he may proceed by Crieff, Comrie, St. Fillan's, Lochearn Head, to the Trosachs Inn, or from Comrie at once to Callander. The advantage of these routes over that which we took, is, that the scenery before the traveller is superior, and indeed improves with every step, while we were frequently delayed in our progress by retrospective glances, without which we should have lost more of the beauty of the scenery than we did, which, we fear, was not a little.

With a short sojourn therefore at Doune, Dunblane and Stirling, and with only a glance at the fair city of Perth, the old romantic walls of Huntingtower or Ruthven, famed in "raid" and conspiracy annals, and Methven, the bower-place of "Bessie Bell and Mary Gray," we held on our way towards our destination.

At Methven, the track to Glenalmond College leaves the high-road from Perth to Crieff. It is bold and picturesque, and the foreground altogether highland. Four miles easy walking brought us to the outskirts of the College. The course of the Almond might be traced in that of the deep and woody glen which receives its name. The bowery braes, the shelving hills, the rude and rocky eminences beyond, stood out in that clear bright softness of northern twilight, which is so inexpressible by description,—but nought beside was visible.

" 'Twas then was heard a heavy sound,
Sound, strange and fearful there to hear,
'Mongst desert hills, where, leagues around,
Dwelt but the gorcock and the deer."

We could comprehend somewhat of Sir Roland de Vaux's surprise, when, in that solitary region, we heard sounds reminding us of the evening summons sent forth from the towers of St. Mary's or Christ Church. We pressed forward, and were soon in sight of the College. Two sides of a quadrangle, 190 feet square, and the walls of a noble chapel, are complete; and the effect of this spectacle amid the surrounding scenery was yet more striking than the sound which had betokened it. We seemed like pilgrims of old, who had reached some stately but lonely monastery. The description of Wordsworth¹ occurred to us:

" A convent, even a hermit's cell,
Would break the silence of this dell;
It is not quiet, is not ease,
But something deeper far than these:
The separation that is here
Is of the grave; and of austere
And happy feelings of the dead."

The spot, therefore, was in unison with our mood. We presented our introductions, and were forthwith conducted into an ample apartment, where the boys, aided by a piano, were holding the farewell concert with which they are indulged at the end of their Term. "The stormy winds do blow" was sung with no less harmony than energy, reminding us, alike by its melody and expressive power, of

" Unâ Euræque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis, Africus—"

This was the last song but one, and that, of course, was "God save the Queen," which was heartily sung, and as heartily cheered. The boys left the room—the day, with its labours and fatigues, was over—and we resigned ourselves to our repose, and to such thoughts as the present scene wrought upon our retrospections.

The early matin chant of innumerable birds aroused us to consciousness that the Christian Sabbath had begun, and warned us to prepare for the early matin bell, which would soon summon us to the first service of the College.

But, ere I describe the order and discipline of the College day, it may be as well to give some account of the nature of the institution itself.

Trinity College, then, was begun to be erected about six years ago, and opened about three, for the education of boys, according to the doctrine and discipline of the ancient Episcopal Church in Scotland, and for training students for Holy Orders. One reason, perhaps, why the College is so little known, may be found in the ignorance prevalent, both in Scotland and England, of that communion to which it belongs. Episcopacy was formerly the established religion of Scotland, though the Presbyterians, from the time of Knox, had been a numerous and powerful body. At the Revolution, the majority of the Scotch clergy refused to break the fealty they had sworn to King James II., while the Presbyterian party were favourable to the new dynasty. William had been educated a Presbyterian; and policy, no less than prepossession, dictated the transfer of the Scottish Establishment, with its revenues, from the Episcopalian to the Presbyterian communion. The ejected bishops and clergy, after the primitive example, "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods," and many other severe enactments, which their attachment to the Stuarts provoked from the House of Hanover. Having nothing to depend on but the offerings of their own people, they were, and still are, no less primitive in their poverty than their patience. An English curacy, though not a splendid preferment, is often more lucrative than a Scotch bishopric; while many of the clergy are much worse remunerated than the generality of English mechanics. Nevertheless, the little flock has maintained vitality, and challenged respect. They have never intrigued for power, nor the restitution of honours or possessions; they have raised no faction against the Establishment; they have cast no impediments in its way; they have fomented none of its internal dissensions; but trod the quiet paths of peace, and charity, and piety. In consequence, they are regarded with the most unsuspicious and confiding good-will by their Presbyterian neighbours generally. Members of the same family often belong to the two communions, and sometimes even to their ministries, without any discomposure of domestic harmony. The wisdom and moderation of the Episcopalians have done much to soften the prejudices of their countrymen against prelacy; and, had that form of government been presented to them in Knox's time as they now behold it, his exhortations might have fallen on the popular ear with different effect.

One of the most serious evils resulting from the poverty of the Episcopalians, is, the difficulty of procuring a sufficient education for their clergy. In the larger towns, they are often supplied from England; but in the Highland districts, where the congregations themselves are miserably poor, (and such, for the most part, must the young candidate for Holy Orders expect,) the pittance of the minister is wretched indeed. Such prospects will not supply the means of education at the most economical of the English theological colleges; and, until the erection of Glenalmond College, there was nothing in Scotland suitable for the purpose; the Scotch universities affording no instruction in divinity, as received by the Episcopalians; while the purchase of a library wherewith to prosecute his studies, was to the country clergyman a thing impossible. The Scottish Episcopal Fund, set on foot in 1806, and the Scottish Episcopal Church Society, founded in 1838, aim to make the condition of the bishops and clergy better suited to their office; and to these bodies all sums intended for that purpose will be most effectively paid; but it was not till the year 1841 that education for the clergy, especially on a scale worthy the object, was projected by the Episcopalians of Scotland.

The scheme was warmly supported by their English brethren. About 36,000*l.* were raised by subscription. The Warden (the Rev. Charles Wordsworth) contributed 5,000*l.*, and, besides, has since undertaken to advance, on loan, the sum necessary for the erection of the chapel, which is to cost upwards of 5,000*l.*; and 6,000*l.* have also been lent by members of the council and other friends. Two sides of the quadrangle are completed, comprehending the lodgings of the Warden, Sub-warden, and assistant masters, complete accommodation for 130 boys, and rooms for 13 Divinity Students. The other sides are incomplete: the east side is to comprehend the large school-room, with servants' rooms above, and the hall; and the south is to be a cloister, connecting the Warden's house with the chapel. About 20,000*l.* additional will be required to pay off the loans, and complete the buildings; and, of course, a still larger sum, to secure the desirable endowments for professorships, scholarships, &c. The grounds comprise twenty acres. It will be seen, therefore, that the education contemplated is intended to be conducted on a liberal scale; and in these days, when the benefits of education are so generally recognised, it is to be hoped that an institution like this will not be suffered to languish for want of funds. One great hope of the College must rest on the Scotch nobility and gentry, who have hitherto sent their children to the English public schools, because, as yet, there has been no precisely kindred institution in Scotland. The cost of a boy's education is 70*l.* per annum, which includes washing, medical attendance, and every necessary expense,—a sum far less than that which is requisite to support him at any similar place of education in England; and forty boys, at this cost, it is calculated, will enable the institution to support itself. All the clear income of the college, when the buildings are completed, will be applied in the shape of exhibitions, and in affording increased facilities to sons of clergymen (who, at present, are generally relieved of nearly one-half of the ordinary charge), and students for Holy Orders, who are received at the very inconsiderable cost of 30*l.* per annum, for which they enjoy every educational advantage which it is possible to possess.

"It may be fairly said," most truly says the advertisement issued by the Council, in 1847, "that the accommodations of Trinity College will challenge comparison with those of any similar establishment in England; that the situation of the College . . . at the foot of the Grampians, and upon the banks of the river Almond, cannot be surpassed for healthiness, nor for the beauty and grandeur of the surrounding scenery."

I am one of those who regard knowledge, valuable and important as it is, as very far indeed from constituting the whole of education. An integral portion, an essential element, of a liberal education, it must undoubtedly be; but the mind which receives no more is informed, not educated. Education implies the training and development of all the human faculties,—of the whole spiritual, intellectual, and even corporeal, nature. Religious guidance and habits are so necessary to the first, that, without them, religious knowledge may become worse than useless—positively injurious—as giving "the knowledge of sin," and higher responsibilities, without commensurate spiritual attainments. In regard to the intellect, educational philosophers are surely too much in the habit of ignoring the imagination, as though it were a weed injurious to the growth of the reasoning powers, requiring to be subdued, or even eradicated; instead of an inherent quality of the intellect itself, needing only due restraint and direction, to aid and refresh the demonstrative faculties. I cannot lightly regard the influence of noble forms and fair proportions, whether in art or nature, on the youthful mind. I cannot believe that the same studies, pursued, on the one hand, in close alleys and squalid attics, and, on the other, beneath turret and spire, groined arch and shafted window, can leave the mind in the same condition. Nor can I believe that the love of the grand and tender in nature will unfit the understanding for severe pursuits; but rather would I hold that, under proper limitations, it would rescue the student from the danger of a cold and hollow scepticism. Hence, the union of the beautiful and solemn which this spot exhibits, perhaps beyond any other in Britain, deserves, I must think, to be taken into the account, as a very valuable constituent indeed of the education imparted in Glenalmond College. The students, whether young men or boys, cannot fail to be impressed by the majestic character of the natural and artificial objects by which they are surrounded; and if impressed at all, it must surely be for good.

But the early matin bell is calling us to prayer. We enter the temporary chapel—one of the school-rooms, neatly and appropriately fitted up till the beautiful building destined for the purpose is completed. The visitors and domestics take their places, the clock strikes eight, and immediately the boys, under the direction of the several masters, enter; then the Warden and Sub-warden. All are attired in surplices; all take their places in perfect quiet, and with every mark of deepest reverence. At this service nothing is used but the Morning Service of the English Church, which is equally that of the Scottish Episcopalians, without the Litany. The College has no organ, but the service is choral throughout, and performed with no less precision and melody than in an English cathedral. Music is a regular portion of the instruction, and every boy is taught to sing from notes, which very many of them perform very expertly and effectively. Nothing could be more orderly and reverent, and certainly the impression was most distinct that religion was the business of the place.

This service over, we proceeded to breakfast in the ample apartment which does duty as a hall till the noble design for that portion of the building is completed. On our way along the cloisters to this spacious room, we were much gratified by witnessing a pleasing custom of the College. Several boys came hastily, yet respectfully, forward, and, "with shining morning faces," (any thing, however, but "unwillingly,") bright with unaffected pleasure, presented the authorities of the College, as they passed, with choice nosegays and garlands. The custom, as we afterwards learned, originated entirely with the boys themselves, who take great delight in the observance. Each boy has a piece of garden-ground allowed him, and those who are fond of this amusement take pride in presenting to their masters the fairest produce of their little territory; while others find in native heath, harebell, broom, cglantine, and "each plant and flower—the mountain's child," materials for their tribute of respect and affection. How the custom arose is not known. Probably some boy of kind and elegant disposition originated the practice, and, as example is contagious for good as well as evil, the goodly observance seems now pretty well established at Glenalmond. The caps and hands of the masters overflowed with flowers as they entered the temporary hall. Here we found a dais and a high table, at which the Warden, officers, and guests, took their places. On ordinary days, we were informed, the Sub-warden and other assistants preside at the dinner-tables occupied by the boys, helping them to their meal, and all partaking of the same fare, the high-table on such days being only used for breakfast and tea. Grace is at every meal intoned by the Warden, or principal officer present, and a musical Amen is chanted by the boys. A like ceremony concludes the meal. All the arrangements were excellent, and the utmost order and propriety were observed.

We rambled about the College walks, admiring the verdure of the turf and the gaiety of the flowers, till the bell called us to Litany and Communion, at a quarter past eleven. The service was intoned and chanted as before. The Warden preached from Phil. iv. 4. "Rejoice in the Lord alway; and again I say, Rejoice." The Theological Students having left for the vacation, the discourse was addressed to the boys, who were to leave on the following Tuesday.

The preacher commenced by observing that many devout Christians had taken an almost opposite view to that which the text inculcated. The evil of sin in itself, the consciousness of each individual of his own transgressions, the awfulness of having offended such a being as God, the very covenant of pardon, sealed with the sufferings and blood of the Eternal Son, seemed to them to forbid rejoicing. And no doubt there were passages of Holy Scripture which did appear to countenance this view. The preacher then adduced numerous instances, especially the whole Book of Ecclesiastes, (which had furnished the first Lessons of the Daily Service during the previous week,) and in particular those parts which set forth the benefits of "the house of mourning," and our Lord's commemoration of the blessedness of them that mourn. Yet these texts were capable of reconciliation with that which was the subject of the discourse, by reference to the nature of the joy inculcated. It was to be joy "in the Lord;" joy in his love and forgiveness, and in the blessings which he had in store hereafter for his faithful people. This joy was quite consistent with the deepest sense of unworthiness and the truest contrition for sin; indeed, it entirely arose from those dispositions. Joy in the Lord was the lot of those only who abode in the Lord by faith and obedience. The preacher then brought forward many texts, especially from the Psalms, to show that the righteous, and they alone, were both permitted and commanded to rejoice; and then proceeded to apply the text more immediately to his pupils. A time of rejoicing had once more arrived to them; they were about to return to their friends and their homes, and to enjoy relaxation from severe duties; but it would wholly depend on themselves whether their rejoicing should be safe and Christian, and, indeed, such as should be genuine and blessed. They must "rejoice in the Lord;" they must remember that vacation was not idleness; even study must be, to a certain extent, pursued; but the religious dedication of each day, love and obedience to parents, kindness to brethren, sisters, and friends, unselfishness, consideration of others, must be daily cultivated, if they would have a title to the joy of the text. The following verse said, "Let your moderation be known unto all men." That word (τὸ ἐνέμεν) implied not merely "moderation," in the ordinary sense, but gentleness, kindness, courtesy, and concession. Those elegant symbols of such a disposition which the boys were so laudably accustomed to offer, (the Warden alluded to the flowers,) would be a mockery where the disposition itself was absent. The preacher then affectionately commended his scholars to the Divine blessing, and bade them farewell in terms of great pathos and earnestness. Nothing could exceed the stillness of the youthful congregation, and the attention which seemed to prevail; and, if we might judge from appearances at an age when they seldom deceive, vacation joys were not unmingled with affectionate regrets, and the return to Glenalmond would not be unaccompanied with pleasure.

The unconfirmed now left the chapel, and the service of the Holy Communion, which is solemnized here every Sunday, began. Two services for this purpose are in use in the church; the so-called "Scottish Office," (borrowed, for the most part, from the first English Liturgy of 1549), and the present "English." These offices are used at Glenalmond on alternate Sundays. This is no place to discuss their respective merits; it will be enough to observe that the Warden has herein exercised a sound discretion. He has given neither triumph nor offence to any parties, and acted in full compliance with the regulations of the Church. He has accustomed his pupils to use and reverence both services, and, whether among clergy or laity, they will feel no repugnance to share in that office which circumstances may oblige them to celebrate or participate. It was the "English Sunday" when we were present.

After the service, we inspected the chapel. The walls and roof alone at present are completed. The exterior fabric very much resembles the chapel of Merton College, Oxford, except in the omission of the half transept, and in the very high pitch of the dark, open roof, the effect of which is particularly striking, the eye completely losing itself in the height and darkness of the timbers. In the chancel, the roof is what the Germans would term a "Himmel." It is painted blue, and sprinkled with stars in gold. The interior, when complete, will doubtless be a very noble and collegiate place of Christian worship, and well worthy to form a part of that cultivation of the taste and fancy which I have ventured to pronounce essential to a liberal education.

In the heat of the day we wandered, or rather scrambled, down to the umbrageous banks of the Almond. Indescribably beautiful they are! Branching, tangling, intertwining foliage, of every kind and hue, crossed and shadowed our precipitous path. Midway between the summit of the bank and the bed of the river, is flung across the current—a suspension-bridge! But, Reader, bethink thee not of Hungerford, nor even of Menai. The structure is quite in harmony with the scene. The iron chains which support it only exhibit themselves to close inspection; a rude, but graceful curve is all that marks the transit to the general glance, and the pathway is apparently as frail as it is really secure. Proceeding below this point to the water's edge, and winding beside the stream, we came upon fantastic grottoes and caverns, with the water jetting and spouting amid rocks and boulders. The river itself rolls over a bed of irregular stones, chiming, tumbling, and leaping, as the obstacle it meets diverts or breaks its course. I was pleased to hail a token that the beauty of the scenery had not been lost upon the boys. A rude track led us to an equally rude but well-defined seat and resting-place, evidently the work of some of them, and, perhaps, on the most picturesque point which could have been selected.

Dinner was served in the hall. There was the same goodly order, the same repetition of graces as at breakfast, and even a greater rivalry in presenting flowers. The meal over, the lads formed groups, and wandered, as their fancy led, each with his favourite mates, to the garden, or the river bank, which the heat, no less than its beauty, rendered popular. We were entertained with wine and dessert by the Warden in the dining-room of his house, no unworthy common or combination-room. Afterwards the Sub-warden kindly conducted us over the building. The appointments are certainly most admirable. Each of the Theological Students, of whom there are now ten, has an apartment of his own. Of the forty-eight boys now resident, thirty-four have separate sleeping-rooms; the remaining fourteen sleep in a dormitory, but in separate "stalls," as they are not inappropriately called. These are divided from each other by a high wooden partition, and from the line of the dormitory by a lower, so that each boy is quite private at night. The dormitories and sleeping apartments are so situated and constructed, as to be capable of being all brought in an instant under the eye of the particular master to whose charge they severally belong. Every boy is provided with a looking-glass, framed in dark carved oak, and an ample chest of drawers, garnished with bronze plates and handles. In the schoolroom the boys' accommodations are more like studies than desks; they are divided by high partitions, as in the sleeping stalls, and against each partition bookshelves are erected, reaching from the top to the desk, so that each boy can take the book he wants without delay or confusion, while there is no opportunity for interrupting each other, and the open side of the study places every boy under the eye of the master. Some of the arrangements are quite peculiar and admirable. Hot air is conveyed to every part of the building in winter, while there are special contrivances for ample and free ventilation. The danger of fire in a spot so distant from extraneous aid is met by provisions for flooding in an instant every floor of the building with water.

By this time the bell was calling to Evening Prayer. At half-past four we again assembled in the temporary chapel, where the service of the Church of England was solemnized as in English cathedrals. On this occasion there was no sermon, nor public catechising, which latter, we were informed, is the general practice of the place, but the course having been lately suspended for a time, in consequence of the frequent absence of the Warden, in order to preach on behalf of the College in different congregations throughout the Church, he did not think it necessary to resume it on this, the last Sunday of the half-year. It was gratifying to learn that these appeals for the increase of the College funds, which are now being made in compliance with a Pastoral Letter, signed by all the bishops, and recommending that an offertory be appropriated to this purpose in every congregation, have been so successful that nearly 1,000*l.* have been already raised from less than sixty churches, out of one hundred and eighteen, of which the whole episcopal communion in the country consists. One incident, related in connexion with these collections, struck us as not a little characteristic of the "bonnie Scotch." In one place, instead of the usual practice of making the collection after the sermon, the "guid folks" were allowed to think over the matter during the week, and the Warden had the gratification of hearing, in the week after, that the offertory on the following Sunday, which was the produce of his Appeal, contained no less a sum than 138*l*. Perhaps our friends in the south may take advantage of this hint.

Tea, with the same observances as the other meals, was then served in the hall. Afterwards we wandered in the exquisite serenity and beauty of northern twilight till we felt repose needful. We bade a regretful good night to our new friends, grateful for what we had seen and learned; and sought a blessing on Glensalmond College. And as, with the early morn, we followed the course of the glen onward to Crieff, while the young and lusty sun, though not long on his way, was already dazzling to the eye of the pedestrian, and fatiguing us by his heat, we hoped we beheld an augury of the College, which in so early infancy had done so much to diffuse the light of truth and the warmth of charity; and took cheer in the belief that Christendom would never deny the requisite facilities for affording Glensalmond meridian development, and making it "a praise in the earth;" while my companion observed, "No secularity in nature can bring more balm to a wounded heart than the contemplation of immortal spirits in training for immortal blessedness."

PUNCH AT NAPLES.

SUNNY Italy was the birth-place of the famous little gentleman with the hook-nose, who seems to have taken a new lease of his life in the colder climate of England. Originally intended as a mere buffoon for the populace, he was soon made the medium of sly satire against abuses which there was no press to castigate and no legal power to redress. Many a pungent observation thus thrown out produced no small effect upon the public mind. Punch is a favourite of all classes, and all ages, and in all countries, for all are alike lovers of merriment and scandal. Sec! that venerable white-bearded monk—whose thoughts we might imagine to be exclusively fixed on heaven—has paused to witness his mad pranks, and to listen to his racy gossip. That oily black-bearded friar is shaking his sides at the fun, while the countenances of the crowd express the variety of their emotions, from the lively curiosity of the youngster to the gaping fatuity of the octogenarian. Blessed be the amusement which can thus withdraw all classes for a moment from the hard realities of daily drudgery into a little bye-world where care can find no entrance, and make them shake their sides with medicinal peals of laughter. And so long as he does not confound libels against the harmless with satire against the guilty—so long as he advocates the cause of the poor and oppressed—so long as he touches the humours of the time with a racy but not malicious satire—so long, in short, as he does not abuse his power, may the old gentleman prosper in his new vocation of hebdomadal censor, and flourish in the midst of us in a vigorous old age.

A MEMORIAL OF LOUIS PHILIPPE.

WHATEVER may have been the political mistakes of the late ex-King of the French, there is a large body in France who will cherish his memory with something more than respect. He displayed, even by the admission of his enemies, those domestic and social virtues, by which kings—and French kings in particular—are not often distinguished. His patronage of men of letters and artists will long be missed under the new régime. It was under his government that the French capital, distinguished before for its strange contrasts of magnificence and meanness—of splendour and filth—began to assume an air of completeness and comfort. Many a building left unfinished by Napoleon was brought to an end by Louis Philippe—many a national monument which had fallen into decay munificently restored by his care. The streets were paved; the Seine, no longer allowed to inundate the city, was confined within a range of massive quays. In short, to this ill-fated monarch was owing that spirit of improvement that has rendered the Paris of to-day so superior to that of twenty years ago. His last and recent bequest to his country, was his splendid private collection of Spanish pictures in the Louvre; and we may thus conceive the bitterness of his exile from the city which he loved so well.

Nor was his care exclusively bestowed on Paris—the provinces also shared in it, and memorials of his patriotism and love of art are to be found even at a distance where one would hardly expect to meet with them. Such are some with which we happened to fall in on a recent voyage along the shores of the Mediterranean, and of which, as they are little known, a brief notice may not be uninteresting at the present moment.

During a stay at Malta, we visited the famous church of St. John, in which are sepulchral chapels for the various branches of the now extinct Order of the knights, among which, that of France ever held a most distinguished place. In the French chapel is a very beautiful monument erected by Louis Philippe, to the memory of his son the Duke de Beaujolais, who here died of a consumption. It is a truly admirable piece of sculpture. The young prince is represented in a reclining posture, and the sculptor has thrown over his figure and countenance an expression of languor and debility which it is impossible to look upon without admiration for so exquisite a production of art, and sympathy for the sorrow which prompted its execution.

On the evening of March 25th we crossed the harbour of Marsa Muscet to the quarantine station at Fort Manoel, where lay the screw steamer Bosphorus, Captain Vinc Hall, on board of which our passage was taken to Gibraltar. This vessel then hoisted a yellow flag, the livery of the plague; and at sight of that detested ensign, I could not but congratulate myself at having lived to see the period of quarantine reduced from three mortal weeks, which I had myself accomplished in that very Lazaretto, to a period of as many days. This term was to expire at midnight, when the captain, on receiving a clean bill of health, would instantly proceed towards his destination.

As soon as we had got on board, he called me aside to communicate an unexpected piece of information. The ship's course was to Gibraltar direct, but a large party of Tunisians, who had fled from their city on account of the cholera, and had been spending some months at Malta, sick of the delays of sailing vessels, had earnestly besought him to go a few hours out of his course in order to convey them to their homes. This trifling delay, he averred, would be more than compensated by the opportunity—so rarely occurring—of paying a few hours' visit to the site of Carthage. "The very thing," I replied, "that I have long particularly desired;" and I absolutely hugged myself at so unusual a piece of good fortune.

My satisfaction, however, was somewhat damped, as the parties to be conveyed began to present themselves alongside. The vessel was most comfortable, but of moderate size, and the best of the berths, our own of course among them, had been already secured. But now a long string of boats successively appeared, laden almost to sinking with men, women, and children, and infants with their nurses, and piles of carpets and bedding, huge boxes, baskets, bags, mats, and paraphernalia of all descriptions—a mass of live and dead stock, which, huddled in a heap on deck, entirely blocked up the gangway, and made the gallant captain stare aghast at the dilemma in which he had involved himself. Perhaps a more curious company, too, were never seen. They consisted of French, Italians, and Germans, who had long settled as doctors and merchants at Tunis, and had become so acclimatés that they could hardly be distinguished from the natives themselves, whose dress and habits they had partly assumed, while their children were attended by African servants. So odd was the jumble of costumes, that we were really puzzled at first as to the sex of more than one of the party. Besides these mongrel Africans, we had on board, as deck passengers, a collection of genuine Hadjis, returning to Barbary from a pilgrimage to the tomb of their Prophet, (a distance of more than 2,000 miles from their homes, many hundreds of which must be performed at the toilsome foot-pace of the camel,) and whose ashy countenances and meagre frames, enveloped in large loose drapery, eloquently told of long months of fatigue and privation on the burning desert. These men crouched together in a circle upon the fore-castle of the ship, and avoided all intercourse with the new-comers and the rest of the passengers.

How all these people found room, is a mystery, but by close packing and the exertions of the captain they at length settled down,—shortly after midnight we left the harbour, and by daybreak Malta had diminished to a faint speck upon the verge of the horizon. The day was fortunately calm, but a slight breeze sprung up at night, and the treble of the mammas and infants in the agonies of the mal de mer, with the deep basso of their male companions, the monotonous thumping of the screw, and the pathetic quavering of a flute, with which the captain was endeavouring to drown the surrounding discords, formed a combination of sounds which effectually scared away sleep from our eyelids. Happily it was but for a night, for next morning the magnificent promontory of Cape Bon loomed in sight, and we ran along the coast in the direction of Tunis. The sea being calm, the woe-begone sufferers now crept successively on deck. Nothing could equal their delight at the thoughts of returning home, a word which awakens the same associations on the torrid shores of Africa, as among the green fields of England. We could not but sympathise with their joy; the children, their miseries forgotten, frolicked joyously about the deck, and as we opened the Bay of Tunis, and the white fort of the Goletta, the distant city, and the chapel of St. Louis, became visible,—objects as familiar to them as St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey were to ourselves,—their glee at the prospect of getting on shore was only to be equalled by that of the captain at getting so speedily rid of them.

How strange seemed all these common-places on a spot which sounds to us at home so remote, so surrounded with a halo of antiquity, as Carthage—and how difficult at the place itself to look out of them, and realize that the seat of a dead empire lay out stretched before our eyes! Yet so indeed it was. From the promontory still called Cape Carthage, which forms the western termination of the deep and noble bay, to the fort of the Goletta in its centre, we could trace with difficulty, all along the sea line, the shapeless ruins of what was formerly the great emporium of the Mediterranean, and so long the rival of imperial Rome. Could this be, we asked, the scene of our school-boy memories of Regulus, of Scipio and Hannibal, of Marius and Cato, of Dido and Æneas? The site of the city is an undulating plain, now green with corn, swept clean of the magnificent piles which once covered it so thickly; the thousand keels which thronged the harbour are also gone, and the daughter of Tyre sits as lonely upon her rock by the sea-shore, as does the progenitor of her commercial greatness. Two buildings alone stand up conspicuously on the site—the Chapel of St. Louis, and the fort of the Goletta, memorable for the siege it sustained against the Turks. Tunis is faintly seen at a distance of five miles inland, a mass of white buildings on the side of a hill; and a lofty range of mountains forms a fine termination to the magnificent, but solitary gulf.

While engaged in making out the different points of the view with the assistance of our friends the Tunisians, some boats came off from the Goletta, near which we had cast anchor among a few war-ships and merchantmen; whereupon, taking leave of our fellow-voyagers, we jumped into one of these, and in a few moments stepped upon the shores of Africa. We advanced along a ruinous quay into an equally ruinous collection of buildings, crouching at the foot of the dilapidated fort of the Goletta, sentinelled by some miserable native soldiers clad in a half-European uniform. Certain shabby cabriolets stood ready for the conveyance of passengers to Tunis; but being a party of four, and having abundance of time before us, we preferred to set forth on foot. Half an hour's walking brought us to the base of the mount upon which the Chapel of St. Louis is erected. As we slowly ascended it, the plains of Carthage gradually expanded before us; we passed between dangerous excavations and pitfalls, and saw on every side foundations and heaps of rubbish half overgrown with wild flowers; but with not a single building erect of the thousands that once crowded the space below. Never was the destruction of a great city more complete than that of Carthage. That a city twenty-three miles in circumference, numbering 700,000 people, surrounded with a triple wall, with barracks for 20,000 men, and stables for 4,000 horses and 300 elephants, could ever have stood upon the spot, seemed to us like a dream. And then the fleet of 220 war-ships, and countless merchantmen—where were they? Truly the counsel of the old Roman, "Delenda est Carthago," has been fearfully acted out. This destruction by Scipio took place 2,000 years ago; yet other splendid cities have risen again upon the site only to be obliterated. Here also Christianity took root and long flourished, to be at last extinguished by that terrible sweep of Mahomedanism which, crossing the Straits of Gibraltar, founded a Moslem kingdom in Spain, and only ceased its onward career when checked by Charles Martel on the banks of the Loire.

In undertaking the seventh and last of the crusades, Saint Louis, instead of directing his armament against the shores of Palestine, misled by a wild expectation of converting the King of Tunis, landed in July, 1270, upon the desolate shores of Carthage. His pious illusion was speedily dissipated by a message from the Tunisian monarch, "that he would come to seek him at the head of a hundred thousand men, and demand his baptism upon the field of battle." Neither the knights who had accompanied Louis, nor even the ecclesiastics, were sufficiently read in ancient history to be aware that they stood upon the grave of a mighty people—all that they knew was that they had landed at a town that was called Carthage! Encamped upon this arid and miserable spot, the fierce heats of an African midsummer, and the want of fresh provisions, soon bred among them a variety of fatal maladies which struck down the most illustrious as well as the meanest of the army. The king lost his darling son, the Duke of Nevers, who had been born during his captivity in Egypt, and while thus stricken with grief was himself shortly after seized with a dysentery which rapidly reduced him to the brink of the grave. Calling his eldest son, Philip, to receive his last instructions, he enjoined him to show himself in all things a pattern of justice, to be charitable and merciful to the poor and suffering, and to redress the wrongs of the widow and the orphan. In the same spirit he added various other counsels, all calculated to heal the divisions with which his kingdom was then distracted. As he grew hourly weaker he occupied himself in continual prayer, beseeching God, with the Psalmist, that he "might be enabled to despise the prosperity and to brave the adversities of this present evil world." Sometimes, in the wandering of delirium, he was heard to exclaim, "Jerusalem, Jerusalem!—we will go to Jerusalem."

On the 25th of August he became speechless, but still regarded those around him with his accustomed kindness. His countenance was serene, and it was evident that his departing spirit was divided between the purest earthly affections and the idea of an opening eternity. Feeling his end approach, he made signs that he should be placed, covered with a sackcloth, upon a bed of ashes; he lay thus, as if asleep, for some hours, until, suddenly opening his eyes and raising his voice, he exclaimed, "Lord, I will enter into thy house, and adore thee in thy holy tabernacle." In the evening he expired. Scarcely had he breathed his last, when his brother, Charles of Anjou, King of Sicily, whose counsels had led to this fatal enterprise, arrived at the mourning camp with a powerful reinforcement. But, broken as they were by disease, and discouraged at the loss of their leader, the crusaders were glad shortly after to conclude a peace and to return to Europe. A few days after the conclusion of the treaty, Prince Edward arrived with the Scotch and English knights; he was received with great honours, but, on hearing the conclusion of the treaty, he shut himself up in his tent, and refused to take part in any of the consultations. Shortly after, the crusading army left the fatal shores of Carthage.

No monarch was ever more tenderly beloved by his subjects than St. Louis. His love for the poor, his profound respect for the claims of misfortune, his spirit of conciliation, were virtues almost unknown in the stirring ages during which he lived. If his ardent piety was tinged with the superstition of the times, no one was more actuated by the genuine tenderness of Christian charity. The words uttered by the Pope were long in the mouths of all Europe:—"House of France, rejoice in having given to the world so great a prince. Rejoice, people of France, in having enjoyed so good a king."

We had now arrived at the gate of the octangular enclosure; on knocking at which, it was opened by an old native of France, who is maintained here for the purpose by the consul of his nation at Tunis. In the centre of the space stood the little chapel, surrounded by a garden, intersected by walks, in which wall-flowers and other familiar favourites mingled with those which flourish on the African soil. At the extremity of the avenues appeared several statues, more or less mutilated, which had been dug up from the surrounding plain; but the most surprising relic of ancient Carthage was contained in an upright box, standing against the chapel wall. This was a colossal female head—probably that of the goddess of the Carthaginians—beautifully executed, and of such dimensions that the entire figure must have been forty feet in height. Besides these interesting relics, all of them the property of France, others of minor value were contained in some small adjacent chambers. The chapel is a neat and tasteful Gothic edifice, having an altar within, at which mass is sometimes celebrated by a Catholic priest from Tunis. A tablet bears a simple and unpretending inscription, nearly in the following words :—

LOUIS PHILIPPE, KING OF THE FRENCH, ERECTED THIS CHAPEL
ON THE SPOT WHERE DIED HIS ANCESTOR, SAINT LOUIS.

It was invidiously said at the time, that policy, as much as piety, had a hand in this good work. "It is the first footing of the French at Tunis, and may be the rallying point of conquerors. The poor priests who now sing masses for the soul of the crusader, may turn out monks militant, and, under their cowls, 'hide harness on their backs.'" That there might be an arrière pensée of the kind, we will not venture to deny; but, at any rate, we could not stand on such a spot, and look upon the monument which commemorates its history, without a certain feeling of sympathy. With a natural veneration for an ancient line that has mingled its annals with those of Europe, we could not look with indifference upon its downfall; nor remember, without a painful sense of the vicissitude of human things, that the last monarch, perhaps—and not the worst—of this illustrious house, was at that moment an exile upon our own shores, because he had not known the day of his visitation.

Truly these are strange and eventful days in which we live. It seems but yesterday that we were in the beautiful gardens of the Tuileries, on the commemoration of the "glorious three days," which had hurled Charles the Tenth from the French throne to elevate Louis Philippe in his place. It was a balmy July evening, and by the light of the setting sun, Paris never looked more beautiful. The long and magnificent façade of the palace—that palace which had already witnessed the hurried and fearful flight of two Bourbon monarchs, to which that of a third is now added—looked out upon those gorgeous gardens, every corner of which was crowded with the inhabitants of the capital, through which ran an eager murmur of expectation. A window in the centre pavilion was suddenly thrown open, and a group appeared upon the balcony—the cry, "Le Roi," "La Reine," "Les Princes," burst forth from the assembled multitude. It was a most exciting moment. To have heard the reiterated shouts—to have seen the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, who could have imagined what a reverse was in store for the objects of the popular adoration? For a moment all was hushed, when—as by a spontaneous impulse—arose from a thousand voices at once the solemn and thrilling strains of the "Marseillaise Hymn;" the vast crowd was carried away by enthusiasm; the king himself joined in the chorus; and all present—even the stranger that was within the gates—bound by the electric touch of sympathy, felt themselves as one man. And then—pass over a few brief years—and contrast with this scene the approach of the infuriated populace fresh from the slaughter of the guards—the terrible confusion in the palace—the bewildered king amidst his vacillating counsellors—the hurried and perilous flight—the lasting banishment from the soil of France, and the death upon a foreign soil!

Louis Philippe has at least peacefully closed a career of unusual vicissitudes. Although a repeated mark for the assassin, he has died at last quietly in his bed. Now that he is gone, his political errors—if such they were—may well be forgotten; his good and generous qualities will be long remembered. His memoirs will be looked for with unusual interest, as throwing light upon the difficulties of his position, and, perhaps, excusing those arbitrary and unfortunate measures which led to his dethronement and expatriation.

OR, THE RAILROAD OF LIFE.
BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRBORN."

CHAPTER XLV.

CONTAINS A "MIDNIGHT STRUGGLE," GARNISHED WITH A DUE AMOUNT OF BLOODSHED, AND OTHER NECESSARY HORRORS.

LEWIS, having overheard the conversation detailed in the preceding chapter, perceived himself to be placed in a position alike dangerous and difficult. In the spokesman and leader of the party he had recognised (as the reader has probably also done) his old antagonist, Hardy the poacher. The matter, then, stood thus—four ruffians (one of whom, burning with the desire of revenge for wrongs real and supposed, possessed strength and resolution equal to his animosity,) were already in possession of the lower part of the house, their avowed objects being robbery, murder, and abduction; the butler, faithless to his trust, was clearly an accomplice; Hardy, fighting as it were with a halter round his neck, was not likely to stick at trifles, and Lewis foresaw, that the conflict, once begun, would be for life or death, and on its successful issue depended Annie's rescue from a fate worse than death. His only ally was the footman; and whether this lad's courage would desert him when he discovered the odds against which he had to contend, was a point more than doubtful. However, there was no time to deliberate; Lewis felt that he must act, and summoning all the energies of his nature to meet so fearful an emergency, he prepared to sell his life as dearly as possible. On attempting to unlock his pistol-case, the key turned with difficulty, and it was not without some trouble and delay that he was enabled to open it. As he did so, it occurred to him that his pistols, which he kept loaded, might have been tampered with. It was fortunate that no thought of ascertaining this, for on inserting the ramrod, he found the bullets had been withdrawn from both barrels. Carefully reloading them, he placed the pistols in a breast-pocket ready for use, and taking down from a nail on which it hung, a cavalry sabre which had belonged to Captain Arundel, he unsheathed it, and grasping it firmly with his right hand, he turned to leave the room, with the design of arousing the footman. As he did so, a faint tap was heard, and on opening the door, the figure of Annie Grant, pale and trembling, wrapped in a dressing-gown and shawl, appeared before him, while her French soubrette, in an agony of fear, was leaning against the wall, listening (with eyes that appeared ready to start out of her head with fright) for every sound from below. As Lewis advanced, Annie perceived the sabre, and pointing towards it, she exclaimed, in an agitated whisper,

"Oh! you have heard them then! what will become of us?"

Lewis took her trembling hand in his.

"Calm yourself," he said, in the same low tone; "I will defend you, and, if needs be, die for you."

His words, spoken slowly and earnestly, appeared to act like a charm upon her. She became at once composed, and looking up in his face with an expression of child-like trust, inquired,

"And what shall I do?"

"Go back to your apartment, and pray for my success; God is merciful, and will not turn a deaf ear to such angel pleadings," was the solemn reply.

Annie again gazed earnestly at him, and reading in the stern resolution of his features the imminence of their danger, was turning away with a sickening feeling of despair at her heart, when Lewis again addressed her.

"I am going to awaken the man-servant," he said; "the butler is an accomplice of these scoundrels, and has admitted them. They cannot, however, molest you without ascending the stairs; and as they do that, I shall encounter them; the result is in the hands of God."

He was about to leave her, but there was a speechless misery in her face as she gazed upon him, which he could not resist. In an instant he was by her side.

"Dear Annie," he said, and his deep tones faltered from the intensity of his emotion,—it was the first time he had ever called her by her Christian name,—"Dear Annie, do not look at me thus sorrowfully; it is true we are in peril, but I have ere now braved greater danger than this successfully, and—should I fall, life has few charms for me—to die for you——!"

At this moment the sound of a man's voice in anger was heard from the lower part of the house, and starting forward with a scarcely suppressed cry of terror the French girl seized Lewis's arm; while, pointing in the direction of the footman's room she exclaimed,

"Allez, allez, cherchez vite du secours, nous allons être assassinés tous."

Lewis placed his finger on his lips in token of silence, and listened a moment as the voices below were again audible and then died away.

"They are quarrelling over their booty," he said, "and are too well occupied to think of us at present."

He then led Annie to the door of her room, urged her to fasten it on the inside, and pressing her hand warmly, left her. After one or two futile attempts, he discovered the man-servant's apartment; the door was unfastened, and he pushed it open, when the loud regular breathing which met his ear, proved that the person of whom he was in search was as yet undisturbed. Approaching the bed, Lewis paused for a moment, and shading the light with his hand, gazed upon the face of the sleeper. He was scarcely beyond the age of boyhood, and his features presented more delicacy of form than is usually to be met with in the class to which he belonged. He was sleeping as quietly as a child; while Lewis watched him, he murmured some inarticulate sounds, and a smile played about his mouth. As Lewis stooped to wake him, he could not but mentally contrast the calm sleep from which he was arousing him, with the probable scene of violence and danger in which he would so soon be engaged. It was no time for such reflections, however, and laying his hand on the lad's shoulder, he said,

"Robert, you are wanted, rouse up!"

Startled by the apparition of a figure bending over him, the young man sprang up, exclaiming,

"What's the matter? who is it?" then recognising Lewis, he continued, "Mr. Arundel! is anybody ill, sir?"

"Hush!" was the reply; "get up and put on some clothes as quickly as possible; there are thieves in the house. I will wait at the top of the stairs till you join me; but make no noise, or you may bring them upon us before we are prepared for them."

So saying, he quitted the room. In less time than he had imagined it possible, the young servant joined him.

"Have you roused Mr. Simmonds?" was his first query.

"The butler has proved unworthy of the trust reposed in him," returned Lewis; "he has admitted these men into the house, and they are now in his pantry, preparing to carry off the plate."

As he spoke, his companion's colour rose, and with flashing eyes he exclaimed, "Let us go down and prevent them; there's plate worth 500*l.* under his care."

Lewis held the lamp so that it shed its light upon the young man's face and figure. He was a tall well-grown youth, and his broad shoulders and muscular arms gave promise of strength; his eye was keen and bright, and an expression of honest indignation imparted firmness to his mouth. Lewis felt that he might be relied on, and determined to trust him accordingly.

"They have worse designs than merely stealing the plate," he said; "they intend to carry off Miss Grant, and murder me. Chance enabled me to overhear their plan; I mean, therefore, to wait at the top of the stairs, and use any means to prevent their ascending them; will you stand by me?"

"Ay, that I will; a man can but die once," was the spirited reply.

Lewis grasped his hand, and shook it warmly.

"You are a brave fellow," he said, "and if we succeed in beating off these scoundrels, it shall not be my fault if your fortune is not made. There is a carbine hanging in the General's bed-room, is there not?"

Receiving an answer in the affirmative, Lewis continued, "Fetch it, then, and the sword with it, if you think you can use it."

As Robert departed on this mission, Lewis, surprised at the delay on the part of Hardy and his associates, glided lightly down the staircase to reconnoitre their proceedings. The lower part of the house was, of course, in total darkness; but as he approached the butler's pantry, a bright stream of light issued from a crack in the door, while the tramp of nailed shoes on the stone flooring inside, together with an occasional muttered word, or oath, from one of the party, proved that they were busily engaged in some toilsome occupation, which Lewis rightly conjectured to be conveying the plate to a cart outside. Returning as cautiously as he had advanced, Lewis rejoined his companion, whom he found waiting for him at the top of the stairs, carbine in hand. Having ascertained that the charge had been removed from this also, he reloaded it with some of the slugs intended for his pistols, and placing the lamp so that it cast its light down the staircase leaving the spot where they stood in shade, he handed one pistol to Robert, reserving the other for his own use in any emergency which might occur; and thus prepared, they awaited the approach of the robbers. Their patience was not in this instance destined to be severely taxed, for scarcely had they taken their stations, when the creaking of a door cautiously opened, and the tread of muffled footsteps, announced that the crisis was at hand; and in another moment Hardy and his associates were seen stealthily advancing towards the foot of the stairs. As they perceived the light of Lewis's lamp, they paused, and a whispered consultation took place. At this moment the rays fell strongly upon the upper part of the poacher's figure, and Lewis, levelling his carbine, could have shot him through the heart. It was a strong temptation. Hardy once dead, Lewis had little fear of being able to overcome or intimidate the others. He knew that it was life for life, and that by all laws, human and divine, the act would be a justifiable one; but he could not bring himself to slay a fellow-creature in cold blood. Besides, although, since his unmanly attack on Annie, Lewis had felt in the highest degree irritated against the poacher, he compassionated him for the loss of his daughter, and could not entirely divest himself of a species of admiration for his strength and daring: so, though he still held the carbine directed towards the group, he did not pull the trigger; and thus, by a strange turn of fate, Lewis spared Hardy's life, as Hardy had on a former occasion spared his, when the motion of a finger would have sent him to his long account. At this moment the butler joined the party, and Lewis caught the words, "They have fire-arms!"

"Never fear," was the reply in the tones of Simmonds' voice, "they may bark, but they won't bite; I've taken care of that."

"Come on, then," exclaimed Hardy impetuously; "rush at them all together and overpower them!" and grasping a bludgeon with one hand, while in the other he held a cocked pistol, he dashed up-stairs followed by the rest. Lewis waited till they had passed a turn in the staircase, and then aiming low, in order if possible to stop their advance without destroying life, he fired. Simmonds, who was one of the foremost, immediately fell, and losing his balance, rolled down several steps; one of the others paused in his career, and from his limping gait was evidently wounded; but Hardy and two more continued their course uninjured. The smoke of the discharge for a moment concealed Lewis's figure; as it cleared away, Hardy levelled his pistol at him, and fired. The bullet whistled by Lewis's ear, and, passing within an inch of his right temple, lodged in the wall behind him; while, following up his ineffectual shot, the robber rushed upon him. Lewis, however, had too keen a recollection of his antagonist's matchless strength, to risk the chance of allowing him to close with him, and springing back, he struck him, quick as lightning, two blows with the sabre,—the first on his arm, which he raised to protect his head, the second and most severe one, on the shoulder near the neck: this last blow staggered him, and reeling dizzily, he grasped the banister for support, the blood trickling from the wound in his shoulder. In the mean time the two others, one of them having felled the young footman to the ground by a back-handed stroke with a bludgeon, attacked Lewis simultaneously. Having parried one or two blows with his sabre, Lewis made a desperate cut at the head of the man with the bludgeon. The fellow raised his staff to ward off the stroke, and the blow fell upon the oak sapling, which it severed like a reed; but unfortunately the shock was too great, and the sword snapped near the hilt. Seeing that he was thus left defenceless, and might probably be overpowered, as both his assailants were strong, square-built fellows, Lewis had no resource but to draw his pistol; and as before, endeavouring to aim so as to disable without destroying life, he fired, and the man nearest to him fell. His comrade immediately threw himself upon the young tutor, and a fierce struggle ensued. In point of strength the combatants were very equally matched; but, fortunately for the result, Lewis was the most active, and by a sudden wrench disengaging himself from his antagonist's grasp, he struck him a tremendous blow with his clenched fist on the side of the head, which sent him down with the force of a battering-ram. As he did so, a giant arm was thrown round his waist, a knife gleamed at his throat, and in a hoarse broken voice, the savage ferocity of which had something appalling in its tones, Hardy exclaimed—

"I've owed you something a long time, young feller; and now I've got a chance, I'm going to pay you."

Both his hands being occupied, he, with the fury of some beast of prey, seized Lewis's hair with his teeth, and endeavoured to draw his head back in order to cut his throat; but, by dint of struggling, Lewis had contrived to get his right arm free, and, grasping the wrist of the hand which held the weapon, he was enabled, as long as his strength might hold out, to prevent the ruffian from executing his murderous purpose. Hardy made one or two efforts to shake off the grasp which thus fettered him, but his muscular power was so much impaired by the sabre cut on the arm, that he was unable to accomplish his design. Accordingly, trusting to his great strength, and thinking that Lewis would become exhausted by his attempts to free himself, Hardy determined to wait, rather than run the risk of affording his victim a chance of escape by removing the arm which encircled him. While affairs were in this position, Robert, having recovered the stunning effects of the blow which had felled him, regained his feet, and was advancing to Lewis's assistance, when the robber who had been slightly wounded in the leg as he was ascending the stairs, and had since remained a passive spectator of the struggle, interposed, and rousing, through the medium of a kick in the ribs, the fellow whom Lewis had knocked down, closed with the young servant, and attempted to wrench the pistol (which went off in the scuffle without injuring any one) from his grasp, while his accomplice, gathering himself slowly from the floor, prepared to assist him. In the meantime the struggle between Lewis and Hardy appeared likely to terminate in favour of the young tutor, for the exertions made by the poacher to retain his captive, caused the blood to flow rapidly from his wounds, and a sensation of faintness stole over him, which threatened momentarily to incapacitate him. As he became aware of this fact, his fury and disappointment knew no bounds; and collecting his powers for one final effort, he released Lewis's waist, and transferring his grasp to his coat collar, suddenly flung his whole weight upon him, and bore him heavily to the ground; then raising himself, and planting his knee on Lewis's chest, he stretched out his hand to pick up the knife which he had dropped in this last attack. Had he made the attempt one minute sooner, it would have been successful, and Lewis would, indeed, have laid down his life for her he loved; but his time was not yet come: as the poacher leant over to reach the knife, a dizzy faintness overpowered him, his brain reeled; a slight effort on Lewis's part was sufficient to dislodge him, and, uttering a hollow groan, he rolled over on his back and lay motionless, his deep laboured breathing alone testifying that he was still alive. Hastily springing from the ground, Lewis, on regaining his feet, turned to assist his companion, who was still manfully battling with his two assailants: as he did so, the sound of feet became audible, and the gardener and three of the other out-door servants, aroused by the report of fire-arms, rushed in, having effected their entrance by the open window of the pantry. Their arrival ended the affair. The burglar who was uninjured, finding the door of Lewis's bedroom open, took refuge there, leaped from the window, alighted on some shrubs, which broke his fall, and, the darkness favouring him, effected his escape. The other four, who were all wounded more or less seriously, were secured.

A surgeon was immediately sent for: he examined Hardy (who remained in a state of unconsciousness) first. He pronounced the cut in the arm of little consequence, but the wound in the neck had divided several important vessels, and he considered it highly dangerous. The burglar at whom Lewis had discharged his pistol, was severely wounded in the hip, but the surgeon did not apprehend any serious consequences. Simmonds, the butler, proved to have been hit in the knee by a slug from the carabine, an injury which would probably lame him for life. The remaining member of the gang had come off more easily, a shot having passed through the fleshy part of the leg; Robert, the servant, displayed a broken head, and Lewis, besides being severely bruised, had in the last struggle with Hardy received a wound in the left wrist, from the point of the ruffian's knife. As soon as, by the application of proper restoratives, Hardy became sufficiently recovered to bear removal, a carriage was sent for, and the captured burglars were conveyed to the nearest town; the two most severely injured were taken to the hospital, and the other pair securely lodged in the county gaol.

On Annie's expressions of gratitude to her preservers, or on the feelings with which Lewis heard her lips pronounce his praises, we will not dwell; neither will we expatiate on the view Miss Livingstone (who appeared in a tremendous nightcap of cast-iron white-washed, and a dressing-gown of Portland stone,) was pleased to take of the affair, in which she recognised a vindication of the reality of the individual who was always under the beds, and behind the curtains; who, for the future, she declared to have been Hardy, professing herself able to swear to the expression of his boots, in any court of justice throughout the United Kingdom.

Poor Lewis, bruised and wearied, flung himself on a sofa in his dressing-room, to try if he could obtain a few hours' sleep, ere fresh cares and duties should devolve upon him;—but sleep demands a calm frame of mind, and in his spirit there was no peace. One thought haunted him,—in his brief and agitating interview with Annie, had he betrayed himself? Sometimes, as he recalled the words he had spoken, and the feelings which had, as it were, forced them from him, he felt that he must have done so; and then he regretted that Hardy's bullet had flown wide of its mark, and wished that he were lying there a senseless corpse, rather than a living man endowed with power to feel, and therefore to suffer. Then he bethought him how alarmed and confused Annie had appeared, and he conceived that she might have been too thoroughly preoccupied and self-engrossed to have marked his words, or to have attributed to them any meaning, save friendly interest. One thing was only too clear,—of whatever nature might be Annie's feelings towards him, his affection for her was love—deep, fervent, earnest love—a passion that he could neither banish nor control. How then should he act? flight had now become the idea that most readily occurred to him: again, the possibility of leaving Walter presented itself to his mind, and this time not as a mere remote contingency, but as a step which he might at any moment be called upon to take, if he could not recover his self-control so entirely as to endure Annie's presence; nay, to receive marks of her gratitude and esteem, or even, on occasion, to share her confidence, without betraying his feelings. Then in his self-tormenting, he caught at the expression which he had half thought, half uttered, to “endure” her presence—to endure that which he idolized, the presence of one for whom he would sacrifice friends, family, the love of adventure, his ambitious hopes, nay, as he had but now proved, life itself. A wild idea crossed his mind;—if love were thus all-powerful with him, a strong-minded, determined man, might it not be equally so with her, a young impulsive girl, whose very nature was an embodiment of tenderness; might she not secretly pine to sacrifice rank, station, riches, for the sake of love and him? Sacrifice—ay, rather rejoice to cast off such trammels! Should he strive to ascertain this? Should he tell her how he loved her with a passion that was undermining the secret springs of his very existence, and implore her to fly with him to some fair western land, where the false distinctions of society were undreamed of, and the brave true-hearted man was lord, not of his servile fellows, but of the creation which God had destined him to rule? The picture, seen by the false glare of his heated imagination, appeared a bright one, the lights stood out boldly, and the shadows remained unheeded, till the first gleam of returning reason brought them prominently forward, and he shuddered to think that he could have entertained for a moment a project so completely at variance with every principle of honour and of duty. Thus feverish alike in mind and body, he tossed restlessly on his couch, till at length, thoroughly exhausted, he fell into a deep sleep, and dreamed bright dreams of happy love, to make the stern reality appear yet darker and more drear on waking.

CHAPTER XLVI.

IN WHICH THE READER DIVERGES INTO A NEW BRANCH OF “THE RAILROAD OF LIFE,” IN A THIRD-CLASS CARRIAGE.

ON his return to Broadhurst, General Grant expressed his most unqualified admiration at the gallant defence of his house, property and daughter, (we quote his own “table of precedence,”) by Lewis and the man-servant; on the former he bestowed a sword

(presented to him in by-gone days by some Indian potentate), to replace the weapon broken in the struggle, together with a handsomely-bound copy of the Wellington Despatches,—the latter he rewarded by promotion to the post of butler, vice Simmonds, (in a fair way to be) transported, together with a douceur of twenty pounds; which piece of good fortune so elated the youthful Robert, that he publicly declared he should like to have his head broken overy night, and wished the house might be robbed regularly twice a-week till further orders. The wounded men recovered rapidly, with the exception of Hardy, whose case assumed a very alarming character;—owing to the state of his constitution, impaired by a course of intemperance, to which, since his escape from prison, he had given himself over, erysipelas supervened, and in a few days his life was despaired of. On receiving this intelligence, Lewis rode over to H—, and calling at the hospital, requested to be allowed to see the man whose life he had been the involuntary instrument of shortening. The permission was readily accorded, and he was conducted along several passages to the room, or rather cell, for it was little else, in which, for the purpose of security as well as to separate him from the other inmates of the establishment, the burglar had been placed. As soon as Lewis had entered, the door was closed and fastened on the outside. Noiselessly approaching the truckle bed on which Hardy lay, the young tutor paused, as his glance fell upon the prostrate figure of his former antagonist. Stretched at full length upon the couch, his arm and shoulder swathed in bandages, and his muscular throat and broad hairy chest partially uncovered, he looked even more gigantic than when in an erect posture: his face was pale as death, and an unnatural darkness beneath the skin, betokened, to any one accustomed to such appearances, the speedy approach of the destroyer; while a small hectic spot of colour on the centre of each cheek gave evidence of the inward fever which was consuming him. When Lewis approached the bed, his eyes were closed, and his deep breathing at first led to the belief that he was asleep; that this was not the case, however, soon became apparent. Opening his eyes, he accidentally encountered those of Lewis fixed upon him with an expression of mingled pity and remorse: as their glances met, Hardy gave a start of surprise, and gazed at him with a scowl which proved that his feelings of animosity against Lewis were still unabated; while a puzzled look evinced that his mental powers were so much weakened, that he doubted whether the figure he beheld were real, or a creation of his morbid fancy. Advancing to the bed-side, Lewis broke the silence by inquiring whether he suffered much pain. As he began to speak, the confused look disappeared from the sick man's countenance, and glaring at him with an expression of impotent rage, he exclaimed in a low hoarse voice,

“So, you're come to look upon your handy-work, are you? I hope you like it!”

“I am come to tell you that I am sorry the blows

I struck you in self-defence, should have produced such disastrous consequences, and to ask your forgiveness, in case the means employed for your restoration to health should prove ineffectual," replied Lewis.

"Restore my health!" repeated Hardy, bitterly: "do you mean that you expect these doctors can cure me? Do you think these wounds, that burn like hell-fire, can be healed by their plasters and bandages? I tell you, no! You have done your work effectually this time, and I am a dying man. You want me to forgive you, do you? If my curse could wither you where you stand, I would, and do curse you! If priests' tales be true, and there be a heaven and a hell, and by forgiving you I could reach heaven, I still would curse you, in the hope that, by so doing, I might drag you down to hell with me."

The vehemence with which he uttered this malediction completely exhausted him; and falling back on the pillow, he lay with closed eyes, his laboured breathing affording the only proof that he was still alive. Throwing himself upon a chair by the bed-side, Lewis sat wrapped in painful thought. The reflection that hatred to him for acts which circumstances had forced him to commit, might cause the unhappy being before him to die impenitent, and that he might thus be instrumental to the destruction both of his body and soul, was distressing to him in the extreme; and yet, how to bring him to a better frame of mind was not easy to decide. At length, following out his own train of thought, he asked abruptly:—

"Hardy, why do you hate me so bitterly?"

Thus accosted, the poacher unclosed his eyes, and fixed them with a piercing glance upon the face of his questioner, as though he would read his very soul. Apparently disappointed in his object,—for Lewis met his gaze with the calm self-possession of conscious rectitude,—he answered surlily,

"Why do you come here to torment me with foolish questions? It is enough that I hate you with just cause; and you know that it is so. I hate you now; I shall hate you dying; and I shall hate you after death, if there is an hereafter. Now go. If by staying here you think to persuade or entrap me into saying I forgive you, you only waste your time."

"Listen to me, Hardy," returned Lewis, speaking calmly and impressively; "you are, as you truly say, a dying man. In this life we shall probably never meet again: the reality of a future life you appear to doubt: I believe in it; and I believe that your condition there may be affected by your dying with such feelings in your heart as you have now expressed. It is therefore worth while to discuss this matter, and see whether you have such just cause to hate me as you imagine."

As Hardy made no reply, Lewis continued: "It is true that, on a former occasion, I secured your capture when, perhaps, I was stepping beyond my regular path of duty to do so; but, in this last affair, I merely acted in self-defence, as I overheard from my open window your scheme for my destruction. You discharged a pistol at me, ere I attacked you: had the ball gone half an inch more to the right, I should have been a dead man. Whatever may be your faults, you are brave; and that quality alone should prevent your bearing malice against one who met you in fair open fight. It was a game for life and death, and it is unjust to hate me for winning it."

"Boy, you will madden me," exclaimed Hardy, passionately, raising himself on his elbow as he spoke, though the pain the action caused him, forced a groan from his compressed lips. "Do you suppose I care for your paltry blows? If they had not finished me, brandy, or my own hand, would soon have done so; for life has long been a curse to me, and had become unbearable since—may the torments I shall soon endure, if there be a hell, fall upon you for it!—since you and the titled scoundrel, your friend, stole my daughter from me."

"I!" exclaimed Lewis, in astonishment; "do you imagine me to have had any share in that wickedness? Why, man, I never saw your daughter save on two occasions; and on the second of these, I warned her—unfortunately without effect—against the designs of the villain who betrayed her."

As he spoke, Hardy gazed eagerly at him, and when he ceased, exclaimed:

"Tell me, when and where was it that you did this?"

"It was on the morning after the electioneering ball at Broadhurst. I was shooting with the game-keeper, met your daughter by accident in the grass field by the larch plantation, and witnessing her parting with Lord Bellefield, I took the opportunity of telling her his true name and character, and warning her against his probable designs. But, unluckily, she had witnessed a disagreement between us on the previous evening, and, supposing me to be actuated by malicious motives, discredited my assertion."

"You are not deceiving me?" questioned Hardy, eagerly. "You could not, dare not, do so now!"

"You do not know me, or you would not doubt my word. I have spoken the simple truth," returned Lewis, coldly.

"Here!" continued Hardy, producing a small Bible from beneath the pillow: "you tell me you believe in this book, which the chaplain left with me. Will you swear upon it that you are not trying to deceive me?"

Lewis raised the book reverently to his lips, and kissing it, took the required oath. Hardy watched him with a scrutinizing gaze, and when he had concluded, held out his hand, saying,—

"I have wronged you deeply, Mr. Arundel, and must ask—what I never thought again to ask at the hand of man—your forgiveness. I have sought your life, sir, as the wild beast seeks his prey; and chance, on one occasion, and your own courage and address on others, have alone preserved it."

He then went on to relate how, his suspicions having been excited by hints from the neighbours, he had learned that his daughter was in the habit of meeting some gentleman by stealth. How he watched for him constantly, without success, till the day after the great party at Broadhurst, when, lying concealed in the larch plantation, he had been attracted by the sound of voices, and, creeping beneath the underwood, had witnessed, though not near enough to overhear what passed, the interview between Lewis and his daughter, when he naturally concluded the young tutor to be the individual against whom he had been cautioned. He then went on to relate that the opportune arrival of the gamekeeper had alone prevented him from shooting the supposed libertine; but that he had determined on his destruction, and that his capture by Lewis and the General had alone hindered him from executing his design. It was not till after his escape from H—— gaol that he first heard Lord Bellefield's name coupled with that of his daughter, which information complicated the affair; but still feeling convinced that Lewis was guilty, either as principal or accessory, he joined in the scheme for robbing Broadhurst, in order to be revenged on the young tutor, as well as on General Grant, against whom he had long nourished feelings of animosity, on account of his poaching persecutions.

His penitence for the wrong he had done him by his unjust suspicions was so sincere and spontaneous, that Lewis imagined he recognised, amid the ruin, traces of a naturally generous disposition, that "seed of the soul" which remains in almost every nature, however the rank growth of evil passions, uncontrolled, may have checked its development. Taking advantage of an expression of which Hardy made use, that "he thanked God he had not added to his other sins the murder of one who had sought to befriend his child," his companion observed:

"You say you thank God for preserving you from an additional crime: now, does not the fact of your involuntarily making use of that form of speech, tend to convince you that the belief in a God and a future state is natural to the mind of man?"

Hardy seemed struck by the force of the remark; and Lewis, pursuing the subject, had the satisfaction of perceiving that he had excited the wounded man's interest, and, ere he quitted him, he obtained his promise to listen to the exhortations of the chaplain, whose advances he had before angrily repulsed. Pleased with the result of his visit, Lewis, in his way home, called upon the clergyman who fulfilled the duties of chaplain to the hospital, and mentioning to him Hardy's improved frame of mind, begged him to see him again as soon as possible, to which request the chaplain willingly acceded.

Three days after this interview, Lewis received a note from the chaplain, thanking him for his hint, and informing him that the results of it had been as satisfactory as in such a case was possible. Hardy appeared sincerely penitent, and willing to embrace, and anxious to profit by, the truths of religion, as far as his weakened faculties enabled him to apprehend them. He added that he was sinking fast, and had expressed the greatest desire to see Lewis again before he died, as he had some request to make to him. On the receipt of this information, Lewis immediately set out for H——.

A great change had taken place in Hardy's appearance in those three days. His cheeks had become still more hollow, the unnatural brightness of his eyes was replaced by a dull leaden look, and the hectic colour had faded to the pale, ashy hue of approaching dissolution, whilst the hoarse, deep tones of his voice were reduced almost to a whisper through weakness. But the most remarkable change was in the expression of his features; the sullen scowl, which betokened a spirit at war alike with itself and others, had given place to a look of calm resignation; there were indeed traces of bodily pain, and mental anguish about the mouth, but the upper part of the face was in complete repose. Lewis gazed upon him with deep interest, and the idea suggested itself that thus might have appeared the demoniac, when the words of power had gone forth, "Hold thy peace, and come out of him." Nor was the comparison inapt, for if ever the mind of man was possessed by an evil spirit, that of Hardy had been so by the demon of revenge. As the dying man perceived his approach, his features lighted up.

"I knew you would come, Mr. Arundel," he said; "I felt that I should not die without seeing you again."

"Do you suffer much pain now, Hardy?" inquired Lewis, kindly.

"Scarcely any since six o'clock this morning, sir," was the reply; "but I know what that means— that's mortification coming on. I've seen men die from sabre wounds before now. I was a soldier once; at least, I was farrier to a troop of cavalry, which is much the same thing; but this was not what I wanted to say—" he paused from exhaustion, and pointed to a glass containing some strengthening cordial. Lewis held it to his parched lips; having drunk a portion of it, he appeared considerably revived.

"I am going fast," he resumed, "and must not waste the minutes that remain. You have treated me with kindness, sir,—one of the few who have ever done so; you are a bold foe and a warm-hearted friend, and that is a character I understand and can trust. Moreover, you tell me you showed poor Jane" (as he mentioned his daughter's name, tears stood in his eyes, and his breath came short and fast,) "her danger, and strove to warn her against the villain who has wronged her; and this shows you are a good man; therefore, I am going to ask you to do me a favour. When I'm dead, I want you to find out Jane, and tell her whatever you may think best to induce her to leave this man; and when she hears that I'm dead, if she seems to feel it very deep, and take on about it,—which likely enough she will, for she did care for me once,—you may tell her that I forgave her before I died. I never thought to do so, for she has finished what her mother began; between them, they've first made me the devil I have been, and then—broken my heart." He paused, and when he had sufficiently recovered breath, continued, "When I married her mother, five-and-twenty years ago, I was a different man from whatever you've known me. I'd been brought up to my father's trade of a blacksmith, and worked steadily at it till I was able to lay by a fair sum of money, besides keeping the old man as long as he was alive. However, in the village where we lived was a farmer, well to do in the world, and his daughter was far the prettiest girl in those parts: she'd had a good education, and gave herself airs like a lady, and looked down upon a rough young fellow like me; but I bore it patiently, for I loved her, and determined I'd marry her. For a long time she would not look at me, but I persevered; any man that come a-courting her, I picked a quarrel with and thrashed; I found many ways of making myself useful to the old man her father, and somehow she got used to me like, and grew less scornful; and just then a sister of my father's, who had been house-keeper at Broadhurst, died and left me 300*l.*, and I'd saved about two more, and the old man wanted help to manage his farm,—and the long and short of the matter was, I married Harriet Wylde, took a farm next her father's, and gave up blacksmithing.

"For four years I was as happy as man could be; everything seemed to prosper with me, my wife had one child, a girl; a proud man was I when she was first placed in my arms, but had I known what was to be her fate, I would have smothered her in her cradle! There was a young gentleman lived near us—his father was a rich baronet—I had been accustomed to break in horses for the son, and when I took the farm we used to shoot together. He was a frank, generous-hearted man, and treated me like a friend and equal. On our shooting expeditions, he would often come and lunch at my house; on one occasion he brought his younger brother with him. This young man had just returned from Italy, and brought foreign manners and foreign vices with him. My wife was still very good-looking, like poor Jane but handsomer; and this young villain coveted her beauty. I know not what arts he used; I suspected nothing, saw nothing, but one evening on my return, my home was desolate. I obtained traces of the fugitives—he had taken her to a sea-port town in the South of England, meaning to embark for France—I followed them, and in the open street I met him; the bystanders interfered between us, or I should have slain him where he stood. He was taken to an inn, where he kept his bed for some weeks from the effect of the punishment I had administered to him. I was dragged off to prison; the law which suffered him to rob me of her whom I prized more dearly than house and goods, punished me for chastising the scoundrel, with six months' imprisonment. I consorted with thieves, poachers, and other refuse of society; and in my madness to obtain revenge upon the class which had injured me, I listened to their specious arguments till I became the curse to myself and others which you, sir, have known me. Well! society sent me to school, and society has had the benefit of the lessons that were taught me. I came out of gaol a bad, and well nigh a desperate man, to learn that my wife had returned to her father's house and died, giving birth to a boy. In my anger I refused to acknowledge the child, but the old man took care of it. Time passed on, the elder of the two brothers quarrelled with his father and died abroad, the younger one married; but God visited him for his sin: his wife saw by accident in an old newspaper an account of my trial for the assault; the shock brought on a premature confinement; she also died in child-birth, and the child remained an idiot. Yes! you start, but you have guessed rightly—the boy to whom you are tutor is the son of the man who wronged me. The ways of God are very wonderful; had the boy possessed his proper senses, you might never have come here, and I might not now be lying on my death-bed."

Again Hardy broke off from weakness; and again Lewis administered the cordial to him, and wiped the cold dews from his brow.

"Little more remains to tell," he added, after a few minutes' pause; "and 'tis well that it is so, for death comes on apace. I do not fear to die; I have long wished myself dead, life was such deep misery; yet now I should be glad to live, that I might undo some of the evil I have caused. Since I saw you last, I have felt more like my former self than I have ever done from the time my wife left me. Poor Harriet! Do you think we shall meet in the world of spirits, Mr. Arundel?"

"These are things God alone knows," replied Lewis gravely; "He has not seen fit to reveal to living man the secrets of the grave!"

After a short silence, in which Hardy appeared to be collecting strength to finish his relation, he continued,—

"After my release from the prison, I took to drinking to banish reflection. Drinking is a vice which brings all others in its train. I soon fell into bad company,—became involved in debt; and at last, in a drunken fit, enlisted in the —th dragoons,—my height attracting the notice of a recruiting party from that regiment. I served ten years; at the end of which time my wife's father died, and left his little property between the two children, with the exception of a sum to purchase my discharge, if I chose to come and take care of them. The confinement and regularity of a soldier's life did not suit me, and I availed myself of the opportunity thus offered, returned home, and lived on a certain income set apart for the maintenance and education of the children. This was a fresh chance for me, and had I conducted myself properly, I might have yet known some peaceful years; but a craving for excitement haunted me. I sought out some of my old companions, joined a Chartist association, took to habits of poaching: and this has been the end of it."

"What became of the boy who was left to your care?" inquired Lewis. Hardy uttered a low groan.

"That is another sin I have to answer for," he said. "I never liked the child—I doubted whether it was mine, and the sight of it recalled the memory of my wrongs; accordingly, I treated the boy harshly, and he repaid me by sullen disobedience;—and yet there should have been sympathy between us. He was brave even to rashness, and copied my vices with an aptitude which proved his power of acquiring better things. By the time he was thirteen, he could set a snare, hit a bird on the wing, thrash any boy of his own weight, and alas! drink, game, and swear, as well as I could myself. One night I had been drinking, he angered me, and in my rage I struck him. For a moment he looked as if he would return the blow; but the folly of such an attempt seemed to occur to him, and he glanced towards a knife which lay on the table; then his sister threw her arms round him, and he refrained. He waited till she had gone to bed, sitting sulkily without speaking. When we were alone, he looked up, and asked me abruptly, 'Father, are you sorry that you struck me that blow?' There was something in the boy's manner that appealed to my better feelings, and I was half inclined to own myself wrong, but a false shame prevented me, and I angrily replied, 'that I would repeat the blow if he gave me any more of his impertinence.' He looked sternly at me, and muttering, 'That you shall never do,' quitted the room. From that day to this I have never seen him. My poor Jane, who was doatingly fond of him, was broken-hearted at his loss. She told me he often threatened to run away, when I had treated him harshly, and that his intention was to go to sea. I have no doubt he contrived to put it into execution. Perhaps if her brother had remained with her, the poor girl might not have left her home so readily. God help me, my sins have brought their own punishment!"

An attack of faintness here overpowered him, of so severe a character that Lewis thought it advisable to summon assistance. When Hardy had in some degree recovered, on consulting his watch, Lewis found that he must return without further delay; he therefore prepared to depart, bidding Hardy farewell, and promising to see him again on the following day. The dying man shook his head.

"There will be no to-morrow for me in this world," he said; then pressing Lewis's hand, he added, "God bless you, Mr. Arundel; you have done me more good by your kind words, than your sword has done me evil; nay, even for my death I thank you; for had I lived on as I was, I should only have added crime to crime. You will remember your promise about poor Jane?"

Lewis repeated his willingness to do all in his power to carry out the dying man's wishes; and Hardy added, "It may be that the poor boy I told you of is still alive; if he should ever return, I should like him to know that I have often grieved for my bad conduct to him. I have left a letter for you with the clergyman, in case I had not seen you," he continued; "it only contains the request I have now made, and one or two other particulars of less consequence; he will give it to you when I am gone." He again pressed Lewis's hand feebly, and closing his eyes, lay more dead than alive.

As Lewis quitted the room, the surgeon met him, and informed him that it was not probable Hardy would survive through the night, but promised that every attention should be bestowed upon him. Lewis's thoughts, as he rode back to Broadhurst, naturally ran upon the history of sin, and shame, and sorrow, to which he had just listened, and he could not but wonder for what purpose a frank, generous nature, such as Hardy had originally possessed, should have been so severely tried. A like question may have occurred to many of us, and we may have felt that the safest course is to look upon such things as mysteries to be regarded by the twilight of a patient faith, which waits trustfully, till all that now seems dark shall be made clear, in the glorious brightness of the perfect day.

FAIRIES DANCING ON THE SANDS.

A POETICAL creation by one of the most poetical of our painters, Danby, upon which we may gaze until we lose ourselves in the ideal world he has conjured up before us,—a band of fairies dancing upon the argent beach amidst the grandest combinations of coast scenery, such as may be dreamed of, but rarely witnessed, unless perhaps in some island of the fair Pacific. In such a scene we might fancy the beautiful invocation of Ariel,—

"Come unto these yellow sands
And then take hands:
Courtesied when you have, and kiss'd
(The wild waves whist),
Foot it feathery here and there,
And, sweet sprites, the burden bear."

Danby has a daring imagination, and ventures to represent what an ordinary painter would shrink from. Witness his "Passage of the Red Sea;" a "Sunset after a Storm;" and other extraordinary combinations of effect in remarkable contrast to the loveliness he has here depicted.

THE CHARITIES OF LONDON.

It is an assertion obvious to all, that in the constitution of society, those who are lowest in the scale must be the most exposed to suffering and calamity. Unpossessed by any of those luxuries which lighten the burdens of the upper and wealthier classes, sorrow and distress press upon them with double force. When deprived of anything, therefore, upon which they have set their earthly affections, they cannot turn to the pursuit of pleasure to stem their grief, or make them forget their loss. Poverty aggravates their sufferings, and renders them insensible to the dictates of hope. It is impossible to project our imagination forward to the time when all traces of indigence shall be swept from the land; but it may be arrested in its progress, and it is our duty to see that this be done. The humbler classes have strong claims upon us—claims which must be recognised; and though we are quite willing to render due praise to those who step forward with their benevolence, we cannot but at the same time acknowledge that there would be some justice in a demand for assistance, if made by the poor.

All labour is performed by them. It is their hands must form, and mould, and create, and give life to the mere abstract idea of anything for which our country has been remarkable. Those vast ships which sail along the ocean, and carry the blessings of our civilization and the results of our energy to distant lands, and traverse thousands of miles, have all been joined and cemented, and put piece by piece together by our workmen. Every noble structure, whose design has been conceived by some master mind, has been reared by our labourers, and will bear to all futurity the relics of their toil. In all the productions of the loom, in the most delicate fabrics which adorn the form of royalty itself, and deck the proudest lady of the realm, we must acknowledge the skill and labour of the artizan. There is nothing which constitutes one of our material luxuries in which he has not had a share. Thousands there are, doubtless, who are unemployed, and who, steeped to the lips in poverty, misery, and often crime, are a burden at once to themselves and to the state. But they are not in all cases to blame for belonging to this class. It is not they who have created the dearth of employment, or who are called upon to provide a remedy. The causes of this state of things lie deeper, and are not to be explained in limits so imperfect as ours necessarily must be. For the poor, and the labouring classes as well, have the charities of London, in part, been instituted, and as many as it is possible to accommodate may partake indiscriminately of their comforts and assistance.

There is something in the mind of an Englishman, unselfish in the highest degree. No man is so ready to taste of the enjoyments of life, no man so fond of surrounding himself by its luxuries, and none so indefatigable in the pursuit and acquisition of wealth. He rejoices in a complete domesticity, never found in any other country. He has the gift of constantly creating new means of enjoyment, and seems from the aids of his home to defy the power of all elements of annoyance. But in the midst of his proneness for self-indulgence and his ease, there is no man so accessible to the consciousness, that there are classes below him in the fabric of society who labour in the creation of social comfort for others from morning till night, but who never know the meaning of the word, never taste of the sweets of life. The feeling prompts him to set aside from his income certain sums to be distributed among the poor through the means of benevolent institutions, which, if they do not extend these benefits to all, have greatly lessened the amount of actual suffering. The efforts made are on a sufficiently grand scale to attract the attention of foreigners to the fact, that England more than any other country can boast of benevolent and charitable minds, who have originated institutions calculated to relieve the destitute, feed the hungry, reclaim the erring, and promote the general good of the whole community.

The work from the pen of Mr. Low, which places before us a list and account of all the existing charities in London, must prove of immeasurable service. Considerable interest in the institutions themselves will be awakened, and a better acquaintance with their purpose and object afforded to all. It is, in fact, more than probable that a large class of persons are totally ignorant of the existence of many of these valuable charities, who would now be delighted to contribute to the enlargement of their funds, especially when they reflect upon the beneficial effects destined to be produced upon society at large. Few indeed, at a mere cursory glance, can comprehend the vast purposes to be achieved, or the reactionary effect upon society produced by the improvement of morals, the advancement of religion, and the suppression of vice. How many are brought back to the path of virtue, how many young children are redeemed, how many grey hairs are protected, those alone who really study the subject can ever know. No one can peruse the account of the various institutions, without an inward feeling of pride that England can boast of them. Only in progress of time, however, can we hope to derive immense benefit from their existence, and though we are far from tracing all the improvement manifested by this generation to this fact, we are induced to believe that much more effect is produced than is generally supposed.

At one time, considerable prejudice attached to the idea of going into an hospital. The mind of an Englishman revolts from the idea of receiving charity, and entering any asylum, where he would be indebted to the public for all the benefits and comforts he received. When, however, the hospitals increased in number, this feeling by degrees wore away, and thousands availed themselves of the privilege thus afforded. Every one has had some experience of the constant attendance required by a sick person, and of the confusion created in a family even of moderate competency by such an event. But if we transport ourselves to the cottage where, for instance, the father is sick, we can ill imagine the misery it produces by throwing an insuperable barrier to all active exertion on the part, not only of the invalid, but of the wife or child. If they have employment, either they must throw it up, or a nurse must be hired, a proceeding of too expensive a nature to be often risked. Every little saving perhaps of years must be withdrawn, and even then all that is required in extreme sickness can rarely be procured. Such cases seem, however, to awaken all the purest feelings of which the poor are possessed; they seem to bound their hopes to the present, and with affectionate recklessness, risk anything to afford advice and relief to their relative. The prolonged sickness very often causes them to part little by little with every little possession; then, their clothes are sacrificed, and perhaps the family are reduced through this one accident to extreme poverty. It is to guard against such trials as these, that buildings have been erected throughout the metropolis, where the poor man when he feels the approach of sickness, may resort and find the highest skill, the greatest solicitude and attention, with the kindness of a nurse, if not the tenderness of a wife or child.

There are in London twelve general medical hospitals: St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas's, Westminster, Guy's, St. George's, London, Middlesex, Charing Cross, Royal Free, King's College, University, and Marylebone, and these, with two exceptions, have been erected almost within the last century; proving that the disposition to afford assistance to the poor has by no means diminished, but rather, rapidly increased, in spite of the assertion of a late eminent statesman, that we had greatly degenerated from the piety of our forefathers. If reference, however, is made to the past statistics of the hospitals, and the condition in which we find them at present, it will be discovered that it is during the last forty or fifty years that their funds have increased, and the buildings themselves extended. In their early career these institutions encountered many struggles. They had to combat both against prejudice and poverty. It was with extreme difficulty that accommodation could be provided for the sick brought to the door, and common necessities afforded them, much less the vigilance, the comfort, and attention afterwards supplied. People looked at first with some suspicion upon these establishments. All organized charities and methods of bestowing benevolence require to be investigated before they can be properly appreciated. Faith, however, in their purpose and intentions was by degrees established, and an active spirit of interest in their progress awakened. Some placed by chance in circumstances of wealth, with princely munificence contributed large sums, which raised the hospitals from their poverty, extricated them from their difficulties, and enabled them to carry out their design of proportioning their accommodation more to the exigencies and number of the sick.

One of the most interesting of the medical hospitals is St. Bartholomew's, founded seven centuries ago by Rahere, the minstrel of King Henry the First, connected with a priory. Only a hundred "sore and diseased" were then enabled to find accommodation within its walls. So it endured until 1537, when, monasteries and priories being suppressed, it fell into the hands of Henry the Eighth, who had the grace to refound it by royal charter. It now began to be extended, subscriptions and donations rapidly increased its power; some left legacies for the improvement of the diet, others for the purchase of linen. The size of the hospital spread, until gradually it has attained to more than five times its original extent. Everything calculated to render its arrangements complete has been performed; a spacious surgery has been erected for persons requiring medical or surgical assistance, and there exists besides, a theatre for operations.

Into this hospital the patient may enter without the annoyance of fees, to servants already well paid by the establishment, and 580 persons may be at the same time inmates within its walls. During one year alone, more than seventy thousand patients experienced its benefits, either within its walls or without.

Into the minute arrangement of every separate institution, we may not in our limits enter. We shall merely, therefore, portray a few of the leading charities. In St. Thomas's hospital, Southwark, a custom prevails, which we could wish to see at some future time in more active operation, viz. furnishing those who have arisen weak and dejected from the sick bed, with money to satisfy their present necessities, and carry them upon their way home. Few who contemplate the scenes in the homes of the poor from a distance, and who have not personally entered, as it were, into their social economy, witnessed their sacrifices, their privations and sufferings, know how grateful is the most trifling assistance in the hour of sickness. How much more then the consciousness that their friend or relative is cared for, and provided with every necessary. They are not debarred from intercourse with their friends. They may visit them at stated times, and carry them any additional luxury they may fancy. The sick-ward of an hospital has revealed more of the tenderness of the human heart than many would suppose to exist. The anxious visits, the whispered words, the wondering looks of the visitants, the unmistakable delight at beholding the purity and cleanliness of everything, are pleasant to contemplate. There is much more, however, of a painful nature. Scenes infinitely harrowing to the feelings occur, and much pain is necessarily inflicted upon the sufferers, by the consciousness that on the next couch, separated only by a foot of space, a fellow being is passing into eternity. They see him borne away to his last resting place with concern, for, besides the warning his death conveys, it leaves a gap in the circle, even of the sick-ward. It must not be supposed, either, that over the life of the nurses any halo of romance is thrown. They have to contend with all the irritability of sickness, the ignorance of the lower orders, and the peevish disinclination to comply with the rules and regulations of the establishment. At one time, however, the nurses were very ill chosen, and were frequently guilty of great harshness towards the patients. In some few instances they are scarcely, even now, sufficiently patient and gentle, although in general they are remarkable for their tenderness and attention to the sick.

We earnestly trust that the volume with which Mr. Low has furnished us, may be the means of awakening deep interest in the grand subject of which it treats. It is a matter of considerable regret to discover how many of the institutions are labouring under a depression of funds, which necessarily cramps their labours, and diminishes the field of their exertions. Instead, therefore, of pointing our attention to the erection of new hospitals, let us hope that those already existing will be furnished with ample means, and that every endeavour will be made to extend their power. Numbers of large wards in several of the oldest and longest established hospitals are now lying perfectly empty, not because patients are scarce, but because the means of preparing them for the reception of the sick and poor do not exist. Quitting those institutions which have been erected for medical purposes generally, let us hasten on to others which have more special purposes in view. Of these there exist fifty, all devoted to the cure of various diseases. The following will briefly detail their objects and condition:—

! "SUMMARY OF THE ESPECIAL MEDICAL CHARITIES.

"1 Seamen—2 Foreigners and Jews—1 Fever—4 Consumption, etc.—1 Madeira—1 Sea-bathing—9 Lying-in—3 Women and children—3 Small-pox and vaccination—5 Ophthalmic—3 Ear and voice—3 Deformities—3 Internal disease—3 Skin and Glandular—4 Maniac and Idiots—4 Convalescent and Invalid. Total 50.

"Twenty-two institutions receiving in-patients, and making up beds to the number of 1,105.

"Four lunatic asylums, ditto 1,670.

"In all, fifty charities granting medical relief for special objects annually to 105,997.

"(Exclusive of the Madeira Sanatorium and another only just formed, and two from which there are no returns.) Of these, one was founded in the sixteenth century; eleven in the eighteenth, and thirty-eight in the present century.

"The aggregate amount of annual receipts averages at the present time 96,664*l.* of which amount, contributed by voluntary contributions is 27,974*l.*"—P. 20.

These, besides some dispensaries and minor institutions, constitute all the strictly medical charities. Upon their importance it is almost needless to enlarge. Through their existence thousands and tens of thousands have been relieved from sufferings, which formerly they were compelled to endure in silence. Medical science has attained to a state of perfection beyond which it is difficult to imagine it capable of progressing, and inestimable advantages have been derived by society. Scarcely, however, less important than those which tend to the preservation and prolongation of life, are those institutions which are destined to improve the morals of the people, diminish crime, and check the progress of disease, in other ways besides the application of medical science. Health and morality are to a certain extent bound up together, as we cannot fail to acknowledge the more we become acquainted with the secret machinery which operates through the country, and contributes to the ill or well-being of the various divisions which compose the humbler classes. The wide dissemination of these institutions, and the principles they inculcate, will do more for the prevention of sickness than all the private advice of the most able medical men. Every investigation which has of late taken place tends to moral and social improvement—the great care bestowed upon the building and formation of dwellings hereafter to be tenanted by the poor, the destruction of pest-holes and corners in which dirt and disease have long been hoarded up, which have breathed an atmosphere of sickness, the prevention of burials in town—will all tend to the amelioration of every condition of society, but more especially of the lower orders.

The first class of these, as they may be termed preventive institutions, tend to the preservation of human life. Every one has heard of the Royal Humane Society, and knows something of its operations. All classes of society can bear witness to the good they have achieved, and many doubtless retain recollections of a personally grateful nature connected with it. Many a death from imprudence, poverty, or desperation, has been prevented by their vigilance. Indeed, we may regard this society as one of the most beneficial in its effects of any that are scattered through the metropolis. What check besides should we have upon those numerous accidents, which are the results of rashness, or even sometimes upon those attempts at self-destruction, which result from a long train of evils, poverty, sickness, crime, neglect and despair? Had not this society not only existed, but been in active operation, we must have trusted to accident, or individual instances of bravery. Not that the operation of the Humane Society can be universal; far from it, it would require a machinery of considerable vastness to effect this; but if the public will be at the pains, they will recollect innumerable instances of their active assistance in cases of emergency. People will be rash, children will not profit by the experience of past generations, they are unfortunately all born with the same propensities, the same rashness, and will be so to all succeeding generations. Societies of this nature will always be necessary.

A very peculiar interest is attached to this institution from its earliest commencement up to the present period. In the year 1774, Dr. Fothergill was enabled to carry out a plan, doubtless previously long contemplated, for establishing some agency which should quietly and indirectly operate, to cause some check upon the then constantly occurring accidents through drowning, and without much risk to endeavour to preserve human life. He therefore founded the present society, which has gone on increasing in size and importance up to the present period; its plans improved, and greater stability given to its operations. Rewards are established for those who have assisted in the saving of life, no matter whether belonging to the society or not, no matter in what part of the world the act may be performed. Since its erection many hundreds have been rescued from the water. Some have been restored to anxious friends and relatives, some have been re-introduced into the community from which they had hoped to have escaped for ever. Many, after taking a plunge which they had intended to carry them into eternity, have been re-awakened to a sense at once of their despair and crime. This sudden return to life, as it were, has frequently produced very beneficial effects. The existence of the Humane Society has awakened an intense spur to investigation, and has wonderfully advanced the interests of science. Suspended animation was, once, too often mistaken for death, and remedies were not applied in consequence of this injurious supposition, which might have been successful in recalling the sufferer to life. Many perished, doubtless, through the absence of those discoveries which, at a later time, have caused so many to be restored to life. The summary of operations during the past year, will show the extreme utility of the society:—

"Since the establishment of this society, many hundreds of individuals have been rescued by its direct agency in the neighbourhood of the metropolis alone, from premature death. The following summary of operations during the past year, may be considered as a fair average of what is effected by the direct exertions of its own officers: fourteen persons were prevented from effecting suicide; twenty rescued, whilst in danger of drowning, from cramp or getting beyond their depth while swimming; and, during the ice season, thirty-four rescued from various degrees of danger whilst skating. The number of rewards voted in cases of meritorious exertions, or prompt remedial measures, extending over the world: one gold, sixteen silver, and twenty-one bronze medallions; and pecuniary amounts to 125 individuals. The principal receiving-house of the society is on the north bank of the Serpentine in Hyde Park. The methods of treatment under emergent circumstances, published by this society, are very excellent, and may be obtained gratuitously on application. The annual amount spent for rewards, salaries, wages, advertisements, etc., is 1,620*l.* and for receiving-house and marquees 200*l.* This is defrayed by an income of 1,800*l.* arising from voluntary contributions and dividends."—P. 83.

Next we have the Society for Protection of Life from Fire, which is no less valuable, and no less deserving of encouragement. In a fire, the need of such assistance is felt more than in any other emergency. Persons retire in peace, awake in the night, find themselves enveloped in smoke—a confused consciousness that they are in danger takes possession of them—the father or the mother remembers that above them children are sleeping in the unconsciousness of infancy; unable to avert their fate, an agony of despair, which few can comprehend, takes possession of them, they know not how to rescue them, flames burst around, and a sort of temporary madness paralyses their exertions. The fireman, more cool, with nothing in his heart to warp his energies, urged on by the discharge of duty, and often by the intense desire to save a human being from such destruction, now makes his appearance, protected by the resources of art; he fearlessly mounts the flaming stairs, creeping on his hands quickly up through smoke and flame and yielding timbers. He seizes the sleeping infant in his arms, to the admiration of all the spectators, who experience a thrill of inexpressible delight upon the occasion. The institution ought to be spiritedly supported.

The Labourers' Friend Society, having for its object to build model houses for the poor, in order that cleanliness, health, and comfort may be promoted, is intimately connected with the Baths and Washhouses, which have, altogether, performed immense good for the working-classes. No one would believe the actual effect of the desire for cleanliness which has been awakened in arresting the progress of disease and death. Upon these we shall not dwell, but pass on to those which address themselves to another class of the population.

The consequences of crime are too often fatal to those who, whether through ignorance or example, have been led to its commission. Society visits upon the head of the offender obloquy and disgrace. The man who has once by his own act placed himself beyond its pale, can never return. He is branded; and neither repentance nor reformation can wash out the stain. His children come into the world with the mark of infamy upon them. They can procure no employment; the publicity afforded to the actions of their parents or relatives has robbed them of all chance of obtaining an honest livelihood. No one will trust them. The seed of evil was so firmly rooted in their character that it seemed as though it must burst forth. The child, early rendered cunning and callous, and long before its time forced to speculate upon the chances of a livelihood—not endowed with sufficient moral courage to face society—sees no resource but to plunge into the same career that its father did before him; and theft, larceny, burglary, murder, form his means of subsistence. If interrogated upon the causes which have operated to produce these results, he would throw back the blame upon society, which had coldly shut its doors upon him, and refused to admit him within its boundaries.

We are accustomed to look with too much harshness upon the vices of our fellow-creatures; satisfied to accept results, without investigating the causes which have been at work. We are all too fearful of trusting to repentance, too averse to be the first to receive within our circle one that has been tainted by the atmosphere of sin: the contact is looked upon with horror. That our children should mingle with their children—no! it cannot be. Many, however, may take the question home to their hearts, How much of this evil might there not have been averted, if private benevolence and charity had been more active in withdrawing little children from the circle of vice,—in assisting the orphans of those who have suffered the penalty of the law for their crimes, to ways of virtue? How much more beautiful to withdraw these poor and much-to-be-pitied children from the path of vice, than to punish their after offences, for which society is more responsible than they are themselves. The greatest vindictiveness and animosity are shown, too, to young women who have, in some moment of forgetfulness,—or who have been tempted, the world never knows how, who have been deceived by false tales,—been induced to fall from their high estate. Their sins are visited heavily upon them, and, strange to say, oftenest most heavily by women themselves, who ought to pity and forgive such errors. Those who have never been tempted know not the force of temptation. All allowance is of course to be made for the infringement of social laws they have committed. Of course we are ready to say that they have outraged those delicate laws which stand immutably round a woman, and which, when once she has infringed in the smallest degree, she can never replace herself in the social scale, in the same position she previously occupied. But while virulence, and malice, and scorn are showered upon the victim, those who have caused the evil, who have been the origin of the sin, go unpunished; society has no terrors for them. Woman is especially hard upon the fallen sisterhood—at least, in outward show, and in words; but urged by a forgiving spirit, which their pride induces them to conceal, they secretly assist numerous establishments open for the reception of the erring. Crime no longer constitutes the destruction of all earthly hope; the sins of youth, the failings and frailties of a riper age, may be wiped away entirely. The moment the mind turns away, disgusted with its position—at the time when accumulated wrongs, sufferings, crimes, and remorse press heavily upon them—when self-destruction seems the only hope, they are welcomed within the walls of an institution adapted to their condition, in which they meet, from the hands of women, the greatest tenderness, sympathy, kindness, and attention. No voice is raised against them in reproach; no finger of scorn is pointed at them, no retributive sneer, no threat of vengeance. They are received freely; and they often find there the shielding from scorn and ignominy which they have, perhaps, sometimes sought in vain beneath a mother's roof. There, at peace, surrounded by order, propriety, gentleness, and firmness, they are taught to become reconciled to themselves, and to the God they have disobeyed. The sin which the sinning world will not forgive, is forgiven by One who never sinned; and they are enabled to go forth again into the world, cleansed, as Christ cleansed the leper.

It has seldom if ever happened that those who have been once rescued from the power of evil, have ever returned to the pursuit of crime. They have been placed out in the world in good situations, and they have outlived the reputation of their youth.

We arrive now at those institutions which address themselves more directly to the poor. That term—"the poor," signifies not a mere handful of individuals, as in the comprehension of some it seems to mean, to whom a casual assistance will afford immediate relief; but is a large mass of our population, scattered over every country district, town or village in the kingdom. Threading the metropolis in and out, driving through its broad open streets, gazing upon the wealth and magnificence we meet at every turn, the splendid equipages, the luxurious dresses of a large class, we can scarcely transport ourselves in imagination to the degrading contrast shown in low dark alleys, where the houses nearly meet overhead, where every noisome odour, every fætid effluvia rises, where disease and sickness are continually generating, where the pure breath of heaven never enters, where small, dark, ill aired, ill ventilated rooms and cellars are found densely inhabited by human beings, wallowing, not living, in the midst of dirt and rags, who roll on in the daily round assigned to mortality, whose food is wrung from the heart of the passer-by, whose prayers are only a curse upon society, whose hope ventures no further than the morrow, and who are perfectly reckless as to what the future may bring forth.

Imagine, in the bitterest and most nipping frost, when the intense cold seems to freeze the very breath which God gave them for enjoyment, as it comes from the body, a whole family huddled, numbed with cold, despair written upon every countenance, from the pinched little features of the babe, nestling on the mother's emaciated breast, to the stern unbending face of the father, who, suffering from the keenest agony which man in health can know, hunger, feels a still keener pang in the consciousness that he has called into existence a host of human beings, who like himself in the time to come are destined to suffer the same cold, hunger, despair, and misery. What shall send relief to these suffering creatures, what imposture shall they or need they practise, to obtain a mouthful of bread? Come, let them leave their dark and cheerless cellars, and go forth into the streets; let them sit down upon the cold stone and look, not speak to the passers-by. The pompous owner of thousands, enveloped in furs and comfort from head to foot, with yet greater heat derived from indulgence in artificial stimulants, marches by and mutters between his teeth, "Gross imposture!" Yes, another and another pass by, and turn in scorn from the appeals of children's eyes, who in silent suffering cannot suffer tears to trickle down their cheeks. Yet all is imposture! there is no poverty in the land, and unless some charitable person possessed of fewer means but larger capacities chance to near the spot, there is no resource but death or crime to terminate sufferings beyond the power of mortality to endure much longer. Then again, hundreds exist in this wealthy metropolis, who have not the luxury of a shelter from the elements. Their dreary couch is an empty sewer pipe, the bare ground, the arches of bridges, the unfinished dwelling, or the cold stones. Early travellers through London would be surprised at the holes and corners, the pestiferous crevices from which, wrapped in rags and pinched by starvation, human beings roll forth into the light of day to commence another circle of wretchedness and crime. Poor women glide with forms so frail, that the wonder is how they can sustain themselves, much more the little one who nestles in her bosom, and who seems to constitute the only link which binds her to her fellow-men. She glides past dark corners, seeking a resting-place out of sight of the passer-by and those members of constituted authority who urge her on from step to step, from doorway to doorway, until exhausted nature sinks beneath the trial. Let those who sleep upon beds of down, and sink to peaceful slumbers upon a pillow never, perhaps, moistened by a tear, think upon the broken-hearted mother and sorrowing little children, who crouch in rain, and wind, and snow, under the shelter of a doorway, or lay their shivering forms upon the cold stones of a damp alley; let them think of these, and inquire if nothing can be done to avoid this.

To obviate at least a portion of those deplorable results arising from this dreadful position, those buildings called Refuges for the Homeless have been formed, and though inadequate to supply the wants of all the vast body of destitute which exist in the metropolis, their effect has been extremely beneficial in palliating those sufferings which, if reflected upon, harrow up our feelings beyond description. Here they may at least reckon upon shelter for the night, and a warm comfortable meal in the morning, which, at all events, makes them go forth to their employment, whether at begging or aught else, with vigour.

We will conclude our brief outline of Mr. Low's work, by the following table. There are in the metropolis numerous savings banks and loan societies, besides Chelsea and Greenwich hospitals, not included in the following table, which will convey some idea of the stupendous machinery at work for the relief of the poor, the advice of the sick, and the protection of the homeless.

CHARLES THE GREAT.

CHARLES THE GREAT, or Charlemagne, was born in the year 742; some say at the castle of Ingelheim, on the Rhine, a few miles below Mayence, in the grand-duchy of Hesse, in Germany; others, at Salzburg, in Bavaria. He was a son of Pepin the Short, and of Bertha, the daughter of a French count, Chaubert, of Lan. By this lady Pepin had several other children. Pepin himself was the son of Charles Martel, so called from the word martel, a hammer, a nom de guerre given to him in consequence of his immense strength, and the extraordinary valour which he displayed in a battle fought near Poitiers against the Saracens. This Charles Martel was the son of Pepin the Fat, who was descended paternally from St. Arnaud, Bishop of Metz, in Lorraine, and, maternally, from Pepin the Aged, or, as he is often called, Pepin of Landen, a town in the Netherlands, in the duchy of Brabant. Such is the descent of the illustrious Charlemagne, whose brilliant career forms a distinct epoch in the annals of history, standing as a mighty monument between the dark ages which succeeded the fall of the Roman Empire, and the tardy restoration of civilization. Pepin the Short had, besides Charlemagne, three other sons—Carloman, Pepin, and Gilles. The latter became a monk; Pepin died in infancy; and Carloman divided the government of the French dominions with Charlemagne. Pepin had in his will bequeathed that part of his dominions called Austrasia to Charles, his eldest son, leaving the kingdoms of Neustria, Burgundy and Aquitaine to Carloman; but, after the death of the old king, a different division of the kingdom took place, and Carloman was crowned King of Austrasia at Soissons, while Charles, at the same time, was crowned at Noyon as sovereign of the other kingdoms. The amicable feeling that, to all appearance, existed between the brothers when they first assumed the reins of government was, however, of very short duration. Charles was no sooner established in the possession of his father's dominions than he made incursions into Austrasia, and obtained a part of that province for himself; Carloman prepared to resent this injury, but was diverted from his plans of retaliation by the alarming movements of Hundale, the old duke of Aquitaine, who had for some years past been confined in a convent, but, having now regained his liberty, he had assumed his old title of King of Aquitaine; and, as his former subjects received him with open arms, he promised to be rather a formidable enemy to the young princes. Charles, with that promptitude and decision which marked his character through life, instantly marched against his dangerous foe (769), and, though he was deserted by the indolent Carloman in the moment of need, yet he proved victorious, and Hundale was consigned to a prison for life.

Shortly after this event Carloman died at Samancey, near Lan, leaving a widow and two sons, who, upon his death, (771,) fled into Lombardy. Charles was now proclaimed King of Austrasia, and, consequently, the youthful sons of Carloman were cut off, at least for a time, from the succession. Didier, the successor of Astolphus, in the kingdom of Lombardy, thinking to ensure the friendship of the Franks, offered Charlemagne, immediately on his accession, his daughter Desiré in marriage, a beautiful and virtuous princess. The King of the Franks accepted the offer and espoused Desiré, repudiating his first legitimate wife, notwithstanding the opposition of the Pope to this unlawful connexion. However, being a short time afterwards convinced by the arguments of Pope Stephen III. that it was unbecoming in the head of the church to live in adultery, and to take to wife one who had been brought up by the enemies of the holy church, Charles sent the princess back to her father, thereby giving him the most deadly offence. Didier now willingly afforded refuge to the fugitives from Charlemagne's court; and most of the enemies of the French monarch at this period flocked to the court of Lombardy, among whom was the liberated Hundale, the old duke of Aquitaine. Charles was well aware of the mischief that might accrue from such an assemblage of his enemies, and only waited to quell some insurrection of the Saxons which demanded his attention, when, with a numerous army, he crossed the Alps, and, descending into Lombardy, besieged both Pavia and Verona, the only places of strength in that kingdom. In the former of these Didier, with the old duke of Aquitaine, had taken shelter, while Verona was defended by Didier's son Adalgis, under whose protection the widow and children of Carloman had placed themselves. Didier displayed great courage and valour in the contest which ensued, but the arms of Charles proved victorious, and both towns were obliged to surrender, (773). The conqueror very speedily became master of the whole kingdom of Lombardy, and was crowned with the iron crown of the Lombard kings at Milan by the bishop of that place. Adalgis made his escape to Constantinople, but Didier with his wife and daughter fell into the victor's hands, and was sent into France, where, it is supposed, he ended his days as a monk. The widow and children of Carloman, it is also believed, were conveyed to France, but of their ultimate fate history does not speak, although some authors affirm that these hapless children excited the jealous fears of Charles, and came to an untimely end; their doubtful fate must ever reflect disgrace on the otherwise splendid character of the mighty hero. A new monarchy was formed by Charles on the ruins of the old kingdom of Lombardy, under the title of the kingdom of Italy, and indeed, such was the power of the conqueror's arms, that, in a short time, he became master of the whole of Italy, with the exception of a portion in the South, belonging chiefly to the duke of Beneventum. After this conquest, Charles was again obliged to turn his arms against the Saxons, who, throughout his reign, troubled him with continual revolts. Under the guidance of their chief Witikind, they repeatedly invaded those provinces of France which bordered the Rhine, and, although Charlemagne gained repeated victories over this warlike people, he was not enabled to reduce them to entire submission, or to banish Paganism from their country, until a period of thirty years had elapsed, during which time, he was constantly called upon to repress the tumultuous spirits of this people. On one occasion, (783,) Charles was so much enraged by the want of good faith and allegiance among the Saxons, that he closed his heart to mercy, and pursuing the wretched people beyond the Rhine with a numerous army, he caused 4,500 of the flower of the Saxon nobles and people to be beheaded; an act which only exasperated the nation to fresh insurrections, and which leaves an indelible stain on the character of Charlemagne. At last, however, Witikind himself consented to be made a Christian, and, repairing to Aix-la-chapelle, was there baptized in the presence of Charlemagne, who stood godfather to him. The Saxons, however, could not be prevailed upon to follow the example of their chief, and it was not until after many more long years of war, which lasted until nearly the end of this great prince's reign, that his dominion was firmly established over all Saxony, as far as the banks of the Elbe, which, from that time, made part of the Frankish empire. The same good fortune which had smiled on the son of Pepin in his expeditions against the Saxons, continued to favour him, when fighting against the other people of Germany. Thuringians, Frisons, and Bavarians, all originally of Frankish origin, were subdued by him, and governed by officers imposed on them, with the title of dukes. Tasillon, duke of Bavaria, and nearly all the princes of these different people, were put to death, or condemned to end their days in monasteries, like the unfortunate Didier.

The Slavonian nations who attempted to invade Italy, and one of the successors of that insolent Avarian chief who had threatened Constantinople, were obliged by Charlemagne to bow to the Frankish power, and to receive Christianity.—Charlemagne having now attained a good age, together with the summit of power and glory, reigning at once over Germany to the Elbe, all Gaul, Spain to the Ebro, and even over many islands of the Mediterranean, was become sovereign over all European Christendom except the Britannie Islands, and the subjects of the Greek emperors of Constantinople. One title, that of Emperor, was alone wanting,—a title then thought the greatest in the world, as recalling the remembrance of the Roman Cæsars, even to those nations which had assisted in destroying their empire. One day when the monarch (who had returned to Rome, at the earnest entreaties of Pope Leo III.) was present at the mass on Christmas day, the Pontiff suddenly placed on his head the imperial crown, formerly the sign of the Cæsars' power. At this sight the Frank and Roman nobles, the priests and the people who filled the church, saluted him, amidst loud acclamations, with the title of Emperor; and his vast possessions took the name of Empire of the West, a name which had been lost since the taking of Rome by the Goths, in the time of Augustulus. This solemn ceremonial took place on Christmas day, (800). From that time the name of Charlemagne became formidable to the most distant countries of the earth, and obtained respect even from the Greeks who had hitherto regarded all Europeans as barbarians. The Empress of the East, Irene, sought his alliance, and the most celebrated of the Abasside Caliphs, Haroun Al-raschid, sent him all sorts of magnificent presents, the most valuable of which, in the emperor's estimation, was the Keys of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, which the caliph sent him as the highest mark of his respect for the Christian faith. Thus surrounded by magnificence and success did Charlemagne reach the term of the most glorious life ever passed by man, but it is said that he had many misgivings as to the future fate of the country he had founded. At his death, which took place in 814, his son Louis le Debonair succeeded him. Charlemagne was canonized by Pope Pascal III, and is the patron saint of the University of Paris.

A TRUE GHOST STORY.

BY ANNABEL C—.

"Did you ever hear," said a friend once to me, "a real true ghost story, one you might depend upon?"

"There are not many such to be heard," I replied, "and I am afraid it has never been my good fortune to meet with those who were really able to give me a genuine well authenticated story."

"Well, you shall never have cause to say so again; and as it was an adventure that happened to myself, you can scarcely think it other than well authenticated. I know you to be no coward, or I might hesitate before I told it to you. You need not stir the fire; there is plenty of light by which you can hear it. And now to begin. I had been riding hard one day in the autumn for nearly five or six hours, through some of the most tempestuous weather to which it had ever been my ill luck to be exposed. It was just about the time of the Equinox, and perfect hurricanes swept over the hills, as if every wind in heaven had broken loose, and had gone mad, and on every hill the rain and driving sleet poured down in one unbroken shower.

"When I reached the head of Wentford valley—you know the place, a narrow ravine with rocks on one side, and those rich full woods (not that they were very full then, for the winds had shaken them till there was scarcely a leaf on their bare rustling branches) on the other, with a clear little stream winding through the hollow dell—when I came to the entrance of this valley, weather-beaten veteran as I was, I scarcely knew how to hold on my way; the wind, as it were held in between the two high banks, rushed like a river just broken loose into a new course, carrying with it a perfect sheet of rain, against which my poor horse and I struggled with considerable difficulty: still I went on, for the village lay at the other end, and I had a patient to see there, who had sent a very urgent message, intreating me to come to him as soon as possible. We are slaves to a message, we poor medical men, and I urged on my poor jaded brute with a keen relish for the warm fire and good dinner that awaited me as soon as I could see my unfortunate patient, and get back to a home doubly valued on such a day as that in which I was then out. It was indeed dreary riding in such weather; and the scene altogether, through which I passed, was certainly not the most conducive towards raising a man's spirits; but I positively half wished myself out in it all again, rather than sit the hour I was obliged to spend by the sick-bed of the wretched man I had been summoned to visit. He had met with an accident the day before, and as he had been drinking up to the time, and the people had delayed sending for me, I found him in a frightful state of fever; and it was really an awful thing either to look at or to hear him. He was delirious, and perfectly furious; and his face, swelled with passion, and crimson with the fever that was burning him up, was a sight to frighten children, and not one calculated to add to the tranquillity even of full-grown men. I dare say you think me very weak, and that I ought to have been inured to such things, minding his ravings no more than the dash of the rain against the window; but, during the whole of my practice, I had never seen man or woman, in health or in fever, in so frightful a state of furious frenzy, with the impress of every bad passion stamped so broadly and fearfully upon the face; and, in the miserable hovel that then held me with his old witch-like mother standing by, the babel of the wind and rain outside added to the ravings of the wretched creature within. I began to feel neither in a happy nor an enviable frame of mind. There is nothing so frightful as where the reasonable spirit seems to abandon man's body, and leave it to a fiend instead.

"After an hour or more waiting patiently by his bedside, not liking to leave the helpless old woman alone with so dangerous a companion, (for I could not answer for anything he might do in his frenzy,) I thought that the remedies by which I hoped in some measure to subdue the fever seemed beginning to take effect, and that I might leave him, promising to send all that was necessary, though fearing much that he had gone beyond all my power to restore him; and desiring that I might immediately be called back again, should he get worse instead of better, which I felt almost certain would be the case, I hastened homewards, glad enough to be leaving wretched huts and raving men, driving rain and windy hills, for a comfortable house, dry clothes, a warm fire, and a good dinner. I think I never saw such a fire in my life as the one that blazed up my chimney; it looked so wonderfully warm and bright, and there seemed an indescribable air of comfort about the room which I never had noticed before. One would have thought I should have enjoyed it all intensely after my wet ride, but throughout the whole evening the scenes of the day would keep recurring to my mind with most uncomfortable distinctness, and it was in vain that I endeavoured to forget it all in a book, one of my old favourites too; so at last I fairly gave up the attempt, as the hideous face would come continually between my eyes and an especially good passage; and I went off to bed heartily tired, and expecting sleep very readily to visit me. Nor was I disappointed: I was soon deep asleep, though my last thought was on the little valley I had left. How long this heavy and dreamless sleep continued, I cannot tell, but gradually I felt consciousness returning in the shape of the very thoughts with which I fell asleep, and at last I opened my eyes, thoroughly roused by a heavy blow at my window. I cannot describe my horror, when, by the light of a moon struggling among the heavy surge-like clouds, I saw the very face, the face of that man looking in at me through the casement, the eyes distended, and the face pressed close to the glass. I started up in bed, to convince myself that I really was awake, and not suffering from some frightful dream; there it stayed perfectly moveless, its wide ghastly eyes fixed unwaveringly on mine, which, by a kind of fascination, became equally fixed and rigid, gazing upon the dreadful face, which alone without a body was visible at the window, unless an indefinable black shadow, that seemed to float beyond it, might be fancied into one. I can scarcely tell how long I so sat looking at it, but I remember something of a rushing sound, a feeling of relief, a falling exhausted back upon my pillow, and then I awoke in the morning ill and unrefreshed. I was ill at ease, and the first question I asked on coming down stairs, was, whether any messenger had come to summon me to Wentford. A messenger had come, they told me, but it was to say I need trouble myself no further, as the man was already beyond all aid, having died about the middle of the night. I never felt so strangely in my life as when they told me this, and my brain almost reeled as the events of the previous day and night passed through my mind in rapid succession. That I had seen something supernatural in the darkness of the night, I had never doubted, but when the sun shone brightly into my room in the morning, through the same window where I had seen so frightful and strange a sight by the spectral light of the moon, I began to believe more it was a dream, and endeavoured to ridicule myself out of all uncomfortable feelings, which, nevertheless, I could not quite shake off. Haunted by what I considered a painful dream, I left my room, and the first thing I heard was a confirmation of what I had been for the last hour endeavouring to reason and ridicule myself out of believing. It was some hours before I could recover my ordinary tranquillity; and then it came back, not slowly as you might have expected, as the impression gradually wore off, and time wrought his usual changes in mind as in body, but suddenly,—by the discovery that our large white owl had escaped during the night, and had honoured my window with a visit before he became quite accustomed to his liberty.”

POTTERY AND PORCELAIN.¹

AMONG the various arts dear to those possessors of the three good things, wealth, leisure, and taste, whom we call virtuosi and Dilettanti, the Ceramic art holds deservedly a respectable place. We do not pretend that the best special pleader in its behalf can say as much in favour of the intrinsic value of a collection of old china, as may be said by any one of common education in favour of a collection of books, pictures, or statues; but we are disposed to rank a Ceramic Museum above a collection of coins or swords, tulips or beetles. We should do this on the sole ground of the superior utility of the objects collected; for, almost every conceivable thing seems to have been made, at some time or other, in pottery, from the tomb of a chieftain to an infant's rattle; from the rouge-pot of a fine lady to the dwelling of a philosopher; for the tub of Diogenes has been fairly conjectured to be nothing more nor less than a very large crook.

But Pottery and Porcelain claim consideration on another and a higher ground than that of utility, viz. that of beauty. Besides, they have a great historical value; from them much has been gathered concerning the manners and customs and the amount of artistic and mechanical skill and knowledge among the various nations that have practised the art of pottery in ancient and modern times; and there is no nation, excepting, perhaps, in the very lowest stage of savage life, that has not fashioned for itself vessels of clay. This branch of the plastic art was, undoubtedly, one of the first, if not the first cultivated by every people; and the trade of a potter was always esteemed honourable.

“Successful cultivators of the art,” Mr. Marryat tells us in his Preface, “were honoured with statues and medals, decreed to them by the state, and their names were transmitted to posterity by poets and historians. A college for its members was established by Numa, and a family of potters who worked for the king, is mentioned in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah.”

Mr. Marryat observes further:—

“The existence of pottery has proved of the highest value as an aid to historical research. From the pottery of the tombs, we learn the domestic manners of nations long since passed away, and may trace the geographical limits of the various great empires of the world. The extent of ancient Greece, of its colonies, and its conquests, is clearly to be traced through each division of the Old World by the Greek funeral pottery, which, distinct in its character from that of any other, long survived the political existence of the Grecian empire. The limits of the Roman empire are, in like manner, deduced from the remains of the Roman pottery. Beyond the spot where Arminius repulsed the Roman legions no trace of Roman pottery has been found, and the frontier line of the Roman dominion in Britain is marked out in a similar manner. The extent of the Mohammedan empire, in the Old World, and the Aztec dominion in the New, would alike be clearly pointed out by their pottery if no other record of their conquests had been transmitted to us.

“The Ceramic art has always been an object for royal patronage. The Chinese emperors obtained, by high premiums, the unrivalled manufacture of the egg-shell porcelain, and they enrolled the potter martyr in the catalogue of their deities. The dukes of Urbino, by their liberal patronage, introduced the beautiful majolica; from Henry II. and Diana of Poitiers, an unrivalled Fayence derives its name, and that prince and his consort, Catharine de' Medici, developed the genius of Palissy; Augustus the Strong, Maria Theresa, Frederic the Great, and other reigning princes of Germany, both founded and brought to perfection at their own expense, the porcelain manufactures of their respective countries; Russia owes the establishment of hers to Elizabeth and Catharine II.; Charles III. founded those of Capo di Monte and the Buen Retiro; Madame Pompadour, by her influence over Louis XV., brought the porcelain of Sèvres to its unrivalled perfection, while Dubarry gave her name to the most lovely colour it has produced; and William, Duke of Cumberland, supported that of Chelsea, which unfortunately was abandoned for want of encouragement at the death of its royal patron. Even Wedgwood, who, in general, courted no extraneous aid, was fain to secure a certain number of subscribers to enable him to take the copy of the Barberini; while his newly invented earthenware was introduced under the patronage of Queen Charlotte and bore her name."

Had we lived a hundred and fifty years ago, it would have been scarcely possible for us to have written soberly on the subject of porcelain. It was an exciting theme then. Porcelain, or, as it was commonly called, colaspin, was, perhaps, more emphatically fashionable then, than any thing that has ever carried away the wits and the money of the fashionable world, before or since. The reign of china was a very long one, in this country—we mean the universal, despotic reign, when every man, woman and child who had any pretension to taste, was under the sway of a consuming passion for tea-cups and porcelain monsters; when the chief work of ladies of quality was visiting the "Indian shops" at "Matteuse's or the Change," and arranging the useless articles they bought there in their own with-drawing rooms, which must have had very much the appearance of old china shops. "Shakspeare and the musical glasses" were as nothing in point of general interest compared with porcelain. It was the mode,—the rage,—a perfect furor that possessed the town; not the female portion of it only, for the men went mad on the subject too, and spent half their incomes, industriously enough, in forming collections of grotesque teapots, or chimerical animals. The love of such things became a species of adoration which just escaped being a profane worship from the fact that the objects of idolatry represented no things that are in heaven above or in the earth beneath. A hundred-and-fifty years ago it would have been a dangerous thing for any one to write calmly and reasonably about a passion for porcelain. Fifty fair dames, with powder and patches, brocade and hooped petticoats, would rise in tumultuous ire, and brain us with their fans. And these, not the maddest or most frivolous of the sex. By no means! We should have for our deadly enemies great women who "have been among us;"—those pattern women of whom the satirist says, as their highest praise, that they are—

"Mistress of themselves though china fall."

For did not Mrs. Elizabeth Carter make a collection of teapots as well as a translation of Epictetus? Not to mention a dozen other remarkable English women before and since her day, and a starry host of French female philosophes who all ran mad, more or less, about "Gombrome ware," "Palissy ware," "Old Dresden," "Old Sèvres," "Capo di Monte," "Chelsea," &c. The very word China suggests tea,—and both these together, with the words "a hundred and fifty years ago," call up to our fancy strange visions of bygone people.

Lady Mary Wortley Montague, in her brilliant youth, at Twickenham, entertaining "Lord Fanny," and the nightingale of the neighbourhood, not yet converted by her cruel levity into "a wicked wasp." Let us add Mr. Fielding, her ladyship's far-off cousin, and we have a pretty little partie quarrée for the discussion of an infinite variety of subjects—politics, literature, philosophy, the town, and the characters of all their acquaintance. Her ladyship's wit cuts like a two-edged sword, and Pope's, like a well-aimed arrow, whizzes through the air, and pierces the object with unerring accuracy;—some of his arrows, too, are poisoned, as her ladyship in after times can prove. My Lord Hervey is no fool, though he may occasionally spin a thousand bad verses a-day; and the great novelist must have been worth listening to, in such company, and inspired by the gentle intoxication of the Chinese leaf. Reader! I wish I could hand you a cup of their tea, and give you a taste of their manners and conversation, even though it were only about some of the strange "Gombrome vases and monsters" which my lady brought recently out of Turkey.

Or let us look at Horace Walpole entertaining a few choice spirits, wits and virtuosi, at Strawberry Hill. They are examining, with intense interest, a recent purchase of porcelain, made that day by their host; and, thereupon, he tells them a story, at which Mr. Gray, the poet, is mightily amused. Turner, the dealer in china-ware, from whom he bought that same valuable Palissy dish, had a rare vase cracked the other day, by the shock of an earthquake, which frightened all the town into piety, or the contrary. Turner was a quick-witted tradesman, and turned even misfortunes to account. His vase was worth ten guineas before; now he asks twenty for it, "because it is the only vase in Europe that has been cracked by an earthquake." My Lord Chesterfield openly commends his host's taste, and secretly amuses himself with his vanity.

Or, what think you of a formal party, drinking tea out of the finest old oriental porcelain—all point device, correct, and intolerably dull? Fancy, for instance, the Harlowe family entertaining one or two worthy persons;—the persecuted Miss Clarissa and her dear friend Miss Howe looking very pretty, in powder and point-lace, brocaded silk gown and hooped petticoat. Miss Clarissa gazes on her tea-cup, and wonders whether the tiny-footed maiden at the bottom of it who seems walking in an impossible garden of bamboos and parroquets, has any more liberty of action than a young English gentlewoman of the year 17—.

Or, what do you say to joining Mr. Richardson's own proper and particular tea-party; at his house, North End, Hammersmith? Here we have the great printer and novelist in his "flower-garden of women." Surely no author, before or since, ever wrote books in such delightful circumstances. The composition of "Grandison" or "Clarissa" was taken deeply to heart by half-a-dozen charming young women, who looked upon the old gentleman as the best, the greatest genius that had ever deigned to illumine this dull earth. Like all men, Richardson loved to be admired—and like all authors, he loved to have his works admired and listened to;—and he had admirers and listeners, and laudatory commentators to his heart's content. Then, let us look at the salons of Paris at that time. There, display of porcelain and all kinds of pottery is astonishing! So récherché—so costly—so absurdly useless, for the most part. There is little like this to be seen as yet in London; Paris being as usual our forerunner and teacher in matters of fashion and luxurious taste. Let us look into the salon, the boudoir, the chambre à coucher of the "sublime Emilie" of M. de Voltaire, Madame du Châtelet. Even she, with her masculine intellect far gone in the seventh heaven of science;—she, the tenth Muse,—to whom astronomy and pure mathematics were as the last new polka or novel to fashionable ladies in these days,—Madame du Châtelet cherished in her heart a love of vases and cups, and nondescript creatures en pâte tendre and en pâte dure. That chateau of hers to which she led captive her train of admiring savans and hommes de lettres had a goodly show of pottery and porcelain, which with books, maps, globes, telescopes, and mathematical instruments formed appropriate ornaments for the private apartments of so learned and so fine a lady. Let us peep into the salon of Julie, Comtesse d'Houdetot—Who is the passionate-eyed man examining that beautiful specimen of a Majolica vase which the lady has recently fallen in love with? It is—

"The self-torturing sophist, wild Rousseau."

But we must pause in our digression—leaving the reader to continue it or not as he feels inclined. A whole volume might be written on the thoughts and fancies suggested by the word China; but it is not our business to write it now; but rather to give some account of the very beautiful volume on "Pottery and Porcelain," now before us. Its author, Mr. Marryat, is a gentleman who has devoted much time to studying the history of the Ceramic art; and having collected a great deal of information on the subject, he has been induced to put it together in the present form for the benefit of persons who are making collections of pottery or porcelain, or who may be interested in those subjects. It is illustrated with wood-cuts and coloured plates of great merit—the latter are as uncommon in style as they are beautifully executed. These engravings and the handsome type make the work very attractive to the eye.

Mr. Marryat seems to be thoroughly master of his subject, and spares no pains to elucidate it for the general reader. He writes in a grave style, rather too grave, perhaps, for his subject; which would be the better for a little liveliness and occasional elegant and playful chit-chat; if his volume be intended for something more than a learned and conscientiously written hand-book of Pottery and Porcelain, from the fifteenth to the close of the eighteenth century, to which period he has confined his labours. This absence of lightness and sparkle—of appropriate anecdote and witty illustration, is the only fault we have to find with the work; which is really full of useful and interesting information, well arranged and easily referred to. To the collectors and connoisseurs we are quite sure this book will be highly valuable. We will now give a brief account of its contents, and some extracts for the benefit of our readers. In the first place, it may not be unnecessary to give Mr. Marryat's definitions of the two words Pottery and Porcelain. "Pottery, Fayence. This term is applied to all ware which is distinguished from porcelain by being opaque and not translucent. The word is derived from potum, Latin, a drinking vessel."—"Porcelain, a semi-vitrified compound, in which one portion (kaolin) remains infusible at the greatest heat to which it can be exposed, while the other part (petuntse) vitrifies at that heat, and enveloping the infusible part produces that smooth, compact and shining texture, as well as transparency, that are distinctive of true porcelain." But pottery and porcelain approach each other so nearly in some kinds that it is not an easy matter to decide at once whether the article in question is in fact one or the other. Ordinary earthenware is composed of various kinds of clay, and has many technical names. It is always either what is called hard or soft paste. Of porcelain Mr. Marryat says:—

"Porcelain, like pottery, consists of two kinds, distinguished by the technical terms of 'hard and soft paste.' A reference to the Table of Analysis will show that the hard paste is composed of a greater proportion of clay, or aluminum, and less of flint, or silica; to fuse it requires, consequently, a greater degree of furnace heat, which also gives it a greater density of substance than the soft paste. The soft paste, from the larger proportion of silice and the addition of alkaline fluxes, requires a less degree of furnace heat, and consequently acquires less density. It is soft in two senses; first, as being less able to resist a high temperature; and, secondly, as being easily scratched by the knife.

"It therefore appears that the comparative proportion of silica determines the softness of porcelain. Some specimens, as those of early Chelsea, are little better than semi-opaque glass. Reaumur endeavoured to produce porcelain by means of hardening and giving opacity to glass. Böttcher succeeded in making hard porcelain by softening pottery, and rendering it translucent. As porcelain may be considered as an intermediate substance between pottery and glass, both these savans were correct in the principle upon which they proceeded, though their modes of operation were reversed. The most practical test by which to distinguish these descriptions of porcelain is, that the soft paste can be scratched by the knife, which is not the case with the hard paste (rayable ou non rayable par le fer). On one occasion, M. Brongniart having been presented with a choice specimen of old Worcester, affirmed it to be oriental porcelain, till he tested the glaze with a steel point, and found that he could scratch it easily.

"M. Brongniart divides porcelain into three classes:—

- "1. Porcelain, Hard Paste.
- "2. Porcelain Naturally Soft ditto (tendre naturelle).
- "3. Porcelain Artificially Soft ditto (tendre artificielle)."

As the composition of oriental porcelain has always been a matter of mystery and interest to Europeans, we will extract what Mr. Marryat says on the subject of the two minerals known to compose this beautiful substance. He does not here say anything as to the proportions in which they are used; but in a Table of Analysis in the work, the exact chemical combination is set down.

"KAOLIN, Chinese.—Decomposed felspar, or porcelain clay, derived from the decomposition of granite rocks. It consists of silica and alumina; and being mixed with Petuntse (a strong clay) forms the composition of the Chinese porcelain. The Dutch, unable to find the materials necessary for imitating the Indian porcelain, imported the white porcelain from China and Japan, and decorated it at home.

"KAOLIN, Fr. PORCELAINERDE, Ger.—Porcelain clay. That which is used at Sévres comes from the rock of St. Yrieix, near Limoges; the Dresden, from Aue, in Saxony; the English from St. Stephen's, in Cornwall. We refer to M. Brongniart's work—'Traité des Arts Céramiques,' for the history of the Kaolins in use.

"PETUNTSE, Chinese. CAÏLOU, Fr.—Cornish clay—Pegmatite.—Felspar of a brilliant white, used with Kaolin in the composition of porcelain. Felspar melts at the heat of a porcelain furnace into a milky glass; Kaolin does not melt at the same temperature. It is the Kaolin, therefore, which gives strength and body to the porcelain. It is related that some Europeans, having privately obtained some blocks of Petuntse in China, and conveyed them to their own country, vainly endeavoured to convert them into porcelain; which becoming known to the Chinese manufacturers, they deridingly remarked that, 'Certainly the Europeans must be a wonderful people, to go about to make a body whose flesh was to sustain itself without bones.'

The most beautiful kind of modern pottery (this work does not treat of Greek, Etrurian, or Roman) is that known as Majolica, of which our author says:—

"The Italian pottery generally known under the name of Majolica, Raffaello ware, and sometimes by the term 'Umbrian ware,' though the production of the fifteenth century, owed its origin, about the twelfth century, to the introduction into Italy of the Moorish pottery, obtained as the spoil of conquest by the various Italian republican States, engaged in warfare with the Infidels."

The Pisans, he informs us, were the first to carry over into Italy, from the conquered island of Majorca, "the painted Moorish pottery, an article of great value, and supposed to have been almost unknown at that period in Italy."

The bacini, or Moorish tiles (Azulejo), are found incrusting in the walls of the most ancient churches of Pisa, as well as in those of many other Italian towns. Passari, however, asserts that the Azulejo is of native Italian manufacture, as well as the pottery called Majolica. He "claims the invention on behalf of his birthplace, Pesaro; in which city he says that the manufacture of pottery existed from the earliest times; that it remained in abeyance during the decline of the Roman empire, and revived about the fourteenth century, at which period arose the custom of decorating the façades of churches with coloured plates of earthenware (bacini). He thinks it probable that the art originated with Luca della Robbia, and that it might have been brought by the Sforzi to Pesaro, where it could have been easily adapted to all kinds of pottery, at a period long prior to the introduction into Italy of the 'contrefaite majurichine.' Luca della Robbia was born in 1388. He was first known as a sculptor, afterwards he turned his attention to terra cotta. "Vasari writes of him, 'Che fuora l'opere di terra quasi eterne.' His chief productions are Madonnas, Scripture subjects, figures, and architectural ornaments; they are by far the finest works of art ever executed in pottery. He adorned the Italian churches with tiles, as well as with altar-pieces, in terra cotta enamelled; and he is the founder of a school that produced works not much inferior to his own." The term Majolica is derived from the name of the island whence it is supposed to have been first brought into Italy. With regard to that other name of "Raffaello ware;"—many of Raffaello's compositions are found on this kind of pottery, but as the 'Prince of Painters' died in 1520, and the best specimens of Majolica, according to Mr. Marryat, are not of an earlier date than 1540, it is clear that they were not painted by him, or under his direction. But, as his pupils furnished designs for vases, &c. from original drawings by this great man, the name of Raffaello ware was naturally enough given to such articles in Majolica. We have not space to enumerate one half of the articles manufactured in Majolica. They are for the most part of rare beauty of form and colour. From Italy the manufacture of Majolica, and other kinds of pottery, spread into France; where it was called Fayence, from the Italian town of Faenza. There is a description of this ware, which takes its name from the inventor, Bernard Palissy, whose life was so remarkable, that we will extract Mr. Marryat's short biographical sketch, for the use of those among our readers to whom its facts may be new. Pottery has had its men of genius, and of a high kind, too, as the following unadorned account will prove:—

"Bernard Palissy, a man of great natural genius, was born in the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the diocese of Agen, of parents so poor that they could not give him any education. He learnt, however, to read and write, and having acquired some knowledge of land-surveying, obtained a livelihood by following that employment. The habit of drawing lines and geometrical figures inspired him with a taste for design, which talent he developed in copying the works of the great Italian masters. He was employed in painting images and pictures upon glass. He visited the principal provinces in France, examined the monuments of antiquity, and made numerous observations upon different mineral productions, which are astonishing, even at the present day. He also studied chemistry, as it was then taught, in order to know the composition and properties of minerals.

"Palissy, having finished his travels before 1539, established himself at Saintes, and there lived upon the produce of his talent for painting. Seeing at this time a beautiful cross of enamelled pottery, the idea struck him, that if he could discover the secret of the composition of the enamel used, it would enable him to bring up his children creditably; and from that time his mind was solely directed to this object. He soon spent all his savings in useless attempts; but having been employed, in 1543, to make a survey and plan of the salt marshes of Saintonge, this work brought him a considerable sum of money, which he did not hesitate to devote to new experiments. These, however, did not succeed better than the first.

"Neither the complaints of his wife, who reproached him with neglecting an employment which would secure his family from want, nor the representations of his friends, could deter him from continuing his experiments. He borrowed money to construct a new furnace, and when wood failed him he actually burned the tables and boards of his house, to finish the operation, which succeeded but imperfectly. He discharged his only workman, and not having money to pay him, he gave him part of his clothes. Palissy now became so wretched that he dared no longer to show himself, and trembled to meet the looks of his wife and children, whose emaciated appearance seemed to accuse him of cruelty. Although devoured by chagrin, he affected a cheerful air, and persisted still in following up his experiments, until his efforts were at length crowned with the glorious result, to the attainment of which they had been so long and so patiently directed.

"It was in 1555, after sixteen years of experiments, more or less unsuccessful, that he discovered the composition of this long-sought enamel; and soon his beautiful patterns, and rustic pottery (figulines), obtained him fame and patronage. King Henry II., and, following his example, the grand seigneurs of the court, hastened to order from him vases and figures, to ornament their gardens; and the Constable Montmorenci engaged him to decorate his château, at Écouen. Many beautiful fragments from this place have been preserved from destruction, and transferred to the Musée des Monuments Français, among which are some painted tiles, and also some painted glass, representing the history of Payche, after the engraved designs of Raffaele.

"Palissy had embraced the principles of the Reformation; and, when the Parliament of Bordeaux, in 1562, ordered the execution of the new edict against the Protestants, the Duke of Montpensier gave him a safeguard, and ordered that his establishment should be exempted from the general proscription; but, notwithstanding this special protection, he was arrested, his workshop destroyed, by order of the judges at Saintes, and it was necessary for the King himself to claim him as his own special servant, in order to save his life. He was called to Paris, and lodged in the Tuileries, which favour no doubt secured him from the massacre of St. Bartholomew. He there gave a course of lectures upon natural history and physics, which were attended by all the learned men of the day, and which he carried on with increasing success until the year 1584.

"These services did not, however, give him favour in the eyes of the leaguers, since he was arrested by order of the Sixteen, and shut up in the Bastille. Henry III. went to visit him in the prison, and said to him, 'My good fellow, if you do not renounce your views upon the point of religion, I shall be constrained to leave you in the hands of my enemies.' 'Sire,' replied this intrepid old man, 'those who constrain you can never have power over me, because I know how to die.' Events, happily, did not come to this extremity, for the Duke of Montpensier, aware that he was not able to deliver him, humanely delayed the prosecution; and Palissy terminated in prison, about 1589, at the age of ninety, a life which he had rendered illustrious by great talents and rare virtues. His occupation as a potter arose from an accidental circumstance; but the courage and perseverance he displayed throughout his eventful and calamitous career would have been equally conspicuous, whatever pursuit he might have followed. France may indeed be as proud of his noble and independent character, as of the credit attached to his name from having brought the art of enamelling on pottery to a perfection till then unknown in that country. His writings, little known in England, are excessively curious, especially the autobiography of his fickle career; however, from want of precise and definite details, they give little information as to the processes he employed; and after his death, and that of his brothers, who succeeded him, the art was lost."

The manufacture of earthenware was carried on very successfully in Germany, Switzerland and Holland. The last-named country produced the well-known Delft ware. At present, earthenware is made in almost every European country; but the English is the best. Russia makes very good pottery. Mr. Marryat has travelled through great part of Europe, in pursuit of his favourite study, and speaks from personal observation of most of the great and famous manufactories on the continent.

The growth of this manufacture in England was slow, as there occur very few remarkable names connected with English pottery from the reign of Elizabeth till that of George III., when Wedgwood produced his unrivalled Queen's ware.

"Much uncertainty exists regarding the period when the manufacture of fine earthenware was first introduced into England. Among the documents in the Foedera, occur various lists of articles ordered to be purchased in England for several foreign potentates, and permitted to be exported for their use, without paying the Custom duties. One of these lists, dated in 1428, enumerates many objects as those shipped for the use of the King of Portugal and the Countess of Holland, among which are 'six silver cups, each of the weight of six marks (or four pounds), a large quantity of woollen stuffs, and 2,000 plates, dishes, saucers, and other vessels of electrum.'

"As these articles were, no doubt, the produce of the country, it would appear that utensils for domestic use were then made of metal, and not of pottery; and it was not till some time afterwards that the latter was introduced by the Dutch, whose manufactory at Delft probably existed as early as the fifteenth century, and who sent large quantities of their ware to England. The skill and excellence of the English artisans consisted in the manufacture of silver and other metals. Of this, instances are recorded in the correspondence of La Mothe Fénelon, the French ambassador at the court of Queen Elizabeth; and in the travels of Heutznar, who visited England in 1598. Both describe in glowing colours the silver plate which adorned the buffets, as well as the magnificent furniture and decorations of the palaces of that sumptuous queen.

"Still Elizabeth, who so highly prided herself upon the state and splendour of her establishment, and who was in constant intercourse with the court of France and the Low Countries, was not likely to have remained altogether satisfied without possessing, among the manufactures of her own kingdom, something similar to the fine Fayence then in use in every foreign court. Though it is probable that Delft ware, procured from Holland, was first used, it may reasonably be presumed that the ware called by her name, was afterwards manufactured under her immediate patronage, for the use of the court and the nobility; and although there is no record of the fact, it is supposed that Stratford-le-Bow was the site of the manufactory.

"Shakspeare's Jug, which has been carefully preserved by the descendants of the immortal bard, since the year 1616, is perhaps the most remarkable example of the Elizabethan pottery now existing. The shape partakes very much of the form of the old German, or Dutch ewer, without, however, the usual top or cover, the one now attached to the jug being a modern addition of silver, with a medallion bust of the poet in the centre, beautifully executed, and inscribed, 'WM. SHAKESPEARE, AT THE AGE OF FORTY.' It is about ten inches high, and sixteen round at the largest part, and is divided lengthwise into eight compartments, having each a mythological subject in high relief. All of these, although executed in the quaint style of the period, possess considerable merit. Some of them, indeed, manifest much masterly grouping of both human figures and animals; and such is the admirable state of preservation of this very interesting old English relic, that as correct a judgment may be formed of its workmanship as in the days of its first possessor; at all events, as regards the degree of perfection which English pottery had obtained in the Elizabethan age, an inspection of this jug will justify the presumption that her court was not less tastefully provided in that respect than those of the Continent, notwithstanding the obscurity in which the precise locality and extent of the manufactory is unfortunately involved."

Mr. Marryat gives a short account of the rise and progress of pottery (hard and soft), in Germany, Prussia, Holland, &c. and then he proceeds to his history of porcelain. He begins with the oriental; but as he has confined himself to the period between the fifteenth and nineteenth centuries, and the manufacture of porcelain in China and Japan is of great antiquity, like all other arts and manufactures in those countries, he does not devote so much space to this, the highest branch of the subject, as it would seem to deserve; still what he says is very interesting and agreeable. Beautiful porcelain has been fabricated in imitation of the Chinese in various European countries, but it has always fallen below the finest oriental in one or two points. Almost every German state has had, and still has, its manufacture of porcelain; and curious stories are told concerning the methods used by royal personages to monopolise the profits of this manufacture in their own states. Augustus II. Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, was so passionately in love with this manufacture that he was nicknamed by Frederick William of Prussia, "the Porcelain King." He established the celebrated manufactory at Meissen, near Dresden, which has produced so much beautiful porcelain. It was his porcelain majesty who caught and caged the famous Böttcher, a chemist, who had discovered the secret of making oriental porcelain, and compelled him to give up his secret for his benefit, for which he was made director of the works at Meissen. The King of Poland was so bewitched by the charms of forty-eight china vases of an extraordinary size, that he purchased them of the King of Prussia, at a singular price—that of a whole regiment of soldiers. And when Dresden was attacked and taken by the King of Prussia, in 1745, and the porcelain king was obliged to fly, he took good care to carry off from his palace all the china and pictures he could dispose of, although he left the electoral archives behind him. Such was the force of the love of china in a monarch's breast!

We have some interesting details connected with the manufacture of French porcelain. Sèvres, as all the world knows, is the finest, as to colour and composition. The beauty of the form in Sèvres articles is, we think, often disputable. The following account of a successful counterfeit manufacture is curious.

"The Sèvres porcelain, as it is without comparison the most beautiful in colour, and also the most rare and valuable, is consequently the most difficult to procure in a genuine state, the real 'pâte tendre' having been made only from 1740 to 1769. A great quantity of common ware was made during that period, but not much of the fine Bleu de Roi, turquoise, and Rose Dubarry.

"At the conclusion of the last war, the old stocks in the Royal Manufactory of Sèvres were put up to auction, and bought by certain individuals, who also collected all the soft ware they could find in the possession of other persons. The object of this proceeding for a long time remained a mystery; but at length the secret transpired that the parties had discovered a process, which consisted in rubbing off the original pattern and glaze, and then colouring the ground with turquoise or any other colour, and adding paintings or medallions in imitation of the style of the old 'pâte tendre,' thus enhancing a hundred-fold the value of the pieces. With any other description of porcelain the adoption of this process would have been impracticable without discovery, but the soft paste was found to have absorbed in the first baking such an excess of glaze, that the second application of heat had the effect of bringing out a fresh portion, sufficient to cover the surface where the original glaze had been filed away, and thus giving the appearance of the original process. The turquoise was found to succeed the best, and therefore there exist more revivals of this colour than of any other. A china dealer, lately dead, obtained the immense fortune which he left by this artful process. It is very difficult to detect the fraud, but the want of vividness in the colour, and of evenness on the surface of the glaze, will sometimes afford an indication. Also something may be learnt by comparing the date of the former with the period of the style of painting and colour, (the turquoise and rose being of latest date,) and thus any incongruity in this respect will detect the imposture. This comparison can, however, be only completely made at Sèvres, where the model of every piece is preserved."

In conclusion, we need only say that this book is one which the collectors of pottery and porcelain cannot well dispense with; and it is also one which every lady and gentleman possessing a taste for these things will be delighted to lay hands on. It is furnished with a glossary of technical terms, a list of the best collections in England, a list of the marks and monograms of the great manufactories, and of the eminent artists who have designed or executed celebrated pieces of these wares. The coloured plates are beautifully done, and the smaller wood engravings are of great merit. On the whole, it is a book which does great credit to all concerned in its publication, and we have no doubt it will be appreciated by its proper public; part of which, we think, will be found among the readers of "SHARPE."

THE YEAR-BOOK OF THE COUNTRY.¹

"THERE is a time for every thing," and undoubtedly the best time for "babbling of green fields," and finding "sermons in stones, and good in every thing," are these present months, September and October; when every body who can get a holiday, is taking it; in the country, or by the sea-shore. On this account, we hasten to introduce Mr. Howitt's new book to our readers. It is just the sort of book for holiday-makers; just the sort of book that those who know the author's "Book of the Seasons," "Rural Life in England," &c., and love to have them always at hand, will be delighted to add to the number of their favourite volumes, for hours of relaxation.

William Howitt is so well known as an author, that it is unnecessary for us to explain now, what are his peculiar excellences and defects. Those who love his books well, can, of course, see few or no defects in them; and those who do not love them, can see in them very little to admire. To the former it would be of little use to say,—There is nothing original in these works; nothing in thought or feeling that seems to come to us at first hand—nothing very lofty in feeling; nothing very wise or deep in thought;—there is nothing exquisitely delicate, or rich and strong in humour; nothing touchingly tender, nothing highly imaginative or of a subtle intelligence. As a necessary consequence of this, in style, there is much one could desire to see altered; it is often scrambling and unpolished; learning, or scholarly finish and elegance we do not look for, but simplicity, natural fluency and ease, and a freedom from common-place or vulgar taste, would constitute something like the appropriate beauty of style, for such subjects as those in which Mr. Howitt delights to let his pen wander; and such appropriate beauty of style is, undoubtedly, often wanting in the work before us, as in previous works of the same author. Now, those who have read these and thoroughly enjoyed them, would Pooh! Pooh! such critical remarks, and say: "That may be all very true; but William Howitt does not set up for extraordinary learning or genius, that I can see. There is nothing very grand or sublime, or profoundly wise about his books; if there were, they would not suit me in holiday time. I like him because he writes like a good, honest, clever man, with a true love for the beauties of Nature, and sympathy for the joys and sorrows of the crowd, whether in town or country. He has walked about in the world with his eyes open, and he is able and willing to tell you what he has seen. In short, I understand and enjoy William Howitt's books; to my mind they are full of taste, full of spirit, and full of true religious feeling, for they make you love both God and man." To those who see nothing to admire in William Howitt's books, it would be as useless to say,—Mark the active intelligence, the pleasant liveliness, the enjoyment of existence evident in the writer. There is nothing of sickness, of the elevation and depression of the mental thermometer caused by indigestion, in these pages. There is a healthiness about them, which one cannot but find contagious; they are particularly suited to the youthful reader; they are full of the spirit of youth. The reply would be: "Yes, that is all true, but I want something more than an evidence of good digestion and an active intellect in a book; it should not be all full of the spirit of youth; it should have a large leaven of the spirit of mature wisdom."

Between these two parties we take up our position. William Howitt has considerable talent, which he has exercised to some purpose in the "Year-Book of the Country." His descriptions of country occupations and pleasures, of rural sights and sounds, are familiar, we believe, to most readers of modern books. The present work is, of course, chiefly devoted to them; but they are mingled with much agreeable gossip, and many anecdotes and sketches of persons and types of classes which may not be so familiar to our readers. Such for instance, as the following:—

"Those farm-houses are dangerous places. Let no man with a poetical imagination, which is but another name for a very tinkery heart, flatter himself with fancies of the calm delights of the country,—with the serene idea of sitting with the farmer in his old-fashioned chimney-corner, and hearing him talk of corn and mutton—of joining him in the pensive pleasures of a pipe and brown jug of October—of listening to the gossip of the comfortable farmer's wife, of the parson and his family, of his sermons and his tenth pig, over a fragrant cup of young hyson, or lapped in the delicious luxuries of custards and whipt-creams—in walks a fairy vision of wondrous witchery, and with a curtesy and a smile, of most winning and mysterious magic, takes her seat just opposite.

"It is the Farmer's daughter! a lively creature of eighteen. Fair as the lily—fresh as May-dew—rosy as the rose itself—graceful as the peacock perched on the pales there by the windows—sweet as a posy of violets and 'clove-gillivvers'—modest as early morning, and amiable as your own idea of Desdemona or Gertrude of Wyoming.

"You are lost! It's all over with you. I would not give an empty filbert or a frog bitten strawberry for your peace of mind, if that glittering creature be not as pitiful as she is fair. And that comes of going into the country, out of the way of vanity and temptation, and fancying farm-houses only nice old-fashioned places of old-fashioned contentment.

"Ay, many a one has found to his sorrow what trusting himself among hand-churns and rows of bee-hives has cost him. His resolutions of bachelor independence have been whirled round and round, and resolved themselves into melting butter: he has been stung by the queen-bee in the eye, and has felt all over pangs and twinges, as if the whole swarm had got into his bosom. Then has come a desperate liking to that part of the country; and taking that neat cottage just out of the village, with its honeysuckle porch, and willow arbour by the brook; the sauntering down the footpath that leads past the farm of a summer's evening, with a book of poetry in the hand—the seat on the stile at the bottom of the wood—the sudden looking up. How sweet that farm-house does look! What fine old trees those are about it! And that dear little window in the old gable, with its open casement and the diamond panes. And oh! surely! yes—that is Anne herself, and I think she is looking this way!

"Then follow the sweetest walks down by the mill—the sweetest moonlight leaps over the sunken fence at the bottom of the garden—the most heavenly wanderings along that old quince walk. Such vows!—such poetry of passion!—such hopes and promises of felicity;—and then the old farmer looks over the hedge, and says, ‘Who’s there?’

“There! This is a pretty go! Off goes Anne like the spirit of a young lamplighter up the garden, through the house, up the stairs at three bounds, and there she is locked and bolted in that dear little chamber, with the little diamond-window, in the old gable. She has sunk into a chair—it is a very soft one, cushioned comfortably all round, seat, back, and elbows—and very wet is that white cambric handkerchief which she holds to her eyes.

“But where is Captain Jenkinson?—Oh! He’s there! He’s too bold and too true a lover to sneak or fly. There they stand, face to face, in the moon-light—the tall thin Captain Jenkinson and the tall stout Farmer Field, with his huge striped waistcoat ready to burst with hurry and indignation, and his great stick in his hand.

“‘What! Is that you, Captain? My eye! What! was that you a-talking to our Anne?’

“‘Yes, friend Field, it is I—it is the Captain that was talking to your adorable Anne; and here I am ready to marry her with your consent, for never shall woman be my wife but your charming Anne!’

“How that great elephant of a farmer stands lifting up his face, and laughing in the moonlight! How those Herculean limbs do shake with laughter! But now, as the tears stream down his face, he squeezes the youth’s hand, and says—‘Who could have thought it, Captain, eh? Ha! ha! Well, we’re all young and foolish once in our lives; but come! no more on’t—it won’t do, Captain; it won’t do.’

“‘Won’t do! won’t do? Why shouldn’t it do, Farmer; why shouldn’t it do?’

“‘Why, becoss it won’t, and that’s why. A captain and old Farmer Field’s lass! Ah! ah! What will Lady Jenkinson say, eh? The Honourable Captain Jenkinson and the daughter of old Farmer Field! What’ll they say, eh? Say, I’m a cunning old codger: say I’ve trapped you, belike. No, no—they shan’t say so, not a man-jack of ’em; not one of the breed, seed, and generation of ’em shall say old Farmer Field palmed his daughter off on a gentleman for his house and lands. No, Anne’s a tight lass, and John Wright will come at the right time; and when you are married to my Lady Fitzsomebody, and Anne’s got the right man, come down, Captain, and kill us a pheasant, and set up your horses and your dogs here, and we’ll have a regular merry do, and another good laugh at our youthful follies!’

“But all won’t do! The Captain vows he’ll shoot all the old guardians of a row, and tell his mother she may shoot him, if they make any opposition; and the very same night he sticks a note on the end of his fishing-rod, and taps with it at Anne’s little window with the diamond panes, in the old gable; and Anne, jumping from the easy chair, looks out, seizes the paper, clasps her hands, casts down a most affectionate but inconsolable look, and sighs an eternal adieu!—then flying to read the note—finds the Captain vowing that she ‘may cheer up, all shall go right, or that he will manfully drown himself in the mill-dam.’

“Now, there is a pretty situation of affairs! and all through incautiously wandering into the country of a summer’s evening, and getting into one of those old-fashioned farm-houses. It would serve them all right to leave them in their trouble. It might act as a warning to others, and place the dangers of the country in their genuine light. But as the Captain would be almost certain to drown himself in the mill-dam, he is so desperate, and then there must be a coroner’s inquest, and we might, at a very inconvenient moment, be called up to serve upon it, we will for this once let things pass—all shall be right. The guardians relent because they cannot help themselves; Lady Jenkinson becomes a good deal, but, like all bodies of a certain specific gravity, she comes down again. The adorable Anne is not drowned in her own pocket handkerchief, though she has been very near it! and The Times announces that the Honourable Charles Jenkinson, of the Light Dragoons, was married on the 7th inst to Anne Leslie, the only daughter of Burley Field, Esq., of Nycomore Grange, Salop.”

There is something very pretty and natural about this sketch, with the exception of the style of the imaginary conversation between the father and the lover, which is by no means natural, and would scarcely come within the limits of fictional probability in a farce at the Surrey theatre. The next sketch is far better finished, and worthy of the author. We will extract it. Dolly Cowcabbage is a type of another kind of farmer’s daughter. It is true to the life. It is not unlike a Dutch picture, both as to subject and style of treatment. And here he it observed, the homely and the merely useful are made to serve an æsthetical purpose, and touch the feelings gently, as if the quality of beauty had been elicited from them;—and it has.

“There are some specimens of human nature that not all the fashions or follies of any age can alter or make new-fashioned. They are born old-fashioned. They have an old head on young shoulders, and they can’t help it if they would. You might as soon turn a wheel-barrow into a chariot, or an ass into an Arabian steed. There is Dolly Cowcabbage, now, what can you make of her? Her father farms eighty acres, and milks half a dozen cows. He has nobody but her; and he has saved a pretty lot of money. Dolly knows of it, too. Her mother died when she was only about fourteen; and Dolly, from that day, began to be her father’s little maid;—left her play on the village-green and village play-fellows, and began to look full of care. She began to reap and work, and cook, and milk and make cheese. It is many a year since she has done all those things entirely for the house. Those who know her say she ‘has not thriven an inch in height’ since that day, but she has grown in bulk; she is like a young oak that got a shock from a thunderbolt in its youth, or had its leading branch switched off by some Jerry Diddle or other, as he went past to plough, and has ever since been stunted, and has run all to stem. She is a ‘little runting thing,’ the farmers say;—a little stout-built, plodding woman, with a small, round, rosy face. She is generally to be seen with a linsay-wolsey petticoat, a short, striped bed-gown or kirtle, and a greenish brown kerchief carefully placed on her bosom. She is scouring pails with a wisp of straw and wet sand, and roaring them on a stone bench to dry and sweeten; or she is calling her cows up by blowing on a long horn; or calling her father and the men to their meals, out of the distant fields, by knocking with a pebble on a pail-bottom. She is coming out of the fold-yard with a milk-pail on her head, or she is seated by the clean hearth, busy with her needle, making a pillow-case to hold the feathers she has saved.

“Such is Dolly Cowcabbage. She has had offers; men know what’s what, though it be in a homely guise; but she only gives a quiet smile, and always says—‘No! I shall never marry while father lives.’ Those who don’t like sour grapes begin now to say,—‘Marry! No. Doll ’ull never marry. There always was an old look about her; there’s the old maid written all over her—any body may see that with half an eye; why, and she’s thirty now, at least.’

“But Dolly knows what she knows. There is a homely, close, plodding sort of chap, that lives not far off—Tim Whetstone. He farms his fifty acres of his own. He has nobody in the house with him but an old woman his housekeeper, who is as deaf as a bolt, and has a hundred and thirty-guineas of old gold, wrapped in an old stocking, and put into a dusty bee-hive that stands on her bed's head. Tim knows of that too, though the old woman thinks nobody knows of it. She hath neither kith nor kin, and when the lumbago twinges her, as they sit by the fire, she often says—'Tim, lad, I shall not trouble thee long, and then what two or three old traps I have 'ull be thine.'

"Tim is certain, before long, to find honey in the old hive; and he has been seen, sly as he is, more than once, coming over the fields, in the dusk of the evening, in a very direct line towards old Farmer Cowcabbage's house. He says it was only to seek a lamb which he had missed. But when somebody asked him if it were the same lamb that he was looking after so earnestly in church last Sunday, Tim blushed and said—'All fools think other people like themselves,' and so went away. If the old woman should drop off, I should not be surprised to see those two farms thrown into one, and old Samuel Cowcabbage having a bed set up in the parlour at Tim's. In the meantime, Dolly goes to market with her maund (a basket with two lids) of butter on her arm as regularly as Saturday comes. She makes eighteen ounces to the pound, and will have the top-most price. Beautiful cream cheeses too, Dolly manufactures; and if any one attempts to beat her down in her price, Dolly is just as quiet, as firm, as smiling, and as ready with her 'No,' as she was to her sweethearts. If I were to prophesy, it would be that Dolly will marry, and have half a dozen children yet, as sturdy and as plodding as Tim and herself; but there is no knowing. She tells 'Tim they are very well off as they are—she can wait; and the truth of the matter is, that they have kept company these ten years already."

Is not that picture as clever as it is accurate? The Farmer's daughters, as Mr. Howitt seems to be fully aware, are by no means the least important of the womankind of this realm. He gives us a specimen of another kind; which is also very good. Nancy Farley is not so common a character as the other two, for the simple reason that she is above the common, and they are not.

"Nancy's father farms his two hundred acres, and yet there is a slovenly look about his premises; and Nancy has grown up pretty much as she pleased. As a girl, she romped and climbed and played with the lads of the village. She swung on gates and rode on donkeys. When ten or twelve years old, she could ride bare-back and astride with a horse to water, or to the blacksmith's shop. She thrashed the dogs, fetched in the eggs, suckled the calves, and then mounted on the wall of the garden, with her long chestnut hair hanging wild on her shoulders, and a raw carrot in her hand, which she was ready either to devour or to throw at any urchin that came in sight.

"Such was Miss Nancy Farley in those days; but her only appellations then were Nan and Nance. Nance Farley was the true name of the wild and fearless creature. But Nance was sent for by an aunt to a distance; she was away five years; she was at length almost forgotten, and only remembered when it was necessary to call any girl, 'as wild as Nance Farley'; when lo! she made her appearance again; and great was the wonder. Could this be the gipsyish, unkempt, and graceless Nance Farley?—This bright and buxom young lady in the black hat and the blue riding-habit?—This fine young creature with a shape like a queen and eyes like diamonds?—Yes, sure enough it was she—now, Miss Nancy Farley, indeed.

"Miss Nancy's aunt had determined that she should have what is called a 'bringing up.' She had sent her to a boarding-school; and whatever were Miss Nancy's accomplishments, it was clear enough that she was one of the very handsomest women that had ever set foot in the parish. The store of health and vigour that she had laid up in her tom-boy days might be seen in her elastic step, and cheek fresh as the cheek of morning itself.

"She was something above the middle size, of a beautiful figure, and a liveliness of motion that turned all eyes upon her. Her features were extremely fine, and her face had a mixture of life, archness, freedom, and fun in it, that was especially attractive, and especially dangerous to look upon. Her eyes were of half-a-dozen different colours, if half-a-dozen different people might be believed; but, in truth, they were of some dark colour that was neither black, nor brown, nor grey, nor hazel; but one thing was certain, they were most speaking and laughing and beautiful eyes, and those long, flying locks were now, by some gracious metamorphosis, converted into a head of hair that was of the richest auburn, and was full enough of a sunny light to dazzle a troop of beholders.

"Nancy had enough of the old leaven in her to distinguish her from the general run of ladies, with their staid and quiet demeanour. She was altogether a dashing woman. She rode a beautiful light chestnut mare, with a switch tail; and her brother Ben, who was now grown up, with the ambition of cutting a figure as a gay blade of a farmer, was generally her cavalier. She hunted, and cleared gates and ditches to universal admiration. Every body was asking, 'Who is that handsome girl that rides like an Arab?' Miss Nancy danced and played and sang; she had a wit as ready as her looks were sweet, and all the hearts of the young farmers round were giddy with surprise and delight. Miss Nancy was not of a temper to hide herself in the shade, or to shun admiration. She was at the races, at the fair, at the ball; and every where she had about her a crowd of admirers, that were ready to cat one another with envy and jealousy. The young squire cast his eyes upon her, and lost no time in commencing a warm flirtation; but Nancy knew that she could not catch him as a husband,—he was too much a man of the world for that; and she took care that he should not catch her. Yet she was politic enough to parade his attentions whenever he came in the way, and might be seen at the market inn window, or occasionally on the road from church, laughing and chatting with him in a fashion that stirred the very gall of her humbler wooers. The gay young gentleman-farmer, the rich miller, the smart grazier, the popular lawyer of the country-town, were all ready to fight for her; nay, the old steward, who was nearly as rich as the Squire himself, and was old enough to be her father, offered to make a settlement upon her that filled her father with delight.

"'Take him, Nance, lass, take him,' he cried; 'thy beauty has made thy fortune, that it has. Never a woman of our family was ever worth a hundredth part of that money.'

"But Miss Nancy had a younger and a handsomer husband in view; and Miss Nancy is Miss Nancy no longer: she has married the colonel of a marching regiment, and is, at this moment, the most dashing and admired lady of a great military circle, in the garrison town of—"

Mr. Howitt's acquaintance with farms and farmers' daughters appears to be envitably extensive. He seems to be also well acquainted with the country schools and schoolmasters of the last thirty or forty years. He says many sensible things concerning their merits and defects, and points out strongly this truth, that the village schools all over England are much more in want of masters than of scholars. We are favoured with a genuine love-letter, written by a country schoolmaster of the last generation, which is quite worthy of one of Shakspeare's pedagogues. Every creature makes love after its kind, and this is the kind of love-letter the country schoolmaster makes. It was well worth double postage.

"ESTEEMED FRIEND,

"I embrace the present opportunity of addressing these few lines unto thee, hoping they will find thee in good health, which leaves me the same, thank my God! Respected P., I have often told thee I don't much like illustrating my sentiments by correspondence, but I write with a majestic air of animation and delight when I communicate my thoughts to one that I love beyond description; yes! to one that is virtuous, innocent and unblemishable; which has a comely behaviour, a loving disposition, and a goodly principle. And thou the person! charming fair one, which may justly boast of thy virtue, and laugh at others' aspersion. Dear P., when I reflect on all thy amiable qualities and fond endearments, I am charmingly exalted, and amply satisfied. My senses are more stimulated with love, and every wish gives thee a congratulation. Amiable P., I have meditated on our former accompaniments, and been wonderfully dignified at thine condescending graces. I, in particular, admire thy good-temper, and thine reluctant forgiveness. For when we have parlook of a walk together, some trifling idea has exasperated my disposition and rendered my behaviour ungenerous and disreputable. Thou, like a benevolent friend, soothed the absurd incensement, and instantly resuscitated our respective amorousness, and doubly exaggerated our beloved enamours. While above all others I thee regard, and while love is spontaneously imprinted in our hearts, let it have its unbounded course. Loving friend, I was more than a little gratified that thou wrote to thy mistress, which was thy duty, for she has been thy peculiar friend, and gave thee competent admonition. She is a faithful monitor and a well-wisher to thine everlasting welfare. I was absolutely grieved when I heard of thee not being well, and completely fretted that I was aloof, and could not sympathise with thine inconsonant moments. I candidly hope thy cough is better, and I earnestly desire that our absence may be transformed into lasting presence, that we may enjoy our fond hopes and loving embraces.

"My dear, the last Sunday that I was at Bevington, I parted with thee about four o'clock; and stopped in the market-place looking at the soldiers parading, and harkening the band playing till about six o'clock; then I proceeded on my nightly excursion. I called at the public house, and was spouting a little of my romancing nonsense, and I instantly received a blow from a person in the adjoining company. I never retaliated, which was very surprising; but a wisely omission. I should not have troubled thee with this tedious explanation, hadst thou not been preposterously informed about the subject. Thy ingrateful relations can't help telling thee of my vain actions, which is said purposely to abolish our acquaintance. But we are so accustomed to their insinuating persuasions and ambidextrous tales that renders them unlikely to execute their wilful designs. Our loves are too inflexible than to be separated by a set of contemptuous rafs.

"My dearest dear, at this present time I wish I had thee dandling between my arms. I would give that sweet mouth ten thousand kisses, for I prefer thy well composed structure above all other secular beauties.

"Loving P., I will positively come to fetch thee at the respective period, when we can have a consolable and delightful journey homewards, reanimate our fond and innocent delights, salute at pleasure, and every kiss will sweeten our progressive paths; they will add delightfully to our warm affections, and invigorate us to perform our journey with the greatest facility. I thank thee for sending thy complimentary love to me, which I conclude with ten thousand times ten thousand respects.

"I remain thine ever faithful and constant lover,
M. G."

As we have given the above letter, we cannot do better than subjoin some remarks of the Author upon country schoolmasters generally, which deserve to be circulated far and wide, among the so-called enlightened people of this generation; people who are apt occasionally to forget the dark days of their fathers, and to whom it was that they themselves owe the first sparks of that light, by which they now see so clearly over the heads of others. Their intellectual touches should be carefully carried, not brandished in the faces of those who are half blind.

"This is only the ludicrous side of the country schoolmaster; he has another and a nobler one. Much as we may now despise him, and lightly as we may derive by one sweeping Act of Parliament to consign him and all his compeers to instant ruin and a union workhouse finale, to him the country owes a large debt of gratitude. Without aid of parliament or parish, from age to age, he has opened his little gymnasium, and tamed and civilized the fauns and satyrs of the rural wilderness. What little light and knowledge have radiated through our villages and fields, it is he that has kindled them. It is he who has enabled the farmer, the miller, the baker, and every little tradesman and mechanic, to conduct his affairs, manage his markets, and add to the capital of the nation. It is he who has taught the tough cub of the hamlet to make his bow and to respect his superiors; in fact, to get a glimmering of morals and manners, and a possible shape of humanity. Nay, many of these humble men have been clergymen, who have won honours at college, and have been full of the fire of genius and the kernel of wisdom, but who, not having the golden wings of this world, have sunk down into obscure Thorpes and Wicks, and in far-off fields and forest regions have gone on their way, like little unnoticed brooks, moaning over their lot, yet scattering plenty and greenness around them. How many are there, at this day, sitting in uncouth garbs, in uncouth places, on dreary moorlands, amongst wild fells and mountains! Such have I seen in various parts of these kingdoms, and wondered at their patience and holy resignation. On the tops of wildest hills, by some little chapel, like that of Firbank, near Sedburgh, in Yorkshire, I have opened the door of a cabin which was filled with a hum as of bees, and found a company of bare-legged boys and girls, round a peat fire on the hearth, and a young man, with the air of a scholar and a gentleman, sitting as their teacher. Yes, in many a bleak and picturesque situation, where the old school bell hangs in the old chestnut-tree, in a little rude church or chapel or ancient school-house, are such men as Wordsworth has described in Robert Walker of Cumberland, still to be found.

"What a picture that of Robert Walker is!—Right hours in each day, during five days in each week, and half of Saturday, except when the labours of husbandry were very urgent, he was occupied in teaching. His seat was within the rails of the altar; the communion-table was his desk; and, like Shenstone's schoolmistress, the master employed himself at the spinning wheel, while the children were repeating their lessons by his side.

"This mountain patriarch, who never made any charge for teaching, but took all that came—and such as could afford gave him what they pleased—not only performed service twice every Sunday, but was the scrivener of the neighbourhood, writing out petitions, deeds of conveyance, wills, covenants, &c.; so that at certain periods of the year he was obliged to sit up the greater part of the night. Besides spinning at all possible hours, he also cultivated his garden and a little farm, and assisted his neighbours in hay-making and shearing their sheep.

"And what was the value of his living? 17l. 10s. a year!"

In a later portion of the work, when he is giving some account of some unfrequented parts of Germany, Mr. Howitt takes the opportunity of dwelling upon the superiority of our continental neighbours to ourselves in the matter of national education; this strikes most English travellers, and to one whose attention is much directed to the morals and manners, pleasures and occupations of the lower classes, it strikes painfully. But, all in good time. England will educate her poor, as soon as ever they themselves are sufficiently anxious for education; which seems to be the case now. Abroad, the poor must be taught, by the command of the government, willy nilly. Free and enlightened British citizens might object to be made wiser and better, upon compulsion.

There is a great deal of pleasant reading in this volume, and much useful information. It is divided into twelve sections, each devoted to one of the months of the year. The matter in each section, however, has often nothing whatever to do with the month whose name it bears. We have a very fair budget of fireside stories at the end; consisting of ghost stories, "dreams, warnings, and providences." They are all well told, and have a good air of authenticity about them. One called "The Old Well in Languedoc," taken from the Courier de l'Europe, is a very strange true story, as interesting in its way as the Murder of the Red Barn, which attracted so much attention here some twenty years ago. All who love "the Night side of Nature" should read what Mr. Howitt has to say about it, in his present book. His account of a short tour in the Odenwald is very pleasing, as is also the account of another short journey into the Vosges, to see the Castle of Trifels, in which Richard Cœur de Lion was confined by Leopold of Austria. Of the castle itself, he says:—

"Trifels was now looking down upon us in our inn, and in the morning we set out to it. The hill is lofty, steep, and clothed with wood; a winding road conducted us to the top, though not in less than a good half-hour's ascent. The castle as you approach it is a very striking object. First, you follow a hollow stony road; near the summit you look up, and over your head see a stupendous rock frowning, pushing out a narrow but lofty point far into the air. Then, as you advance, your eye catches above you amongst the trees a tall massy tower, and from it to another tower springs a narrow, lofty arch, like a rainbow. The effect is pleasantly startling. You observe other walls above you half buried in trees, and as you move round the outer tower, the high, light rainbow arch comes finely into front view, and several flights of steps lead your eye upwards to where, on its elevated foundation of rock, soars aloft the castle itself."

It will not be an agreeable task, to note down the few objections that we are inclined to raise, as we go carefully through this book, and we shall therefore say little about them; the good points are preponderant.

But why does Mr. Howitt go to Queen Elizabeth's Hunting Tower in Epping Forest, for the express purpose as it seems of heaping abuse on her memory. Why add anything to the present popular prejudice against her? Why call her "that wretched old woman," "that ancient hag and Jezobel," "an assassin," "a murderer," a "royal tigress," "that bad old woman," "the heroine of the Armada farce, and the Queen of Scots tragedy?"

The nightingale's song is sweet,—but who can say, if he think for a moment of the import of his words, that, "it pours forth hymns of love and worship, more beautiful than Pindar or even David ever wrote!" It is not doing honour to humanity and the great Creator, to speak thus of those whom he has made to know him while they sing his praise. Again, we think Mr. Howitt has quite taken the point and the interest away from the story of Charlemagne's Daughter and the Secretary. It was the Lady who carried her lover through the snow, not the lover the lady. That would have been a polite attention on his part, but nothing at all remarkable. In conclusion, let us assure our readers, whether in town or country, that they will find in the "Country Year-Book" amusement and instruction for every day in the year.

There is so strong a love for the beauties of the rural districts of England and Wales in the heart of William Howitt, that it overruns almost every page he writes, and makes all his books more or less alike; but in the one before us there is more of variety than in several of his most popular works, and quite as much of revelling in country things as in any other. This author tells us in simple prose, many times over, the great truth which Wordsworth has embodied in these well-known, but never too well-known lines:—

— "Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her. 'Tis her privilege
Through all the years of this our life to lead
From joy to joy. For, she can so inform
The mind that is within us; so impress
With quietness and beauty; and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all
The dreary intercourse of common life,
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith that all which we behold
Is full of blessings."—

SEA BATHING

THIS is a very pretty subject, and one that will come home to most of our subscribers at this season of the year. We need say but little about it, except to remark that it is one of the most pleasing of Collins's marine subjects, in which that master was so deservedly famous. A shrimp catcher—a fisherman with his nets or a child playing upon the beach—touched in by his delicate and feeling pencil, have a magic which is vainly sought for in the works of any other painter of similar subjects.

SEA-SIDE SKETCHES.—DUNWICH FAIR.

BY AGNES STRICKLAND.

"AND so you will not join our party to Dunwich fair to-morrow, Elizabeth?" said Margaret Blackbourne to the pretty daughter of the Vicar of Southwold, with whom she was returning from a long ramble along the broken cliffs towards Eastern Baven, one lovely July evening in the year 1616.

Southwold, be it known to such of my readers as may happen to be unacquainted with its locale, is a pretty retired bathing town on the coast of Suffolk, remarkable for its picturesque scenery and salubrious air. At the time when the events on which my tale is founded took place, Southwold, though it boasted none of the pretty marine villas which now grace the Gunhill and centre cliffs, was a place of greater wealth and importance than with all its modern improvements it is at present. It was then one of the most flourishing sea-ports in Suffolk, and occasionally sheltered in its ample bay the stateliest ships in the British navy. And, in addition to the little corn-brigs and colliers, whose light sails alone vary the blue expanse of waters, a mighty fleet of vessels of war might not unfrequently be seen stretching in majestic order along the undulating coast between Eastness and Dunwich, and the more remote promontory of Orford-Ness. Dunwich, too, that Tyne of the East Angles, sat not then so wholly desolate on her crumbling cliff as now overlooking, in dust and ashes, the devouring waves of the German ocean in which her former glory lies buried two centuries ago. Dunwich, however changed and fallen from what she was in olden time, still retained the rank of a city; and, instead of the miserable horde of smugglers' and fishermen's huts we now behold, with the roofless remains of one lonely church, there were busy and populous streets, with shops, and some appearances of maritime enterprise and mercantile prosperity. The annual fair, which still takes place there on St. James's-day, was at that time considered as a most attractive holiday by the denizens of all the scattered towns and villages along that picturesque coast. Many a well-manned yawl and light sailing-vessel would, in those days, put off from Southwold, Lowestoft, or Aldborough, freighted with a pleasure-loving crew, eager to enjoy a summer voyage and a merry day at old Dunwich.

A great revolution has taken place in public opinion since then, with respect to fairs, which so far from being exclusively the saturnalia of the vulgar and dissolute, were then used as marts for the sale of various articles of domestic produce; and regarded by all classes of society as seasons of social glee, where all meet together, from the highest to the lowest, in gala array, with smiles on their faces, and good-will in their hearts, to participate in cheerful sports and harmless mirth, in which good order and decency were observed out of respect for the presence of ladies and gentlemen.

Christopher Younges, Elizabeth's father, was, however, a man of stern notions; and looking on the dark side of the picture, the abuse of such assemblages, he absolutely condemned them as affording fatal opportunities for the idle, the extravagant, and the dissipated to indulge in sinful excesses, and to seduce the weak and unstable to follow bad example. He had never, on any occasion, permitted his pretty daughter Elizabeth, then in the opening bloom of eighteen, to display her youthful charms and gay attire even at the annual fair held in their own town; and she knew, as she told her gay companion, Margaret, "that it would be in vain to ask his permission to join the festive party on the morrow."

"For my part," rejoined Margaret, "I would as leave be a nun, and live shut up between four stone walls, as be subjected to such restraints! My father is the worshipful bailiff of this town, but he never stands in the way of a little harmless pleasure."

"Very true, Margaret; but my father, being a minister of the Gospel, understands these things better, you know."

"What, better than a magistrate? the chief magistrate of the borough and corporation of Southwold, Bessy Younges? No, no, my dear; you won't persuade me to that. Your father is a very good kind of man, and has a deal of book knowledge; but my father says, 'he knows very little of the world, and is far too stiff in his notions for his congregation,'" exclaimed Margaret.

"It may be so," observed Elizabeth, "but as I am bound to pay double attention to my father's advice, both as my parent and my pastor, I beg to hear no more on the subject."

"As you please, Elizabeth;—but have you seen Arthur yet?"

"Arthur! I thought he was at sea."

"He landed this morning at seven."

"And you not to tell me of it before!"

"I thought you had seen him; but I dare say he has called at the vicarage while we have been out walking."

"How very provoking!"

"Never mind; you will have enough of his company to-morrow, if you go to Dunwich fair with us."

"But I am not going to Dunwich fair!" cried Elizabeth, pettishly, "and if Arthur Blackbourne goes without me I will never speak to him again."

"And if you do not there are plenty in this town who will be ready to pull caps for him, I can tell you. There is Joan Bates will be only too happy to sit by him in the boat, and she says,—"

"Something vastly impertinent, I dare say; but I don't want to hear any of her cross speeches second-hand: I beg you will save yourself the trouble of repeating them, Margaret. It is getting late, and I must hasten home."

Time had, indeed, stolen a march on the vicar's fair daughter, while she had been discussing this interesting subject with her youthful friend and gossip, the sister of her sailor lover; for the full-orbed moon had already reared her bright face over the swelling waves, and was pouring a flood of radiance through the bay, and illuminating the high-arched windows of All Saints' church on the distant dark promontory of Dunwich cat-cliff.

Elizabeth turned resolutely about to pursue a homeward path; but, at the little turnstile leading to the vicarage, which then with its neat garden and paddock adjoined the western boundary of the churchyard, she encountered Arthur Blackbourne and her brother Edward.

"Where have you been cruising out of your course, girls, for the last age?" cried Arthur: "here have I been giving chase to you both in all directions, till I have hardly a leg to stand on!"

"We have only been for a walk to Easton Broad," said Elizabeth.

"A walk to Easton Broad, the very evening of my return, and without me!"

"How should I know you were home?"

"There were other girls in the town who contrived to find it out;—aye, and pretty girls too,—but they took the trouble of keeping a look-out for the Jolly Nicholas," rejoined Arthur reproachfully.

"So did Bessy, I am sure!" exclaimed the boy Edward, with great vivacity: "why, she wholly crazed us about the Jolly Nickolas, and sent me a dozen times a-day to ask our old pilots at the station, whether she were in sight, till they were so sick of the Jolly Nicholas and me, that they got as savage as so many sea bears, and give me the name of 'Old Nick' for my pains."

"Joan Bates was on the beach to welcome me on shore when I landed," pursued Arthur.

"Just like her; she is always so forward," retorted Elizabeth.

"It would be well if some people thought as much of me as Joan Bates," continued Arthur.

"And if you have nothing more agreeable to say to me, Arthur Blackbourne, I will wish you good night," said Elizabeth. "Come, Edward."

"You are in a mighty hurry, I think; when you have not seen me for six months, and I have thought of you, sleeping and waking, all that time, and now you won't speak one kind word to a poor fellow!" said the young sailor.

"I have spoken quite as many as you deserve," retorted Elizabeth; "if you want flattery, you may go to Joan Bates."

"And so I will, if you are not more lovingly disposed the next time we meet," said Arthur; "but you will be better tempered, I hope, at Dunwich fair to-morrow."

"I am not going to Dunwich fair."

"Not going to Dunwich fair, Bessy! a pretty joke, I faith, when the Royal Anne is new painted and rigged with her best flags and canvass all ready to take us; and we have the prospect of a glorious day to-morrow."

"No matter; I shall not go."

"How very perverse;—just to vex me, I suppose!"

"You know my father does not approve of fairs."

"Fiddle-de-dee! there will be plenty of people as good as Parson Younges, at Dunwich fair, and some a little wiser, mayhap."

"I am sure there is no harm in going to a fair," said the boy Edward; "and, oh dear! how I should like to go to-morrow."

"So you shall, my hearty, if you can persuade Bessy to go with us."

"Pray, sister, let us go! there will be such fine doings:—a pair of dancing bears, and three jack-an-apes dressed like soldiers, a mountebank with an Andrew and a Master Merriman, and such lots of booths with toys and beads and ribbons; more cakes and sweetmeats than I could eat in a year; besides a merry-go-round and two flying ships. Then, there will be wrestling and cudgel-playing, foot-ball, jumping in sacks, and dancing on the church-green to the pipe and tabor, and you dance so well."

"And we should dance together," whispered the handsome mate of the Jolly Nicholas.

"It is all very fine talking; but my father will never consent."

"Tut, tut; you have not asked him yet."

"It would be useless if I did."

"That is more than I know; for no ship is always in the same tack. Men change their minds as often as girls; and if you coax the old boy handsomely, when you bid him good night, my compass to your distaff, he'll let you both go."

"Oh, do try, dear sister Bessy!" cried Edward, hanging on her arm.

"Well, I suppose I must; and if my father consents I will join you on the beach with Edward at six to-morrow morning."

"We shall wait for you, remember," said the sailor, "so come and let us know at all events; for time and tide tarry for no one," and so they parted.

Elizabeth, when she preferred her suit to her father that evening, met with a positive denial, accompanied with a stern rebuke for her late return from her evening ramble. She retired to her own chamber in tears, and cried herself to sleep. She dreamed of the forbidden pleasure; and that she was seated in the gaily painted Queen Anne, at the helm by the side of her long-absent sailor love, listening to his whispered endearments, as the boat glided rapidly towards the scene of festive enjoyment, to which the merry pealing of bells seemed to invite her. At five she was awakened by a light tap at her chamber door. from her little brother, who whispered, "Oh, sister Bessy, it is such a lovely morning, let us go and see the boats push off for Dunwich fair!"

"To what purpose?" cried the mortified girl, "the sight of them will only increase my vexation."

"Oh, but you promised to let Arthur and Margaret know; and they will take it unkindly if you do not keep your word," said Edward.

Far wiser would it have been for the brother and sister if they had kept out of the way of temptation; but mutually compounding with their consciences, that there could be no harm in going to see the boat off, since they did not mean to sail with her crew, they left the paternal roof together, and tripped hand-in-hand towards the spot where the Queen Anne, with her new crimson pennon, lay in readiness for the launch, surrounded by a gaily-dressed group of females, young and old, in their holiday attire, jovial seamen, and blithe young bachelors of the town, among whom, but superior to them all, stood Arthur Blackbourne, in his sable fur cap with a bullion cordon and tassels. His nautical dress differed little in fashion from that of the rowers of the yawl, only that his doublet was of a smarter cut and finer material, and surmounted with a full ruff of Flanders lace, a piece of foppery in which the handsome mate of the Jolly Nicholas imitated the fashion of the court of James I., and was enabled, by his trading voyages to Antwerp and Hamburg, to indulge without any great extravagance. He had brought home half a dozen yards of this costly adornment and a damask gown for the vicar's fair daughter, and he communicated the fact to her in a loving whisper, when, after springing halfway up the cliff at three bounds to meet her, he had fondly encircled her waist with his arm, to aid her in the descent to the beach.—“And the damask is white damask,” pursued he, “on purpose for your wedding gown; and I have a pocket full of silver and gold besides, to treat you with anything you may fancy at Dunwich fair, my sweeting.”

“Dear Arthur, it is of no use talking of it; father was very angry with me for asking his leave to go, and so I cannot go. I told you how it would be!” said Elizabeth, with mingled wrath and sorrow in her tones.

The mate of the Jolly Nicholas looked troubled for a moment, and then said, “Never mind, my darling girl, you shall go to Dunwich fair for all that, and so shall little Teddy.”

“Oh, dear Arthur, I am so glad! Hurrah for Dunwich fair!” shouted the boy.

“Be quiet, foolish child, we cannot go without my father's leave,” said Elizabeth.

“Yes, yes, you can; it is but for once, and I will take all the blame upon myself,” cried Arthur Blackbourne.

“Goodness, Arthur! I never disobeyed my father in my life.”

“Then you have been a very good girl, Bessy, and he cannot reasonably rate you for a first fault; and if he does—there is the white damask ready bought for the wedding gown, and I am ready to take you for better or worse to-morrow,” continued Arthur, drawing the half-resisting, but more than half-willing girl nearer and nearer to the boat at every word; while Teddy, hanging on her arm, continued to wheedle and implore her to go.

“It is only for once, sister Bessy; only for once: father can't kill us if we do take this one day's pastime. Oh dear, oh dear; I shall die if I don't go to Dunwich fair!”

“Arthur Blackbourne, we shall lose the tide if you stand palavering there,” shouted half-a-dozen of the crew of the Queen Anne.

“Arthur Blackbourne, you are to take charge of my niece, Joan Bates, if Bessy Younges doesn't go with us,” screamed the shrill voice of the widow Robson, one of the busiest bodies in the busy borough corporate of Southwold two centuries ago.

“Oh gracious, aunt! you must not interfere between sweethearts;” expostulated Joan, with a giggle of affected simplicity. “I am sure I don't wish to take Arthur Blackbourne from Mistress Elizabeth Younges, if he prefers her company to mine, and it is her intention to go to Dunwich fair with us; but I think she does not go to fairs. Parson Younges always preaches against them, does not he, aunt?” said Joan.

“Why, to be sure he does,” cried the widow Robson; “so of course his daughter cannot be seen at such a place.”

Elizabeth turned pale with vexation at these observations, the drift of which she perfectly understood. Margaret Blackbourne stepped back, and whispered in her ear, “All that is said to keep you from going to Dunwich fair with Arthur.”

“I shall not ask their leave if I choose to go,” returned Elizabeth.

“Then pray make up your mind at once,” said the widow Robson, “or we shall none go, I fancy, as Arthur Blackbourne is the steersman of the Queen Anne.”

“I am coming,” cried Arthur, drawing Elizabeth towards the boat. All the female voyagers had now scrambled in, save Joan Bates, who was exercising her coquettish skill in parrying the advances of Bennet Allen, the town-clerk's brother, with the evident design of securing the attentions of the handsome Arthur Blackbourne for the voyage.

Four stout seamen, aided by a bare-foot ragged rout of auxiliaries, such as are always loitering on Southwold beach in readiness to volunteer their services on such occasions, now began to impel the boat through the breakers with the usual chorus of, “Yeo ho—steady—yeo ho!” and Edward, following the example of some of the juvenile passengers, sprang into the boat with the agility of a squirrel, and a wild cry of delight.

“Edward, Edward, you must not go,” exclaimed his sister.

“Hurrah for Dunwich fair!” shouted the wilful urchin, tossing up his cap.

“Arthur, help me!” cried Elizabeth.

“Aye, aye, by all means,” rejoined the mate of the Jolly Nicholas, taking her about the waist and swinging her into the boat. The next moment he was seated by her side, and the Queen Anne was gaily dashing through the waves. Her canvas was hoisted amidst bursts of mirth, and snatches of nautical songs, and it was said that so gallant and fair a company and crew never before left Southwold beach. Elizabeth Younges was perhaps the only one who looked back with boding glances towards the town, and in so doing recognised her father's tall bending figure on the centre cliff, holding up his hand in an authoritative manner, as if to interdict her voyage. It was her first act of wilful disobedience, and her heart sank within her; and though she had triumphed over her bold rival, by securing the company and attentions of Arthur Blackbourne for the day, she felt more dejected than if she had been left alone on the beach. One black cloud, the only one in the silver and azure sky now floated across the horizon, and appeared to hover darkly and ominously over her forsaken home, as the shores of Southwold receded in the distance.

"Arthur," whispered she to her lover, "I do not like to go to Dunwich fair so entirely against my father's prohibition. Do make the boat tack, and set the boy Edward and me ashore."

"Dear heart! it is folly to think of such a thing; we are opposite Dingle now."

"It will be only a pleasant walk back to Southwold for us."

"Very pleasant for you, perhaps; but recollect, there are twenty people besides yourself in the boat, and I really do not see why they should be put to inconvenience for your whims."

"But, Arthur, you know you put me into the boat against my will."

"The more fool I," retorted the offended lover. Elizabeth made an angry rejoinder, but instead of persisting in her purpose, she sat silent and sullen during the rest of the voyage. The merry pealing of bells from the three churches then remaining in Dunwich, sounded a jocund welcome over the waves—the old city was adorned with flags and green boughs in honour of her chartered fair, and the tall cliffs were lined with gaily-dressed groups, rejoicing in their holiday; but these things gave no pleasure to Elizabeth. The uproarious glee of her brother Edward annoyed her, and finding Arthur appeared in no haste to offer her his arm, to assist her in ascending the lofty cliffs of Dunwich after they had landed, she took that of the reluctant boy and walked proudly on, without deigning to direct a glance towards her lover.

"I wish you would walk with your own man, sister Bess," said Edward. "I want to have some fun with the other boys."

"You are very unkind, Edward, to wish to desert me, when Arthur has treated me so ill. If it had not been for your perversity in jumping into the boat, and refusing to leave it, I should not have disobeyed my father by coming here," said Elizabeth.

"It is of no use thinking of that now," rejoined Edward; "as we are here, we had better enjoy ourselves."

Elizabeth never felt so little in the humour for any thing of the kind called pleasure. The want of sympathy, too, in her little brother, added to the bitterness of her feelings. She directed a furtive glance towards the party behind, and perceived Arthur engaged in what in these days would be called an active flirtation with her rival, Joan Bates: under these circumstances she determined not to relinquish her brother's arm; but the perverse urchin, whom she had so entirely loved and petted from his cradle, with the usual ingratitude of a spoiled child, took the earliest opportunity of breaking from her, and joining a boisterous company of boys of his own age. Bennet Allen then approached, and offered his arm to Elizabeth, with the mortifying observation, "that as they both appeared to be forsaken and forlorn, the best thing they could do would be to walk together."

The proud heart of Elizabeth was ready to burst at this remark, and had it been anywhere else, she would have rejected the proffered attentions of young Allen with scorn; but she felt the impropriety of walking alone in a fair, and silently accepted the arm of her rival's discarded lover, and at the same time affected a gaiety of manner she was far from feeling, in the hope of piquing Arthur Blackbourne. Nothing is, however, so wearisome to both mind and body as an outward show of mirth when the heart is sorrowful. Elizabeth Younges relapsed into long fits of gloom and silence, and when addressed by her companion, made short and ungracious answers.

"What a disagreeable thing a fair is," said she at last; "I no longer wonder at my father saying it was not a suitable place for me—How I wish I were at home!"

But many weary hours of noise and pleasureless excitement had to be worn away, ere the party with whom Elizabeth came to Dunwich would agree to return. Elizabeth's remonstrances, entreaties, and anger, were alike unheeded by the companions of her voyage. She had haughtily rejected every overture on the part of Arthur towards a reconciliation, and declined to receive fairings or attentions of any kind from him, to manifest her indignant sense of the slight she had experienced from him in the early part of the day; and Arthur had retorted by paying his court very ostentatiously to Joan Bates. Elizabeth, neglected and alone, strayed from her party, and sought a solitary nook among the ivied ruins of a monastic pile, whose rifted arches overhung the verge of the lofty cliff, where she indulged in floods of tears, casting from time to time her wistful glances towards Southwold, whose verdant cliffs looked so calm and peaceful in the mellow lights of a glowing sunset; but it was not till those cliffs were silvered by the rising moon that the tide served for the return of the boats. At length Elizabeth heard her name vociferated by many individuals of her party, and felt sorely mortified at the publicity thus given to the fact of her being at a forbidden place. Ashamed to raise her voice in reply, yet painfully anxious to return to her deserted home, she hastened from her retreat among the ruins, and ran eagerly towards the steep narrow path that led to the beach. On the way she encountered Arthur Blackbourne, evidently the worse for his revels.

"Where have you been wandering about by yourself?" cried he, seizing her roughly by the arm.

"You have used me very ill to-day, Arthur," said she, bursting into tears.

"You are jealous and out of temper," was the reply.

"Where is my brother Edward?" sobbed Elizabeth, for she could not trust her voice with a rejoinder to this taunt.

"In the boat, and if you do not make haste, we shall lose the tide."

"I have suffered enough for my disobedience to my father as it is," said Elizabeth; "and oh, what will he say to me on my return from this disgraceful expedition!"

"There is no time to think of that now," rejoined Arthur, as they proceeded to the boat in mutual displeasure with each other. Elizabeth perceived with alarm, that boatmen and passengers alike were in the same state of inebriation which was only too evident in Arthur.

The beach was now a scene of tumultuous bustle; a crowd of boats were putting off for Southwold, Walberswick, and all the other places along the coast for which the wind and tide served.

"Young woman," said an experienced Dunwich mariner who had been regarding Elizabeth with much interest, "which boat are you going in."

"The Queen Anne of Southwold," was the reply.

"Take an old man's counsel and go not in her tonight. She is too full of riotous headstrong people, and those who ought to be the most cool and considerate there are the worst."

"Oh, but I must go; I dare not remain longer, for I came without my father's leave."

"So much the worse, young girl, for you; no good can come of such doings," said the ancient mariner.

"Oh, if I but reach my home in safety, I will never, never so transgress again!" sobbed Elizabeth as she took her seat among the reckless crew of the Queen Anne, and rested her aching head against the dowy canvass which was now unfurled to the gay breeze that came dancing over the summer waves.

It was a night of intense beauty, and the contemplation of the starry heavens above, with that glorious moon shining in such cloudless splendour over the mighty expanse of heaving blue waters, might have drawn the minds of the midnight voyagers to far different themes than those which were so clamorously discussed by them as they glided through the murmuring waves. The Queen Anne had shot ahead of the swarm of sailing boats with which she left Dunwich strand, and her thoughtless crew with wild excitement continued to accelerate her perilous speed by hoisting a press of canvass as they neared the shores of Southwold.

A dispute now occurred among them, whether they should land at the haven or opposite the town. None of the parties were in a state to form a very correct judgment as to which would be the best and safest point to bring the boat to shore. The importunities of Joan Bates and others of the female passengers, who had suffered severely from seasickness during the homeward voyage, prevailed on Arthur Blackbourne and a majority of the party to attempt a landing at the haven, and four of the boat-men scrambling through the surf proceed to fix their rope and grapples, to bring the boat to shore.

They were resisted by such of the men as were for landing opposite the town, and with reason, for the tide was rushing with great force into the river Blythe. Arthur Blackbourne had seized one of the oars to assist in effecting a landing on that perilous spot. Elizabeth Younges, who perceived a cable lying athwart the haven, started up in an agony of terror, caught him by the arm, and entreated him to desist. Arthur, attributing her opposition to angry excitement of temper, rudely shook off her hold and exerted a double portion of energy to accomplish his object, and just at the fatal moment when the men carelessly let go the rope, impelled the boat into immediate contact with the obstacle of which Elizabeth was about to warn him. The next instant all were struggling with the roaring tide. The slumbering village of Walberswick was startled with the death-cries of that devoted company. The anxious watchers on Southwold cliff, the parents, relatives, and friends of the hapless voyagers echoed, back their cries in hopeless despair. Then there was the impulsive rush of men, women, and children towards the spot where they had seen the boat capsized. In less than ten minutes the swift-footed neared it, but ere then, the dread gulph which divides time from eternity had already been passed by each and all, save one, of those who sailed so gaily from the town that morn. Lovers and rivals, passengers and crew, were united in a watery grave. The solitary survivor was Arthur Blackbourne.

The register of Southwold for the year 1616 contains the record of this tragedy of domestic life, penned with mournful minuteness by the faithful hand of the bereaved parent of two of the victims, Christopherus Younges, the Vicar of Southwold; we copy it verbatim from the tear-stained page.

"The names of those who were drowned and found again. They were drowned in the haven coming from Donwick fayer, on St. James's day in a bote, by reason of one cable lying overboard the haven, for by reason the men that brought them down was so negligent, that when they were redie to come ashore the bote broke lose, and so the force of the tide carried the bote against the cable and so overwhelmed. The number of them were xxii, but they were not all found. The widow Robson, John Bates, Mary Yewell, Susan Frost, Margaret Blackbourne and the widow Taylor, were all buried on the 26th day of July, being all cast away, coming from Donwick Fayer, on St. James's daye.

Widow Foster was buried the 27th day of Julye. Bennett Allen was buried the 30th daie, Goodie Karrison same daie. Edward and Elizabeth Younges, daughter and son to me, C. Younges, vicar and minister, was buried the 31st Daie of Julie.

All these were found again in this towne and buried."

THE ANATOMY OF OLD AGE.

BY J. R. W.

WE all talk of OLD AGE. Some feel it, and bear it with repining, it may be; better with patience; and better still, (O happy lot!) with rejoicing. Others anticipate it with hope or fear ; and too many disregard its approach with reckless indifference, as they do the certain arrival of death ; or, still worse, hurry on its severest effects by their abuse of the gifts of youth and maturity.

With the general appearances and consequences of old age, whether these manifest themselves in the mind or in the body, we are familiar enough ; but with the material causes which produce it many are unacquainted, and indeed never bestow a thought on them, although the subject is one in many respects very interesting to us all. We shall point out the most important of these under the title, "Anatomy of Old Age."

A very ancient eastern writer thus fancifully describes the body of man : "A mansion, with bones for its rafters and beams ; with nerves and tendons for cords ; with muscles and blood for mortar ; with skin for its outward covering ; filled with no sweet perfume."

It is in the first of these parts—in the rafters and beams—the skeleton—the bones, which form a framework, on which the rest of the body may, without any figure of speech, be said to be suspended or built ; it is in the bones that we find the most obvious changes produced by the progress of time ; changes which influence, also, in many instances, the alterations of other structures of the body.

Buffon says, "An oak only perishes because the oldest parts of the wood, which are in the centre, become so hard and compact, that they can receive no further nourishment. The moisture they contain being deprived of circulation, and not replaced by fresh sap, ferments, corrupts, and gradually reduces the fibres of the wood into powder. Thus it is with old men, who are subject to natural infirmities that originate solely from the decay of the different parts of the body. The head shakes, the hands tremble, the legs totter, the sensibility of the nerves decreases, and every sense is blunted. At about the age of seventy years, decrepitude commences, and continues to augment till eighty or ninety, when death commonly puts a period to the existence of those few who have been so fortunate as to wade through such length of life, without being taken off its stage by the innumerable host of diseases and casual accidents to which the human frame is subject, and which openly and secretly prey upon our lives."

In order to give a clear idea of what the changes alluded to, as taking place in bone from youth to age, consist, the composition of that substance requires to be explained. Two principal materials concur in the formation of bone, which are termed animal and earthy matters. Of the existence and general appearance of these any one may satisfy himself, by two very simple experiments. Take a piece of bone, and steep it for some time in diluted muriatic acid ; when the earthy matter will be decomposed—dissolved by the acid, and thus abstracted from the animal matter. This earthy matter consists, chiefly, of those salts termed phosphate of lime and carbonate of lime. The acid has a strong affinity, as chemists call it, for the bases of these salts, and hence they are decomposed and taken away from the animal matter of the bone. The form of the bone is unchanged, but it becomes soft and flexible ; so that if it be a long bone, such as a rib, a knot might be tied in it. The second experiment gives a result the reverse of the former. If the bone be put into the fire, and allowed to remain a certain time, its animal portions are destroyed by the fire, and the earthy salts alone remain, still keeping the original form of the bone, if the burning is not carried too far. What remains, instead of being tough and flexible, like the result of the former experiment, is quite brittle. When we examine the bones of any animal in the very earliest stages of its existence, they appear to be composed of a substance which is quite soft, like jelly, contained in a thin envelope, or membrane. By degrees the substance acquires more consistence, becomes firmer, and the covering membrane thicker ; until they gradually assume nearly the appearance and properties of cartilage or gristle, which differs from bone in containing a less proportion of the earthy salts. These are so called because they are found in earths and minerals, while what is termed animal matter is found only in animals. This cartilaginous bone, which is at first transparent and colourless, after a time exhibits white opaque spots on its surface ; and to these spots very minute vessels can be discovered conveying blood. These blood-vessels, which are in fact nutrient arteries, deposit particles of the earthy matter, and the parts formerly soft and jelly-like become hard and rigid, so that the blood seems to be scarcely capable of forcing a passage through its vessels, compressed as they are by the dense matter thrown out by themselves, and which at last greatly lessens their capacity. But their office is now performed, in a great degree ; the bone is formed, and the arteries become so minute as to be imperceptible to the naked eye. Their function, however, though less active, is continued all through life, in a greater or less degree, according to circumstances. When a bone is broken, this process seems to be renewed in all its original vigour, in order to repair the injury.

The nature of the change which takes place in this process of ossification, at one time gave rise to considerable dispute. It was by many thought to be a kind of hardening, or coagulation, resembling the coagulation of white of egg by heat, or the congelation of water by cold. This opinion is now abandoned ; it being well ascertained that the change is brought about by means of little vessels, the absorbents, which take up and carry away the gelatinous matter, while at the same time the particles of earthy salts are deposited by the arteries of nutrition. Even when bone is completely formed, this process does not cease ; a continual removal and renewal going on, differing in its rapidity however, there can be no doubt, according to the state of health and other circumstances, during the whole period of life. The old particles are daily being removed by the absorbents, and new particles deposited by the nutrient arteries.

The structure of the bones is harder and more solid in proportion as age comes on. At first, as we have said, they resemble a mere jelly; then a simple tissue of fibres, or plates, interlacing with each other, but containing as yet little or no hard substance. The proportion of earthy matter increases with age, until in many instances the bones become unnaturally brittle, and hence are more easily injured by slight accidents than in youth, when fractures are less easy, and deformities, from the too great flexibility of the bone, more common. In age the bone more resembles the specimen deprived of its animal matter by fire; in youth it is nearer that deprived of its earthy matter by acid.

This is not the place to enter minutely into the composition of bone. We have already said that the earthy salts are chiefly phosphate of lime and carbonate of lime; chemists differ in the quantities they give, probably because they have used different kinds of bone. We shall not far err, if we say that bone contains 50 per cent. of phosphate of lime, 10 per cent. of carbonate of lime, small quantities, sometimes, of other salts, and between 30 and 40 per cent. of animal matter. Phosphate of lime, the chief ingredient, is a salt which does not dissolve in water, bears a high temperature without being decomposed, and thus gives to bone the power of resisting in a remarkable degree most of the external influences to which it can be exposed, and renders it the most durable of all the organised bodies with which we are acquainted. Accordingly, the skeletons of animals are found in a tolerably perfect state, often centuries after they have been exposed to all the vicissitudes to which the surface of the globe is liable. Indeed, from the discoveries of geologists, we have good reason to believe that bones still remain which existed before the earth had received its present form; or at least before any traditions, or historical records, of which we are in possession.

The nature of the process which takes place in the formation of bone is illustrated by instances of disease, and one or two of these it may be interesting to mention:—

A very rare disease of bones is what has been termed softening; but it is rather a failure in their formation altogether; the earthy bony matter goes on to be absorbed, but is not again renewed. Madame Supiôt, in 1747, had a fall which occasioned her to keep her bed for some time. Soon afterwards she began to feel her limbs affected with pains, succeeded by bending and softness of the bones, which went on from bad to worse, until, in 1752, the trunk of the body did not exceed twenty-three inches in length; the chest and the extremities were distorted, and the thigh bones so flexible that the feet could easily be laid on each side of her head. The one side was longer in becoming deformed than the other was, and it was surprising to observe the progressive alterations in the forms of the limbs which daily took place from the increasing change in the bones. After death these were found in a great degree dissolved, the outer covering—for all bones have a kind of outer covering, the membrane formerly mentioned—alone remaining. By the bones being dissolved the narrator of the case would seem to mean that the earthy matter was wanting, and the bones must have been very much like those which have been steeped in muriatic acid. Rickets, a common enough disease of infancy, depends on the deficiency of earthy matter in bones.

As an instance of the opposite, let us take the remarkable history of M. Sinorre. This person, a captain in the French army, was reduced to a dreadful state by ossification taking place in his joints, so that every joint in his body had become completely motionless. The disease appeared to have its beginning in rheumatism, and he is described as being before his death, which took place in 1802, in the following state. He had while suffering illness remained constantly in an arm chair, and this attitude determined that which his body assumed, and ever after retained. His back was bent, his right elbow placed a little below the middle of the body; the legs formed an acute angle with the thighs; the arm an acute angle with the trunk; and the fingers being by this means pointed inwards, exercised a continual pressure upon the body. The jaws became locked and motionless, as if frozen, so that in order to support his life, the front teeth were taken out, and soft food introduced by the opening; and in the same way his drink was given him by means of a tube. When it was necessary to lift him, in order to make his bed, he was raised at once, in one piece, not the slightest bending taking place. This unfortunate man, such is the force of mind over circumstances, however adverse, bore his fate with great cheerfulness, and amused himself with singing ballads, which he himself composed, and sold to assist him in his poverty.

A few years ago, we saw in Warwickshire a gentleman in a state very nearly the same as that of the French captain. Nearly all his joints were fixed and motionless; and he was lifted daily, in helplessness, from his bed to an arm-chair by the fireside. He had some motion of one arm, and his jaws were free. The disease had been going on for several years, and no medical treatment had availed in checking it. He was not suffering much pain.

Such extreme cases illustrate the subject, but, fortunately, the ossification of old age does not proceed so far. Still, its increase is often to a diseased extent. The joints in their natural state are formed of ligaments and cartilage; these become harder, and hence the joints become stiffer and stiffer, as age advances. The very elastic spinal column becomes so stiff as not to change its position without pain and difficulty, and hence the stooping position, hence the tottering step. The elastic coats which line the cavities and entrances of the heart, become loaded with bony particles, from which in their natural state they are free; thus these arteries become brittle instead of elastic, some one of them gives way in the neighbourhood of the heart, and sudden death is the result; or, if it be the arteries in the brain which yield, we may have apoplexy and palsy. The capacity of the heart and arteries generally being diminished, the blood flows more slowly, and is not so rapidly nor so completely purified by the lungs; and hence a failure of most of the organs and faculties, both of the mind and of the body. Other influences may occur in producing the phenomena of old age, but this we have been describing, the gradual increase of bony matter, is greatly preponderating in producing these effects, and is the most common instrument by which nature works, when undisturbed by violence, in terminating human life.

In the passage already quoted from Buffon he gives from eighty to ninety years as the limit of human life, which corresponds with the scripture rule of "three-score and ten, or if in some, by reason of more strength, they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow." Mr. Smith of Southam, in an ingenious little tract printed for private circulation, traces from Bible history the causes of the shortening of life at different periods to the prevalence of particular sins at those periods; and whatever we may think of his theory in this respect, we cannot deny the soundness of the benevolent author's opinion, that the most rational plan for restoring to us the longevity of the patriarchs, is to turn away from those sins to which he attributes the abbreviation of life. The celebrated Haller has given a table of 221 individuals who lived from 100 years to 169; but the most remarkable work upon this subject is a volume by James Easton, published at Salisbury in 1799. In it he records the name, age, place of residence, and year of the decease of 1712 persons who attained a century and upwards, from the year A.D. 66 to 1799, comprising a period of 1733 years, with anecdotes of the most remarkable. Mr. Easton must have used great research; he writes in perfect good faith; and although, doubtless, he may occasionally have given credit to uncertain traditions, we cannot reasonably withhold our confidence from his work as a whole. The following is his classification of the different ages,—

From 100 to 110,	1310
110 to 120,	277
120 to 130,	84
130 to 140,	26
140 to 150,	7
150 to 160,	3
160 to 170,	2
170 to 185,	3

From the historical sketches Easton gives, we cannot form any conclusion as to the kind of life most conducive to this extreme longevity. We have them of all kinds, hard working and indolent, temperate and intemperate, men and women; we must set them all down as exceptional cases, depending upon some peculiarity of constitution unknown to us; but no man of common sense will deny, that, in order to attain a moderate old age, temperance and active exercise, not hard labour, are the most likely means to succeed.

From Easton's book we take the following instances:—

George Kirton, Esq. died in 1764, aged 125; he was a fox-hunter, and hard drinker to the last.

William Farr, carrier from Birmingham to Tamworth, died in 1770, in his 121st year. He had 144 descendants, all of whom he survived, and left 10,000*l.* to charitable uses. What an affecting thing, this old man burying 144 children and grandchildren, and left alone in the world at 120 years of age! Yet his heart was softened, not seared, for in his dying hours he thought of the poor.

Thomas Wood died in 1738, aged 106; he was parish clerk of Canfield in Essex seventy-eight years, kept his bed only one day, and could read without spectacles to the last.

Sir Henry Featherstone, Bart., who had property near Bloomsbury, and from whom Featherstone Buildings, in Holborn, are probably named, died in 1746, aged 100.

Margaret Krasinowna died in 1763, aged 108. At ninety-four she married Gaspard Raykett, aged 105; they are said, but it is hardly credible, to have had two boys and a girl, unhealthy and ill-formed.

James Hatfield died in 1770, aged 105. This was the soldier of whom the well-known story is told, that being on guard at Windsor, he was accused of sleeping on his post, when he defended himself by asserting that he had heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen instead of twelve, which, on inquiry, turned out to be the case.

Thomas Parr, the most talked-of of old men since the days of Methusalem, was born at Winnington in Shropshire, and died in 1635, aged 152. He married for the first time at eighty-eight, and had children. At the age of 102 a woman attributed a child to him, and he married a widow at the age of 120. He fed chiefly on bread and cheese, milk, and whey; and had so hearty an appetite as often to rise during the night to take food. Lord Arundel took him to court, and presented him to Charles I. It is supposed that the high feeding he now had, shortened his days. His body was opened by the illustrious Harvey; the heart was found fatter than usual: the account of Harvey is not very particular, which is to be regretted.

John Michaelstone, a grandson of Parr, died in 1763, aged 127. He is said to have been very temperate.

A joiner named Humphries died at Newington, in 1799, aged 100; and was said never to have been more than a mile from his own door.

Henry Jenkins died in 1670, aged 169. He used to mention as an evidence of his age, that he remembered the battle of Flodden; and also the last Abbot of Fountains. He gave evidence in a case in April 1665, when he was 157. He is buried at Belton in Yorkshire, where there is an inscription on his tombstone. He was a fisherman for the last century of his life; and fared hard.

The Rev. Mr. Gilpin, in his "Observations on Picturesque Scenery," has the following amusing remarks on Jenkins. "Among all the events which, in the course of 169 years, had fastened upon the memory of this singular man, he spoke of nothing with so much emotion as the ancient state of Fountains Abbey. If he were ever questioned on that subject, he would be sure to inform you, 'what a brave place it once had been;' would speak with much feeling of the clamour which its dissolution occasioned in the country. 'About a hundred and thirty years ago,' he would say, 'when I was butler to Lord Conyers, and old Marmaduke Bradley, now deceased and gone, was Lord Abbot, I was often sent by my lord to inquire after the Lord Abbot's health; and the Lord Abbot would always send for me up to his chamber, and would order me a quarter of a yard of roast beef, and wassail, which I remember well was always brought in a black jack.' From this account we see what it was that riveted Fountains Abbey so distinctly in the old man's memory. The black jack, I doubt not, was a stronger idea than all the splendour of the house, or all the virtues of the Lord Abbot."

Stephen Rumbold died in 1687, aged 105, and is buried at Brightwell in Oxfordshire, with this epitaph:—

"He lived one hundred and five,
Sanguine and strong;
One hundred to five,
You live not so long."

The Countess of Desmond died in 1612, aged 143. She is said by Bacon to have renewed her teeth twice or thrice. The or leads to a doubt.

William Eadie died in 1731, aged 120. He was sexton or grave-digger to the parish of Canongate, Edinburgh, and buried the inhabitants of that extensive district three times over.

Peter Torton in 1724, and St. Mongah in 1781, are both stated to have died at 185 years of age, but no particulars of their history is given.

The writer had occasion, at one period, officially to visit and examine into the histories of about 300 men, all exceeding 60 years of age, pensioners on a charitable society. The majority were between 70 and 80; a good many above 80; a few, perhaps ten, above 90, and one 104. They were mostly mere wrecks of men; few could hear and see at all well. But indeed their infirmities were the causes of their requiring the aid of others. Most men, not broken down by disease or hard labour, are in full vigour of body and mind, (less active than vigorous in body—the ossification in the neighbourhood of the joints is increasing,) between 60 and 70. The man 104 years of age was an Irishman; had been a common labourer all his life. He was quite imbecile both in body and mind; and the evidence of his age was derived from his family.

There is living, or was a few weeks ago, a woman in Christ Church workhouse, Southwark, 108 years of age at least, probably a year more. She is remarkably lively, and, all things considered, intelligent. Her face has a singular expression, not easily described. She is neat and cleanly dressed, and quite contented. When asked if she wanted for any thing, she expressed a wish for some tea, as she could drink more than the allowance. This modest request was easily complied with.

To the good heart nothing can be more grateful than to bestow attention and kindness on the aged; and there is no duty to which we are more obviously bound. When we came into the world helpless and wailing, having eyes, and ears, and limbs indeed, but these wholly useless, and having no power that availed us but the feeble cry of distress, was not that cry listened to in mercy? The eyes of affection beamed upon us, our ears were charmed with the lullaby, and the arms of others supplied to us the place of limbs; while the mildest food was provided for our imperfect mouths. Now need we, in the vigour of manhood, grudge to lend our hands to support the tottering limbs of those who so often bore us in their arms? need we think it tedious to read the desired volume, or tell the news of the day into the dull ear of the aged, who charmed and trained our infant ears with the merry song or the schoolboy fable? Let our now quick sight, and active hand, aid them in all their little wants, at the fireside or the dinner table, when the eye fails and the hand trembles. Nor is it the individuals alone who may have been our parents and friends, that we ought to honour; we should extend our regard to all the aged. All treat infancy with love. Should death or other cause deprive an infant of its parents, some kind soul is found to take up the task of love; the exceptions are so rare as not for a moment to call for consideration. All great and good men have been affectionate to their aged parents, and those who have been deprived in childhood of father or mother have often shed tears of sadness to their memory.

There is a curious anecdote in the recently published memoirs of Dr. Chalmers, so eminent as a man and a Christian. It is an extract from his private journal, and he seems to reproach himself for not having shown sufficient attention to his aged relatives, although a warmer-hearted man never lived; but his awakened conscience was tender. His father was blind and deaf; his mother and his aunt both deaf. He is on a visit to them and says,—

"I think I am behaving well. I can scarcely force myself to talk when I am inclined to be silent, but I may at least ward off the assaults of anger. Now this I have done; and while the 'Ehs?' and the 'Whats?' reciprocate in full play across the table, and explanations darken rather than clear up the subject, and entanglements of sense thicken and multiply on every side of me, and Aunt Jean tries to help out the matter by the uptakings of her quick and confident discernment, and confusion worse confounded is the upshot of one and all of her interferences; why, even then, I know that it is my duty, and I shall strive to make it my practice, to stand serene amid this war of significations and cross-purposes, and gently to assist the infirmities which I may be soon called to share in."

We conclude with another sentence from the eastern sage whom we referred to in the commencement of this paper—Manu, as translated by Sir William Jones, by whom he is stated to have written one thousand years before the Christian era. "The body is a mansion, infested by age and by sorrow, the seat of malady, harassed with pains, haunted with the quality of darkness, and incapable of standing long; such a mansion of the vital soul let its occupier always cheerfully quit." We would add to the words of the eastern sage, that while we should be ready to quit the mansion with cheerfulness, we should also, when there, inhabit it with cheerfulness. It is the body God has given us, and He will surely hold us accountable for its use.

A LEAF FROM MY JOURNAL IN MEXICO.

WHEN I was in Mexico, in 183—, I was engaged in a rather troublesome affair; namely, the recovery of a considerable sum of money from a debtor of whose whereabouts not the slightest trace could be found. Speed and energy being, in this matter, of essential importance, I had addressed myself, in consequence, to several gentlemen of the long robe, who possessed reputations for never interfering in difficult cases in vain. All had commenced by promising me their assistance; but as soon as I had named the mysterious debtor,—who rejoiced in the title of Don Dionisio Peralta,—one and all had drawn back, opposing to my entreaties the most absurd and ridiculous excuses. This one assured me that he would never forgive himself for causing the slightest annoyance to so gallant a caballero as Senor Peralta; that one was attached to the gentleman in question by a compadrazgo, or companionship of long standing; while a third, with the most pitiful countenance in the world, brought forward as an objection the reminiscences of a boyish friendship. Finally, a fourth, more frank than the rest, hinted broadly that, independent of all these friendly scruples, there was the fear of a stab in the back some dark night; a proceeding which Senor Peralta had, to all appearances, more than once put in practice, in order to relieve himself of a creditor whose attentions had been too pressing. "The only man I know that can assist you," added he, "is the licentiate, Don Tadeo Cristobal; he has a hand of iron, joined to a lion's heart; in short, he is just the man for you." No sooner had I received this piece of intelligence when I hastened to the Calle de los Batanes, where dwelt, as they told me, the licentiate Don Tadeo; but there a fresh disappointment awaited me. Don Tadeo had quitted his lodgings, and no one could or would tell me where he had now set up his tabernacle.

Thoroughly wearied and discouraged at the close of a hot summer's day, the whole of which had been spent in fruitless researches, I was promenading sadly enough under the Portales de los Mercaderes, or Merchants' Arcades. I had resolved, as a last chance, to seek some information concerning Don Tadeo from the numerous public writers whose stalls, situated under these galleries, may be considered in the light of so many offices of intelligence, open at all hours to the curious inquirer. But, once fairly under the Arcade, I had completely forgotten the motive which had led me to this species of bazaar, the daily rendezvous of all the idlers in Mexico, and my entire attention was absorbed by the animated picture now spread before my eyes. The reader would, I have no doubt, be less astonished at this distraction of thought, were he to picture to himself the magical aspect of the Plaza Mayor of Mexico an hour before sunset. The Portales de los Mercaderes occupy, in fact, one side of this immense square, the three remaining faces of which are taken up by the cathedral, the Ayuntamiento and the presidential palace. The two finest streets in Mexico open into the square between these edifices; these are the Rua de la Primera Monterilla, with its beautiful shops, and the Rua de los Plateros, almost exclusively occupied by silver-smiths and jewellers; then, facing these streets, wherein European commerce displays all its marvels, the petty commerce of Mexico seems to have chosen for the theatre of its operations the sombre arcades of the Mercaderes. At the epoch of my sojourn in the country, no innovating hand had as yet changed the picturesque physiognomy of these arcades. The heavy vaulted arches were supported on one side by the large gloomy-looking stores of the dealers, and on the other by massive pillars, around the bases of which were laid out a succession of alacenas, or stalls, abundantly provided with prayer-books, rosaries, daggers, and spurs. By the side of these stalls, as if to represent trade reduced to its very lowest denomination, stood a few ragged leperos, who trafficked in glass beads, rings, and trinkets, and who, with their stock-in-trade ingeniously suspended from one finger, pursued their customers with most importunate solicitations. From time to time the dealers in cooked wild-fowl, or tamales,¹ grouped together under the shadow of the arches, mingled with the general hum of the crowd their well-known cry, "Aquí hay pato grande, mi alma; señorito vengasted!"² or the briefer, and no less popular one, of "Tamales queretanos." The passengers and customers were quite as worthy of observation as the dealers. The brilliant colours of the dresses and tapalos, the gold of the mangas, the medley of tints in the striped sarapes, viewed in the dim light which penetrated beneath the pillars, formed altogether a scene worthy of a Venetian carnival masquerade. It was above all in the evening that the throng beneath the arcades of the Mercaderes offered a brilliant spectacle. In the evening, shops and stalls are alike closed, and the Portales become a political club. Seated upon the threshold of their carefully-secured doors, or gravely pacing this species of cloistered avenue, officers and civilians may be seen conversing together of revolutions past, present, or to come, until the hour arrives when the now almost deserted galleries serve but as a meeting-place for lovers and their fair ones, while their dim and silent vaults echo but to the murmur of the love tale whispered by some Mexican youth into the ear of his inamorata.

I had wandered for some time under the Portales, when the appearance of a public writer's stall suddenly recalled to my mind the object of my visit. Among the traders of the Portales the public writers form a considerable corporation. It must be recollected that in Mexico, elementary instruction being to this day very generally neglected, the functions of the public writers have, amid this illiterate population, lost nothing of their original importance. The docile pen of the "Evangelist"—for such is the title that he rejoices in—is required for a thousand different purposes, more or less delicate, and some of them, it must be said, equivocal enough, from the emptiest of empty love letters, to the mysterious note despatched by the hired bravo to lure his victim into some fatal ambush. The evangelist whom I had especially singled out from among his numerous fellow-labourers, was a little, thin, wrinkled old man, around whose nearly bald crown straggled a few grizzly locks of hair. What had originally attracted my attention to him was the peculiar expression of sardonic joviality which animated his countenance, in other respects insignificant enough. I was about to accost this man, in order to make some inquiries of him respecting the whereabouts of Don Tadeo, when an incident occurred which constrained me to resume my original part of taciturn observer. A young girl had approached the stall of the evangelist. The long plaited hair which escaped in tresses from beneath her half-open rebozo; her sun-burnt complexion; her brown shoulders, which the chemise of fine linen, bordered with lace, left almost bare; her slender waist, which no corset had ever deformed by compression; and, above all, the three petticoats of strongly contrasting colours, which fell in straight folds over her hips, all betrayed in the young client of the evangelist the purest type of the Mexican china.¹

"Tio Luquillas!" said the young girl.

"What is it?" replied the evangelist.

"I want you."

"So I should imagine, since you called me," rejoined Tio Luquillas; and, fancying that he had guessed the nature of the message which the maiden was about to dictate to him, he unfolded, with great complaisance, a sheet of highly-glazed rose-coloured parchment, upon which was depicted a pair of fat cupids, apparently going through some extraordinary gymnastic performances; but the young china waved her little brown hand with a gesture of impatience.

"What use can a condemned man make of your rose-coloured paper?" said she.

"Ah, diablo!" said the writer, without showing the slightest sign of emotion, whilst the maiden passed one of the long plaited tresses of her hair over her eyes. "So they are adieux, eh?"

A sob was the china's only reply; then, leaning over towards the ear of the old scribe, she endeavoured to dictate to him a short letter; not, however, without frequently pausing to take breath, and give free course to her tears. Never had the contrast of cold-blooded old age and passionate youth appeared to me so moving. Nor was I the only one to remark it, for there was scarce a promenade who passed the stall of Tio Luquillas who did not cast on the pretty china a glance of mingled curiosity and commiseration. The evangelist had folded the letter, which now only required the address, when a passer-by, either more bold or more curious than the rest, advancing suddenly to the stall, interrupted the colloquy between Tio and the china. The features of the new comer were not altogether unfamiliar to me, and I remembered that, having been placed beside me at a recent bull-fight, he had commented in the most attractive manner possible, and with the air of a true amateur, on the merits and defects of the exhibition of which we were spectators. The present moment not being a very favourable one for me to question in my turn the evangelist, I waited patiently at a short distance from the group, until the new comer should have taken his departure. This individual, with whom I had had but a few hours' conversation in the circus, inspired me with a sort of interest I in vain endeavoured to account for. He was about forty years of age; his features might be called almost noble, despite a cloud of sombre irony which would occasionally flit over them, imparting in its course an expression almost sardonic. Independent of the recollection of our first interview, the strangeness of his costume would have alone been sufficient to recall him to my memory; this consisted in an ample blue mantle, lined with red, and, for a head dress, a vast sombrero of drab felt, bound with broad gold lace.

"For whom is this letter, my child?" demanded he of the china, with a certain air of authority.

The maiden pointed with her finger towards the presidential palace, and murmured a name which did not reach my ears.

"Ah! it's for Pepito, is it?" exclaimed the stranger aloud.

"Alas! yes; and I know not how to get it sent to him."

"Well, well, don't fret about it; we'll devise some means or other. And, stay; as I live, here is an occasion sent expressly for us."

At this moment there was a general rush of the crowd towards the Plaza Mayor. A circumstance of but too frequent occurrence in Mexico, namely, an assassination, had been committed in the public street. The murderer had been seized, his victim raised from the ground, and the cortège was now on its way to the nearest prison. This prison was precisely the one in which the young china's lover was incarcerated, and I was accordingly at no loss to discover the sense of the words of hope which had been addressed to her by the stranger.

The procession, which was now defiling along the square, possessed in its half ludicrous, half serious aspect an originality thoroughly local. A cargador, or street porter, marched at the head, bearing upon his shoulders, by the aid of a leathern strap passed round the forehead—as is the custom of the Mexican porters—a chair, upon which was fastened a man, or rather a dead body, over which had been hastily thrown a bloody coverlid. The assassin, in the custody of four soldiers, followed close after his victim; a few idlers, and some of the friends of the deceased, brought up the rear. Of all these men, each more or less moved or occupied, the most tranquil, beyond all question, was the murderer, who, with the most marvellous nonchalance, strode quietly on between his guards, a cigarito sticking out of one corner of his mouth, from time to time addressing to his victim certain reproaches, which, to his evident surprise, remained unanswered.

(1) The china is the grisette of Mexico

"Come, none of your nonsense, Master Panchito," said he, "you know right well that I have not the means of making your wife an allowance. You think yourself a very cunning fellow to feign death in that sort of way; but for all that I'm not your dupe."

But, despite all the assassin said to the contrary, poor Panchito was really and truly dead; and I could not control a shudder when I gazed on the hideous corpse as it was borne close by me, with the bright sun shining on its eyes, which were wide open and fixed in a horrid unearthly stare. The stranger in the sombrero was doubtless more accustomed to such sights than I was, for, going straight up to the procession, he stopped it, and placed the china's letter in the murderer's hands.

"Listen to me," said he. "You are, of course, acquainted with the illustrious Pepito Rechifla?"

"What! he that is to be strangled to-morrow? of course I am; he is my companion."

"Well, as his turn is sure to come first, you will see him by and by in the prison. Give him this letter for me."

"Ah, Senor Caballero!" interrupted the young Mexican girl, who, with heaving bosom and eyes bathed in tears, had flung herself at the murderer's feet and seized, in the antique manner, the hem of his garment, "for the sake of the blessed Virgin, do not forget to give him this letter. I am so unhappy at not being able to see him."

"Yes, Linda mia, yes," replied the assassin, placing his hand over his eyes, and endeavouring to impart a pathetic tone to his voice; "I have a very soft heart also; and had it not been for this damned Panchito, who was always vexing and annoying me, I should not be here, I can assure you; however, preciosita de mi alma!"

A piece of money, flung by the man in the sombrero to the prisoner, cut short this elegant tirade, and the soldiers resuming their march, the little procession quickly disappeared round an angle of the ayuntamiento. A few women of the lower orders, with the delicate sensibility of the Mexicans, now gathered around the young china, and endeavoured, but in vain, to persuade her to return home. Resisting all entreaties, I saw her proceed towards the prison, and seat herself at the foot of the wall, her features veiled in the ample folds of the rebozo.

The stranger in the sombrero had disappeared in the crowd, and, as the moment was now favourable for me to consult the evangelist, I tapped lightly on the old man's shoulder.

"Can you inform me," inquired I, "where dwells the licentiate, Don Tadeo Cristobal?"

"Don Tadeo Cristobal, did you say? Why, he was here not two minutes ago."

"Here! Don Tadeo!"

"Did you not see how kindly he undertook to have that letter delivered to the bandit, Pepito Rechifla, which had been dictated to me by one of the prettiest chinas in Mexico?"

"What! the man in the sombrero and red-lined mantle was Don Tadeo, the licentiate?"

"Himself."

"And where think you shall I be able to find him now?"

"That is a question, Senor, that I can hardly answer. Properly speaking, he has no dwelling-place; he lives a little everywhere, as one might say. If, however, you have got anything particular to say to him, go this evening, between nine and twelve o'clock, to the Callejon del Arco, you will be sure to find him in the last house on the right-hand side, as you enter from the Plaza."

I thanked the writer, and, having left him a few reals in testimony of my gratitude, directed my steps towards the Callejon del Arco. Although it was scarcely seven o'clock, I thought it would be well, before night-fall, to reconnoitre the house I purposed visiting a couple of hours later. Experience had taught me that similar precautions were not to be despised in Mexico, and more especially in this instance, as the Callejon del Arco had been pointed out to me as one of the most disreputable alleys in the capital.

The appearance of this lane but too well justified the reputation it had acquired. The mass of buildings of which the "Portales de los Mercaderes" forms a portion, and which is known by the name of the Impedradillo, does not form a perfect solid square. In front of the cathedral, which faces the south-west, there opens in the Impedradillo a narrow lane, the entrance of which bears no ill resemblance to the mouth of one of those caverns formed by the action of the sea in the perpendicular face of a sandy cliff. This is the Callejon del Arco. When dazzled by the vivid sun-beams with which the Plaza Mayor is inundated, and which, reflected from the white faces of the buildings and the granite of the foot-way, has an almost blinding effect, you penetrate into this narrow and tortuous alley, the eye, before it has got accustomed to the obscurity, can, after a few moments, but just distinguish another street, which bisects this one at right angles, the junction point forming a small dark space. There, as in the sea-side caverns, you hear scarce a sound from without, save a low, confused murmur, which as much resembles the distant breaking of the agitated waves as it does the far-off tumult of a populous city. A few rope-makers' stores, some massive and hermetically closed portals, here and there a half-open cellar, alone remind you that you are in the vast metropolis of Mexico, teeming with life and movement. The walls drip with perpetual moisture, and it is only at noon, and that too but for a short period in the middle of summer, that a furtive sunbeam enlivens for a moment the sombre pavement of the Callejon del Arco. Then a little fresh life is infused into this dismal lane, until the moment when, the sun regaining the opposite tropic, all sinks once more into darkness and silence.

It was, then, in this spot, and in one of these most disreputable looking houses, that I was to meet the man who, as everybody had assured me, could alone unravel an affair before which all the lawyers in Mexico had recoiled in dismay. I paused for a few moments to contemplate with surprise the spot so singularly chosen for a lawyer's place of business; but then, had not the little episode, of which I was a witness, in itself sufficiently prepared me for the eccentricities of Don Tadeo? How was the tone of easy familiarity with which he addressed the wretch whom he had commissioned before my eyes with the message to Pepito Rechiffa, to be explained? How, also, the acquaintanceship which evidently existed between this last-named bandit and the licentiate? This strange intimacy of a lawyer with thieves and murderers appeared to me, at first sight, of rather bad augury; the prospect, however, of at length obtaining a settlement of my affair finally decided my wavering purpose, and I quitted the Callejon del Arco with the full determination of returning two hours later.

The night had now come; it was one of those beautiful nights of May when the moon, the voluptuous splendour of which is unknown to the inhabitants of our cloudy mist-land, imparts to Mexico an aspect truly magical. Its soft beams now fell from a cloudless sky upon the pointed steeples of the churches and the coloured façades of the various public buildings, lighting them up in a thousand different manners. On the Plaza Mayor the crowd was no longer so dense as it had been before sunset; it was also calmer and more contemplative. The promenaders almost whispered their observations, as though fearful of disturbing the serenity of this most lovely night. The gentle sounds of waving fans and rustling silks, and now and then a little burst of feminine laughter, as pure and melodious as the vibrations of a musical glass, joined with the occasional tinkle of a far-off convent bell, alone disturbed the silence of the evening. The women, with their long veils, the men enveloped in the wide folds of their Spanish cloaks, glided along like shadows over the Plaza. Here might be discovered, but ill disguised beneath the ample folds of the national costume, more than one couple whose presence on such a spot, and at such an hour, would have fully confirmed the scandalous gossip of the salons. Mingled with this concourse of young and pretty women were also a few of those whom we style on the shady side of thirty, and not a few of the fair, but frail, doucellas chanfonas of whom Perez de Guevara makes honourable mention. I say nothing of the hosts of adventurers with which Mexico literally swarms; delicious fellows these, true types of Mata-mores, swaggering along, with their sabres and spurs jingling noisily upon the pavement. Such was the aspect of the Plaza Mayor at the hour when, slowly, and, I must confess, rather irresolutely, I threaded its gay and motley throng on my way to the Callejon del Arco.

At the very first step which I took in this dismal lane, a current of cold air, like that which escapes from the ventilator of a cellar, struck me in the face, and chilled me to the bone. For some minutes I stood motionless at the entrance of the lane, seeking to distinguish some traces of light at the windows or grated doors of the houses; but all was as dark as pitch. I accordingly made up my mind for the worst, and advanced, almost feeling my way as I proceeded, in the direction of the house, which I had noted at sunset. I had nearly reached the open space formed by the intersection of the street, of which I have already made mention, when the sound of footsteps advancing rapidly behind me suddenly reached my ears, and, looking back, I could just discern the figure of a man coming, as I had done, from the Plaza. I drew up to the wall to let him pass, but, in so doing, the long rapier worn by this nocturnal Rambler somehow or other got entangled between my legs; I stumbled forward, and, to avoid a fall, which would otherwise have been inevitable, grasped hold of his cloak. The man stepped quickly aside, and the sudden rasping sound of the steel warned me that he had drawn his sword.

"Capo di Dios!" shouted he; "is it my person or my cloak that you want, Senor thief?"

I fancied that I recognised this voice, and so hastened to reply,—

"I am neither a thief nor an assassin, Senor Don—Don—"

I had hoped that the stranger would have come to the assistance of my memory, and have mentioned his name, but in this I was disappointed, for he did nothing of the kind, but, leaning his back against the door of a neighbouring house, demanded roughly who I was and what I wanted with him.

"I seek the dwelling of the licentiate, Don Tadeo Cristobal," replied I; "and, if I am not mistaken, this is the very house before which we are now standing."

"Ah! and who told you of this house, may I ask?"

"Tio Luquillas, the evangelist. I wish to consult Don Tadeo on an affair of importance."

"Well, it is to Don Tadeo himself that you are now speaking."

The costume of this individual, whose features were indistinguishable in the gloom, was, in fact, the same as that worn some few hours previously by my friend in the sombrero, whose real name Tio Luquillas had given me. I hastened to reply to Don Tadeo, flustered myself on this lucky rencontre, and demanding a few moments' conversation with him in private.

"Most willingly," replied he; "I am quite prepared to enter with you upon your business; but, first of all, let us get into this house,—we shall be able to converse more at our ease." And, as he spoke, he knocked with the hilt of his rapier upon the door against which he had been leaning. "My profession," added he, "obliges me to adopt some precautions; you will comprehend by and by wherefore. Do not be astonished at my singular domicile; they must have told you that I was an original, and they are right, too."

As he spoke, a loud noise of bolts and chains undoing informed us that we were about to be admitted, and immediately afterwards the heavy door swung slowly back upon its hinges. The porter, who carried a lantern in his hand, bowed respectfully to the licentiate, who made a sign to me to follow him. Crossing rapidly the zaguan, or vestibule, we climbed a steep wooden staircase, and finally stopped before a green baize door surmounted by a transparency, upon which might be read the following words in letters of most gigantic proportions:—SOCIETAD FILARMONICA. A confused medley of discordant shouts and cries reached our ears from the saloon dignified with this ambitious title.

"Are these your clients who are kicking up such a row inside there, Senor Licentiate?" demanded I of Don Tadeo. Without replying, he pushed open the door, and we found ourselves in a vast and dimly-lighted room. A long table, covered with green cloth, and surrounded with players, occupied the centre of the apartment; in addition to lights in sconces fastened round the wall, four wax-candles as tall as those used in the Mexican churches, and contained in tin tubes, completed the illumination of the saloon. A few small tables, ranged at equal distances along the side of the room, served for those who might desire refreshments; such as infusions of tamarinds and rose water, or Barcelona brandy. Finally, at the further end of the room, there arose a species of high dais, ornamented with rough fresco delineations of bassoons, horns, clarionets, &c. &c., doubtless for the purpose of recalling to the minds of the frequenters the original destination of the establishment.

The reader may imagine my feelings of surprise on first putting foot into such a den as this at the moment when I imagined I was going to be introduced into a lawyer's office. With some feelings of distrust I glanced at my companion; it was indeed the man that I had met at the circus, and under the "Portales de los Mercaderes." With his strange costume, his long rapier, and his thick dishevelled hair, Don Tadeo had, it must be confessed, much more the air of a brigand than of a sober jurist. Scarcely had he taken three steps in the room when he was accosted by two individuals, who seemed, by their appearance, the fitting representatives of the cavern they frequented.

"How goes the illustrious Senor Don Tadeo to-night?" exclaimed the first, a species of giant, extending as he spoke, with an air at once ferocious and awkward, a fist of about the size and shape of a leg of mutton.

"Better than those whom you have a grudge against, Master Pearcec," replied the licentiate, fixing upon his interlocutor as he spoke a glance as cold and piercing as the blade of his rapier. "Do you know," he continued, "that your reputation is made now in Mexico as well as in Texas, above all since —"

"Hush!" returned the American quickly, evidently but little desirous of hearing the completion of the licentiate's phrase. "With your permission, I wish to consult you."

"Just now," replied the man of the law, "I must give the preference to this caballero, whom I met before you."

"For mercy sake, hear me first, Senor Licentiate," interrupted a grey-headed individual, who wore the Mexican costume, and who squinted horribly.

"Ah! is that you, Navaja?" replied Don Tadeo, coolly surveying the Mexican, who evidently quailed beneath his eye. "Is it still a question of that bad affair?"

"Hush!" cried the Mexican, in his turn; "since it is your good pleasure, Senor, I will take the third place."

It had merely sufficed for Don Tadeo to make allusion to two episodes, neither of them probably redounding much to the credit of the individual in question, to be quickly rid of their importunities. I could not help admiring the power possessed by my companion; a power evidently acquired at the price of an intimate and perilous commerce with the most lawless heroes of Mexican vagabond life.

"And now, Senor Caballero," said the licentiate, turning to me, "may I have the honour of knowing who you are, and what affair it is that has induced you to consult me? It must be a delicate matter, for none have recourse to my intervention but to resolve difficulties which my fellow-labourers consider insurmountable. It is, I have no doubt, one of these worthy legists who has advised you to address yourself to me."

I named the licentiate who had vaunted the intrepid heart and well-tried sword of Don Tadeo Cristobal.

The latter shook his head with a disdainful smile.

"It is a dangerous affair, I can see," he rejoined.

"The man you have named is my declared enemy, and he never sends me any other jobs but these. I have a strange line of business, it must be confessed; and for that reason I may be excused for my promptness in unsheathing my rapier in the public streets at night. But, what would you have? I am from Seville, and have not passed some years of my life for nothing among the bullies of the suburbs of Triana."

"You are a Spaniard?"

"Undoubtedly I am, and before adopting the legal profession I was what they called an uracán y calavera.¹ You see in me, Senor, a student of Salamanca, that beautiful city, in which some years ago some choice spirit composed this rhyme:—

(1) Literally, "hurricane gentleman," a phrase which may be almost rendered by our slang term, "out and outer."

"En Salamanca la tuna
Aduve marzo y abril;
Ninas he visto mas de mil
Pero comotu ninguna."¹

"And I, too, Senor, have made quatrains in this joyous city as well as the rest, ay, and sung them too; and it was in consequence of a serenade, interrupted, unhappily, by a duel, which was followed by the death of a man, that I was compelled to seek my fortune in New Spain. To insure success here, I possessed in an eminent degree two precious qualities which are rarely allied; namely, jurisprudence, and the art of fencing. And you yourself must have seen just now that I have not altogether lost my old uracan humour. Upon my life, Senor, it is a most fortunate thing that I did not put my sword through your body; but, to obtain my pardon for the rough greeting I gave you, permit me to offer you an infusion of tamarinds, or a glass of Catalonian refino."

And, without giving me time to put in a word, he drew me towards one of the side-tables, at which we seated ourselves. My astonishment increased in measure as I improved my acquaintance with this singular personage. It was not until after we had been served that Don Tadeo would consent to hear an explanation of my affair, which I gave him as briefly and clearly as possible.

"Very good," said he. "It concerns a debtor that you have not been able to find; but you know at least his name?"

"That is the point," said I; "for it is a name which somehow or other affected your colleagues with very lively feelings of sympathy; for, after hearing it, not one has dared to take the matter in hand."

"Let's hear the terrible name. I am curious to learn if it will produce the same effect upon me."

"I will whisper it to you," replied I. "My debtor is named Don Dionisio Peralta."

The countenance of the licentiate did not change.

"And how much does he owe you?"

"Fourteen hundred piastres."

"Stay," said Don Tadeo, after a moment's reflection, "we will ascend just now to the terrace on the top of this house, where we shall be able to talk over this matter more at leisure. But, in the first place, permit me to despatch these two worthies, who are waiting for their turn. The interest of your affair, besides, demands that I should not resume my consultation with you until I have collected some positive information of an indispensable nature from the frequenters of this house. All that I require of you is, that you do not manifest the slightest surprise in case you should hear things you do not exactly comprehend."

I pressed the hand of the licentiate, and we rose and approached the group of players, which had considerably increased in number since our entrance. A double row of anxious spectators surrounded the green cloth, upon which the piastres rolled with a very enticing sound. The licentiate passed his two clients, the Mexican and the American, making a sign to them to wait for him, and walked up to a young man, who, standing amongst the spectators, kept his eyes ardently fixed upon the play-table. This youth, whose countenance was of a pale and sickly yellow, wore upon his long and sleek hair a little and almost brimless hat, and over his shoulder a threadbare esclavine, or short mantle. He looked the very picture of a solicitor's clerk, regretting his inability to risk his employer's entire fortune on the hazard of a card.

"Ortiz," said the licentiate, tapping him lightly on the shoulder, "have you got any writing materials with you?"

"Certainly," replied the clerk, drawing from his pocket a rouleau containing paper, pens, and ink. The licentiate seated himself apart from the throng, wrote hastily a few lines, folded the paper, and handed it to his clerk; who, having replied to the whispered instructions of his master by a low inclination of the head, instantly quitted the room.

This done, the licentiate begged me to have patience for a few moments longer, until he should have given his two clients their promised consultation, and I accordingly mingled with the crowd which pressed eagerly round the magic board. And, certainly, a more curious spectacle it has seldom been my lot to witness than this reunion of adventurers of all species and of every clime; where the strangest types of the old Spanish romances seemed on this occasion to have met together with one consent. One highly characteristic detail above all struck me as remarkable: in front of the banker lay a long Catalan knife, as bright, keen, and sharp as a razor. A charitable warning which he gave to the players soon explained to me the use to which this knife was destined. "I warn all the gentlemen here present," said he, "that if one of them attempts to confound his loose cash with the bank, I'll nail his hand without mercy to the table." As this strange threat appeared neither to astonish nor offend any one, I accordingly concluded that the case foreseen by the banker must have presented itself more than once. Despite, however, the strangeness of the scenes of which I was now a spectator, I had begun to get wearied of the quick and regular exchange of money which was passing before me, the monotonous sounds of which were varied only by the voice of the banker, and an occasional interjection or oath from one of the players, when my meditations in front of the green cloth were put to flight by the return of the licentiate, who led me to a table placed at the further end of the room, at which his two clients—the squinting Mexican and the gigantic Yankee—were most fraternally seated. The American was swigging away at a bottle of Catalonian refino, while his companion was engaged in the discussion of a glass of iced tamarind water, which he was imbibing in little sips.

"Well, Senor," said the licentiate to me, with an expressive glance, "here are two caballeros who will remove all your scruples of conscience on the subject of the fourteen hundred piastres you owe me; and who are ready to affirm that you can pay them in all tranquillity of mind by the cession to me of the sum in which Don Dionisio Peralta is your debtor. Senor Peralta will honour his signature with the best grace in the world."

(1) "In Salamanca I have led a joyous life in the months of March and April. Of young maidens I have seen more than a thousand, but not one equal to thee."

"I didn't say that," exclaimed the Yankee, with a loud horse-laugh; "I don't know if he will pay with a good grace; all I know is, he shall pay, or else——"

"Gently, gently," interrupted Don Tadeo; "from the moment that Peralta becomes my debtor his life is precious to me, and I must insist upon it being respected."

"Senor Peralta will pay with the best grace in the world, I'll answer for it," said the Mexican, sipping his infusion of tamarinds as if it had been fire-water.

"Let him pay, that is all I require," rejoined the licentiate; "but is not that Pepito Rechifla I see yonder with my clerk? Come, Ortiz has well fulfilled his commission."

The name of Pepito recalled to my mind the pretty china whom I had seen in such despair under the Portales de los Mercaderes. As for the gentleman who rejoiced in the name, he was one of those dark-complexioned, long haired, free and easy going worthies only to be met with under the tent of the wandering Bohemian, or in the streets of Mexico. As soon as Pepito caught sight of the licentiate, he ran towards him, and pressed his hand with every demonstration of the most profound gratitude. "Ah! Senor Licentiate," said he, "I shall never forget that it is to you I owe my life; I was condemned to be strangled the day after to-morrow, and it is you who have saved me from the claws of the Juez de Letras; it is thanks to some reals from your purse that I have been restored to liberty. Yes, Senor Licentiate, do not feign astonishment; I know that it is you who are my saviour; your clerk, Ortiz, told me so."

"Ortiz is a blockhead," replied Don Tadeo, dryly; "but I rejoice no less at your good fortune, for I shall want to speak to you to-morrow morning, and I count upon your punctuality. In the meanwhile here is a piastre for your supper."

"For my supper! That's good, faith," replied the brigand. "I am never hungry but when I have nothing in my pocket. When I have a piastre I play it."

So saying, the illustrious Pepito swaggered off to the gaming table. The Yankee and the Mexican rose at the same time and followed him. Don Tadeo, thus freed from his importunate clients, drew me aside.

"You see those three fellows," said he; "think you that there are many debtors who could long resist such bailiffs; above all, when it touches a debt ceded to the licentiate, Don Tadeo? You doubtless understood me when I dwelt strongly on the cession in your presence; my name is one arm more to employ in this perilous war; but, the war once over, the benefits thereby derived will be for you, less the expenses of the campaign, which you will permit me to deduct therefrom, along with the honours of the victory."

"But how are you to get hold of this Peralta?" inquired I. "Up to the present moment I have never been able to obtain the slightest clue to his whereabouts."

"That will be my business, and the business of those three worthies yonder, to whom I had the honour to introduce you this evening. Don Dionisio Peralta is a bad paymaster, but a first-rate swordsman. However, we shall see."

I now recalled to Don Tadeo's recollection that he had appeared desirous of conversing more at length on the subject of my affair, and I accordingly offered to satisfy his curiosity on this point. In reality, I sought but an occasion of improving my acquaintance with this singular personage. Don Tadeo seemed to divine my secret intention.

"It is now half-past ten," said he, looking at his watch; "I am at your orders, Senor, until midnight. Let us ascend to the azotea, which at this hour is deserted. The night is fine, and we can converse there at our ease."

On gaining the terrace, we both of us involuntarily paused for a few moments in silent contemplation of the majestic scene which lay outspread beneath us. At our feet lay the ancient city of the Aztecs, with its innumerable domes, cupolas, and steeples, capriciously but most brilliantly lighted up by the rays of the moon. Near us, the cathedral projected over the immense Plaza Mayor its double and gigantic shadow. Further off, the Parial reared aloft its black mass amid the spaces whitened by the nocturnal lights, like a dusky shoal amid the breaking waves of the ocean. Still further off might be recognised the elegant cupola of Santa Theresa, the fine domes of the convent of San Francisco, the steeples of St. Augustine and of the Bernardines; and behind this majestic accumulation of pinnacles, cupolas, and painted steeples, the distant country might be faintly descried through the white vapours which, ascending from the lakes towards the sky, hung around the city like a luminous curtain of silvery gauze.

Don Tadeo was the first to break silence by addressing to me some questions relative to my legal affair, which he had undertaken to bring to a favourable conclusion. I hastened to reply to his interrogatives, promising myself to lead him on soon to give me some revelations respecting his own previous career, which could not fail of being curious; but the licentiate had fallen into a deep reverie, and I had begun to despair of drawing him from his reserve, when the strangest chance came to my assistance; it was nothing more than the tolling of a far-distant bell, which arose suddenly like a wail amid the profound silence of the night. On hearing the bell, Don Tadeo shook his head, turned deadly pale, and, finally, hid his face in his hands. At length, with a sudden effort, he roused himself, and, grasping my arm, exclaimed, "Do you not hear that bell?"

"To be sure I do," replied I; "and if I am not mistaken, it is the passing-bell which they are ringing at the convent of the Bernardines."

"At the convent of the Bernardines!" repeated the licentiate in a strangely altered tone of voice; "at the convent of the Bernardines, do you say?"

"I should imagine so by the direction," replied I.

"Well, well, let us descend; this sound makes me ill."

"Why return so soon? do you not prefer breathing the air of this beautiful moonlight night to that of the horribly close and smoky den we have just quitted?"

The licentiate did not reply. The bell, whose tollings became more and more distinct, evidently exercised upon my companion a species of influence to me utterly inexplicable. I know not if Don Tadeo at length remarked my undisguised surprise; but perhaps he but gave way to the strength of his feelings when, grasping my hand, and amid stifled sobs, he let these strange words escape:—

"You must listen to me; I never hear the tolling of this passing-bell without beholding, as in a strange and fantastic dream, the saddest episode of my adventurous life flit before my eyes. Nothing in me will more vividly excite your surprise when you shall have learned the horrible event this passing-bell recalls to my memory."

I made a sign to the licentiate that I was ready to listen to him; and I now transcribe the story as nearly as possible as he related it to me, and with a degree of coolness and self-possession, too, that I was scarcely prepared for after his sudden and agitated exordium:—

"In the year 1825 an attempt at assassination was committed in Mexico. This is unhappily a circumstance of but too ordinary occurrence in the capital, and if public attention was fixed for a brief space upon the matter, it was chiefly on account of the circumstances with which it was accompanied. It was on account of this strangeness that the affair of which I now speak, instead of being briefly related in the last columns of the papers, figured among the events of more or less importance which possess the privilege of occupying for a week or two the attention of the frivolous and idle population of Mexico. A singular mystery, in fact, shrouded this attempt at murder.

"Early one morning, when the Paseo of Bucareli¹ was yet empty, a hackney coach had taken up its station in a retired part of the promenade. The coachman had descended from his box, and now held himself discreetly aloof, as if he divined the motives for which he had been hired. Was it a man or a woman that this providencia (you know that it is by this name they designate the hackney-coaches of Mexico) had led to a rendezvous? The carefully closed blinds interdicted all conjecture in this respect; but later it was known that there was in this carriage a young female of exquisite beauty, who, giving way to Creole vanity, had decked herself for the occasion in all her diamonds. Creoles, you know, have the weakness of wishing to appear as rich as they are beautiful; and yet, with all that she could do, this young girl was still more beautiful than she was rich. Some minutes had thus elapsed when a man, enveloped in the folds of a large cloak, advanced towards the carriage; the door flew open at his approach, and as quickly closed upon him.

"A meeting of this kind was too much a thing of daily occurrence to astonish the coachman, who flung himself beneath the shade of the poplar trees, and soon fell fast asleep. When he awoke, the carriage was still in the same place, but the shadow of the poplar trees, instead of stretching towards the west as at the hour when he fell asleep, now pointed towards the east. In other words, the sun had now nearly completed his course, and the evening had succeeded to the morn. It was the hour when the Paseo began to fill. The coachman, astonished at having slept so long, jumped up, ran to the carriage, and called, but, receiving no reply, he opened the door. A horrible spectacle met his eyes. In a half sitting, half recumbent posture, lay the young female in a state of insensibility, the cause being but too clearly explained by the blood with which the vehicle was inundated. The life-blood still flowed from a deep wound in the side, which at first sight appeared mortal, evidently inflicted by the surely-directed poniard of some skilful brigand. Of all the brilliants which had sparkled on the bosom and in the ears of the young Creole not one remained. The unhappy girl had thus found an assassin in place of a lover, and theft had followed murder. The cries of the coachman soon attracted a crowd of persons, among whom was fortunately a physician, who, after a short examination, discovered that the victim still breathed. Nothing now remained but to carry her to the nearest convent, which was accordingly done. This convent was that of the Bernardines. This first duty of humanity fulfilled, the task of justice commenced. But while the physicians endeavoured, and successfully too, to restore the unhappy woman to consciousness, the exertions of the magistrates to arrest the murderer were not crowned with the same success. The coachman was the first individual arrested; but his innocence being speedily recognised, he was set at liberty. They arrested afterwards a young Spaniard, whose marked attentions to the young Creole were known to everyone. The latter learned thus at the same time the infidelity and probable death of her he desired to make his wife. It was a frightful blow"—(here the voice of Don Tadeo trembled visibly)—"and it almost cost him his reason. At the end of a year the Spaniard was released for want of proofs, but he left his prison ruined by law expenses, and with his heart deprived of its sweetest illusion. He learned then that she who had deceived him, and whom he had wept for dead, still lived, but that she had renounced the world, and had taken the veil in the convent to which she had been carried after the event of the Paseo. He made no attempt, however, to see her; but all his efforts, all his thoughts, were now directed to one end, and that end was vengeance. Mexican justice had failed in tracing the assassin; he determined upon continuing the too speedily abandoned researches, and of succeeding even where the culpable indolence of the authorities had declared success impossible."

Here the licentiate paused; the convent bell still continued its dismal tollings, and I began to comprehend the emotion which these lugubrious sounds aroused in his mind.

"This Spaniard, you must have already guessed, was myself. I had succeeded in abstracting from the papers connected with this sad affair a letter found upon the young girl, appointing the meeting between her and her assassin. This was for me the sole thread by the aid of which I was to wind my way through that sombre labyrinth in which Mexican justice had lost itself. From that moment there commenced in my career a dark and agitated period which death alone can terminate. I made up my mind to live from henceforth amid thieves and murderers, in the hope, with the aid of their revelations, of gaining knowledge of the secret which preoccupied my mind. Under the pretext of practising my profession, I eagerly embraced all lawsuits which offered me an occasion of interrogating these wretches, of penetrating into their haunts and lurking places. From that moment there was not a single crime committed in Mexico the perpetrator of which I could not at need have denounced to justice. The most secret associations of malefactors had no mysteries for me. You have doubtless heard mention made of the celebrated band of the ensebados, who, for an entire year, spread terror throughout the whole of the Mexican capital. These ensebados were men who, at night, after having imbedded their bodies with grease or oil, would dart suddenly from their lurking-places on the unwary and belated passenger, and either plunder him of his property or stab him with their poniards. One only of these bandits, as unseizable as a snake, was enabled to escape the efforts of a body of vigorous soldiers. Well, Senor, this chief of the ensebados is known to me; he has not quitted Mexico, and at any day, or any hour, I can name him if need requires. This is but one of my singular discoveries; I could give you a thousand. Thanks to this life of incessant and perilous research, I acquired a degree of experience which rendered me the dread of these wretches whose disreputable antecedents were all known to me. Very frequently also my life was in danger, and more than one malefactor has attempted to punish in my person an incommensurable overzeal; but the services which my knowledge of the law enables me to render them, has acquired for me, on the other hand, a number of clients sufficiently devoted to my interests to prevent a recurrence of these attempts, which would cost my enemies dear. At the present moment I enjoy almost with impunity the influence which I exercise over the most redoubtable brigands in Mexico; and, as you can yourself perceive, I have at my order a well-disciplined force, ready to lend support to honest men who may stand in need of my assistance."

"This is my case," replied I, "and I cannot help felicitating myself on having been so fortunate as to meet with you; but you do not tell me if your efforts to discover the assassin of the Paseo were finally crowned with success."

"Completely so. I was fortunate enough to discover the evangelist whose pen, under the dictation of a cowardly assassin, had traced the fatal lines which had lured my betrothed to the Paseo. This individual was known to the writer, and he put me on his track. I discovered him; I had him in my power, and could at any moment deliver him up to justice. By so doing I should thus have attained the end for which I had been so long and painfully striving. But, would you believe it, Senor? I did nothing of the kind. Many years had elapsed since the day on which the attempt had been committed; and, by dint of living with these unfortunates, I had learned to pity rather than to hate them. I had succeeded even in forging for myself, as it were, out of their perversity, a set of weapons by the aid of which I could terminate certain affairs before which Mexican justice avowed itself powerless. The assassin of the Paseo is one of these instruments that I could break at a word; but which I prefer employing under my own eye in the service of my numerous clients."

A fresh silence succeeded to these words; the monotonous tolling of the passing-bell still continued.

"Since that period I have never beheld her who was to have been my bride, but who now wears the veil," resumed Don Tadeo; "but I receive news of her from time to time by a sure channel, and I am aware that for some time back her health has been gradually giving way. You now perceive why the passing-bell of the Bernardines makes me tremble."

I was about to propose to Don Tadeo to descend from the terrace in order to escape the melancholy influence of this funeral-knell, when the entrance door of the azulea creaked upon its hinges, and the ill-favoured Mexican, whom the licentiate had named Navaja, glided rather than walked towards us. He was pale with terror, and every now and then would cast an uneasy glance behind him, as if to assure himself that he was not followed.

"It is the demon in person," cried he, leaning against the balustrade to regain breath.

"Of whom are you speaking?" demanded the licentiate.

"Of the American; he is now at his third bottle of refino, and is roaring out what he calls his war song. It is a wild Indian under the skin of a white man. He has been counting up the scalps he has taken, all the murders he has committed in his lifetime; and—would you believe it?—he aspires to the honour of adding the skin of my skull to the rest of his trophies! I repeat to you, this man is a devil—he literally smells of blood."

"How modest we are become all at once!" replied the licentiate, in the scornful tone of voice he habitually made use of when addressing the Mexican. "And since when, may I ask, has the sight and smell of blood been so terrible to you?"

It was a fearful gaiety that of Don Tadeo. The question which he had addressed to the Mexican had apparently excited in the breast of the latter that sort of cowardly rage and hatred which a tiger might be supposed to feel for his human custodian. Don Tadeo, however, appeared not to remark the impression he had made; he seemed, on the contrary, to take a peculiar pleasure in irritating the wretch whom he kept almost quivering with suppressed rage under his cutting sarcasms. An allusion to the affair of the Paseo suddenly explained to me the reason of this outbreak of irony. I had before me the man upon whom the licentiate had power at any moment to wreak his vengeance, but whom he permitted to live; he who had attempted the life of the unhappy girl whose passing-bell was perhaps even now tolling. "Does not that bell from the Bernardines yonder remind you of anything?" were the words made use of by Don Tadeo; but this last stroke had exhausted the patience of the Mexican, who, in place of replying, sprang on the licentiate, and endeavoured to wrest his rapier from him; but the latter was on his guard, and, without even making use of his sword, repelled his aggressor with a vigorous arm.

"Come, come," said he, "you forget with whom you have to do. I pardon you this time; but away with you this instant out of my sight."

Utterly stupefied and crest-fallen, the Mexican did not wait to hear the order repeated, but, with downcast eyes and stealthy tread, retired from the azotea. I could not resist complimenting Don Tadeo on the courage and coolness of temper he had displayed in this little affair. "What would you have?" replied he, with a melancholy smile; "you know in what university I have taken my degrees. I am sufficiently acquainted with suffering to estimate life at its precise value. But let us descend; you have no further instructions to give me relative to your affair, and in the course of a few days from this I hope I shall have some good news for you."

We descended rapidly from the azotea, and were soon upon the vast, and now deserted, Plaza Mayor, at the entrance of the Callejon del Arco. Here we separated; the licentiate proceeding towards the Rua de los Batanes, and I to that of the Monterilla.

A month had elapsed without my hearing any tidings of the licentiate, and I was beginning to get seriously alarmed for his safety, fearing lest he had fallen victim to some of those ambushes so frequently laid for him, when one morning a billet which he transmitted to me by the hand of his clerk, Ortiz, explained the reason of his long delay. Two causes had prevented him from occupying himself in my business with his customary activity: "The first cause, and that which you have probably guessed," wrote he, "is this—the bell we heard a month ago was for her. When I had partially got over this blow, and began my labours afresh, I was suddenly confined to my bed in consequence of a wound—happily slight—received in one of those ambushes in which I have more than once nearly met my end. I can now, however, inform you that your affair is in the highway towards a speedy settlement. I have succeeded, but not without difficulty, in discovering the whereabouts of Don Dionisio Peralta, and have set the three worthies whom you know upon his track. Adieu. Make no efforts to see me, and in a few days you will receive, I trust, more satisfactory intelligence."

Eight days, in fact, had nearly elapsed when I received a fresh message from the licentiate; this letter contained a detailed account of the campaign he had been carrying on against Dionisio Peralta, and which had happily terminated in favour of Don Tadeo. The licentiate's three Janissaries, namely, Pepito Rechifla, John Pearce, the fire-eating Yankee, and Navaja, the Mexican, had successively waited on Dionisio Peralta to reclaim payment of a debt which they affirmed had been ceded to them by the licentiate, Don Tadeo. Peralta, who, despite his magnificent airs, was a gentleman of their own stamp, had at first received them with all the arrogance of a stage captain; but the significant threats of the three bandits had speedily brought him to terms. Peralta well knew the reputations of the men with whom he had to do; it was war to the knife that was declared; while the influence of the licentiate, whose arm directed these formidable bullics, rendered the match decidedly unequal. He had accordingly ended by proposing an arrangement which the licentiate had hastened to accept. Peralta possessed, in the little village of Tacuba, at about a league's distance from Mexico, a small country-house, the value of which about equalled, or nearly so, the amount of his debt. He consented to make this over to Don Tadeo, who had at once taken possession of the property in his own name. It only remained for me now to receive over this house from the licentiate, in order to conclude the whole affair. Accordingly, Don Tadeo warned me to expect him at an early hour on the following day. We were to repair together to the ancient domain of my former debtor, where I should be at once installed as legitimate proprietor.

On the following morning the licentiate was punctual to his appointment, bringing with him two saddle-horses. I was anxious to make acquaintance with my new property, and, above all, to witness the ceremonies incidental to a taking possession in Mexico. As we rode along I felicitated the licentiate on the lucky star which, in this recent occurrence, had once again protected his life; expressing at the same time also my regret at having perhaps drawn down upon him the vengeance of Dionisio Peralta; but he replied, that nothing in the affair seemed to justify my suppositions, and that, according to all appearances, the man who had projected this latest attempt on his life, was none other than the assassin of the Paseo. "However that may be," he added, "my suspicions of Master Navaja have not deterred me from employing him in your affair, where his zeal has been very useful to me. With the exception of some hours of intoxication or vertigo, during which they are half mad, these men obey blindly at all times the will of him who makes them feel his superiority. Consequently, in a letter that Peralta wrote to me to announce his submission, I have read with regret certain threats directed against the rascal who attempted my life, and who it appears has been the most active of the three worthies I set upon your debtor. As Peralta is not a man to threaten in vain, I fear I shall be but too soon revenged."

While thus chatting together we had reached the country, if one can call by this name the arid plains near the capital, which we now crossed at full gallop. The heat was almost insufferable, and a mournful silence reigned around us. All at once the sounds of rapidly advancing horse's hoofs reached our ears, and we were soon joined by a caballero, in whose person I had no difficulty in recognising Master Pepito Rechiffa. The bandit was attired with a certain air of dandyism; he wore a blue manga lined with Indian yellow, and bestrode a horse equipped in the height of Mexican fashion. He saluted us with an air of mingled courtesy and protection.

"You will pardon me, Senor Licentiate," said he, "if I take the liberty of joining you; but, as you told me that you purposed making a little excursion to-day, I thought you would not be sorry to have one companion more. This road is not over safe, and," added he, casting an expressive glance at the arm on which the licentiate still wore a scarf, "it is not always prudent to risk yourself so far from home. I have, however, reason to believe that we shall not have any occasion to draw steel to-day." And as he pronounced this phrase with solemn slowness, Pepito leaned over and whispered some words into the ear of the licentiate, the import of which I could not catch; I remarked only that he called the attention of Don Tadeo to a group of rocky hills which rose to our left, and over which now hovered a flock of large black vultures. Without replying to Pepito, the licentiate checked his steed for a moment, and turned his eyes towards the hills with an expression of painful surprise. He afterwards made a sign to us to continue our course, spurring his horse vigorously, a proceeding which we hastened to follow, and some minutes later we were galloping through the streets of the little village in which my new property was situated.

The house ceded to me by Don Tadeo was situated at the furthest extremity of the village. Numerous groups of peasantry, who had repaired hither in order to come in for their share of the largesses which invariably accompany every ceremony in Mexico, were stationed before the house, and aided us in recognising it. It was a little building of very deplorable appearance, ornamented in front by a sort of corridor supported by brick pillars. Numerous crevices traversed the walls in all directions, indicating the imperious necessity of a thorough repair. At the back of the house, between four walls crowned with moss and bits of broken glass, lay a little garden overrun with rank weeds. The care-taker who had been placed in the house by Don Tadeo opened the door for us, and we entered. The interior was even more desolate than its outward appearance had promised; the plaster of the walls and ceilings was crumbling away in large patches; the worm-eaten and rickety stairs creaked sadly under our footsteps, and the garden could show scarcely any produce save an inextricable mass of thistles, nettles, and houseleek, the whole overshadowed by a few fruit-trees of very sickly appearance. Taking it altogether, however, the dilapidated little tenement, with its uncultivated dependency, might be about equal in value to the sum due, and that was all that I required, especially as, with a debtor of Don Dionisio Peralta's kidney, it would not do to be too particular.

After inspecting the lower part of the house and the garden, we ascended to the first-floor. The first apartment which we entered seemed to be the sitting-room, and evidently had not been opened for years, to judge by the musty odour which saluted our olfactories. We hastened to throw open the massive shutters and give admittance to the light and air. A vast quantity of cobwebs, as thick and strong as the dry moss which floats from the cedar-trees of Chapultepec, hung in festoons from the ceiling. The cupboards, which we inspected next, were completely empty with the exception of one; that contained a thick dusty volume, which the licentiate, after a brief examination, placed under his cloak. Our inspection was soon over. "Call the witnesses," said Don Tadeo to Pepito, whom we had promoted on this occasion to the office of master of the ceremonies. The vagabond, majestically draped in his blue manga, forthwith advanced to the open window and uttered a short but brilliant harangue to the ragged auditory assembled without. Pepito's eloquence succeeded beyond our expectations, and in a very few moments the entrance court was filled with a far greater number of witnesses than the law requires. Never in my life had I beheld such a collection of cut-throat visages. We descended, preceded by Pepito, into the court-yard, and from thence, followed by the crowd of witnesses, into the garden.

"Senors caballeros," shouted Pepito, in a voice of thunder, "you are all witnesses that the illustrious Senor here present" (here Pepito pointed to me) "takes regular and formal possession of this property in the name of the law—DIOS Y LIBERTAD!"

Don Tadeo and I now advanced in our turns, and on the latter's instructions, I tore up a handful of grass and cast it over my head; then I threw a stone over the garden wall. This was a formal act of taking possession according to Mexican law. A general hurrah escaped from the assembled witnesses. It only remained for me now to fulfil the last formality which custom imposes, namely, to distribute a few piastres among the throng of vagabonds which had flocked from all parts to wish me welcome. This done, my witnesses, under the guidance of Pepito, proceeded to the nearest tavern in order to dispense my bounty as best suited them.

"Well, Senor," said the licentiate to me, "you have at length succeeded in recovering your money, or at least an equivalent for it. What think you of my method of doing business with refractory debtors?"

"I think, Don Tadeo, that you play a very dangerous game, and I have a piece of advice to give you; it is simply this:—namely, to renounce as speedily as possible the trade of redresser of wrongs, in which, unless I am greatly mistaken, the losses must, sooner or later, exceed by a large sum the gains."

"You see, however, that I have hitherto been tolerably fortunate in my enterprises. But, however that may be, in case a chance thrust should some day or other put a premature end to my existence, I am anxious that you should retain a little souvenir of our acquaintance. Here is a book which has not been included in the inventory of the household effects; the work is old and is of some value."

"I return you many thanks," said I to the licentiate, taking the dusty volume; "but the recital that I heard from your lips on the azateca of the old house of the Callejon del Arco will recall you more vividly to my memory than this scarce old tome; it is not every client who is so fortunate as to meet with a romance such as yours when he expected but a legal consultation."

It was now time to return to the capital. Without waiting for Pepito, the remainder of whose day would probably be spent at the tavern, we pushed on at a hand-gallop through the plain. The heat was even more oppressive than it had been at our departure. We soon came in sight of the hills which Pepito had pointed out to the licentiate. The flock of vultures which hovered over the rocks seemed to have increased in numbers, and a fetid odour reached us with the little clouds of dust which were ever and anon wafted by the breeze across the plain.

"If you were curious enough to read on to the last page of the romance you spoke of just now," said the licentiate to me, "I would propose to you to canter up to those hills yonder; but I fear you have rather susceptible nerves."

"And what is there to be seen among those rocks?"

"Merely a dead body, that's all. Don't you see how the vultures are swarming round it? One of the three worthies whom I sent in pursuit of your debtor, has paid in his person for the rest. Well, God is just! The man who has fallen under Peralta's knife is the assassin of the Pazeo de Bucareli. The romance is now complete, is it not?"

"Most assuredly it is; and the sight of a corpse half-devoured by vultures would add nothing to the impression left by your recital on my mind."

"Well, I see we must spare your nerves," said the licentiate, putting spurs to his horse, "let us push on for Mexico."

On the Plaza Mayor we separated with mutual promises of shortly meeting again; but fate disposed it otherwise. A few weeks after my installation into the property given up by Peralta, I quitted Mexico, on a tour through the cities and wilds of that wonderful and, to me, most fascinating country. On my return to the capital, the gaming house of the Callejon del Arco was closed, and the evangelist Tio Luquillas, to whom I again applied for information of my friend the licentiate, informed me that he had returned to Spain. Since that period I have made various efforts to discover his whereabouts, but it is almost needless to say, that my researches have been in vain.

THE LIFE AND MAXIMS OF LA ROCHEFOUCAULD.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

THE Maxims of La Rochefoucauld have been long regarded as the most famous collection of malicious truths, of pointed, searching, and sarcastic sayings, with which the world has been favoured. Highly characteristic of the man, the nation, and the period, they will always possess a peculiar interest, from the view which they present of human motives and dispositions, and the worldly philosophy which they inculcate. Those who adopt a low estimate of human nature, and who make it a rule to believe the worst of every one, delight to range themselves under the standard of La Rochefoucauld. Men of the world, or rather worldly-minded men of the meaner sort, have at all times referred to his Maxims as the perfection of wisdom; and they do, in fact, display (however much we may be disposed to quarrel with some of their leading principles) a vast amount of shrewd common sense, real intelligence, and subtle insight into the ordinary springs of human action.

It is interesting to observe how much the spirit of these maxims has been adopted by subsequent writers of the same school; how often they have been appropriated,—used and misused,—by authors of a misanthropical or sceptical turn; and how many of them have passed into proverbs, and become stock sayings and recognised truisms. Our readers may not, perhaps, be displeased with a few examples of this; and the publication of a new translation, illustrated with some very entertaining notes, in which many curious coincidences in thought and expression are pointed out from other writers, affords us legitimate pretext for enlarging on the subject.¹

It will be proper, however, to commence with a short biography of the author: for the events of his life give an additional interest to, as they unquestionably coloured, the productions of his pen. We shall endeavour as much as possible to avoid unnecessary details, although from the position which La Rochefoucauld occupied, and the part he played, it will be requisite to refer repeatedly to the historical events of the period.

Francis, Prince of Marsillac, Baron de Verteuil, and Duke de la Rochefoucauld—for these were the titles he derived by descent from a distinguished race—was born on the 15th of December, 1613. The age in which it was his lot to live, was well calculated to develop his singular talents, and was full of striking and stirring events, in which he was destined to be no inconsiderable actor. "His youth," observes a French writer, "was passed under the reign of Louis XIII. and Richelieu, his riper years under the regency of Anne of Austria, and his old age under the absolute sovereignty of Louis XIV. Each of these three epochs left its influence on his mind, and gave a different direction to his life. His education had been neglected, but he was one of those spirits who owe more to the world than to the schools, and whose minds are better formed by intercourse with mankind than by books."¹

At the age of sixteen La Rochefoucauld commenced the career of arms in Italy. He was soon afterwards introduced at the French court, and received with due distinction as a cadet of one of the noblest families in France. Cardinal Richelieu was then in the height of his power. Louis XIII. nominally reigned, but the Cardinal governed; though a sharp but unequal contest for supremacy was kept up between Anne of Austria, the queen regnant, and the subtle churchman. The elder La Rochefoucauld had attached himself to the party of Anne of Austria, but on the banishment of the Duchess de Chevreuse, the queen's favourite, he fell into disgrace, and withdrew from court. The author of the "Maxims" was thus early initiated in political intrigues, and the lessons he learned when in opposition to Richelieu were not lost upon his after life.

On the death of the Cardinal in 1642, the Prince de Marsillac (as La Rochefoucauld was then called) made his reappearance at court, in the full expectation of finding a new order of things established, as soon as the powerful minister had ceased to breathe. But here he was disappointed; for to his great surprise he found the court as submissive to the will of the wonderful man who had presided for so many years over the destinies of his country, after his death as during his life. "His relations and dependants continued to enjoy all the advantages they had gained through him; and by a turn of fortune, of which there are few examples, the king, who hated him, and who had desired his fall, was obliged not only to conceal his sentiments, but even to authorize the disposition made by the Cardinal in his will of the principal employments and most important places in the kingdom."² But the life of Louis XIII. hung upon a thread, and it was confidently whispered abroad, and most anxiously expected by disappointed courtiers, that important changes were at hand.

The king died, and Anne of Austria became regent during the minority of Louis XIV. All who had been excluded from favour by their attachment to the cause of the queen during her struggle with Richelieu, had now good cause to expect that their services would meet with acknowledgment and reward. But Mazarin (who had succeeded Richelieu, and who had adopted the policy, and followed, as closely as his narrower capacity permitted, in the footsteps of his predecessor,) had artfully managed, before the king's demise, to ingratiate himself with the queen, and having gradually won her confidence, and induced her to appreciate his serviceable talents, his influence became paramount under the regency. Thus, to the surprise of all, and the disappointment of many, the aspect of the court remained unchanged. Every day the queen showed more indifference to the friends of her ill-fortune, among whom was La Rochefoucauld, upon whose observant spirit this first lesson on the ingratitude of courts was not thrown away.

Very little appears to be known of the doings of La Rochefoucauld during the "good times of the regency." It is certain, however, that he was engaged in political intrigues, and was constantly plotting against the power of the regent. But the languid interest excited by the disputes of courtiers, and contests for royal favour, was soon to be superseded by the more alarming incidents of civil war. La Rochefoucauld had reached the prime of life, and was well known among the leading spirits of the age, when the corruption of manners, the extravagance of the court, and other concurring circumstances, precipitated a struggle in which he was destined to take an active part, and which, from its many ludicrous as well as serious features, forms a curious and characteristic passage in French history.

The contest to which we allude is the war of the Fronde, the origin of which was the opposition offered to the court and to the policy of Mazarin by the Parliament of Paris. Through the lavish extravagance of royalty, the national finances were in a most disordered state, and the measures taken by the court to recruit an exhausted treasury had occasioned universal discontent. Supported by the Parisian populace, the parliament commenced an organized opposition to the demands of the queen and her minister. The party of the parliament was called the Frondeurs, and all who supported it Frondeurs. At first there was little thought of fighting; but the court having arrested three popular members of their parliament, the inhabitants of Paris rose in revolt. Then came the Day of the Barricades, and the court was compelled to yield. Barricades in the streets of Paris! The words have a familiar sound, and the reader can scarcely help reflecting before he passes on, how often barricades have been erected and blood has been shed there, during the past half century!

Without entering minutely into the history of the intrigues of the period, it will be sufficient to state that the Frondeurs were not without distinguished partisans. The Prince of Conti, younger brother of the great Condé, and his sister, the Duchess de Longueville, had been gained over by the famous Cardinal de Retz, who regarded these intestine troubles as a fine field for his intrigues and ambition. La Rochefoucauld had long indulged a tender passion for the Duchess de Longueville, and it is not surprising therefore that he warmly espoused the cause of the Fronde, as soon as her adhesion to it was known. Indeed, according to his own account, he was principally instrumental in winning her over to the cause; for the duchess had a womanly abhorrence of politics, and it may be only tolerated them for the sake of her lover. It was one of the strange features of the period, that gallantry was mixed up with the gravest interests and most important pursuits: and we must not therefore be surprised that the Duchess de Longueville, who cared nothing for the parliament or the quarrel in which it was engaged, should have played a distinguished part in this memorable struggle. Giving La Rochefoucauld credit for possessing some influence with this capricious lady, remembering besides his ancient name and lineage,—that he was a nobleman of uncommon parts, of distinguished courage, and well versed in state intrigues,—it will be readily imagined that he was a most important and distinguished member of the Fronde.

The state of Paris and the frequent recurrence of tumults and disorder alarmed the regent, and she fled from Paris, with the young king. La Rochefoucauld and the Prince of Conti withdrew with the court; but their apparent desertion was only to serve their personal interests. At some risk, they soon afterwards succeeded in returning to the metropolis, and the Duchesses de Bouillon and Longueville successfully appealed to the populace in their favour. Condé had now blockaded the city; and a ludicrous sort of warfare ensued. The citizens turned out to encounter the royal troops, and then ran away in a most disgraceful manner. Fighting became a jest; the people of Paris were amused with songs and epigrams; and the most intolerable licentiousness prevailed. Upon one occasion La Rochefoucauld was commanding a detachment of soldiers who were escorting some provisions into the city. They were attacked, and, with the exception of their leader, instantly fled. La Rochefoucauld, however, maintained his ground for some time, till he had been severely wounded, and a horse killed under him.

At length peace was restored for a season; the court came back to Paris; a reconciliation took place between Condé and his brother, and La Rochefoucauld with the Duke and Duchess de Longueville separated themselves from the Fronde. Open warfare was now succeeded by secret intrigue. By a piece of royal treachery, the Prince of Condé, his brother, and the Duke de Longueville were arrested and imprisoned; and the presence of the Duchess de Longueville was immediately ordered at court. La Rochefoucauld dissuaded her from obeying the mandate; and shortly afterwards repaired with her to Normandy, where they endeavoured to sow the seeds of civil war. The attempt was not successful, but the spirit of revolt spread, and La Rochefoucauld himself soon took the field with a considerable force. Hostilities were now recommenced upon a more extensive scale: but it would be tedious as well as unprofitable to recount all the incidents of a struggle in which it is difficult to discover what particular principle was involved, or what were the definite motives of the leading combatants. We refer to the history of the period for the details of a war, which, to quote a French writer,

"would have been only ridiculous if the great names of Condé and Turenne had not figured in it; where consolation under defeat was found in an epigram, and love formed and destroyed cabals; where a marshal restored a town à la belle des belles; where men changed their party as women changed their lovers; a war, in fine, of which the great Condé said that its history could only be properly written in burlesque verses."¹

To the most superficial observer it is obvious that the French nobility and gentry were at this period unprincipled and corrupt to the last degree. The war of the Fronde is a specimen of the reckless ambition and wicked frivolity which were their principal characteristics. A low and sordid selfishness was recognised as the mainspring of every action. A leader was followed, or a party espoused, as interest or the idlest passion prompted; to patriotism or any heroic or exalted motive there was no pretence. In this utter wreck of human virtue we look round in vain for some character rising superior to circumstances, and affording to a degenerate age an example of moral purity and dignified demeanour. As for La Rochefoucauld, without ascribing to him any very exalted qualifications, we think he may be fairly regarded as a favourable specimen of his class; and, judged by its standard of excellence, a most distinguished gentleman. If he was vain, ambitious, selfish, and worldly-minded, it will be remembered that he possessed these qualities in common with all the leading spirits of his age; but it is also beyond question that his reputation for personal courage stood high, that his manners were frank and agreeable, and that his commanding intellect raised him immeasurably above the mass of beings who relied entirely on the prestige of name and lineage for the influence they enjoyed. The openness of demeanour for which he was distinguished procured for him the nickname of Franchise, by which it was insinuated that his frankness was assumed for the purpose of misleading others and throwing them off their guard. This imputation was not perhaps altogether unfounded, for it may be borne in mind that he has said in one of his Maxims, that, "The cleverest men affect all their lives to censure all artifice, in order that they may make use of it themselves on some great occasion, and for some great interest;" an idea which Lord Bacon has adopted and admirably illustrated in his Essay on Simulation and Dissimulation: "Certainly the cleverest men that ever were have all had an openness and frankness of dealing, and a name of certainty and veracity; but then they were like horses well managed, for they could tell passing well when to stop or turn, and at such times when they thought the case required dissimulation, if then they used it, it came to pass that the former opinion spread abroad of their good faith and clearness of dealing rendered them almost invisible." Whilst we protest against the morality of the axiom, we would draw attention to its subtle wisdom, which the genius of Bacon so fully appreciated and approved, and at the same time remark, that it curiously illustrates the character of its author, and shows how nicely he calculated the effect of every part of his conduct.

La Rochefoucauld's passion for the Duchess de Longueville was perhaps the principal motive which induced him to take an active part in the war of the Fronde; though he was undoubtedly also actuated by a vague ambition for distinction, which had he lived in other days he might possibly have directed into a nobler channel. Dazzled by the rank and beauty of the duchess—qualifications which, when united in a woman at that period, rendered her all-powerful—he became her devoted admirer and slave, till her inconstancy broke the tie that united them. In the days of his warm attachment, he wrote under her portrait two lines from a then popular tragedy of Du Ruyter, which he applied to his own case:—

"Pour mériter son cœur, pour plaire à ses beaux yeux, J'ai fait la guerre aux rois: je l'aurais faite aux dieux."

Towards the close of the war, whilst fighting by the side of Condé, in the suburbs of Paris, against the troops of Turenne, La Rochefoucauld was severely wounded in the eye by an arquebus, near the gate of St. Antoine, and was temporarily deprived of sight. Some time after, when smarting from the inconstancy of the duchess, he introduced this incident in a skilful parody on Du Ruyter's lines:—

"Pour ce cœur inconstant, qu'enfin je connais mieux, J'ai fait la guerre aux rois; j'en ai perdu les yeux."

At the close of her life, the Duchess de Longueville withdrew from the gay world, and became distinguished for her piety. To such severe discipline did she subject herself, that it is said her death was caused by a protracted fast.

Although under Condé the cause of the Fronde triumphed for a time, the military skill of Turenne and the gold of Mazarin were ultimately too powerful for it. Before La Rochefoucauld had recovered from his wound, his party experienced a reverse of popular favour; its leaders fell off, and others were only anxiously waiting to make terms for themselves. At length the royal authority was universally acknowledged, and faction was said to be crushed. The bourgeoisie rallied round the throne, and the influence of the nobility declined. La Rochefoucauld beheld the ascendancy of the kingly power, and endeavoured to detach himself from his party, already deserted by most of its leaders. As a professed courtier, there was, however, no place for him at the court of Louis XIV., who had now assumed the functions of sovereignty; for all who had taken part in the rebellion of the Fronde were either suspected or in actual disgrace. His fortune had also severely suffered, and he had no longer the means of playing a distinguished part as a man of fashion. It is supposed that at the conclusion of the war he spent some time on his estate; but afterwards, being much embarrassed, he committed it to the management of his secretary, Gourville, and thenceforth lived in Paris, on a very moderate allowance;—the ornament of a small intellectual circle, and entirely detached from political intrigue.

At this period of his life his dearest and most intimate friend was Madame de la Fayette, a literary lady of distinguished taste and talent, the pupil of Menage and Rapin, and well known as the authoress of La Princesse de Clèves. An attachment of twenty years' duration sprang up between them, cemented by mutual obligations which both were proud to acknowledge. La Rochefoucauld had intellect, and Madame de la Fayette had principle; she was honest and truthful, and he was wise and witty. Their intimacy was thus productive of mutual advantage; as the lady modestly and beautifully observed:—"He gave me mind, and I reformed his heart."

Another of his most sincere and attached friends was the famous Madame de Sévigné, whose life presents so many features of interest, and whose admirable letters are still read with pleasure and studied as models. It is worthy of remark that this celebrated woman always speaks of La Rochefoucauld with the utmost respect. She does not scruple to describe him as the first among all the men she ever knew for courage, goodness, tenderness, and sense, reckoning his wit and many agreeable qualities as nothing in comparison to these. For the last ten years of his life La Rochefoucauld was a martyr to the gout, and Madame de Sévigné repeatedly dwells on the severity of his sufferings and the exemplary fortitude with which they were endured. On the other hand, as an instance of the sensibility of his disposition, she has related how he burst into tears when an anecdote was repeated to him respecting the conduct of an officer whose arm was shot off by the same cannon-ball that deprived Turenne of life, and who, entirely regardless of the loss of his own limb, fell weeping on the body of his commander, and clung to it with transports of grief.

Besides these distinguished female associates, La Rochefoucauld lived on terms of intimacy with most of the eminent literati of the age. Boileau and Racine were among his friends, and Molière is said to have submitted his comedies for his approval. His clearness of apprehension and refined wit recommended him to the society of all who had any pretensions to literary distinction. At length, on the 17th March, 1680, after a severe illness of some days, he expired in the arms of the celebrated Bossuet, who had administered to him the last consolations of religion. His friend Madame de la Fayette is represented as having been inconsolable for his loss; and Madame de Sévigné has in her letters minutely and tenderly described every incident of his last illness.

La Rochefoucauld's two works—the "Memoirs of his own Times," and the more celebrated "Maxims and Moral Reflections,"—though written after his retirement from politics, are impregnated with the spirit of his active life. He has been described as the moralist of the Fronde, as Cardinal de Retz was its historian. Having passed his early years in a thoroughly corrupt and demoralised society, and being endowed with no ordinary faculties of observation, his views of human nature are such as we might have expected him to promulgate. But whatever we may think of their spirit and tendency, the Maxims will always rank among the most valuable contributions to literature. Their great merit is of course the amount of thought and observation which the writer has dexterously managed to pack into so small a compass, by a rigid retrenchment of all superfluous matter and unnecessary words. To the great mass of mankind the brevity of the Maxims is one of their most acceptable qualities: it has recommended them to the attention of the idlest and least reflecting, and has caused them to be easily retained in the memory, and repeated from mouth to mouth. Voltaire remarked of La Rochefoucauld's literary performances, that "his Memoirs were read, and his Maxims were known by heart;" and it would be superfluous for us to add the various eulogies which have been pronounced on the latter work by distinguished critics of other countries. According to the new translator, the earliest English translation of the Maxims was published in 1689, "under the title of 'Seneca unmasked,' by the celebrated Mrs. Aphra Behn, who calls the author the Duke of Rushfucave!" But it is very evident that many English writers had made use of them before that period, and the views of human character which they inculcated had been widely adopted.

It has been observed by Voltaire, that there is scarcely more than one truth running through this celebrated book; viz.—that "self-love is the motive of everything." The nature of this "one truth" has given rise to considerable controversy, and whilst we shall endeavour as much as possible to avoid being entangled in metaphysical subtleties, it will not be improper for us to make a few observations upon it. In the first place, we submit it must be conceded that there are two descriptions of selfishness, or self-love; that one order or form of selfishness,—narrow and short-sighted in its nature and aim,—leads us to consult our own convenience, comfort, and sensual gratification, without regard to the comfort or well-being of others, and to derive our sole gratification from our own sensations of pleasure and avoidance of pain. But there is evidently another kind of self-love, more enlightened and exalted, which regards the performance of charitable actions, and a reasonable deference to the convenience and wishes of others, as absolutely necessary for our own enjoyment of this present existence; and although this species of selfishness is more refined, and is certainly not that which is popularly understood by the term, philosophers are undoubtedly justified in including it under the general term of self-love,—a regard to self, and the pursuit of one's own interest. As Swift has pithily put it: "It is allowed that the cause of most actions, good or bad, may be resolved into the love of ourselves: but the self-love of some men inclines them to please others; and the self-love of others is wholly employed in pleasing themselves." In referring every action, therefore, to the love of self, according to the verbal argument, at any rate, La Rochefoucauld was not in the wrong: but his great error, and the error of most of those who have followed in the same path, appears to consist in forming a low standard of human enjoyments, and of the objects and circumstances capable of conferring gratification; in a manifest devotion to the sensual and material; and in failing to appreciate the purest sources of pleasure and truest principles of happiness.

We will now refer to a few of the Maxims which have excited the greatest attention from the subtlety and acuteness they evince, or the peculiar morality they inculcate; presenting our readers, at the same time, with some of the illustrative passages which have been collected by the new translator. In some instances, we have been enabled to add other extracts, which appeared to bear on the topics discussed, or to confirm the views of La Rochefoucauld.

We commence with a Maxim which is a type of many more, and which has much of the sneering and sarcastic tone so often assumed by the moralist of the Fronde.

"We have all of us sufficient fortitude to bear the misfortunes of others."

A similar reflection has found expression in the writings of two other profound observers—Shakespeare and Swift.

"Every man can master a grief, but he that has it."
—Much Ado about Nothing, Act III. Sc. 2.

"Men,
Can counsel and speak comfort to that grief
Which they themselves not feel, but tasting it
Their counsel turns to passion.

* * * * *
No, no! 'tis all men's office to speak patience
To those that wring under the load of sorrow.
But no man's virtue nor sufficiency
To be so moral, when he shall endure
The like himself."

Much Ado about Nothing, Act V. Sc. 1.

"I never knew a man that could not bear the misfortunes of others with the most Christian resignation."
—SWIFT, Thoughts on various subjects.

Of a kindred character is the celebrated maxim which has been so frequently commented on, and so much condemned:—

"In the adversity of our best friends we often find something which does not displease us."

That well-disposed persons should feel a secret pleasure in the misfortunes of others, seems at first a hard saying; but it is nevertheless, in a qualified sense, a humiliating truth, which those who have most narrowly watched the emotions of the mind have been constrained to accept. In the majority of mankind it is, perhaps, nothing more than a pleasurable feeling arising from a sense of individual security, or freedom from the suffering or ill-fortune which may have overtaken others. This feeling is entirely distinct from the unamiable sentiment of envious selfishness which rejoices in the affliction of a friend, from pure malevolence, or impatience of another's prosperity. It is, in fact, precisely the sentiment which is expressed in the well-known lines of Lucretius, cited by the present translator in illustration of La Rochefoucauld's maxim :—

"Suave mari magno turbantibus sequora ventis,
E terra alterius magnum spectare laborem;
Non, quia vexari quemquam est jucunda voluptas,
Sed, quibus ipso malis careas, quia cernere suave est."
Book ii. v. 1.

Of which we venture to add Creech's homely but pithy version :—

"'Tis pleasant, when the seas are rough, to stand
And view another's danger, safe at land;
Not 'cause he's troubled, but 'tis sweet to see Those cares and fears, from which ourselves are free."

La Rochefoucauld's maxim has, however, we submit, a more malicious meaning, and it was in that sense bitterly seized on by Swift, and introduced in the Verses on his own Death, written, it will be recollected, in the intervals of physical suffering, and under the influence of the deepest mental gloom :—

"As Rochefoucauld his maxims drew
From Nature, I believe them true.
They argue no corrupted mind
In him—the fault is in mankind.
This maxim more than all the rest
Is thought too base for human breast,—
In all distresses of our friends
We first consult our private ends,
While Nature kindly bent to ease us,
Points out some circumstance to please us.

* * * * *

To all my foes, dear Fortune, send Thy gifts, but never to my friend;
I tamely can endure the first,
But this with envy makes me burst."

The Maxim has been indeed generally taken, as it was probably intended, in its most ill-natured sense; and such a clamour was raised against it, that La Rochefoucauld was induced to suppress it in the last edition which he published. "Byron," says the present translator, "has despondingly alluded to it, (Childe Harold, canto 3,)

"I would believe
That some for other's griefs sincerely grieve."

We cite the following for the sake of its proverbial truth, as well as for the illustration which accompanies it :—

"Those who bestow too much application on trifling things, become generally incapable of great ones."

"Frivolous curiosity about trifles, and laborious attention to little objects, which neither require nor deserve a moment's thought, lower a man, who from thence is thought, and not unjustly, incapable of greater matters. Cardinal de Retz very sagaciously marked out Cardinal Chigi for a little mind, from the moment he told him that he had wrote three years with the same pen, and that it was an excellent good one still."—
LORD CHESTERFIELD.

How deplorable it is that the sound philosophy conveyed in the next axiom we have to quote, is not more laid to heart! Many who, at this day, have felt the intolerable tyranny of custom, or who have worn out a weary life in anxious agitation for the possession of something that popular opinion, not individual taste, may have marked out as desirable, will know how to appreciate its truth.

"Happiness lies in the taste, and not in the thing; and it is from having what we desire that we are happy—not from having what others think desirable."

"All external concessions," says Montaigne, "receive taste and colour from the internal constitution, as clothes warm us not with their heat, but our own, which they are adapted to cover and keep in."

And Burns, it will be recollected, has given expression, in verse, to the same idea :—

"If happiness have not her seat
And centre in the breast,
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest."

The truth of the following maxim has been generally acknowledged and acted on, and certainly never more than at the present time, when a fair outside show is regarded by all who are skilled in the world's ways as a sure passport to ultimate success :—

"In order to establish themselves in the world, men do all they can to appear established there."

This axiom has been copied by Goldsmith :—

"If a man wishes to become rich, he must appear to be rich."

"It is with true love as with apparitions. Every one talks of it, but few have ever seen it."

"Byron," observes the translator, "was well read in La Rochefoucauld, and this maxim appears to have been the germ of the following fine stanza :—

"O love, Lo habitant of earth thou art,
An unseen seraph, we believe in thee—
A faith whose martyrs are the broken heart;
But never yet hath seen, or e'er shall see,
The naked eye thy form, as it should be,
The mind hath made thee, as it peopled heaven,
Even with its own desiring phantasy,
And to a thought such shape and image given
As haunts the unquench'd soul, parch'd, wearied, wrung, and riven."

"Silence is the safest course for any man to adopt who distrusts himself."

* Shakspeare has given expression to the same idea in the well-known passage, subjoined by the translator from the Merchant of Venice.

"O my Antonio, I do know of those
That therefore only are reputed wise
For saying nothing."

We have also rather an amusing illustration of this truth in the following scrap from Coleridge's Table Talk, which recurs to our recollection. "Silence," says this great conversationist, "does not always mark wisdom. I was at dinner, some time ago, in company with a man who listened to me, and said nothing for a long time; but he nodded his head, and I thought him intelligent. At length, towards the end of the dinner, some apple dumplings were placed on the table, and my man had no sooner seen them, than he burst forth with—"Them's the jockies for me!" I wish Spurzheim could have examined the fellow's head."

A judicious silence, where there is a consciousness of mental deficiency, is undoubtedly a mark of considerable tact. Dr. Johnson has made the following remarks on the conduct of persons before and after dinner, which may further demonstrate the prudence of this species of self-restraint. "Before dinner, men meet with great inequality of understanding; and those who are conscious of their inferiority, have the modesty not to talk: when they have drunk wine, every man feels himself happy, and loses that modesty, and grows impudent and vociferous; but he is not improved; he is only not sensible of his defects."

"How can we expect another to keep our secret if we cannot keep it ourselves?"

"This idea," says the translator, "has been expressed by other writers, but by none more happily than by La Rochefoucauld.

"I have play'd the fool, the gross fool, to believe
The bosom of a friend would hold a secret
Mine own could not contain."

MASSINGER, Unnatural Combat, Act v. Sc. 2.

"Toute révélation d'un secret est la faute de celui qui l'a confié."—LA BRUYÈRE, De la Société.

"Ham. Do not believe it.

Rosencr. Believe what?

Ham. That I can keep your counsel, and not mine own."

SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, Act iv. Sc. 2.

"The most subtle of all artifices is the power of cleverly feigning to fall into the snares laid for us; and we are never so easily deceived as when we think we are deceiving others."

"A curious illustration of this maxim," the translator observes, "was lately exhibited in the events which led to the defeat of the King of Sardinia, in Lombardy, in July 1848. He was beguiled by a pretended plot for delivering the town of Mantua into his hands, and with a view of aiding in its execution, was induced to weaken his military position to such a degree, as to enable the Austrian general, Radetzky, to attack him at a disadvantage. The Italian correspondent of the Times newspaper, (Aug. 2d, 1848,) remarks upon this:—"I perceive that the whole affair was, to use a vulgar but expressive phrase, 'a plant,' to induce the king to impoverish the left of our lines, where Radetzky saw, as events have since proved, that he might strike the surest blow. . . . I have often noticed that cunning men are the most easily deceived, and I fear Charles Albert, who has the reputation of being very rusé, has thus been caught."

"The true method of being deceived is to think oneself more cunning than others."

"Here, my sagacious friend," said Louis, "take this purse of gold, and with it the advice, never to be so great a fool as to think yourself wiser than another." Quentin Durward.

"Our repentance is not so much regret for the evil we have done, as fear of its consequences to us."

"You do repent

As that the sin hath brought you to this shame,
Which sorrow is always toward ourselves, not heaven,
Showing, we'd not spare heaven as we love it,
But as we stand in fear."

Measure for Measure, Act II. Sc. 3.

"When our vices quit us, we flatter ourselves with the belief that it is we who quit them."

The same idea has been expressed by Swift in homely and familiar terms: "When men grow virtuous in their old age, they are merely making a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings."

The next maxim we have to quote has passed into a proverbial saying, the paternity of which may not be known to all those who have been in the habit of making use of it.

"Hypocrisy is the homage which vice renders to virtue."

"Massillon," says the translator, "has adopted this celebrated thought in one of his sermons: 'Le vice rend hommage à la vertu en s'honorant de ses apparences;' and it probably also suggested to Cowper the following passage in the Task, book iii. :—

"Hypocrisy, detest her as we may,
(And no man's hatred ever wrong'd her yet,)
May claim this merit still—that she admits
The worth of what she mimics with such care,
And thus gives virtue indirect applause."

The following two maxims on the nature of eloquence, should be laid to heart by all who make any pretension to that much coveted accomplishment; or who have any ambition as public speakers, to please, persuade, or convince an audience.

"There is as much eloquence in the tone of voice, in the eyes, and in the air of a speaker, as in his choice of words."

"True eloquence consists in saying all that is necessary, and nothing but what is necessary."

Much of the acuteness and subtlety for which La Rochefoucauld was so famous, is exhibited in the next maxim we have to quote:—

"Humility is often only a feigned submission, of which we make use to render others submissive. It is an artifice of pride which abases in order to exalt itself, and though it transforms itself in a thousand different ways, it is never better disguised and more capable of deceiving than when it conceals itself under the garb of humility."

In illustration of this truth, the translator has subjoined the well-known stanza from the Devil's Walk:—

"He saw a cottage with a double coach-house,
A cottage of gentility,
And the devil was pleased, for his darling sin
Is the pride that poses humility."

"In all the professions, every one affects a particular look and exterior, in order to appear what he wishes to be thought, so that it may be said the world is made up of appearances."

This maxim, which every one will admit has a "pretty general application, is followed by another of a kindred character, which has been always enrolled among the most famous sayings of La Rochefoucauld:—

"Gravity is a mystery of the body, invented to conceal the defects of the mind."

This is the maxim which Yorick, in Tristram Shandy, "with great imprudence would say deserved to be wrote in letters of gold." The translator has also subjoined the opinions of two great thinkers and observers to the same effect, expressed in a characteristic style:—

" 'I have observed,' says Lord Bolingbroke, 'that in comedies the best actor plays the droll, while some scrub rogue is made the fine gentleman or hero. Thus it is in the farce of life,—wise men spend their time in mirth, 'tis only fools who are serious!' Lord Shaftesbury also observes, that 'Gravity is of the very essence of imposture; it does not only make us mistake other things, but is apt perpetually almost to mistake itself.' "

"We think very few people sensible except those who are of our opinion."

"That was excellently observed, say I, when I read a passage in an author, where his opinion agrees with mine. When we differ, then I pronounce him to be mistaken."—SWIFT, Thoughts on Various Subjects.

"A fool has not stuff enough to be good."

In Mr. Taylor's admirable drama of Philip van Artevelde, among other profound remarks, we find the following echo of La Rochefoucauld's maxim:

"And Van Muck, the traitor!
Stupidity is seldom soundly honest;
I should have known him better. Live and learn."

"Old fools are more foolish than young ones."

"This maxim," observes the translator, "seems to have passed into the proverb, 'No fool like an old fool.' "

"Malvolio. Infirmity that decays the wise doth ever make the better fool.

"Clown God send you, sir, a speedy infirmity, for the better increasing your folly."

SHAKESPEARE, Twelfth Night.

"Men often proceed from love to ambition, but they seldom return from ambition to love."

"Les hommes commencent par l'amour, finissent par l'ambition, et ne se trouvent dans une assiette plus tranquille, que lorsqu'ils meurent."—LA BRUYÈRE, Du Cœur.

"He who admits ambition to the companionship of love, admits a giant that outstrides the gentler footsteps of its comrade."—SIR E. B. LYTON, Harold.

"Those who are incapable of committing great crimes do not easily suspect others of them."

"Montaigne," says the translator, "remarks, that 'Confidence in another man's virtue is no slight evidence of a man's own;' and he adds, 'God is pleased to favour such confidence.' "

"Whose nature is so far from doing harm,
That he suspects none."—King Lear.

In the Dedication of a volume of poems to the Duchess of Sutherland, the Honourable Mrs.

Norton, alluding to some painful circumstances in her own life, has given a beautiful expression to the same idea:—

"For they who credit crime are they who feel
Their own hearts weak to unresisted sin;
Memory, not judgment, prompts the thoughts that steal
O'er minds like these, an easy faith to win;
And tales of broken truth are still believed
Most readily by those who have themselves deceived."

We have selected these passages from La Rochefoucauld's Book of Maxims, to illustrate the character and genius of the author, and the tone and spirit of his philosophy. The extracts we have appended, (and which are in general taken from the notes of the new translator), will prove in some degree the influence he has exercised upon other minds, and the wide acceptance which the principles he promulgated have found in the world.

THE POT OF MIGNONETTE.

BY J. M. W.

"HERE'S your fine mignonette! Sixpence a pot!—only sixpence a pot!" cried Dicky Wood, the lame flower-boy, as he hobbled painfully up Brick Court, in the hope of getting a customer. Brick Court one would hardly conjecture to be an eligible spot for the vending of such wares, seeing that it was narrow, dark, dirty, and but rarely visited by airs from heaven. How could Dicky Wood think of getting a customer for his mignonette there? But Dicky Wood had a faith in "unseen things;" and the unseen thing in which he trusted at that particular moment was a customer. "Here's your fine mignonette!" he cried, in a childish, and not unmusical voice, as he proceeded slowly up the court.

It was eleven o'clock on a June day;—and Brick Court was, in a manner, devoid of life. It was inhabited solely by working people, and they had nearly all gone away, long ago, to work. The sunbeams—few enough of them, I am sorry to say—had crept down from the chimney tops, and were gilding one or two of the upper windows, on one side of a narrow alley, doing their best to make the poverty of the place look a little less poor than ordinary. It was towards one of these temporarily bright windows that Dicky looked up, as he said invitingly, "Only sixpence a pot, to-day, Ma'am." It was clear there was a possible customer hidden up there, behind the window blind,—the only blind in the court, by the way. Dicky Wood paused, with his eye fixed on that spot. After a minute, the blind was raised slowly; then the window,—and a pale thin hand beckoned to the child, and a pale thin face looked wistfully out, up to the strip of beautiful azure which was all of Heaven's o'er-arching canopy visible even from the highest rooms in Brick Court. It was a female face, which might once have been beautiful.

The boy understood the beckoning hand: and advancing to the door of the house which stood open, he entered it with his basket of plants. It was a heavy load for such a child. He set it down eagerly at the foot of the stairs, drew a long breath, and wiped his flushed face with the sleeve of his jacket.

He took out from his basket the best pot of mignonette, and was about to proceed up the stairs with it, when his eye was attracted by the bright coloured blossoms of some geraniums. His basket of flowers was in strange contrast with the gloomy, dirty staircase; and Dicky Wood thought within himself much as follows: "How pretty and fresh they look!—She can't get out to see flowers. I dare say she would like to see these. It's worth twopence to look at them, in a place like this." Then he looked up the staircase, and again down at the plants. "It's a goodish pull for one's legs alone, up to the garret; and this basket's no joke to carry, but I think I'll try it. She's so fond of flowers! Come! now for it!" and putting back the pot of mignonette he had selected, into the basket again, he lifted it up manfully, and began to toil slowly, with his burden, up the dark staircase. As he had to ascend to the garret, and the house was two stories high, I shall have time to say a few words about Dicky and his customer expectant before he gets to the top.

Dicky Wood was an orphan, without brother or sister; and lived with his grandmother at Fulham. Old Mrs. Wood was very poor; but she never had been, and, please God, never would be on the parish, —that was her pride and boast. For many years she had excellent health, and managed to support herself and her lame grandchild by taking in washing, going out charring, or doing any of that miscellaneous work which goes by the name of "odd jobs," in various neighbouring households, where she was well known, and so much relied on for her honesty, that they would have trusted her with untold gold—if it had ever been their lot to possess that indefinite amount of wealth. When Dicky was in his twelfth year his grandmother's health began to give way; she could no longer earn enough to support them; and, with the fear of parish assistance before her eyes, she, at length, consented to the lame child's earnest entreaty, that he should try to do something to help her. Dicky was a clever boy, in his way, though he could not run fast; or, indeed, run at all. He had an enterprising, active spirit, and was so good-natured and obliging, that he had a host of friends. One nursery-man to whom the boy applied for advice and work, gave him both; and another, with whom his father had worked for many years, offered to give the child a few pots of common flowers to hawk about, whenever he was not employed elsewhere; and moreover, promised to send him to London with them, in one of his carts, as he would be unable to walk so far, and could not find so good a market near home. By working frequently all day long, in the open air, the boy became much stronger, and was well worth his small wages.

After a time Dicky became more and more impressed with an idea of the dignity of work, and of the pleasures of an industrious life. He could not bear to be idle for an hour. This feeling of satisfaction in the work itself was connected with the highest ambition of his mind,—viz. to be able to earn so much money that he might support his grandmother in comfort during her last years. It was this ambition which fired his youthful soul, and prompted him to turn every moment of his time, every little piece of knowledge he possessed, to account. In short, Dicky was an industrious, affectionate, grateful, intelligent boy, of whom his grandmother was justly proud, and whom most persons liked to help, because he was eager to help himself and others. In the winter time he and his grandmother had a hard struggle to live. There was no work to be had in the nursery grounds, and no pots of flowers to sell; however, one of his masters employed him during the whole winter in sorting, packing and labelling seeds; so that at the end of that season Dicky was a tolerable seedsman, and would be worth double wages next year, his master said, if by that time he had learned to write the names of the seeds in a clear, firm hand. Dicky Wood's heart was set upon learning to write well from that moment. He knew how to write a little, and as he could not afford to pay any money for being taught, he set to work every night with a slate and pencil to improve himself, by copying old flower and seed-labels. Early in the spring, before any flowers were in season, he used to take watercresses and chick-weed into London to sell,—getting a lift in the early morning, by some friendly cart, on its way to Covent Garden.

Now, it happened that a young widow with a sickly little girl lived in Brick Court. The little girl had a linnet,—a dear, favourite bird, whose song cheered her when she was in pain. Mrs. Brown, poor as she was, always managed to feed Mary's linnet well; and when she heard Dicky Wood's voice one morning in the court, crying "Chickweed and groundsel," she opened the window and made a sign to him, that she would buy some, if he would wait till she got down stairs. Dicky waited, of course; but his customer kept him so long before she made her appearance below, that he began to think her custom was not worth much; but when he saw her come down the last few stairs to meet him, his impatience vanished, and he hobbled forwards towards her eagerly, saying, "Don't come any farther, Ma'am!" Poor Mrs. Brown was lame; much lamer than he was! she was obliged to walk with a crutch. He gave her the best half-pennyworth of chickweed in his basket, and promised to bring her some more the next time he came that way. He not only brought it, but he carried it up stairs to her door for her, because, as he told his grandmother, "my legs are the youngest, and I think it hurts her to walk, much more than it does me." Mrs. Brown was a sempstress, and sat still all day, sewing, by the side of her sick little girl. They never had any visitors but the parish doctor and Dicky

Wood, who each came regularly twice a-week; the one to feel the little girl's pulse and leave some medicine and sometimes a little money for her use—the other to bring the linnæa his allowance of fresh green-stuff. After one or two visits Dicky got to feel quite friendly with Mrs. Brown and Mary, and would frequently stop a few minutes to talk with them. Once or twice he brought the poor little girl some spring flowers, crocuses and primroses, which had been given him, and it pleased the good-natured boy to see how the large, hollow eyes of the little girl brightened as she looked at them.

"Mother!" said Mary, one day, when the linnæa was singing cheerily, and she had looked for a long time at a bunch of primroses which Dicky had brought her—"Mother, I think I should get well if I could only be where the flowers grow and the birds sing."

Poor, pale Mrs. Brown looked at the child sadly;—but she was too good a mother to say anything saddening.

"Ah! well, my darling!—We can't tell what may happen. God is very good, you know. I hope we shall get into the country one of these fine days. Shall I tell you about the pleasant country place I used to live in when I was a little girl?" And the fond mother described Springfield, the village in which she was born; and the little girl listened and looked at her primroses till she quite forgot that she was in a garret in Brick Court, Westminster.

The next time that Dicky came, when he had put the groundsel in the cage, little Mary asked him to come and tell her what sort of place he lived in; and Dicky sat down beside her bed, and told her about the large nursery-grounds with their greenhouses and hot-houses,—and the beautiful villas with large gardens, and the neat cottages with small ones, which are to be seen in Fulham and its neighbourhood.

"Oh! it is a most beautiful place, and I only wish you could come and live in it. Why, bless you! you can't think what lots of flowers my master has in his houses. If you stare so at these"—pointing to a few jonquils he had brought for her,—"your eyes would come quite out of your head, I'm thinking, if you could catch a glimpse of our camellias, and azaleas, and geraniums."

"What hard words!" said little Mary. "But I will try and remember them. Give me my book, mother, and a pencil; and if you will tell me how to spell them, I will write down the names."

Mrs. Brown knew how to spell those hard words as well as Dicky; and when Mary had written them, he saw that she wrote much quicker and better than he did. He asked her how she had learned to write so well, and she told him that she used to go to school before she fell ill. Dicky thought he would give a great deal, if he had it to give, to be able to write as well as poor little Mary Brown; and he felt that his liking for her and her mother was much increased since he found they were so well educated.

As the season advanced, Dicky Wood became more constantly employed at Fulham, and did not come often to London; and when he did, it was to sell plants at a sixpence and a shilling each. He was sorely tempted to give one of these to little Mary every time he came, for he was a generous-hearted little fellow; but he refrained from doing so, because he knew that he could sell them, and that it was his duty to be just before he was generous. His grandmother was failing fast, and every penny he could scrape together was required to get necessities and comforts for her. No! much as he desired to do so, he could not give away even a single pot of mignonette, because he could sell it for sixpence. Poor Dicky! Good, honest, virtuous Dicky! Honour to your sound principles, and steady practice!—you withstood temptation, and indulged not in the luxury of giving. To a mind like yours there are few luxuries more tempting; for to such it is pleasanter to give than to receive. The last time Dicky had been in Brick Court his mignonette was eightpence and ninepence the pot, and Mrs. Brown could not afford to let Mary have one, at that price, but had said that she would wait till it was sixpence. It was sixpence a pot now, and therefore Dicky felt himself justified in expecting a customer in Brick Court to-day; and, as we have seen, his expectation was on the point of being realized. As he could not conscientiously give away sixpence from his sick grandmother, he was the more anxious to give Mary and her mother the treat of looking at the flowers in his basket—for, to them, he knew it would be a treat. So the boy determined to carry his heavy load up to the attic. At last he reached the top, and saw Mrs. Brown standing at the open door of her room. She wondered why the boy was so long in coming up; and was surprised to see the load he carried. He set it down on the landing-place, and paused to take breath, while his intelligent face, flushed and moist with perspiration, looked at her, smilingly.

"Why did you bring that up, my dear boy?—It's too much for you to carry," said gentle Mrs. Brown.

"Not a bit of it!" said Dick, wiping his hot face. "It does me good. I'm strong enough in the arms, you know, if I'm weak in the legs. I brought it up because I thought you and Mary would like to see those beautiful blossoms; and I knew you couldn't come down to see them. If you'll give me a drink of water I shall be all right. How's Mary this morning?—I've got a bit of groundsel for the bird."

"Is that Dicky Wood, mother?" cried the little girl, in a feeble voice. "Bring him in."

"Yes, my darling; we are coming;" said the mother; and she whispered to Dicky, "She is much weaker than when you saw her; but don't seem to notice that, my dear. She has been longing for this mignonette; and I'm sure she'll be much obliged to you for bringing these beautiful flowers for her to look at. Poor darling, she is so fond of flowers! Come in; and I will give you some water to drink, and some to wash your face with. Here, let me help you with the basket, now." And they entered the room together. The door was left open, because the weather was very warm, and the doctor had ordered that the child should be kept as cool as possible.

When they had disappeared within the room, somebody else appeared on the landing-place, at the top of the stairs. It was a little old man with grey hair, who was very shabbily dressed, but who nevertheless did not look as if he were poor. The shabbiness of his coat was a fancy of the wearer, not a necessity, because on his little finger he wore a ring with a great diamond, and his shirt front was of very fine cambric, and beautifully white. He was an eccentric old man, and passed many hours every day in wandering about London in search of adventures. He had seen Dicky Wood turn into Brick Court with his heavy basket. The pale, intelligent face of the boy, which he had often seen before, had taken his fancy, and he followed him unperceived. When he saw Mrs. Brown give the signal from her window, the little old man felt a double desire to follow the boy. He watched him during the short debate with himself as to whether he should or should not carry his load to the attic; and when he saw him, lame as he was, begin to ascend the dark stair-case with it, the strange old gentleman was determined to ascertain what the motive for such a labour could be. "Surely," he said within himself, "it's not the mere hope of selling another pot of flowers that has lighted up the child's face with such a beautiful expression!" He stepped softly up the dark stairs behind the child, and overheard distinctly the few words that passed between him and Mrs. Brown; and when they had gone into the room, and the door was partially closed so that he could stand near it and listen unperceived, he did so. I have nothing to say in favour of listening at doors; and yet I cannot find it in my heart to say anything against old Mr. Metcalfe's listening on the present occasion. He expected to hear neither good nor ill of himself, for he knew that the speakers were unaware of his very existence; what he expected to hear was something from which he could learn how he could best assist those who seemed to him to be oppressed by the double affliction of poverty and sickness.

Mr. Metcalfe was not silly enough to fancy that poverty is always an affliction; he knew well that healthy, active poverty is often to be desired rather than wealth, with its heavy drawbacks and responsibilities. He was a wise man, and knew that in a civilized country there must always be poor as well as rich; and that if the poor are contented and industrious, they have far more of happiness than mere wealth can give them. They have the dignity of labour, and the enjoyment of repose after it; and they have no time to spend in frivolous searches after a flimsy happiness, which is not worth seeking. Mr. Metcalfe had been a poor man himself, and he knew wherein consisted the real trials of poverty. He knew that when poor people had health and strength, plenty of employment, and enough to bring up their children respectably in the state of life unto which it had pleased God to call them, they were far indeed from being proper objects of pity; he was quite certain that few classes of people enjoy life more. But when the poor have not physical strength, when sickness lays its hand on them, when they have not enough to educate their children,—then, he knew, that poverty was an evil; and then, he knew, also, that it was his duty, as a rich man, with no near relatives dependent on him, to try if he could do anything towards alleviating the evil. As Mr. Metcalfe was a man who had striven hard all his life to do his duty, the doing it, now that he was old, had acquired a property of easiness. In regard to this one duty of helping the poor, it was his greatest pleasure. I believe he never enjoyed anything in the days of his boyhood and youth more than he, now, enjoyed the discovery of some fitting object for his benevolent sympathy. On the present occasion, as he stood outside Mrs. Brown's door, and listened to the voices within, you might have fancied it was the face of a young man about to commence some service for his lady-love; there was such a deep gladness, such a touching tenderness in the face. He did not hear much. Mrs. Brown was too sad with the fear of losing her only child; Mary was too feeble, and poor Dicky too sympathising, for any of the three to be abundantly eloquent.

"This is a very fine pot of mignonette, for sixpence, Dicky!" said Mrs. Brown: "don't you think you could sell it for more?"

"Perhaps I might. Never mind!" said Dick—"I don't often give myself a treat, and now, if you please, you must keep your sixpence, and let this be a keepsake from me to Mary.—No, I won't be paid for it. I wish to goodness I could afford to leave all these with you since she likes 'em so much. But we're behind-hand with our rent, and the Doctor, he says my grandmother ought to have a nurse, a woman to look after her. I must hire one, of course; and the Lord only knows where the money's to come from."

"Don't be down-hearted, my boy," said Mrs. Brown, giving him a towel and some water; "there, just give your face a good wash—you'll feel all the better after it. There's nothing like a good wash for raising the spirits."

Mr. Metcalfe heard Dick splashing in the cool water, and almost envied him, for it was a very warm day.

"Oh! that's capital!" said Dick, taking a long breath, and then giving his face a short rub.—"Now then, let me see how my namesake goes on."

"He's very well. He sings beautiful," said Mary in a faint cheerful voice, as she sat propped up in bed gazing on the bright blossoms in Dick's basket. "But give him the groundsel—it reminds him of his old home among the trees and fields, I think. See! how he pecks at it!"

"Are you glad I'm come, Mary?"—asked Dicky, sitting down gently on the old box beside her bed, and stretching out his recently washed hand to touch her small blue veined fingers.—"I'm afraid you thought I'd forgotten all about the mignonette. But I had not. It's been very dear this spring."

"I'm very glad to have the nice mignonette; but you should not have waited till it was cheaper before you came to see me. I'm very ill, Dicky. Don't stay away so long again, or you may not see me next time. Now, Mother, darling, don't cry. You know, dearest mother, the Doctor says I cannot get better unless I go into the country and have asses' milk and all sorts of nourishing things, which cost a great deal of money. So now, Dicky, I want you to talk to her, and make her see that it's best not to tease herself any more about me, but just to do the best we can to make each other happy for the short time I have to live. If mother was to work her fingers to the bone, (which she does, pretty nearly,) she could not get money enough to take me into the country, and buy me all the things the Doctor says I want; so it's best to give it up. If God had meant me to get better, he would have sent us these things."

"But, Mary dear, you cannot want to die?" said Dicky in a husky voice, for the tears were in his throat, at the thought of her death. The poor mother sat at the foot of the bed, unable to speak to the children.

"No! oh no!" said the little sickly voice—"I do not want to die. It is so hard to leave mother, and never to see the beautiful country places she and you talk about. At first, I could not bear it; and it made me cry whenever I thought about it; but now I do not mind it so much."

"Why not?" asked Dicky gently.

"Because," replied the little girl after a pause—"Because,—I have thought and thought about it so often that it does not seem dreadful. I'm used to it; and in the night time angels come to me and tell me that God wishes me to go to him, and they promise to comfort mother when I am gone. Kiss me, mother. Don't cry, Dicky. Listen. You said just now that you would be obliged to hire some one to nurse your grandmother. Now, you could not in all the wide world get a better, kinder nurse than mother. If you could wait a week or two till I am—gone to the angels—and would then come and fetch mother to live with you and take care of your grandmother, I think it would be a good thing for you all. Mother longs to go and live among fields and trees quite as much as I do. She won't want to be paid for nursing your grandmother. She'll be able to earn money enough for herself, by dressmaking, after a time, and will be able to help you; though just at first, Dicky dear, she won't be able to work, for thinking and fretting about me. So I want you to come and see us as often as you can, and let us settle about her living with you that I may die comfortably."

Little Mary's voice seemed to get stronger as she proceeded; and her accent was so affectionate that the listening stranger could scarcely refrain from entering the room. Just then he heard a man's footstep coming briskly up the stairs. Mr. Metcalfe did not like to be caught in the act of listening outside a poor woman's door, so he turned away and began to go down-stairs. On the second landing he met the person who was coming up. From his appearance he guessed him to be the Doctor. When Mr. Metcalfe had set his mind upon doing anything, he did not hesitate much about the way of beginning his work. He accosted this gentleman at once.

"Is the little girl in the attic, here, a patient of yours, Sir?"

"Yes," replied the Doctor. "She and her mother are very interesting people. In my profession, Sir, we had need be made of money, to relieve half the cases of real necessity that come before us.—There's this poor child. If she could be removed without delay to a healthy country place, where she could have fresh air, novelty to occupy her mind, and delicate nutritious diet, I would engage that she would get better. As it is, poor little thing!"—

"You think she will die?"

"I do; and what better prospect than an early death can I see for her!—Living as she is compelled to do, (for her good mother is lame and very delicate herself, and cannot manage to change her mode of life, or move about much,) it is not possible that she can ever recover enough to be of use in her own support. This weighs on her mind;—and the little thing already begins to look forward to her own death as a relief to her mother. Ah! Sir, there are some very hard and stern realities that come face to face with very young children among the poor. And when one thinks that such realities might come home to one's own children, it makes us begin to look about and see if we cannot help matters a little. I've got a quarter of an hour to spare, and so I've just stepped up to have a talk with Mrs. Brown, and see exactly what means of subsistence and what friends she has, and then I must see if I can raise a subscription, to send her and the child into the country for a time."

Mr. Metcalfe grasped the good man's hand.—"You're a good fellow, Sir. Excuse my familiarity; but a fellow-feeling should make us familiar. I'm intensely interested in these poor people. I'm able to help them. They don't know me; they never saw me. There's a boy with them now, whom I know by sight because he lives in a cottage near me; I've taken a fancy to him, too. If you'll go up and send him to me while you talk to them, I think there need be no delay in carrying out your wishes for the child and her mother."

The Doctor looked gratified, shook hands again with Mr. Metcalfe, exchanged cards with him, and promised to send Dicky Wood down stairs immediately. After a few minutes Dicky was heard descending slowly with his heavy load. Mr. Metcalfe, as the reader guesses, was not too fine a gentleman to help a poor boy with a load. He went to meet him, and said—"Let me give you a hand."

Dicky had no idea that the person who spoke to him was Mr. Metcalfe, of Hertford House, Fulham,—one of the grandest places near his home;—he could only see a man's form indistinctly, in the dim light. He replied, "Thank you, sir," and accepted the offer readily. When they reached the bottom, and emerged into the court, Dicky Wood thanked his helper again, and this time he looked into his face. Very much astonished was Dicky Wood when he saw who it was, and he took off his hat respectfully; for Mr. Metcalfe's household had been very kind to his grandmother, and Mr. Metcalfe himself was very much beloved among the poor in his neighbourhood.

"You've got some nice plants there," he said, kindly, wishing to relieve the boy's embarrassment. "How much are they all worth?"

"Five shillings, Sir," replied Dick.

"I'll buy them." And the old gentleman put five shillings into his hand. "I've taken a fancy to them, and should like to have them at my house. Leave them here just now, and fetch me a cab to the end of the court."

Dicky soon brought the cab, and he and the man lifted the plants to the top of it.

"Now, Richard Wood, I want to speak to you.—You know who I am? Very well. Is there not another room in your cottage besides those which you and your grandmother use?"

"Yes, sir. We can't let it, because we've got no furniture."

"Well, I want to hire it, and I've got some furniture. How much is it a-week?"

"Four shillings, sir. It's the best room, and very large and airy."

"That's the sort of room I want. I want to hire it, and furnish it to-day for the poor woman and the little girl whom you have just been visiting. I shall go home now, and see your grandmother: she shall not be disturbed more than can be helped. I'll send one of my servants to clean out the room and arrange the furniture, which shall be sent from my house; and to-morrow Mary and her mother shall come down to Fulham, and you shall come and fetch them. You are a good boy; and I shall take great care of these plants, because they remind me of the unselfish exertion you made to please the sick little girl. I shall not give you any money, Richard Wood, I think you are a fine fellow, and I should like to shake hands with you. I do not mean to pay you for the pot of mignonette you gave to little Mary. You said you wished to give yourself a treat by making her a present of it. I will not deprive you of your treat—you deserve it. Now, go and tell the little girl and her mother that a friend of yours, Mr. Metcalfe, is going to send you to fetch them away from Brick Court, to-morrow. Tell the mother, that I hope she will help to nurse your grandmother, as Mary proposed; and tell Mary that she must get well very fast when she comes to Fulham. Above all things, Dick, my boy, don't let her forget her pot of mignonette. If it had not been for that, I never should have known any thing about her. I shall send some one to see the poor woman this evening, and tell her what arrangements are being made for her comfort. In the meantime, I think you had better go back and have some dinner with her. In case she has nothing ready cooked in her cupboard, suppose you take this to the next eating-house, and buy what you think she would like best,—don't forget a jelly for little Mary, and some wine for both of them."

So saying, the benevolent old man put a sovereign into Dick's hand; and before he could say any words of thanks, the cab, with Mr. Metcalfe in it, was rattling away down the street. Dick looked after it till it was out of sight; then he looked at the sovereign in his hand, then up at Mrs. Brown's attic window. The sunbeams still illuminated it. It was open, the blind was drawn up, and on the window sill, outside, stood a pot of mignonette in full bloom. The sight of that seemed to recall Dick's senses.

"It was that—if it hadn't been for that, I never should have been in Brick Court to-day! Oh! that blessed pot of mignonette! What a trifle to bring about so much good! But, as grandmother says, the world is full of good people."

LEWIS ARUNDEL;

OR, THE RAILROAD OF LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XLVII.

CONTAINS A PARADOX—LEWIS WHEN LEAST DESIGNED, DISPLAYS THE VIRTUE OF RESIGNATION.

ON the morning after his second visit to Hardy, Lewis received a packet from the hospital chaplain, enclosing the letter of which the dying man had spoken, together with a note containing the information that Hardy had breathed his last about two hours before daybreak. The chaplain had seen him, and judged him to be in a fitting state of mind to receive the last consolations of religion. After partaking of the Holy Communion he had fallen into a state of unconsciousness, and died without any return of pain. Lewis opened Hardy's letter: it merely contained a repetition of the request in regard to his unfortunate daughter, together with a reference to one of his associates in whose possession was a packet containing his father-in-law's will, and other papers, all of which he begged Lewis to take charge of and examine at his leisure; he also gave a clue by which Miss Grant's watch and trinkets might be recovered, and expressed his deep penitence for that robbery, as well as for his other crimes. As Lewis perused this letter, he for the first time became fully aware of the embarrassing situation in which he had placed himself by his promise to Hardy. How was he to discover Lord Bellefield's victim? how endeavour to reclaim her? After a few minutes' thought his determination was taken. General Grant had announced that morning the fact that Lord Bellefield, having accepted an invitation to Broadhurst, might be expected in the course of the following day; Lewis therefore resolved to address a letter to his lordship, to be given him on his arrival, detailing such portions of Hardy's confession as related to his daughter, and the promise which he had been induced to make to the dying poacher; adding that if Lord Bellefield would afford him the information necessary in order to enable him to carry out her father's wishes, and pledge his word of honour to avoid her for the future, he should not attempt to give publicity to the matter, but that in the event of his refusal, he should feel it his duty to make General Grant acquainted with the whole affair.

In pursuance of the system he had laid down for himself, Lewis avoided Annie's society as much as was possible; a line of conduct which she soon appeared to observe, and at first to wonder at. The arrival of Lord Bellefield, however, and her knowledge of Lewis's feelings towards him, afforded her an imaginary clue to the young tutor's altered demeanour; still the change annoyed and pained her, more than she chose to acknowledge even to her own heart. Lord Bellefield was all amiability; he had visited Italy, and brought back innumerable anecdotes of the domestic felicity of his brother Charles, whose wife he reported to be a model to her sex. His accounts of Charles's prodigious business efforts, varied by occasional lapses into the dolce-far-niente of dandyism, were amusing in the extreme. Annie was forced to own that her cousin appeared greatly improved, and yet her repugnance to a renewal of the engagement seemed daily to increase. General Grant, however, by no means sympathised with this caprice, as he considered it, and was only restrained from some violent manifestation of domestic despotism, by his confidence in his own authority, and in the certainty of Annie's obedience whenever he might see fit to demand it. Lewis wrote the letter to Lord Bellefield, and having ascertained that it had reached him safely, waited patiently for an answer. Several days elapsed without his receiving one, and he was debating what step he should next take, when, as he was pacing up and down a shrubby walk wrapped in meditation, he suddenly met Lord Bellefield face to face. Determining not to lose the opportunity, he raised his hat, and bowing slightly, began:—

"This meeting is fortunate, as I am anxious to ask your lordship a question. Have you not received a letter from me?"

"I have, sir," was the haughty and concise reply.

"It is customary between gentlemen to acknowledge the receipt of a letter," urged Lewis, "more particularly when, as in this instance, the writer has pledged himself to act according to the tenor of the answer."

"I scarcely see how your observation applies to the present case," was the insolent rejoinder. "In regard to your letter, I have treated it with the silent contempt it merited."

Lewis's brow flushed; controlling the angry impulse, however, he said calmly:—"Your lordship cannot irritate me by such insinuations—you are aware of the alternative when you refuse to answer my letter?"

"I am, sir; you are welcome to take any course you please; I scorn your false accusations, and leave you to do your worst."

"In that case we understand each other," was the stern reply, and again raising his hat, Lewis passed on.

After this brief conversation, he lost no time in obtaining a private interview with General Grant; scarcely, however, had he begun his statement when the General interrupted him, by observing:—

"I need not trouble you to proceed, Mr. Arundel; I am in possession of all the facts you are about to detail—Lord Bellefield has given me a full explanation of the matter, and I can assure you that you are labouring under an erroneous impression. The main facts of the story are, I am sorry to say, true; but the chief actor in the affair was a rascally valet of Lord Bellefield's, who assumed his master's name and apparel in order to accomplish his nefarious designs."

"But I myself witnessed an interview between Lord Bellefield and the poor girl on the morning after the ball," returned Lewis, in surprise; "I should not have brought such a charge on insufficient grounds, believe me."

"Your zeal, sir," replied the General,—"for I am willing to attribute the step you have taken solely to misdirected zeal,—has assuredly led you into error. Lord Bellefield, who seems by some means aware of this idea of yours—"

"I mentioned that I saw him, in a letter which I addressed to him on the subject," interrupted Lewis; "it is only fair when you accuse a man of any fault to explain the grounds on which you believe him to have committed it."

"Quite right, sir, quite right," rejoined the General, with an approving nod; "it is owing to the fair and manly way in which you have stated this matter, that Lord Bellefield has been enabled to clear himself to my entire satisfaction. In regard to the interview to which you refer, he has recalled to me the fact, that he spent the morning in question almost entirely in my company; we were engaged upon matters connected with the approaching election—you must therefore have mistaken the identity of the person you imagined to be him."

"I am not apt to make such mistakes," returned Lewis, dryly, feeling convinced that the story was a clever fabrication from beginning to end, while, at the same time, he was becoming aware that for him to prove it to be so, would be next to impossible.

"Nevertheless, you must have done so in this instance," resumed General Grant; "but the mistake is easily to be accounted for. Lord Bellefield tells me, that in order more safely to carry on his schemes, this rascally valet used to disguise himself so as to resemble his master as much as possible, even wearing false moustachios to increase the likeness; the fact of his having deceived you, proves how successfully the fellow had contrived his disguise."

While the General was speaking, Lewis hastily ran over in his mind all the evidence he possessed to prove Lord Bellefield's guilt; and though he still felt as deeply convinced as he had ever been, that in his first impression he had not erred, yet so skilfully had this story of the valet been adapted to suit the circumstances of the case, that it appeared impossible to undeceive a man, whose habits of mind were so obstinate as those of General Grant. His first introduction to the girl after the glove affair in the ice-room, although it carried conviction to his own mind, proved nothing, save that having witnessed a quarrel between two gentlemen, she was naturally enough alarmed as to the probable consequences to which it might lead. Again, in his second interview, she might have been herself deceived by the valet's representations into believing him to be Lord Bellefield, or, as she said, Mr. Leicester, his brother; or, again, it was still more probable, that she had been in her lover's confidence, and striving to mystify and deceive Lewis. Hardy might have been aware of other facts, but his mistake in regard to Lewis, proved that his information was not to be relied on. All this Lewis saw at a glance; and seeing, felt more annoyed and embarrassed than he could express.

"Time will prove the truth," he said; "I cannot believe in Lord Bellefield's innocence, but I am unable, at the present moment, to adduce any facts which might not bear the interpretation he has chosen to put upon them, and can only express my sorrow at having annoyed you, sir, by making a charge which I have failed to substantiate."

"You annoy me more, Mr. Arundel, by refusing to be convinced by evidence, which, after having given the matter my fullest attention, has sufficed to satisfy me. I can only imagine that, in this matter, private pique has warped your usually clear judgment; perhaps, after a little cool reflection, you may be induced to take a more charitable view of the affair."

So saying, the General stalked out of the room with a majestic port, as of an offended lion, leaving Lewis in a frame of mind the reverse of seraphic. But his trials for that morning were not yet at an end. Annie Grant had brooded over the young tutor's gloomy looks and altered demeanour, till she had made herself quite unhappy, when the idea occurred to her that she herself might be to blame. Since the last German lesson, to which allusion has been made, she had felt an instinctive dread of sounding the depths of her own feelings, or of allowing any one else, and much more Lewis, to perceive them. But it now struck her that, in avoiding one extreme, she had fallen into the other, and that Lewis might conceive the alteration in her manner to be owing to Lord Bellefield's influence. This notion having once struck her, was so inconceivably painful, that she determined to avail herself of the first opportunity of inquiring to what cause Lewis's estrangement might be attributed; and if she found it had been produced by any supposed coolness on her part, she resolved to explain away such impression, and, as she herself would have termed it, "make friends" again. Pondering these thoughts, she entered the library by a door communicating with the garden; in her hand she carried a bunch of roses, which she had just gathered, and hanging from her arm was her garden bonnet, which she had converted for the occasion into an extempore basket, also filled with roses; her golden ringlets, scared from their propriety by the wind, hung in picturesque disorder about her face and neck; the alarm she had lately undergone had rendered her somewhat paler than ordinary, and her delicate features were characterised by an unusually pensive expression. She entered so quietly, that Lewis, who, buried in thought, was seated at the table, his head resting on his hands, did not perceive her presence, until, in a soft low voice, she uttered his name. At the moment she spoke, he was thinking of her—striving in vain to banish her image, which haunted his imagination like some restless ghost—trying to think down the temptation, which was hourly becoming too strong for him; and when the sound of her voice reached him, and looking up with a start, he saw her standing by him in the power of her dazzling beauty, it seemed as though the phantom of his imagination had suddenly assumed a bodily shape to tempt him beyond all power of resistance. Something of all this must have appeared in the expression of his features, for Annie began, "I beg your pardon, Mr. Arundel, I had no idea of startling you; I fancied you had heard me enter—but you look pale and tremble, surely you are not ill?"

"Oh, no!" he replied, forcing a smile, "it is nothing; a slight giddiness, which will pass away in a moment."

As he spoke, however, he pressed his hand to his brow, which throbbed as though it would burst. Annie became alarmed, and, placing her flowers on the table, she drew nearer to him, saying—

"I am sure there is something the matter; you are either ill or unhappy; you have received some bad news of your mother, or dear Rose, is it not so?"

"Indeed you are mistaken," returned Lewis, making an effort to rouse himself; "I was buried in thought, and your sudden entrance startled me. I am not usually given to such freaks, but since our nocturnal adventure, I must confess to having become practically convinced of the existence of nerves. I must have lost more blood from this cut in the wrist than I was at first aware of."

"Ah! that dreadful night!" exclaimed Annie, clasping her hands, and turning pale at the recollection, "I shall never forget all I went through on that night, if I live to be a hundred. I had been asleep for an hour or more, when I suddenly woke, and saw Lisette standing by my bed-side, pale and trembling; as soon as she could find voice to speak, she told me there were robbers in the house, and that we should all be murdered. My first idea was, that you would be able to save us, and I told her to go and arouse you instantly; I soon found, however, she was too much alarmed to go alone, so I rose and accompanied her. The rest you know; but you can never know the agony of mind I suffered after you had left me; first, the dreadful interval of suspense before the robbers came up stairs, and then the fearful sounds of the conflict. I felt sure they would kill you, and I thought how wickedly selfish I had been, to allow you to stay there and meet them, when, but for me, you might have escaped. I felt as if I had condemned you to death, and that I could never—never be happy again. Oh! it was too horrible!" and, carried away by the recollections she had called up, Annie sank into a chair, and covered her eyes with her hands, as if to shut out some painful object.

And Lewis, what had been his feelings, as, hurried on by the interest of her subject, Annie had thus unconsciously afforded him a glimpse into the inmost recesses of her heart? When she mentioned that her impulse on the first alarm of danger had been to rely on his protection, his dark eyes beamed with an inexpressible tenderness; but as she proceeded, and her artless confession proved, that in the moment of peril her fears were not for herself but for him, his emotions became uncontrollable, and the volcano of passion, whose secret fires had already begun to prey upon his very life-springs, threatened to burst forth, and bear down all before it. Already he had half risen from his seat; in another moment his arm would have encircled her, and the words that told of his deep, his overpowering love,—the words that, once said, could never have been recalled, would have been poured forth, when, by one of those dispensations of Providence which men call Chance, his eye fell upon two persons, who were pacing, arm-in-arm, along a terrace walk on the farther side of the lawn,—they were General Grant and Lord Bellefield. The revolution of feeling was instantaneous; duty, honour, pride, all came to the rescue, and the fight was won, but the cost remained yet to reckon. Lewis once excited, was not a person to take half-measures; with the speed of thought, the resolution rushed upon him, that while their mutual relations remained unchanged, he and Annie must never meet again. The purpose was no sooner formed than it was acted upon. Turning to his companion, who, engrossed by her own feelings, had remained wholly unconscious of the struggle that had been proceeding in Lewis's breast, he said, in a calm mournful voice,—“Although I have not exactly received evil tidings, yet circumstances have occurred which require my presence elsewhere, and I am now about to ask your father's permission to leave Broadhurst; this will, therefore, probably be the last time I shall see you.”

“Until you return,” interrupted Annie, eagerly.

A bitter smile flitted across Lewis's mouth as he replied, “Yes, until I return! I will therefore bid you good-bye at once.” He paused, and his eye fell upon a rose-bud she was unconsciously playing with, “I have a fancy for that flower,” he said; “will you give it to me?”

“Nay, let me find you a better one,” was the reply; “this is blighted.”

“For which reason I prefer it to any other; you know I have odd fancies sometimes.” He took the bud from her, fixed it in his button-hole, then resumed, “I must now seek the General—good-bye!”

Annie regarded him with a pleading glance, as though she would fain learn more; but reading in the stern resolution of his countenance the inutilty of further questioning, held out her hand in silence; he took it, clasped it in his own, then, yielding to an irresistible impulse, pressed it hurriedly to his lips, and was gone.

General Grant was naturally by no means of a suspicious disposition; the position in which he was placed, giving him irresponsible authority over nearly every person with whom he came in contact, had rendered him pompous and arbitrary; but although not a man of enlarged mind, or possessing much delicacy of perception, he was actuated by a strong principle of justice. This attribute imparted a degree of frankness and generosity to his character, which, despite occasional displays of obstinacy or prejudice, caused him to be very generally respected, and, in some instances, beloved. To a mind of this nature, there can be nothing more vexatious or annoying, than to have its preconceived opinions of a person shaken by artful insinuations, which will require long and patient investigation to verify or disprove. In such a state of mind as we have described, however, did Lord Bellefield leave General Grant, when, after pacing up and down the memorable terrace walk, which had been the scene of De Grandeville's ill-judged confidence to Charley Leicester, he at length quitted him. The subject of their conversation had been the character of Lewis Arundel; and Lord Bellefield had taken advantage of the General's momentary irritation against the young tutor, to suggest, rather than positively to make, the following accusation:—He first hinted that the General had been deceived by Lewis's fair seeming, to adopt a wrong view of his disposition, and that, instead of the chivalrous, high-spirited, honourable being he imagined him, he was, in fact, an artful and accomplished hypocrite. He then proceeded to state, that he had long seen this, and even suspected the object of his lengthened residence at Broadhurst, nay, possibly of his original entrance into that family; this object he declared to be, a systematic design to ensnare the affections of the General's daughter, probably relying on his good looks and insinuating manner to enable him to inveigle her into a runaway marriage. “Hence,” he observed, “his animosity towards me; hence his unsuccessful attempts to blacken my character, first in regard to the poor fellow who shot himself, and now concerning the poacher's daughter. If he could once have succeeded in producing a quarrel between us, he would have had a clear field to himself. I was unwilling to disturb you by telling you this before, sir,” he continued. “I felt perfect confidence in my cousin Annie's affection; and as to the young fellow himself, he was of course quite beneath my notice; but Annie, after all, is a mere girl, and naturally inexperienced in the ways of the world. Since the hint you threw out, advising me to proceed with gentleness, because she appeared to have some girlish scruples as to the renewal of the engagement, I have felt it was incumbent on me to put you on your guard without delay. The man is handsome,—chance has given him many opportunities of interesting a romantic girl, and it must be confessed our dear Annie has a spice of romance about her."

"I do not think so, sir," interrupted the General, snappishly; "none of the Grants ever were romantic. I am not romantic myself, and I do not believe a daughter of mine would forget her duty, her position, in fact, her relationship to me, so far as to indulge in romance in regard to a private tutor. Moreover, I believe Mr. Arundel to be a highly honourable young man; he is the son of a soldier and a gentleman, and I cannot but consider that you wrong him by your suspicions; at the same time, I promise you the matter shall be looked into, the engagement between my daughter and yourself formally renewed, and the moment she is of age, it is my wish that the marriage should take place. It is desirable for your sake as well as for hers. I trust when you become a married man to see you give up racing, and take more interest in public business. It is, as you are aware, my intention to settle Broadhurst upon your second son, it will therefore behove you to distinguish yourself as one in whom the families of Leicester and Grant are united."

So saying, the General relapsed into a solemn silence, and Lord Bellefield, indy raging at the tone of authority which his future father-in-law saw fit to assume towards him, quitted him, leaving the poison he had instilled into his mind to work; and it did work, for although he was disinclined in the highest degree to admit the truth of his intended son-in-law's insinuations against Lewis, yet he could not banish them from his mind. A thousand little circumstances came to his recollection, of which at the moment he had thought nothing, but which now appeared to favour Lord Bellefield's view of the case; and for the first time his own imprudence in throwing so constantly together two young people in every way calculated to attract each other, occurred to him, and he paced the terrace walk in a frame of mind by no means customary to that gallant officer, viz. one of self-reproach. While thus pondering, at a sudden turn in the walk, the object of his thoughts appeared before him, looking so tall, dark, and cold, as, with his arms folded across his breast, he stood statue-like beneath the shadow of an old yew-tree, that the General started as though he had seen a ghost. If any such notion occurred to him, however, the illusion was soon dissipated, for Lewis, raising his hat, advanced towards him, and said,—

"I have sought you, General Grant, to thank you for all the generous courtesy I have received at your hands, and to tell you, that it is impossible for me longer to continue a member of your household."

As Lewis spoke these words calmly and respectfully, the General's face assumed an expression of surprise and dismay, most wonderful to behold.

"What!" he exclaimed, "resign your appointment as tutor to my ward! quit Sir Walter, before you have completed his education, when your system has been so surprisingly successful too! Oh, the thing is impossible, I cannot hear of it."

A look of sorrow passed across Lewis's features, as the General mentioned Walter, but he replied with the same calm, respectful, but determined manner, which, to one who knew him well, would have proved that he was acting in accordance with some resolve that he had formed, and to which he would adhere inflexibly.

"I am grieved to be obliged to relinquish my task unfinished," he said, "more especially since the interest I have long felt in my poor pupil, has rendered duties which others might consider irksome, a labour of love to me. I trust, however, that I have been enabled so far to develop poor Walter's intellects, that any person who will treat him judiciously and kindly (and to no other, I am sure, you would entrust him) may be able to complete all that remains to be done towards his education."

"And pray what is your reason for this sudden determination, Mr. Arundel?" inquired the General, becoming more and more perplexed, as he perceived that it would be no easy matter to shake Lewis's resolve. "I presume some more advantageous prospect has been thrown open to you?"

Lewis shook his head mournfully. "You wrong me by such a supposition, sir," he replied; "my future, as far as I can foresee it, is not a bright one, believe me."

"Has Lord Bellefield in any way annoyed or interfered with you?" inquired the General, as a suspicion crossed his mind that his amiable future son-in-law might have taken some aggressive step against the young tutor; but Lewis again replied in the negative, adding that his reason for resigning his post was entirely of a personal nature, and that he had not come to the conclusion without due consideration.

"Really, sir," returned the General, drawing himself up stiffly, "these enigmas are past my comprehension. You suddenly propose to resign the conduct of my ward's education, thereby materially injuring him, and causing me the greatest inconvenience and annoyance; I think, therefore, you owe it to me as well as to yourself candidly to state your reason for so doing; at all events I must be allowed to say, such concealment is most unlike your usual frank and manly course of proceeding."

As the General uttered this reproach, Lewis coloured, and his compressed lip and knitted brow told how deeply it affected him. When the other had ceased speaking, he answered haughtily,—"Your reproach may be deserved, General Grant, but it was my wish to save us both pain, which alone induced me to desire the concealment you reprobate; your words, however, oblige me to speak openly, and cost what it may, I will do so. I cannot remain longer beneath your roof, because I love your daughter. Wait," he continued sternly, as with a start of horrified surprise the General seemed about to give vent to his indignation, in a torrent of words, "you have forced me to speak, and must now hear me out. I well know the feelings with which you regard my mad presumption, as you consider it; I know better even than you do, the gulf which lies between your daughter and your paid dependant; but nature recognises no such distinctions,—the same God who made her good and beautiful, implanted in my breast the admiration for those qualities, and I could no more exist in her presence without loving her, than I could stand in the glorious sunshine without feeling its genial warmth. My love was from the beginning as hopeless as I know it to be at this moment, when I read in your lowering brow, that if your frown could annihilate me, you would deem the punishment only too mild for my offence against your pride of station; and yet I know, and you know it too, that casting aside the adventitious gifts of rank and fortune, my nature is more akin to your own, than is that of the titled worldling you have selected as your future son-in-law. Before night sets in, I shall have left this house for ever, and from that moment to you and yours I shall be as one dead. I may, therefore, say without fear of misconception, that which I could not speak as long as I remained a member of your household. The tale that I told you regarding the poacher's child was TRUE. In the version Lord Bellefield gave of it, he lied to you. He is a man of evil passions, and of narrow mind, and I warn you, if you entrust your daughter's happiness to him, a time will come, when you will bitterly repent it. I will next tell you why I have remained here thus long, and why I leave you now. My passion for your daughter has been the growth of months; how I have striven against it and endeavoured to crush it out,—aye, though I crushed my heart with it, none will ever know; it is enough that I have failed, that where I fancied myself strong, I have been proved weak. If I have suffered, 'tis through my own folly; if my future appear one fathomless hell of recollection, for myself have I prepared it." He paused, drew his hand across his throbbing brow, and then continued,—

"I remained here for Walter's sake, relying on my own fortitude to conceal the mental torture I endured; I bore Lord Bellefield's sneers, and, harder still, your daughter's gentle kindness, with an unmoved aspect, but at each successive trial the effort became greater, and my strength grew less, until this morning, when in her tender woman's mercy, your daughter, reading in my face traces of the anguish which was consuming me, spoke words of kindness and sympathy, chance alone, or rather the watchful providence of God, prevented my secret from transpiring. A similar trial might recur at any moment—I have lost all confidence in my power of self-control; therefore every principle of honour and of duty bids me leave this place without delay; and this, so help me Heaven, is the whole and simple truth."

As he concluded, General Grant, whose brow had gradually relaxed during Lewis's speech, exclaimed with a degree of warmth most unusual to him—"You have behaved like a man of honour, Mr. Arundel, under what I own to have been a very great trial, and I admire and respect you for so completely justifying the favourable opinion I have formed of you; I wish—that is, I could wish if the thing were not impossible—but it is useless to talk in this way—you must, as you wisely perceive, leave Broadhurst immediately. I will take upon me to find some reason to account for your abrupt departure, but you will carry with you my esteem and gratitude, and in whatever career you may think fit to adopt, you may rely upon my willingness to assist you to the uttermost. May I inquire your future plans?"

"I have formed no plans," returned Lewis hurriedly, "when I leave your house, my only prospect is to begin life anew, with every hope that renders life endurable shut out from me for ever—I am grateful for your offers, but must decline them. Henceforward I am likely to do little credit to any one's patronage, and must strive with existence, alone and single-handed. And now, ere I leave you, let me again thank you for the courtesy you have uniformly shown me—I expected justice at your hands, you have added kindness also—we shall probably never meet again, but the chances of life are strange, and should it ever be in my power to return your benefits, you will not find me forgetful."

He raised his hat as he spoke, and turned to depart. General Grant advanced as if he would detain him, but checking himself he muttered,—

"You shall hear from me—I will write to you at your banker's;" and Lewis bowed and left him.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

SHOWS HOW LEWIS CAME TO A "DOGGED" DETERMINATION, AND WAS MADE THE SHUTTLECOCK OF FATE.

"WALTER, I am going to leave you," observed Lewis, in a quiet, gentle voice.

Walter, who was seated on a low stool playing with Faust, continued his amusement, merely replying carelessly, "Are you?"

Lewis knew from the nature of the answer that the sound but not the sense of his communication had reached his poor pupil's understanding, and yet the apparent indifference of the remark pained him; it seemed as if all he loved were falling away from him. He had determined that it would be better for Walter not to be told at once that he was leaving never to return, but to allow the truth gradually to dawn upon him, after he had practically tested his ability to do without him; still he was anxious in some degree to prepare the poor boy's mind to support the severe grief which he feared his absence would occasion him. Accordingly, he returned to the attack.

"Look at me, Walter," he said. Having caught his eye, he continued—"You did not understand me, dear boy; I am going away—going to leave you for a long time."

"Aye? how long a time? a week?" inquired Walter.

"A great many weeks," returned Lewis gravely, "and you must be very good all the time, and do everything as you know I should wish you to do it if I were here; do you understand me, and will you try?"

Walter nodded assent, paused, and then asked,—
“What will Faust do; may he stay with me?”

Lewis did not answer. Give up Faust, the only thing that he had left to love him! could he make this sacrifice?

“Because, if he may stay, I shall feel sure you will come back some time or other; nobody can leave Faust, and not come and see him again,—at least nobody who knows him and loves him as well as you and I do,” pleaded Walter, throwing his arm round the dog’s neck.

I am inflicting injury enough on the poor boy as it is, reflected Lewis sorrowfully; I must not deny him this thing, which he has set his heart upon. Well, it only makes the sacrifice the more complete. “Walter, will you be happy if I leave Faust with you?” he inquired gently.

“Oh yes!” was the joyful reply, “quite happy till you come again.”

“Then he shall stay,” resumed Lewis; “remember, he is your dog, I give him to you.”

“Yes, he is my dog,” repeated Walter gleefully; “only till you come back again, though, you know,” he added, gazing wistfully at Lewis.

Poor Lewis! his heart was full, he could not trust himself to speak; this little incident had appealed to the affectionate side of his nature, and all but unmanned him. He approached Walter, swept back the soft fair hair from his forehead, and imprinted a kiss on it, patted Faust’s shaggy head, and turning away abruptly, quitted the room. Ere nightfall he had completed the few arrangements which his sudden departure rendered necessary, and taking with him only a small travelling valise which he slung across his shoulders, he waited till the shades of evening had set in, and leaving directions with his ally Robert, now invested with all the dignity and privileges of butlerhood, in regard to his luggage, which he desired might be forwarded to a certain address in London, he quitted Broadhurst alone, and on foot.

The town of H—— was situated about ten miles from the park-gates of Broadhurst, and thither did Lewis direct his steps. He paced along mechanically, with a dull heavy tread, as unlike his usual free elastic bounding step as possible; he kept his eyes fixed on the road before him, neither glancing to the right nor the left, and all his actions appeared like those of one moving in a dream. The night was dry and warm, and when Lewis had proceeded about six miles on his way, the moon came out, and bathed hill and valley in a flood of silvery light. Suddenly he paused, as the ruins of a picturesque old abbey, thrown out in bold relief by a dark background of trees, became visible at a turning of the road, and, fixing his eyes on the time-worn structure, gazed long and earnestly; then a new idea seemed to strike him, and springing over a gate, he ascended with vigorous strides the green hill-side on which the ruin was situated. Passing beneath crumbling arches, and over the fallen stone-work covering old graves of a forgotten generation, he reached a portion of the building which seemed in somewhat better repair than the remainder. Having reached the upper end of the chancel, he paused, and leaning his back against the broken shaft of a pillar which had supported one of the arches, gave way to the painful recollections which the place excited. The last time he had visited that spot, Annie Grant had stood by his side, and as he taught her how the mystic piety of our forefathers had striven to symbolize the truths of Christianity in the cruciform cathedral, with its vaulted arches and heaven-aspiring pinnacles, her soft blue eyes had looked into his face, with an expression of the respectful love we feel towards one whom we deem better and wiser than ourselves. And now how cruel was the contrast—how completely and painfully alone he felt—and then he longed (who has not at some crisis of the inner-life?) so earnestly, that he almost fancied he possessed the power, to separate mind and matter, and flying in the spirit to her he loved, to learn whether she thought of him, and grieved for his absence. Pursuing the idea, he came to speculate on many things. Had they yet told her he would not return? What reason would the General assign for such an abrupt departure? Would she believe his account, or would her heart divine the true cause? And if it did, would she pity him?—strongest proof of love—he could bear the idea of her pity.

Poor Lewis! perhaps his greatest trial was this, that at the very moment when he gave her up for ever, a latent sense of power told him that he could have won her; this was, indeed, the “sorrow’s crown of sorrow”—the bitterness of more than self-reunciation, for Annie, too, might be rendered unhappy by his act. Then the future, the blank fearful future, what lay in store for him there? “Fresh sorrow—no,” (and he smiled as men on the rack have smiled when the tormentors have outwitted themselves, and the numbness of approaching death has produced insensibility to pain, and robbed them of their victim,) “he was dead alike to sorrow as to joy;” but at the moment, as if to prove him weak even in the vis inertiae of despair, the possibility of Annie’s union with Lord Bellefield came before him like some hideous phantom, and he was forced to own, that there might be depths of misery awaiting him greater than he had yet proved. And thus recalling the past, and imagining the future, he afflicted himself with griefs real and visionary, till the moonbeams grew paler and altogether fled, and the stars disappeared one by one, and the red glow of the eastern sky proclaimed the coming day, and the sun arose glorious in his majesty, and his earliest rays poured through the broken roof, and fell in a stream of golden light upon the ruined altar; for the first time that night Lewis thought of Rose, and of what her advice would have been had she known of his unhappiness; and prostrating himself upon the altar-step he prayed long and fervently.

The reflection, that when our sorrow has become too heavy for us to bear, there is One, mighty to save, Himself in His earthly career a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, who will strengthen us to support them, must console the deepest mental anguish; and we do not believe that any man has ever prayed truly and earnestly without receiving comfort from so doing. For the very act recognises a belief in the existence, and faith in the benevolence of a Being, all-powerful alike to avert the evil we dread, and to bestow upon us the good we desire. And Lewis, when he arose from his knees, did so refreshed in spirit, and better fitted to do or to suffer as he might be required, by the changes and chances of that portion of THE RAILROAD OF LIFE over which he had yet to pass.

He reached the town of H— as the inhabitants, aroused from their slumbers, were drowsily opening the shop-windows, and making his way to a small unobtrusive inn, breakfasted. Having ascertained at what hour the last coach passed through for London, he left his valise under the care of the waiter, and passing along several dirty narrow streets, at length reached a court, in one of the poorest and most wretched quarters of the town. Here, after some trouble, and a disagreeable amount of threatening glances from sundry suspicious looking characters, he succeeded in discovering the abode of a certain Jerry Sullivan. This worthy, having satisfied himself that Lewis was not a member of the detective police, graciously accorded him an interview, wherein Lewis explained to him, that, in consequence of a communication made to him by Hardy on his death-bed, he was anxious to investigate the contents of a packet left in possession of his (Sullivan's) maternal ancestor. This fact, Mr. Sullivan, whose brogue was considerably stronger than his regard for truth, immediately saw fit to deny, and was proceeding to lament the death of his mother, which he averred had taken place that day fortnight, when he was interrupted by the inopportune entrance of the lady in question, who appeared by no means dead, but in a very lively state of virtuous indignation. She immediately silenced her mendacious offspring, and beckoning Lewis into a kind of den, which she inhabited, shut the door, and then questioned and cross-questioned him as to his connexion with Hardy. Having satisfied herself, by perusing Hardy's letter, that Lewis was no impostor, she unlocked an old trunk, whence she produced a bundle of papers, and a sheet of parchment.

"There," she said, "that's the will he spoke of, poor fellow, and them's the letters—and I only hope as you'll be able to find the unfortun'te childring, and that they will come into the money all right—it's nigh 100*l.* a year, I'm told."

"Have you any idea whether Hardy had at all traced his daughter since she left him?" inquired Lewis.

"No; he heard nothing of her, poor chap; he was a'most broken-hearted about her, and that's what drove him to the courses he took. He worn't a reg'lar prig, bless yer; he did a little in the poarching line wiles, but only for the sake o' the sport, same as you gents—he wor above them things all together. But I knows more than he did about the gal; there were a young 'ooman here a week ago, as had seen her in London, dressed out, and riding about in a coach like a lady; but that wor soon arter she fust went off with the young swell; and wor a kind of new toy like."

"And did not the girl know anything of her since?" inquired Lewis.

"Well, she know'd this much, that when the young lord went abroad with his sister, he made his valet stop behind, and foller him in a few days with Jane Hardy, arter which she in course lost sight of her; but she thinks he's left her over in them furring parts."

"Them furring parts—that must mean Italy," thought Lewis; and, finding the old woman had told him all she knew on the subject, he thanked her for her information, secured the papers about his person, and was preparing to depart when his companion stopped him, and, summoning Jerry, whose main, if not only virtue appeared to consist in filial obedience, desired him to escort the "young gent" beyond the purlieus of the miserable alley in which their abode was situated.

The visit had taken longer than Lewis had expected; and, on his return to the inn, he found the coach would pass through in about half an hour. Snatching a hasty meal, he placed the papers in his valise, and in a few minutes was on his road to London. The coach stopped at an inn in Holborn, and here Lewis, who, in his present state of mind, was anxious to avoid a meeting with any of his friends, prered himself not excepted, determined for the next few days to take up his abode; accordingly, he engaged a sitting-room and bed-room, which, for the sake of privacy and cheapness, were situated at the back of the house, at an altitude little inferior to that of the neighbouring chimney-pots. Having established himself in this uninviting residence, he sat down to try and arrange some plan for the future. He felt that he ought to write to Rose and his mother, and acquaint them with his altered destiny; but to do so, involved an explanation which he shrank from attempting. He tried to read, but the only book at hand was a volume of Schiller, and, with a sickening feeling of despair, he threw it from him. At length he bethought him of Hardy's papers, and, untying the string that bound them, he spread them on the table before him. The will, which he first examined, appeared formally drawn up, signed, and attested; the testator left property worth, as far as Lewis could make out, about 100*l.* a-year to Jane and Miles Hardy. Laying this aside, he turned over a mass of smaller papers, old game certificates, receipts for rent, and, among others, a note carefully preserved, endorsed in a bold free hand, "The first letter I ever received from Harriet." It was an invitation, coquettishly worded, asking Hardy to join a party to the — races; written by her who had sinned so deeply, and had long since gone to give account of the misery she had caused and suffered. Lewis could not look on this record of an affection, which even the greatest wrong woman can do to man had been unable wholly to destroy, without the deepest commiseration.

Laying the note carefully aside, he took up the bundle of old letters, and, selecting one which was partially opened, glanced carelessly at its contents. Why does he start and change colour, as his eye falls upon the handwriting? Why press his hand to his burning brow as the momentary doubt crosses his mind whether all the mental anguish he has lately suffered can have unsettled his brain, or whether that which he beholds is indeed reality? Eagerly does he devour the contents of the epistle; eagerly does he unfold letter after letter, till not one of the packet remains unperused. Again, sitting late into the night, does he read and re-read them, then folding them carefully, paces up and down the room, chafing at the lazy hours that drag their weary length, and oppose a barrier between his wishes and the coming day, when he may act, and resolve doubt into certainty. For the whole of that night, the second during which he had never closed an eyelid, did he measure with restless steps the narrow limits of the apartment. Leaving his breakfast untasted, he hurried, at the earliest business hour, to the chambers of the family solicitor; for half the morning did they remain closeted together—together did they seek the office (yept by Richard Frere a den of thieves) of Messrs. Jones & Levi, the lawyers, who, as the reader may remember, addressed a mysterious letter to Lewis soon after his first arrival at Broadhurst. Carefully did the astute man of law examine and compare papers, and sift evidence, and draw out the crafty rogues with whom he had to deal; and, when he had gained all the information he required, steadily and cautiously did he examine the affair in all its bearings; nor was it till he had thoroughly made himself master of the subject that he approached Lewis, and, shaking him heartily by the hand, exclaimed, "Well, my dear sir, as far as one can judge in this early stage of the proceedings, I think you have a very good case; and I beg to congratulate you on the prospect before you."

And what, then, was this prospect, at the mere possibility of which Lewis's eye sparkled, and his cheek glowed with the brightness of renewed hope? It was the prospect of inheriting an ancient and honourable name, of gaining a position which would render him not only equal, but superior in rank to Annie Grant, and of possessing an income beside which Lord Bellesfield's fortune, impoverished by the turf and the gaming-table, sank into comparative insignificance. One short year more for him to prove his right before the eyes of men, and then, if Annie were but true to her own heart, he would boldly enter the lists against his rival, and in love or hate, Lord Bellesfield should find that he had met his match. Well might his step be proud, and his bearing joyous and elated; for in twelve hours the whole aspect of life had become changed to him. Such shuttlecocks are we in the hands of Fate, as unthinking men term the mysterious ordinances of the Omnipotent.

Had he known the contents of a letter which was even then awaiting him at his banker's, his new-found joy might have been lessened.

THE EAST CLIFF, HASTINGS

EVERY body who has been at this delightful watering-place must know the "East Cliff." It is a bold, rugged, tempest-beaten bluff, tinted all manner of hues and twisted into all manner of shapes. At its foot, and in its sides, nestles a little fishing village, the abode of the hardy fellows who supply the neighbouring town. No sight can be more picturesque than their departure upon their often perilous avocations; and when, as often happens, the sea is rather rough, it is even highly exciting to get the boat off in the tide. Several men, in their huge leather boots, rush down on each side of her, and propel her over the shelving gravel into the deep water, watching the receding wave to push her well out; then, as the heavy surge comes rolling in and the boat rises upon it, they leap at once on board, hoist their sail in a twinkling, and are soon riding out to sea over the trembling billows. Such a scene is here represented by the master pencil of our admirable marine artist, Stanfield. The rolling sea and the action of the wind are minutely given, and all the details arranged with consummate skill.

The vocation of the fisherman is a hard one, and the fishwives of Leith may well call their haddocks and herrings "the lives of men." When we were stopping at Hastings a sudden gale came on, and several of these East Cliff fishermen, unable to ride it out, met with a watery grave. But who is not familiar with the pathetic scenes in "The Antiquary?"—scenes which scarcely a season fails to renew upon our rugged storm-beaten coast.

FRAGMENT OF AN OLD INDIAN EPIC

On the childless king smote sadly the rash deed his hand had done;
Sorrowing spake he to Kausalya, sighing, weeping for her son, —
"Surely each one reaps the harvest of his actions here below,
Virtuous deed shall bear him blessing, sin shall ever bring forth woe;
For a deed of boyish rashness falls on me this evil day,
As a young child tasting poison eats his death in heedless play.
'Twas the time of early summer, swelling my young soul with love,
When the sun, the earth-dews gathering, shone yet mildly from above;
Balmy cool the air was breathing, welcome clouds were floating by,
Frogs and bees in merry gladness swelled the joyous peacock's cry;
Their wing-feathers wet with bathing, birds slow flying to the trees
Rested in the topmost branches, fann'd by the soft summer breeze;
Like the great deep, many-twinkling, gold-shot with gay peacock's sheen, Gleaming with the fallen rain-drops, sea-bright all the hills were seen.

With my bow, in that glad season, to Surayu forth I drove, To assay my archer prowess in a dark and stately grove; There I lay in ambush, hoping that a deer might come to drink,

Lordly elephant or tiger, hidden nigh the river's brink. Hark! a sound of gurgling water fell at eve upon my ear,

In the darkness, sight-defying, truly 'twas a sound of fear; Eager to lay low the monster, forth a glittering shaft I drew;

Poisonous as fell serpent's venom, to the mark the arrow flew.

Then I heard a bitter wailing, and a voice 'Ah me! ah me!' Of one wounded, falling, dying,—calling out in agony, Writhing on the bank in anguish, with a plaintive voice cried he,

'Ah! wherefore has this arrow smitten a poor, harmless devotee?

Here at eve to fill my pitcher, to a common stream came I; In whose sight have I done evil? by whose arrow do I die? What law dooms me to destruction, living harmless in the wood,

My sole drink the river water, simple herbs and fruit my food?

Will the murderer spoil my body? am I for my vesture slain?

Little from my deer-skin mantle, or my bark-coat will he gain.

'Tis not my own death that pains me—from my aged parents torn,

Long their stay and only succour—'tis for their sad fate I mourn.

Who will feed my aged parents? Heedless youth, whoe'er thou art,

Thou hast murder'd father, mother, offspring, all with one fell dart.'

When I heard that cry of anguish, struck with horror at the sound,

From my hand my bow and arrows quickly cast I on the ground;

Rushing forward, mind-distracted, by the river's bank. I spied,

Lying low, a young ascetic, with my shaft deep in his side,

With his matted hair dishevell'd, and his pitcher cast away,

From his side the life-blood ebbing, smear'd with dust and gore he lay.

Then he fix'd his eyes upon me—scarcely could my senses brook,

As these bitter words he utter'd—that last, long, and dying look,

'Drawing water for my parents, why by thy hand do I bleed?

Tell me how 'gainst thee, O monarch! I have sinn'd in word or deed.

Ah! I'm not thine only victim—cruel king! thy heedless dart

Pierces too a father's bosom, and an aged mother's heart. They, my parents, blind and aged, from my hand alone can drink;

When I come not, thirsting, hoping, sadly to the grave they'll sink.

Nought from study of the Vedas, nought from penance do I gain,

For my hapless father knows not his dear son is lying slain;

Ah! and if my father knew it, could the old man profit me? Can a tree then from the woodman ever save a stricken tree?

Hasten to him, son of Raghu! tell my father of my fate, Lest his wrath like fire burn thee—hasten ere it be too late!

There, O king, is Ekapadi—there my father's hermitage,

Go, beseech him, son of Raghu! lest he curse thee in his rage.

Hasten, king! but first in mercy draw this arrow from my side;

Ah! it eats away my body, as the river-bank the tide.' Mind-distracted, thus I ponder'd, 'Now he writhes in agony,

When I draw the fatal arrow from his body he must die.' Quick he saw the doubt that held me pitying, fearing, where I stood,

Thus the wounded youth address'd me, conquering pain by fortitude,

'Fear not, thou may'st do my bidding, guiltless of a Brahmin's death,

Wedded to a Vaisya father, Sudra mother gave me breath.'

Thus he spake, and I, down-kneeling, drew the arrow from his side;

Then the hermit, rich in penance, fix'd his eyes on me, and died.

Pierced through, wetted by the ripples, by Surayu lying dead,

Bitterly I mourn'd the hermit, weeping, sore disquieted. Standing there as one distracted, sadly, anxiously I thought,

How I best might soothe the misery that my heedless hand had wrought.

From the stream I fill'd the pitcher, and (as 'twere a well-known road.)

Quickly reach'd the lowly cottage, where the childless twain abode.

Talking of their son's long tarrying, a poor, aged, sightless pair,

Like two birds with clipped wings, helpless, none to guide them, sat they there;

Sadly, slowly, I approach'd them, by my rash deed left forlorn, Crush'd with terror was my spirit, and my breast with sorrow torn.

At the sound of coming footsteps, thus I heard the old man say,

'Dear son! bring me water quickly—thou hast been too long away!

Bathing in the cool stream, playing, thou hast stay'd so long from home,

Come! thy mother longeth for thee—come in quickly, dear child, come!

Dear son! be not angry with us, keep not in thy memory Any hard word from thy mother, any hasty speech from me.

Thou art thy poor parents' succour, eyes art thou unto the blind;

Speak! on thee our lives are resting—why so silent and unkind!'

Thus I heard, still deeper grieving, and in fresh augmented woe

Spoke to the bereaved father with words faltering and slow,—

'Not thy child, O noble-minded! Dasaratha, sage! am I, By my deed of sinful rashness plunged with thee in misery.

Towards Surayu forth I wander'd, with my arrows and my bow,

To lay some thirsty elephant, or a savage tiger low. There I heard a pitcher filling,—'Tis an elephant, thought I;

At the sound I drew the bowstring, and I let the arrow fly. Rushing forward through the bushes to the river's bank I lied,—

Dying, lay a young ascetic, with my arrow in his side. Forth I drew the fatal weapon, then his dying thoughts were given

To his aged, helpless parents, and his spirit went to heaven.

Thus thy son died, holy hermit! by this hand unwittingly;

Let deep sorrow win thy pardon, and in mercy pity me.
O'er his cheeks at my sad story flow'd the tear-streams in a flood,
Scarce for weeping spake the hermit, as with folded hands I stood,
'King! hadst thou conceal'd this horror, this blood-shedding left untold,
On thy head thy sin had fallen, with its fruit ten thousand fold.
Know, a warrior stain'd with murder, of a Hermit above all,
From his high estate, blood-guilty, were he Indra's self,
must fall.
Thou dost live, for all unconscious, monarch! didst
thou slay my son,
Else had all the race of Raghu fallen, by thy deed undone.
Lead us, king! by thee bereav'd, lead us to the fatal place,
Let us fold our darling's body in a long and last embrace.
By the hand I led the mourners to the river where he lay;
Fondly clasp'd the sightless parents in their arms the death-cold clay.
Bow'd down by their bitter anguish, sank they by the dead boy's side,
And the sage in lamentation lifted up his voice and cried,—
'Hast thou not a greeting for me? am I not thy father
dear!
Answer—but one word, my darling! wherefore art thou lying here?
Art thou angry with thy father? speak to me, beloved one!
Surely thou wast ever dutious; look on thy poor mother, son!
Come! dear child; embrace thy father—put thy little hand in mine,
Let me hear thine own sweet prattle—some dear playful word of thine.
Who will read to me the Vedas, filling my old heart with joy?
Who, when evening rites are over, cheer me, mourning for my boy?
Who will bring us fruits and water—roots and wild herbs from the wood?
Who support the blind and aged, like a cherish'd guest,
with food?
Stay! dear son, go not so quickly to grim Yama's dread abode,
Stay! we'll go to-morrow with thee, travelling on the self-same road.
In the wild wood all deserted, none to feed us, none to save,
Quickly will thy aged parents sink down sorrowing to the grave;
Then I'll say to mighty Yama, Hear me, great Vivaswat's son!
Oh! have mercy, king of justice! and restore our lov'd one;
Just art thou, and good, and famous—let my prayer thy grace obtain,
Give the son back to his parents, let him be their stay again.
Guiltless, son! by sinner murder'd, join thine own allotted band
In the heaven of slaughter'd spirits, slain on earth by other's hand,
Hasten to thy blissful mansion, welcomed shalt thou be by those Who fell nobly here in battle, with their bold front to their foes.
Thou shalt dwell among those blessed up in Indra's paradise,
Who have risen by holy study, or by penance to the skies.
No one of thy race and lineage shall for aye unhappy be,

(1) The Indian Pluto.

But the wretch whose rash hand slew thee,—he shall sink to misery.
Thus the hermit spake lamenting; by the parents were begun
Sorrow's last and saddest duties o'er the body of their son.
But the youth, to whose pure virtue, the well-earned meed was given,
With the happy ones to mingle high above in Indra's heaven,
Spake to his bereaved parents, to their sad hearts
whispering peace;
Clothed in glory, high exalted, thus he bade their sorrow cease,—
'I have won by filial virtue bliss supreme without alloy,
Come, my ever-lov'd parents, follow and partake my joy.'
Thus the sage's son address'd them, and forthwith before their eyes,
Riding in a heavenly chariot, mounted up into the skies.
Duly were the sad rites ended, by the parents' loving care,
And once more the sage address'd me, as I stood a suppliant there,—
'By thy hand am I bereav'd of my only child, O king!
Let the same hand slay the father, Death no longer has a sting.
But—for thou hast slain my darling—cruel king! thy breast shall know
Something of the pangs I suffer, a bereav'd father's woe;
Thus I lay my curse upon thee, for this thing that thou hast done,
As I mourn for my beloved, thou shalt sorrow for a son.'
Thus the childless hermit curs'd me, and straightway
the aged pair
To the funeral pile ascended, and breathed out their spirits there.
Lady! this sad deed is weighing on my soul right heavily,
Now I feel that curse's power; 'tis this day fulfill'd on me.'
And at midnight the old king died.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT WAR AND THE PEACE CONGRESS.

BY J. M. W.

"Our bruised arms hung up for monuments;
Our stern alarms changed to merry meetings."
RICHARD III.

"But in these serious works, design'd
To mend the morals of mankind,
We must for ever be disgraced
With all the finer sons of taste,
If once the shadow to pursue
We let the substance out of view."
CHURCHILL.

"A French gentleman in the reign of Louis XIV was comparing the French and English writers, with all the boastfulness of national prepossession. 'Sir,' replied an Englishman, better versed in the principles of freedom than the canons of criticism, 'there are but two subjects worthy the human intellect, Politics and Religion,—our state here and our state hereafter; and on neither of these dare you write.' Long may the envied privilege be preserved to my countrymen of writing and talking concerning both! Nevertheless, it behoves us all to consider, that to write or talk concerning any subject, without having previously taken the pains to understand it, is a breach of duty which we owe to ourselves, though it may be no offence against the laws of the land. The privilege of talking and even publishing nonsense is necessary in a free state; but the more sparingly we make use of it, the better."—COLERIDGE, The Friend.

It is scarcely necessary to remind the reader that "SHARPE'S MAGAZINE" steers clear of the whirlpool of party politics, while it endeavours to keep closely in view the great principles of social and political science, as they are exemplified in the present condition, and are likely to affect the progress of the age. In like manner, eschewing the odium theologium, it essays to spread abroad these great religious truths which are essential to the working out of salvation in the present, as in every Christian age. Bearing these facts in mind, I venture to offer to the readers of this Magazine, a few thoughts concerning the late demonstrations of the Peace Party, in the hope that they may suggest some new phases of the subject to those who have already thought much about it; that it may urge to more thought those who have, hitherto, thought little; or, that it may induce some to begin to think who have not yet thought at all, about it.

A man need not frown very hard or use violent gesticulation in order to convince us that he is in earnest. It is possible to speak of important things without much solemnity of manner, and it is, sometimes, the best as well as the pleasantest method of treating them; therefore, my few remarks will be delivered with little pretension, as they are by no means elaborate. In the limited space of a Magazine article, it would not be wise to attempt anything like the grave forms of argumentation, the strict and careful investigation which a regular treatise would demand. It is my business, on the present occasion, to indicate rather than to prove truths, to suggest rather than to inform. If any one find fault with what is said, on account of its informal logic, or its want of profundity, let me gently remind such an one that he is quarrelling with an elder-bush for not being an oak-tree.

During the late thirty years' peace the world heard nothing of a Peace Movement—there was no energetic party bestirring itself to prevent war, and to confirm the habit of keeping the peace between two nations by endeavouring to prolong the thirty years ad infinitum. But no sooner does war break out in twenty countries at once,—war deadly and desperate, pro aris et focis, on one side, for the retention of ill-acquired or ill-used power on the other,—than up springs a party that denounces war as the very worst thing under the sun. Loudly they proclaim the blessings of Peace; as to war, they have nothing to say for that, but that it is unmixed, unmitigated evil. Some of their vivid descriptions of the horrors of war would lead one to believe that men were very devils incarnate. But who does not remember this fair and noble picture?

"A knight there was, and that a worthy man,
That from the time that he first began
To ride out, he loved chivalry,
Truth and honour, freedom and courtesy.
Full worthy was he in his lordes war
And thereto had he ridden no man far,
As well in Christendom as in Heathenesse
And ever honour'd for his worthiness.

And evermore he had a sovereign prize,²
And though that he was worthy he was wise.

And of his port as meek as is a maid.
He never yet no villany ne said
In all his life unto no manner wight:
He was a very perfect gentle knight."

It is difficult to believe that any system of things which produced such men as this knight was all evil;—and it must be remembered that he is, like all the rest of the company assembled at the Tabard Inn, a specimen of a class, not a lusus naturæ whom the author was fated to see but once. Such as this knight, were very many of the men who fought at Cressy and Poitiers; the flower of chivalry; who knew no better than to serve God and their king with the sword; who esteemed all professions but that of arms unworthy of a brave man and a gentleman. Such were Gaston de Foix, Du Guesclin, the Chevalier Bayard, and a hundred other heroes. It is difficult not to believe that there must have been much good in those long wars, which formed such men.

My thoughts went on thus—Now that Lombardy and Venice, Sicily, Rome, Hungary and Austria are attempting to get back their national rights in the only way in which it is possible for them to regain them, and thereby to establish a real peace instead of its frightful mockery, surely now is not the time to preach the doctrine of non-resistance. War is undoubtedly a great evil; but it is not so great an evil as dishonour and forced submission to an authority which good and wise men believe to come from any but a heavenly or a righteous source. "Oh! but," say the International Peace party, "the oppressed nation may get its rights without going to war. We will institute an arbitration." Possession is, at present, nine-tenths of the law, even of arbitration. What sort of arbitration would the lion submit to, that had the antelope beneath his claws? Yes! it seemed to me very inconsistent to cry out, "Peace! peace!" when, constituted as humanity is now, there could be no peace, which was not more cruel and demoralizing than a patriotic war. Why did not these peace-lovers assemble three years ago, and try to prevent war by showing the true state of political matters at that time, to the king of the French, to the pope, to Charles Albert, the emperor, the King of Prussia and the small fry of German royalty, who, to use Mr. Fudge's forcible language, so soon after "Stood prostrate at the people's feet?"

Why did they not? Simply because they did not know the height and depth, the length and breadth of the political evil, although they, like other observers of the times, saw that it was growing past control. This could only be known by a warlike outburst, and by the rapid spread of the revolutionary fire; just as the best physician cannot foresee how far an epidemic will spread, or how long it will last, although he may detect its advent in the air; just as a meteorologist can foretell a storm, but cannot foretell what amount of damage it will do, nor how terrible will be its rage. If they could not prevent these revolutionary wars by a peace movement,

(1) Farther.

(2) Praise.

why do they urge their doctrines now, when the weakest party needs warlike help to maintain a cause which it believes, before God, to be just and holy? They are humane people, I have no doubt; but they are, like other men, a bundle of inconsistencies. What is the use of preaching peace in the midst of a battle? Why talk to a man in a passion about the beauty of a calm temper?

Thus I thought when first the agitations of the Peace party were being talked of—at the time when all Italy was in a blaze, and Hungary was rousing herself to the fight for independence. The names of Mazzini and Kossuth resounded through their native countries in tones of such affectionate reverence and enthusiastic admiration, that even those, here, who knew nothing of them felt convinced that the men were not swayed by selfishness or the low ambition of demagogues. They fought for principles, and they endeavoured to elevate their followers to an enlightened understanding of these principles. They had enough to contend with, no doubt, in the follies and vices, the weakness and the incapacity of the people they had to work with. Of each of these patriots may probably be said what was said of Burke—"In his public character he found himself, as it were, in a Noah's ark, with a very few men and a great many beasts." It was to humanize brutish men, to give true and lasting peace to their country, that they and those who thought with them went to war with despotism. It was not that they loved war better than peace; it was that they loved the souls of their countrymen better than their bodies, or than any earthly good; for souls are killed under oppressive, cruel, and ignorant governments, which will not allow them to exercise their faculties. What other way had they of asserting their right to think, and feel, and speak, and act as men? War is, indeed, a bad thing; but if a nation have vitality enough within it to feel strongly the dishonour of slavery, let it use that vitality to make itself free; and without being reproached as an enemy to peace. Why—it is to obtain this same beloved peace that it goes to war at all—peace in conjunction with honour and liberty. Peace without honour and liberty is no blessing, but a soporific curse; a cowardly saving of the flesh while it degrades and crushes out the spirit of a man.

Let us consider, now, what strong principles and feelings actuate these leaders of the peace movement, whose benevolent agitations have continued for the last two years with ever increasing fame. They have a mighty reform at heart; a reform which none but men of active and benevolent natures would attempt to effect, though poets and speculative dreamers might imagine it, and see the desirability of it; and even hope that the days would come when all races of men would be "lapped in universal law"—and instead of wars and rumours of wars, we should see the brotherhood of nations "the federation of the world." Now, what the poets dream of, the peace party bestir themselves to effect. They say:—War is a shameful and degrading thing,—a thing not to be tolerated in a civilized state of society; and we will set ourselves to work to abolish it.

True, to a certain extent, war is an evil; but, by your leave, good peace advocate, I would remind you, that half truths are sometimes pernicious falsehoods; the more pernicious, for the portion of beautiful truth they contain, which so fascinates young, and inexperienced, and weak minds, that it prevents them from detecting the falseness that accompanies it. Why is war so bad a thing? Because it takes away human life—rouses and keeps alive a spirit of hatred and vindictiveness; because it ruins commerce and the arts—stops social improvement and destroys property.

First.—It takes away human life. The increased value of human life is undoubtedly one of the proofs that a nation is becoming more civilized. Human life is justly esteemed sacred; but it does not follow that in no case should it be sacrificed. Death is by no means the greatest evil that one man can inflict upon another. Why is our life valuable? Not that we may eat, and drink, and sleep, and live in fine houses, and wear fine clothes, merely. That is a life worthy only of an intelligent brute. Our life is, or ought to be, valuable to us because we use it in striving to become nobler and nobler, better and better—in striving to make ourselves fitted for a higher life hereafter. If we find ourselves shut out from knowledge and the means of doing good, from love, and growth, and work, and "all that makes it life to live," does it not show that we are letting go the substance to grasp the shadow, if we refuse to put our bodily existence in peril in order to gain an atmosphere in which our spirits can breathe freely and wholesomely? "Is not the life (i.e. the life of the soul) more than meat, and the body than raiment?" Death—the death of the body—is an awful thing; but do not let us exaggerate its terrors. It is not so awful a thing as that death of the soul, which makes men insensible or indifferent to wrong and suffering, vice and cruelty, and allows them to look on while the grossest injustice and oppression is practised upon their neighbours and friends. It is better to be dead than to be living a life of baseness and dishonour, of weakness and wickedness; at least, it is better to risk the death of the body for the sake of preserving the life of the soul, and leave the result in God's hands. It is better to go to war for a high and holy cause, if there be no other way of maintaining it. Truth and holiness are not to be sacrificed for any good things of the earth. In these days there is no fear of a too great general depreciation of human life; therefore, I do not hesitate to express my opinion that it is quite possible to regard it too highly. In effect, all good men show, by their feelings and instincts, that they recognise this truth, although they may allow their understandings to mislead them on the subject. Who does not glow with admiration at the sight, or at the mere narration of an act of bravery, by which a man perils his life for a fellow-creature or for a dumb animal, or even for something valuable to one he loves? Read the account of the daring, the self-forgetfulness of firemen. All men cry out, "Heroic!" "noble!" "glorious!" Yet these heroic men peril their own lives and encourage others to do the same. They do not think about their lives,—their bodily lives; they act virtuously, nobly, generously—that is the living they think about and care for. Virtue is more to be desired than length of days; and no good and wise man will sacrifice the former for the latter, or counsel his friends to do so.

Secondly.—War rouses bad passions, hatred and revenge, &c. This cannot be denied; but I doubt whether it rouses them to a greater extent than many of the controversies and divisions among men, in a so-called peaceable community. I believe there is as much, aye, more, malignity, and envy, and cruel hatred going on among rival individuals and among commercial, social, and political parties, than is ever called out by open war on the battle-field. And no one, at all conversant with history, biography, and social philosophy, can doubt, for one moment, that war, with all its horrors, calls out a hundred high and noble qualities, in ordinary persons, that would otherwise have lain dormant. It makes the best qualities in the best men flash out clearly, and shows that humanity, with all its errors and weakness, is yet but a little lower than the angels,—and this, in a much more significant way than the ordinary events of a peaceful state can do; constituted as man is now, or rather, half-developed as man is now.

It is in no spirit of perversity or contradictoriness that I am inclined to look upon those consequences of war as the least pernicious which the generality of the peace advocates place first in the list of its unmitigated evils. That it takes away human life, and that it rouses strong passions, I consider evils more than mitigated—they seem to me to be counterbalanced, by the high principles and self-sacrificing virtues called into vigorous action by war. I will not pause to show in all its bearings the falsehood of the oft-quoted line,

"One murder makes a villain, millions a hero!"

It is the motive, the principle of action, which creates the wide difference between the murder of O'Connor by the Mannings, and the victory of Miltiades and the Athenians at Marathon. To class the two together as acts of the same kind, is the error of a man whose reason is not sound.

But although it does not seem to me that war is unjustifiable, or even one of the greatest earthly evils, on the two accounts already glanced at, I still consider it as such, for the other reasons specified above—viz, "because it ruins commerce and the arts, stops social intercourse and improvement, and destroys property;" in a word, because it undoes in a few years the slow growth of centuries, and flings nations back into barbarism and poverty. There is its great evil, as it seems to me. The march of an army through a conquered country, supposing it to be a highly civilized one, is a besom of destruction, whose havoc, moral and material, it would take at least a century to recover. Say, for instance, (if it be not high treason against British valour to suppose such a thing possible,)—say that a French army under a second Napoleon were to march from Brighton to Carlisle, conquering all before it. What effect would that have upon us, and our children, and our children's children—supposing that from Carlisle the invaders were driven out boldly, once and for ever, into the Irish Sea, and England were left to recover her losses as best she could? Let the reader ponder on the evils of such an event; and I think he will perceive that the sacrifice of human life, and the high passionate feeling aroused among us, would not be the greatest of these, by any means.

Yes; War is an immense evil when, instead of being a powerful agent in civilizing the world, (as for many ages it was,) it becomes an agent in undoing the blessed work of civilization, as it is like to become now. Success, then, to the attempts of the peace party to instil a wholesome antipathy to war into the hearts of all nations. Whether we are as yet sufficiently advanced in civilization—the bulk of mankind, I mean—to profit by their doctrine, remains to be proved. For my own part, I fear we are not; but no one would more gladly be convicted of error in this particular. At all events, no harm can come of preaching peace, at this or at any time, providing it be done in peace and truth. I was wrong in thinking the peace party were mere inconsistent men. There is a consistency in their actions and words which may be found in those of all parties banded for an unselfish purpose, if we consider them en grand—and to take the actions of any party into consideration, piece-meal, is unfair. They agitate for peace, show up the advantages of peace, just when they feel its importance most, i.e. when the precious things of peace have been perilled by wars—even wars of patriotism and independence.

"Let us try to make men settle their differences by arbitration. We will show them that it is for their interest to do so," say they. There is no harm in trying; but is it easier to move a whole nation by considerations of enlightened self-interest and right reason, than it is to move individuals by such considerations? We know how lamentably philosophers fail who set up theories of human action upon the notion that man acts according to what he believes to be his interest. Nothing was ever more absurd than that notion.

The late meeting of the peace party at Frankfort is interesting in many ways. That they have done much as yet towards the abolition of war one cannot believe. Still they have done a little. It is by increased knowledge, and higher moral and intellectual culture among the people, that national antipathies as well as party animosities, and consequently war, can ever be abolished. Now, the sight of such an assembly as the late Congress, or, failing the sight of it, a good account of its proceedings, must tend to increase one's hope for human progress. People of all sorts and conditions—poor and rich, politicians and literary men, priests and men of no professed religion, merchants and agriculturists, aristocrats and democrats, monarchists and red republicans, soldiers and quakers, English and French, Germans and Italians, Anglo-Americans and Negroes, Dutchmen and Indian Chiefs—were all assembled in the Paulskirche of that old Germanic town,—the Paulskirche, once a church, lately a parliament house, and now a sort of temple of concord. They met together,—jarring and conflicting elements as they seemed, to talk and think about the practicability of preserving peace all over the world. The speeches of Mr. Cobden and M. Emile Girardin, Mr. George Dawson and Elihu Burritt, the Ojibbeway Chief and Mr. Chipple of New York seem to have produced the most effect in the earlier portion of the proceedings, but we cannot help thinking that the speech of M. Surinagar of Holland, which was delivered near their close, contains more matter worthy of being repeated than most of the others, and the admonitory hints especially addressed to the members of the congress, are at once practical and philosophical. We extract the following from the resumé given of this speech by the "Times Correspondent:"—

"The resolutions of the Congress were not, in his opinion, elaborated as they should have been, to induce all nations to accept their peaceful ideas. First, when the principle of self-defence was not admitted, there was little hope that peace societies would be found in Germany and in Holland. England and America might be able to exclude this principle, as they might be sure they never would be attacked by foreign nations; but he could not believe that while another nation would attack Holland, his own country, they would be obliged to say, 'Come to us; we will not defend ourselves; we will do nothing.' To advise a nation in humble circumstances to act thus would, in his opinion, be an exaggeration of the peace principle. If he were in error, so were millions of men. Nevertheless, he wished to be convinced, and he prayed the members of the Congress to enlighten him next year. Secondly, he thought that hitherto the Congress had been too prone to overlook the honours and glories of conquerors. It was not prudent to go from one extreme to another—to forget all the good services performed by armies of patriotic soldiers. A good soldier could not have pleasure to kill one man, unless it was to save hundreds of others; and their Congress deliberations should be so conducted, that even soldiers could step forward and assist them. Thirdly, in asking for a simultaneous disarmament, the Congress should urge that governments legally provide for those who go out of their service, rather than leave them the prey of poverty. He advised that at their homes the members of the Congress should teach the necessity of a congress of delegates of all nations to make an international code, but with a special view to obtain the assistance of the most eminent men on earth. A future generation would undoubtedly accept their peaceful ideas; but to realize this hope hands and hearts must be prepared. With respect to war itself, he would say that he stood between two mountains. One was the mountain of war. It was composed of blood and tears. The errors and sins of mankind formed that mountain. But there was another mountain. The Almighty God was its creator. It was therefore a good—it was the best mountain. But it was extremely high. Would mankind get to the top? He scarcely believed it possible. But it was noble to advance to as high an altitude as possible. And this was to be done, not by hasty, but by steady steps. The Father of mankind had given them that example in His moral education of the world—it was done slowly, and with moderation, and with love. There were now great ideas in the heads and in the hearts of mankind. The idea of the unity of Germany was one of them—and that idea never could perish; it never could die, for it was immortal. If they did not see it realized, they must not despair. Their children and their children's children would see it realized. Universal peace was another of those great, noble ideas—an idea for the conception of which they wanted enthusiasm, but for its fulfilment calm. Napoleon had said that it was a great error to reorganize the world with special post-horses, and there was an invaluable proverb in the German language, 'Man ein rohrs ist schneidet nicht,' that was to say, 'Exaggeration has spoiled many good things.' This error greatly prevailed in these times. It was believed possible to correct all evil by a coup d'état. But that dream had exploded, he hoped. He would say, however, that there was one sufficient power in existence gradually to reform all evils; that power was faith in God, faith in His declarations, faith in His law. 'God would not abandon mankind so long as mankind did not abandon God.' An Indian chief had told them that he could make peace with a pipe; could not Christians make peace with the Bible?"

With sincere wishes for the spread of pacific principles, and with all due respect for the benevolence and energy of their present advocates, I would yet remind them that it is possible to injure a good cause by unfair misrepresentations of the opposite party. And to that opposite party I would say, Do not turn with contempt from new doctrines because they are new, and seem not to be practicable. Finally, let me quote for the general benefit, the following words of one of our greatest modern philosophers—Samuel Taylor Coleridge:—"Above all, let it be remembered by both parties, and, indeed, by controversialists on all subjects, that every speculative error which boasts a multitude of advocates, has its golden as well as its dark side; that there is always some truth connected with it, the exclusive attention to which has misled the understanding—some moral beauty which has given it charms for the heart. Let it be remembered, that no assuivant of an error can reasonably hope to be listened to by its advocates, who has not proved to them that he has seen the disputed subject in the same point of view, and is capable of contemplating it with the same feelings as themselves; for, why should we abandon a cause at the persuasions of one who is ignorant of the reasons which have attached us to it? Let it be remembered, that to write, however ably, merely to convince those who are already convinced, displays but the courage of a boaster; and in any subject to rail against the evil before we have inquired for the good, and to exasperate the passions of those who think with us, by caricaturing the opinions and blackening the motives of our antagonists, is to make the understanding the pander of the passions; and, even though we should have defended the right cause, to gain for ourselves ultimately from the good and wise no other praise than the Supreme Judge awarded to the friends of Job for their partial and uncharitable defence of His justice: 'My wrath is kindled against you: for ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right.'"

MEMORY.¹

BY R. E. M. K.

"Lord, keep my memory green."

WHOSE is the tongue that will hesitate to repeat with us this earnest petition? Whose the heart that does not echo it, at least in desire? You, with the mantling smile, and the light of girlhood on your beauteous brow, we scarcely ask it of you; for your gaze is onward, on through the flowery meads and vernal pastures of prospective life: on through the sunny arcades of hope's fairy-land, where all is so entirely couleur de rose—so redolent with the "Promised joys of life's unmeasured way."

Yet even you would find the honey-cup of pleasure turn to bitterness at your lips, were it not for the "green memories" by which the cup is encircled. Could we tear from it that verdant foliage, those clinging tendrils,—in other words, could we remove the green memory of the love that has sprung up about you,—that has budded, and leafed, and clasped you with its tendril-like attachment,—that has so sweetened the atmosphere of existence,—where would be the allurements of your future? where the glory of the picture upon which you now gaze so yearningly? Thus unconsciously to ourselves do we borrow from the "past" the light wherewith to gild our future!

Again we say, whose is the tongue that will hesitate to repeat with us this petition, "Lord, keep my memory green?" whose the heart that does not echo it, at least in desire? Listening with the ears of imagination, we hear the expected answer rising up around us, an "universal prayer," from our very antipodes, even to our own "household walls."

Yet some, we know, have, in the face of right reason, maintained memory to be a curse rather than a blessing. These individuals we maintain to be among the morally insane members of the community, and consequently not admissible opinionists. They are among those who would trace deformities in a "faultless perfection" by reason of the crookedness of their own moral vision.

"Thus men go wrong with an ingenious skill;
Bend the straight rule to their own crooked will;
And with a clear and shining lamp supplied,
First put it out, then take it for a guide."

The hearts of men are full of contraractics, and as dissimilar in the more minute characteristics as are the physiognomies of the human race. Of this, even the most superficial knowledge of the world suffices to convince us. Let each one look no further than within the range of his own immediate circle, and even in this narrow boundary, how varied are the aspects, how dissimilar, how opposite! Like the human face, it is only in general outline that the hearts of men resemble each other: even as the leaves of summer are all of one hue, yet of how infinite a variety! The face has its universal form, the leaf its universal green, and the heart, in like manner, its universal triune capacity, "will, memory, and understanding," a twin picture as it were to the theological virtues, "faith, hope, and charity,"—faith and hope, that perish at the gates of eternity, charity only remaining with the beatified soul; will and memory, that in the same way are extinguished in the dawning blaze of an infinite understanding. Faith and hope are bestowed on us as blessings by the hand of a beneficent Providence, and are universally acknowledged as such, as being the means by which we ascend to the everlasting Horeb, the goal of existence; as being the wings by which we soar to that immaculate atmosphere whose vital essence is Charity. Upon the same grounds we demand the same acknowledgment regarding the gift of memory.

Memory is to us now, when we see "darkly as through a glass," and "know only in part," a faint semblance of what "knowledge" will be to us hereafter. To deprive us of memory, would be to leave us dwelling in the darkness of this "prison of the flesh," with our lamp of consolation extinguished; for hope is our lamp, and hope is the offspring of memory. Memory presents the facts to our minds, hope builds upon them. Thus, as we said before, we borrow from the past the light wherewith to gild our future.

"Lord, keep my memory green!" echoes instinctively in the heart of the wondering child, as it looks upon the leafless boughs of winter, and seeks in vain for the wild flowers "striped and golden," it was wont to gather in the merry hours of summer. It remembers them, the blue violets,—those deep eyes of the young spring first gazing upon us so shyly—the cowslips of sunny May; and Hope weaves a garland afresh—a garland of promise that they shall leaf and blossom again, when warm days, and cloudless skies, and fertilizing dews return. "Lord, keep my memory green!" trembles on the wan lips of the weeping mourner, whether it be over the dead or the dying those agonising drops be distilled. It wells up there from the stricken yet disciplined heart in the half-audible appeal for strength addressed to those ears which are never closed against us. "Teach me to remember that Thou hast promised succour to all who call upon Thee in the day of tribulation—"that this is not our true country, that here life is made up of meetings and partings, and that it is only hereafter we may anticipate the bliss of an inseparable companionship." True, memory is potent to stir the storm of natural regrets, to rend the heart with the thought of present desolation, to convulse the lip when its cry of endearment comes back unanswered, to thicken the breath with a sense of suffocation at the threshold of that chamber whose closed door—

"So often on its hinge before," bespeaks the stillness of the sleep within, to flood the eye with ungovernable tears by recalling the bloom, the life, the love, the beauty, that so lately animated that shrine of dust, and have now left it ripening for decay. True, it is potent to awaken thus the fierce tides of mental anguish, to prostrate our moral courage, to overcome for the time being even our physical powers; but how sovereign is the antidote it at the same time affords! how specific the balm of its spiritual consolation!

"Memory is my solace," sigh the separated in life. They who are the victims of an untoward fate; knit together by the bonds of affection, yet divided by an ocean of adverse circumstances to think of the absent, to keep them shrouded in the sanctuary of the mind, to call back the tones, the smiles, the words of endearment, the winning gentleness, the frank pleasantries, the laugh, the glance of sweet surprise, the warm fervent pressure of the hand, are surely privileges too dearly prized to be relinquished without reluctance by the exiled from home: we say home, because of the accepted creed that—

"'Tis home where'er the heart is."

Memory is that sunshine we see beaming so oft in the face of venerable age. "He is thinking of his youth!" we say, when the smile of happy abstraction, like a breath of summer, melts into touching softness of expression the time-worn lineaments of the hoary dreamer. He is back with his early childhood, when the world seemed all so good and beautiful, and men just what their Maker first designed them to be, "only a little lower than the angels;" back with his happy school-days, when application and ability were first coined into the gold of knowledge; back with the merry troop who went "bounding out to play;" back with his dawning manhood, which still is youth, when passion, kindled at the shrine of beauty, offered up its first, its purest sacrifice, an unsullied and devoted heart. He thinks, he ponders on all this, and if a cloud of regret arise, it is but momentary, for though the nerveless arm, the failing eye, over which the film of age is gathering fast, the silvered locks, the faltering step, are all solemn evidences that the winter of life has set in for him, memory is at hand with her antidote; at hand with the balm of her consolation. She tells him that these are but incrustations wrought by time on the surface, which eat not their way within; the soul of man being impervious to all blighting influences; its dower being that of perpetual youth.

Memory is the guardian angel even of the wicked. How often does it step in between the intention and the guilty deed, staying the murderous hand, whispering admonitions long forgotten, stirring the callous heart to a sense of good, softening, subduing, winning it! Truly may we repeat, it is their guardian angel, though it is doubtless these who would clamour for its destruction, who would exclaim "Away with it—away with it; it is the bane, the curse of my life!" If there be really any existing whose graceless tongues could dare thus to execrate aught so sacred, we cry, "Pause ere thou condemn," and opening for them afresh the book of the creation, bid them behold how, when God made man in the paradise of Eden, and endowed him with "will, memory, and understanding," "He saw that it was good."

THE DOMESTIC LIFE OF ALEXANDER PAULOWITZ, EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

THE tragedy of which Paul I. was the victim, called Alexander to the throne of all the Russias in the twenty-fourth year of his age. He had been carefully educated under the eye of his grandmother, the able Catharine. Her choice of a preceptor in La Harpe, a Swiss republican, who had fraternized with the revolutionists of France, was a problem the sovereigns of Europe could not solve; but after all, republicanism cannot be very far removed from despotism, if we may judge from its consequences, since history shows us that republics end in despotic sovereignties. Catharine was doubtless aware of this fact when she gave La Harpe the direction of her grandson's education. It was prudent to avoid Russian ascendancy in a matter so important to herself, for Catharine was a foreigner and a usurper, a fact of which a native instructor might have availed himself to her disadvantage. In educating her grandsons, the great empress excluded the fine arts. She wished to make them rulers, not professors of music and painting; and she was right; La Harpe inspired, it is said, his imperial pupil with lessons of generosity and truth it was no easy task to inculcate during his eventful life. The policy of Catharine made her determine to give wives to her grandsons as soon as they were marriageable. Her jealousy, or her profound judgment, made her overlook Paul in the succession of Russia, by a mental but not a public exclusion. Alexander was destined by her to the throne of which she had robbed his father Constantine, she proudly hoped to place on one she designed to win from the Sultan, an ambitious desire which was never realized.

Three German princesses came to the court of St. Petersburg, in order that Catharine might make choice of suitable brides for her grandsons. The empress thoughtfully expected the arrival of her guests, whose approach she watched from a window of her palace.

The empress, whose motions were dignified and graceful, attached great importance to deportment; she formed her opinions of young people by that standard. The destinies of these princesses were decided the instant they alighted from their travelling carriage. The first leaped down without availing herself of the step. The empress shook her head, "She will never be empress of Russia, she is too precipitate," was her internal remark. The second entangled her feet in her dress, and with difficulty escaped a fall. "She is not the empress, for she is too awkward," and Catharine again turned her eyes on the carriage with anxious curiosity. The third princess descended very gracefully; she was beautiful, majestic and grave. "Behold the future Empress of Russia," said Catharine. This princess was Louise of Baden.

Catharine introduced these ladies to her grandsons, as the children of the Duchess of Baden-Durlack, born Princess of Darmstadt, her early friend, whose education she wished to finish at her court, since the possession of their country by the French had left them without a home. The great dukes saw through this artifice, and upon their return to their own palace talked much of Catharine's élèves.

"I think the eldest very pretty," said Alexander.

"For my part," rejoined Constantine, "I consider them neither pretty nor plain. They ought to be sent to Riga to the princess of Courland; they are really quite good enough for them."

The Empress Catharine was informed, that very day, of the opinion of her grandsons. The admiration of Alexander for Louisa of Baden sympathised with her intentions. The Grand Duke Constantine had done the personal attractions of this young princess great injustice, for Louisa of Baden, besides the freshness of her youth, had lovely fair ringlets, hanging in rich profusion on her magnificent shoulders, a form light and flexible as that of a fairy, and large blue eyes full of sweetness and sensibility. The following day, the empress brought the princesses to the palace of Prince Potemkin, which she had appointed for their residence. While they were at their toilette, she sent them dresses, jewels, and the cordon of St. Catharine. After chatting with them upon the topics she considered suitable to their age, she asked to see their wardrobe, which she examined, article by article, with interest and curiosity. Having finished her scrutiny, she kissed the princesses, and remarked with an emphatic smile,

"My friends, I was not so rich as you when I came to St. Petersburg." In fact, Catharine was very poor when she arrived in Russia, but she left her adopted country a heritage in Poland and the Crimea.

The predilection of Alexander for Louisa of Baden was responded to by that lovely princess. The grand duke at that time was a charming young man, full of benevolence and candour, with the best temper in the world, and the young German did not attempt to disguise her tenderness for him. Catharine, in announcing to them that they were destined for each other, believed she was rendering them perfectly happy.

The behaviour of the bride was admirably adapted to the circumstances in which she was placed. She acquired the Russian language with grace and facility, and accepted a new name with the tenets of the Greek religion. She received those of Elizabeth Alexiowna, the same borne by the imperial daughter of Peter the Great.

Notwithstanding the fortunate presages of the Empress Catharine, this early marriage was not one of happiness. The inconstancy of Alexander, indeed, withered the nuptial garland while yet green on the brow of the bride, and made it for her a crown of thorns.

The tragedy that elevated Alexander to the throne, restored to the devoted wife the wandering affections of her husband. His profound grief made her sympathy necessary to him, and the young empress, almost a stranger to Paul, wept for him like a true daughter. The secret tears of Alexander were shed at night on the bosom of his consort, whose tender concern for him consoled him for the restraint he imposed upon his feelings during the day.

The regretful remembrance of Alexander for his father, outlasted the reviving affection he had during that dolorous period felt for his wife.

The empress, still a young woman, was an old spouse, and the emperor had inherited the passionate and inconstant temperament of Catharine. But, gracious and smiling as he always was with the ladies, or polite and friendly to the gentlemen, there crossed his brow from time to time a gloomy shadow, the mute but terrible memorial of that dreadful night, when he heard the death struggle of his father, and was conscious of his agony without the power to save him. His perpetual smile was the mask beneath which he disguised the anguish of his mind, and as he advanced in life, this profound melancholy threatened to deepen into malady. He did not yield, however, without maintaining a warfare with his remorse. He combated memory with action. His reforms, his long and laborious journeys, had but one aim. In the course of his reign, he is supposed to have traversed fifty thousand leagues. But, however rapidly he performed these journeys, he never deviated from the time he fixed for his setting off or return, even by an hour, and he undertook them without guards and without an escort. He, of course, met with many strange adventures, and was amused with rendering his personal assistance whenever he met with accidents or encountered difficulties by the wayside. In his journey to Finland in company with Prince Pierre Volkouski, the imperial carriage in traversing a sandy mountain rolled back, notwithstanding the efforts of the coachman, upon which the emperor jumped out, and literally lent his shoulder to the wheel, leaving his companion asleep.

The rough motion of the carriage disturbed the slumbers of the prince, who found himself at the bottom of the carriage and alone. He looked about him with astonishment, when he perceived the emperor, with his brow bedewed with perspiration, from the effects of his toil in assisting to drag him and the vehicle to the top of the mountain, the precise point at which he had awakened from his sleep.

At another time, while traversing Little Russia, while the horses were changing at a certain station, the emperor expressed his determination to travel on foot for a few miles, ordering his people not to hasten their arrangements, but to let him walk forward. Alone, with no mark of distinction, dressed in a military great-coat, that gave no clue to the rank of the wearer, the emperor traversed the town without attracting attention, till he arrived at two roads, and found himself obliged to inquire his way of an individual who was sitting before the door of the last house smoking a pipe. This personage, like the emperor, wore a military great-coat, and by his pompous air seemed to entertain no small opinion of his own consequence.

"My friend, can you tell me which of these roads will bring me to —?" asked the emperor.

The man of the pipe scanned him from head to foot, apparently surprised at the presumption of a pedestrian, in speaking to such a dignitary as himself, and between two puffs of smoke he growled out very disdainfully the ungracious reply, "The right."

"Thank you, sir," said the emperor, raising his hat with the respect this uncivil personage seemed by his manner to command. "Will you permit me to ask you another question?"

"What do you want to know?"

"Your rank in the army, if you please."

"Guess," returned him of the pipe.

"Lieutenant, perhaps?"

"Go higher."

"Captain?" rejoined the emperor.

"Much higher," and the smoker gave a consequential puff.

"Major, I presume?"

"Go on," replied the officer.

"Lieutenant-colonel?"

"Yes, you have guessed it at last, but you have taken some trouble to discover my rank."

The low bow of the emperor made the man with the pipe conclude he was speaking to an inferior, so, without much ceremony, he said, "Pray, who are you? for I conclude you are in the army."

"Guess," replied the emperor, much amused with the adventure.

"Lieutenant?"

"Go on."

"Captain?"

"Much higher."

"Major?"

"You must still go on."

"Lieutenant-colonel?"

"You have not yet arrived at my rank in the army."

The officer took his pipe out of his mouth. "Colonel, I presume."

"You have not yet reached my grade."

The officer assumed a more respectful attitude.

"Your Excellency is then Lieutenant-general?"

"You are getting nearer the mark."

The puzzled lieutenant-colonel kept his helmet in his hand, and looked stupid and alarmed.

"Then it appears to me that your Highness is Field-Marshal?"

"Make another attempt, and perhaps you will discover my real position."

"His Imperial Majesty!" exclaimed the officer, trembling with apprehension, and dropping the pipe upon the ground, which was broken into twenty pieces.

"The same, at your service," replied the emperor, laughing.

The poor lieutenant-colonel dropped upon his knees, uttering the words in a pitiful tone, "Ah! sire, pardon me."

"What pardon do you require?" replied the emperor. "I asked my way of you, and you pointed it out, and I thank you for that service.—Good day."

The good-tempered prince then took the road to the right, leaving the surly lieutenant-colonel ashamed and astonished at the colloquy he had held with his sovereign.

He gave a proof of intrepidity and presence of mind during a tempest which befell him on a lake near Archangel, when, perceiving the pilot overwhelmed with the responsibility his imperial rank laid upon him, he said, "My friend, more than eighteen hundred years have elapsed, since a Roman general, placed in similar circumstances, said to his pilot, 'Fear not, for thou hast with thee Cæsar and his fortune.' I am, however, less bold than Cæsar; I therefore charge thee to think no more of the emperor than of thyself or any other man, and do thy best to save us both." The pilot took courage, and, relieved from his burden by the wisdom of his sovereign, guided the helm with a firm hand, and brought the tempest tossed skiff safely to the shore.

The Emperor Alexander was not always so fortunate. He met with several dangerous accidents, and his last journey to the provinces of the Don nearly cost him his life. A fall from his droski hurt his leg, and left him incurably lame. This misfortune was aggravated by his disregarding the advice of his medical attendant, who prescribed rest for some days; but Alexander, who was a strict disciplinarian, did not choose to delay his return to St. Petersburg an hour beyond the time he had fixed. Erysipelas attacked the limb, and the emperor was confined to his bed for many weeks, and never recovered his lameness. The sight of his wife, pale and melancholy, whom his infidelity had injured, increased his mental despondency. That princess watched over him with the conjugal tenderness which no neglect could extinguish, but her fair face had for ever lost the smile which once lighted up, like a sunbeam, every beautiful feature, and he felt himself the cause of that secret sorrow which had banished the bloom from her cheek and the smile from her lips. Elizabeth had borne him two daughters, but her children had not survived their fifth and seventh years. A childless mother and forsaken wife, Elizabeth the Empress resembled no longer the bright Louisa of Baden, the object of Alexander's first love, the princess who had shed tears of happiness when the joyful start and impassioned look of her lover had assured the Empress Catharine how willingly he accepted the hand of the princess she had destined for him. The heart of the wife had never swerved from her devotion; her love had increased with time, but she knew not how to share his affections with a rival.

Alexander was solitary in his habits; repose was necessary to a man who loved privacy, and hated those prestiges of power which had surrounded him from infancy. He had inherited his imperial grandmother's love for Tzarsko Zelo, a palace situated between three and four leagues from St. Petersburg.

This palace stood upon the site of a cottage formerly belonging to an old Dutch-woman named Sarah, a person well known to Peter the Great, with whom that mighty prince was accustomed to chat and drink milk.

The fruitful plains covered with grass and waving corn, lately redeemed by the plough from their native sterility, pleased the legislator, who was an habitué at the abode of Sarah, and at the death of the old woman, he presented the cottage to the Empress Catharine, with the surrounding lands, as a suitable situation for a farm-house. Catharine, as simple in her tastes as her imperial consort, gave her architect proper direction respecting this grange. He, however, thought fit to build her a fine mansion. Her daughter, the Empress Elizabeth, found this house too costly for a farm-house, and too mean for an imperial residence. She pulled it down and built a magnificent palace, after the design of Count Rastreti. This Russian had the barbarous taste to gild the building within and without. The bas-reliefs, statues, cariatides, roof and basement, glittered with a waste of this precious metal. The count wished to make this palace surpass Versailles, and so it did in wealth undoubtedly. The Empress Elizabeth invited the French Ambassador to the fête she gave at the inauguration of her golden house, which outshone even the celebrated one built by Nero. The palace of Tzarsko Zelo was considered by the whole court the eighth wonder of the world.

The silence of the Marquis de Chetardie surprised her majesty, who with some pique requested his opinion, adding, he appeared to think something was wanting.

"I am seeking for the case of this jewel, Madam," dryly replied the ambassador; a bon mot which ought to have gained him a sitting in the academy of St. Petersburg, where wit was a surer passport than learning.

The golden roof of Tzarsko Zelo was ill-calculated to stand the rigour of a Russian winter. The noble architect had built it for summer. Cold had been forgotten in his calculation. The expensive repairs every spring brought in its course, compelled Catharine the Great to sacrifice the gilding. She had scarcely issued her orders, before a customer appeared for the article she was excluding from her palace, for which a speculator offered her an immenso sum. The empress thanked him for a liberal offer none but a Russian sovereign would have declined, assuring him with a smile, "that she never sold her old chattels."

This empress loved Tzarsko Zelo, where she built the little palace for her grandson Alexander, and surrounded it with spacious gardens, which she was aware he loved. Bush, her architect, could discover no supply from whence he could obtain water in the immediate neighbourhood, yet he prepared lakes, canals and fish-ponds, upon the responsibility of the empress, being sure that his reservoirs would not long be empty if she ordered water to come. His successor Baner did not leave the empress to discover its source. He cast his eyes upon the estate of Prince Demidoff, who possessed a superabundant quantity of the precious fluid the imperial gardens wanted. He mentioned the aridity of Tzarsko Zelo, and the courteous subject dutifully bestowed his superfluous moisture upon the imperial gardens. In despite of nature, copious streams rushed forward, and at the bidding of the architect rose into cascades, ran into canals, filled fish-ponds, and spread in expansive lakes. The Empress Consort Elizabeth, upon beholding these wonders, playfully remarked, "We may fall out with all Europe, but we must take care not to quarrel with Prince Demidoff." In fact, that obliging noble could have killed the whole court with thirst, by stopping the supply of water he allowed to the imperial family.

Educated at Tzarsko Zelo, Alexander was attached to a place filled with the recollections of his infancy. He had learned there to walk, to speak, to ride, to sail, to row. He had passed there the brightest and happiest part of his life. He came with the first fine days, and only left his favourite residence when the snows of winter compelled him to take up his abode in the winter palace.

Even in this luxurious solitude, where the emperor wished to enjoy the repose which affords to princes the same pleasure amusement offers to persons of less exalted rank, Alexander found his privacy invaded and his attention claimed by those who had the temerity to break through the invisible circle with which Russian etiquette fenced round a despotic sovereign.

A foreigner at St. Petersburg, in the summer of 1823, ventured to seek the Emperor Alexander in the delicious gardens of Tzarsko Zelo, in order to present a petition, with which delicate commission he had been charged by a friend. He thus relates his adventure:—

"After a bad breakfast at the Hotel de la Restauration, I entered the park, into which the sentinels permitted every body to walk without opposition. Respect alone prevented the Russian subject from entering the gardens, I knew, yet I was about to break this boundary and to intrude myself upon the emperor's notice. I was told he passed a great deal of his time in the shady walks, and I hoped chance would obtain for me the interview I sought. Wandering about the grounds, I discovered the Chinese town, a pretty group of five houses, each of which had its own ice-house and garden. In the centre of this town, which is in the form of a star, whose rays it terminates, stands a pavilion, which is used either for a ball or concert-room, which surrounds a green court, at the four corners of which are placed four mandarins, the size of life, smoking their pipes. This Chinese town is inhabited by the aide-de-camps of the sovereign. Catharine, attended by her court, was walking in this part of her garden, when she beheld, to her surprise, the mandarins puffing forth real smoke, while their eyes appeared to ogle her, and their heads to bow in the most familiar manner in the world. She approached in order to find out the cause of this sudden animation on the part of these statues. Immediately the loyal mandarins descended from their pedestals, and made Chinese prostrations at her feet, reciting some complimentary verses to the imperial lady, to please whom they had transformed themselves into the images of the men with pig-tails. She smiled, and quickly recognised them for the Prince de Ligne, Potemkin, Count Segur, and M. de Cobenzal.

"Leaving the Chinese town, I saw the huts of the lamas, where these inhabitants of the south are kept and acclimated to a temperature very different from that at the foot of the Cordilleras. These animals were presented to the emperor by the Viceroy of Mexico, and their original number of nine has been reduced, by the rigour of the Russian winters, to five; from which, however, a numerous race have succeeded, who bear the cold much better than the parent stock.

"In the middle of the French garden stands a pretty dining-room, containing the celebrated table of Olympus, imitated from a whim devised by the Regent Orleans; where the wishes of the guests are supplied by invisible hands from beneath. They have only to place a note in their plate expressive of their desire, when the plate disappears, and in five minutes after re-appears with the article required. This magic originates in a forecast which anticipates every possible want. A beautiful lady finding her hair out of dress, wished for curling-irons, feeling assured that such an odd request would defy even the enchantment of the Olympian table to procure. She was astonished at finding her plate return with a dozen pair. I saw the curious monument raised to commemorate three favourite greyhounds, pets of the Empress Catharine. This pyramid, erected by the French ambassador, Count Segur, contains two epitaphs: one, by himself, is a sort of burlesque upon the old eulogistic style so prevalent in the last century; the other is by Catharine, and may be literally translated into English:—

"Here lies the Duchess Anderson, Who bit Mr. Rogerson."

"I visited successively the column of Gregory Orloff, the pyramid erected in honour of the conqueror of Tchesma, and the grotto of Pausilippo, and passed four hours wandering along the borders of lakes, and traversing the plains and forests enclosed in these delicious gardens, when I met an officer in uniform, who courteously raised his hat. I asked a lad employed in raking a walk 'the name of this fine gentleman,' for such he appeared to me to be. 'It is the emperor,' was his reply. I immediately took a path which intersected that he had taken, yet, when I had advanced about twenty steps, I stopped upon perceiving him near me.

"He divined, apparently, that respect to his person prevented me from crossing his walk; he therefore kept on his way, while I awaited him in the side walk, holding my hat in my hand. I perceived he limped in his gait from the wound in his leg, which had lately re-opened; and I remarked as he advanced the change that had taken place in his appearance since I had seen him at Paris, nine years before. His countenance, then so open and smiling, bore the expression of that deep and devouring melancholy which it was said continually oppressed his mind, yet his sorrowful features still were impressed with a character of benevolence, which gave me courage to attempt the performance of my hazardous commission. 'Sire,' said I, advancing a single step towards him.

"'Put on your hat, sir,' was his kind and gracious reply; 'the air is too keen for you to remain uncovered.'

"'Will your majesty permit —'

"'Cover your head, sir, then; cover your head;' but, perceiving my respect rendered me disobedient to his commands, he took my hat from my hand, and with his own imperial one replaced it on my head. 'Now,' said he, 'what do you wish to say to me?'

"'Sire, this petition,' and I took the paper from my pocket, but the action disturbed him, and I saw him frown.

"'Sir, why do you pursue me here with petitions? do you know that I have left St. Petersburg to be free from such annoyances?'

"'Yes, sire, I am aware of it, nor dare I disguise the boldness of an attempt for which I can only expect pardon from your benevolence. This, however, seems to have some claim to your majesty's consideration, since it is franked.'

"'By whom?' inquired the emperor, with some quickness in his manner.

"'By his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine, your majesty's august brother.'

"'Ah!' exclaimed the emperor, putting out his hand, but as quickly withdrawing it again.

"'I hope your majesty will for once infringe your custom, and will deign to accept this supplication.'

"'No, sir; I will not receive it; for, to-morrow, I shall have a thousand, and shall be compelled to desert these gardens, where it seems I can no longer hope to enjoy privacy.' He perceived my disappointment in my countenance, and his natural kindness would not suffer him to dismiss me with a harsh refusal. Pointing with his hand towards the church of St. Sophia, he said,—'Put that petition into the post-office in the city, and I shall see it to-morrow, and the day after, you will have an answer.'

"I expressed my gratitude in animated terms.

"'Prove it,' was his quick reply.

"I declared my willingness to do anything he required, as the test of that feeling.

"'Well, tell nobody that you have presented me a petition and got off with impunity,' and he resumed his walk.

"I followed his advice, and posted my paper, and three days after received a favourable reply to my petition."¹

A PIECE OF STILL LIFE.

In these days of agitation and excitement, of ambitions and pretensions of all kinds, it is sometimes pleasant to turn away our eyes from the tumultuous fields where the political and social battles of the time are being fought out,—from the fever and the fret of life in its more anxious and stirring scenes, and suffer them to rest awhile on some of its little out-of-the-way nooks and corners, where the current of existence glides on so gently that we hardly perceive its motion, where a few simple affections and a few plain rules suffice for its guidance, and where still flourish amidst many hardships and privations the old-fashioned virtues of humility and content. There are not many spots of earth, perhaps, that can show more perfect quiet little pictures of this kind, than the little cluster of islands lying off the coast of the Duchies of Schleswig Holstein, many of which have been, and many more of which apparently will be, sooner or later, swallowed by the ocean that howls around their very thresholds.

Lying but a few feet above the level of the sea—in many instances undefended even by dykes, for the expense of their construction is often too great for the limited means of the inhabitants, they seem to hold their lives by the most precarious tenure; in the winter months the islands are often flooded twice a-day, and it would require a by no means uncommon combination of wind and tide, to whelm the human dwellers, with the few cows and sheep from which they derive their subsistence, in one common grave.

To strangers their lives appear forlorn and destitute of all that could render life attractive, besides being exposed to dangers that would form a serious drawback upon a condition rich in enjoyment. But fortunately, the dangers by which they are surrounded are never thought of but when they are actually present, and their hopes and wishes and affections are centred in the little spot where they were born and where they mostly wish to die. That maiden spinning in the sun knows not of dance or song; but is happy as she twists the thread and dreams of her betrothed husband, now far away, perhaps, in the stormy Polar seas. This is the almost invariable destiny of the young men of these islands, whose inhabitants have from time immemorial been a nation of sailors.

In the quaint little abode next door, so dazzling inside and out, with its Dutch tiles and bright blue paint, there dwells one of the retired sea-captains who form the aristocracy of the place. He has passed thirty years at sea, and now thirty years more in this lonely little village, in the company of his aged wife, who during all that time has never been able to move a single step without his assistance. She passes her days in that high-backed leathern chair, in the old French taste, which was considered by a certain nomadic Englishman, who somehow or other found his way hither, as so delightfully Rococo, that he offered a considerable sum of money for it; but the offer was refused by the captain because his sickly wife had got used to it, and would not like any other. The money offered would indeed have purchased two far more elegant and commodious chairs; but he thought no other would ever please her so well.

Another of the cottages is, or was a few years ago, inhabited by a widow of seventy-eight, who, since the death of her husband, had been alone in the world, all her relations having either been lost at sea, or having departed this life in some fashion or other.

She inhabited a tiny house, which was a perfect pattern of cleanliness, although she had to do with her own hands all that was required to make it so; for she was too poor to pay for any assistance. She had a little sitting-room, a less bed-room, and a kitchen, four feet square, yet her dwelling could vie with the best of her neighbours for its brightly polished brass utensils, its brightly rubbed tables, its shining black stove, and spotless white boards.

She used to get up at a very early hour in the morning, and divide her day between her spinning-wheel, and the washings and scourings, rubbings and scrubblings, necessary to preserve the spotless purity of her domain, and thus wage an incessant and valiant warfare against dust, and rust, and cobwebs, hunger, sickness, and ennui.

Against the most formidable of these enemies—hunger—her wheel was her most potent ally. With its assistance she earned enough to provide her small stock of tea and coffee, which she stood the more in need of, as she only allowed herself a hot dinner twice a week, that she might be able to save enough to keep her little goods and chattels in the best possible order. She expressed great thankfulness, however, for the uncommon blessings of her lot; since she could see, and hear, and walk, and work, as well as a young girl. In her room of state hung a picture of her father, who was a schoolmaster, and by the side of it ticked a large old-fashioned clock, the brass weights of which, so apt to be covered with fly marks, were as clean and bright as if they had just come out of the shop. The leaves of the plants at her window, also, shone as if they were varnished, as the old lady every morning wiped them, each severally, with a damp sponge, that no dust might settle on them and stop their pores, which, she thought, might prevent their thriving. In this apartment was also a bed, but one only used for a grand state occasion,—namely, when a cousin, the only relation she had in the world, came from a neighbouring village to pay her a visit. It was always kept ready for him, and for him stood also, in a little corner cupboard, a half-pound of tobacco, neatly wrapped up, a brass pipe-holder, and some white clay pipes.

In this cupboard was also a goodly store of household utensils, the accumulation of her long life, amongst which figured a rather stately soup-tureen of Russian extraction. It appeared that some long-deceased relative of hers had once had the honour of dining at the table of the Emperor of Russia, and that it was then the custom for the guests of his Imperial Majesty, not only to eat what was set before them, but also to carry away the dishes; and in this way, both the tureen above mentioned and several plates, knives, forks, and spoons, had fallen into the possession of her kinsman. It is indeed no uncommon thing in these islands, to see both household utensils and furniture collected from all corners of the earth,—a fact easily accounted for, when we consider that the population is almost entirely composed of sailors.

In a little lumber closet which I forgot to enumerate amongst the apartments contained in her mansion, stood some fine old chests, carefully covered with stout leather, and one, which was upwards of two hundred years old, was richly adorned with carved work, exhibiting among other figures a whale in a noose, a favourite ornament here. One of these had cost a hundred marks, (between six and seven pounds,) and would now certainly sell for half the money,—but nothing could induce the old lady to part with these relics, for in them she honoured the memory of her forefathers and deceased relations. The only memorial of former days that she seemed to care little about, was an ancient fan, which she had broken to pieces to make sticks for the flowers at her window out of its ribs. The tops of these ribs were still fastened together with strings of beads, so that they had a very ornamental effect.

She possessed also an antique musical instrument, a kind of guitar with brass strings, such as she said people were glad to dance to when she was young, but now they must have trumpets and violins. Most people had one in the house, to accompany the family "in the Sunday afternoon psalms."

The Sunday afternoon psalms are now, alas! almost as rare as the brass stringed guitars, and when they are heard, it is mostly from the quavering voice of some ancient dame or her good man, who still endeavour to keep up the pious old custom. When the old lady is in funds, she pays a visit to a neighbouring shop, and purchases all sorts of little presents for her kinsman, for frugal as she is in her own habits, she is, for her means, generous with respect to him, and her chief recreation is, after she has done everything that it is possible to do for the welfare of her own flowers, to go and look after those of her neighbours. She pays, for instance, frequent visits of inspection to some flower-pots belonging to the keeper of the above shop; picks off the dry leaves, cuts the decayed branches, and feels in the mould to know whether he has been keeping them well watered. On these occasions however, she sometimes comes into collision with another amateur, an old man, formerly a school-master, who has the same passion for flowers as herself; and there has sprung up between them something almost like a feud, in consequence of the gentleman insinuating that her mode of treatment is not attended with invariable success, and even warning his neighbours that "if they let that Frau K—meddle, she'll spoil every thing they have in the world;" while she on her side, shaking her head at him, will say,— "that as for old Y——, he may be a very learned man, and she dares say he is—but as for flowers, he knows no more of them than a child." The utmost extremity, however, to which hostilities have as yet proceeded between them, is that each party takes the utmost possible pains to get out of the other's way.

THE PET LAMB.

THIS is a very favourite subject by Collins, our best painter of rustic life and incident. It is a sad day at the cottage, for the pet lamb, the play-fellow of the children, is about to be transferred to the hands of the butcher, who stands at the doorway concluding his bargain with the mother. The lamb, unconscious of its impending doom, is surrounded by a group of weeping little ones, who are striving in vain to drive away the butcher's boy and retain their pretty favourite. The painter has told this simple story in a very effective way. The grouping of the figures is admirable, their rustic character well preserved, while the scenery by which they are surrounded is such as all have admired while rambling round our beautiful homesteads and farms. The picture is thoroughly English in sentiment and expression.

BIOGRAPHY OF THOMAS CHALMERS.¹

PART II.

BY JOHN LEAF.

By the publication of Dr. Hanna's second volume of the Memoirs of Dr. Chalmers, we are enabled to resume the notice which was commenced in the May number.

For two years after his marriage, Chalmers lived a life of quiet domestic blissfulness and studious activity in his sequestered parsonage of Kilmany. His popularity as a preacher was meantime increasing in the neighbourhood; while a considerable literary reputation, gained principally by an able publication on the External Evidences of Christianity, occasioned a lively interest respecting him in the general Scottish public. By the autumn of 1814, the rumour of his extraordinary abilities, and of his extending celebrity, had reached Glasgow, and created some sensation among the Town Council and other local powers of that city, who were then charged with the onerous and somewhat perplexing duty of selecting a new minister for the Tron Church, recently vacant through the appointment of the former incumbent, Dr. Macgill, to the chair of theology in the University.

One Sunday, towards the close of October, five Glasgow citizens had travelled down to Bendoely, in Perthshire, with the design of hearing Mr. Chalmers preach, and of afterwards reporting their impressions to the Town Council, by whom they had been deputed. Chalmers had been sent for to Bendochy, to preach a funeral sermon on the death of the late minister of that parish, who is said to have precipitated his decease by heroic and successful efforts, made some time previously, on behalf of seven distressed seamen, whose lives he was the instrument of saving, after their vessel had been driven upon a sandbank in the bay, to the eastward of St. Andrew's. The sermon was an impressive one—on the uncertainties of human life, and the fleeting character of time—and the deputation, apparently, went home edified, and delivered in a favourable testimony.

Presently an active canvassing was commenced in Glasgow; for two other gentlemen had been at the same time brought forward as candidates, either by voluntary desire, or on sweet compulsion. Chalmers was altogether an involuntary nominee. He declared from the first that he would refrain from taking any step whatever in the business, and begged even to be excused from saying whether he would or would not accept the appointment, should he ultimately chance to be elected. He entertained a variety of scruples about leaving his present parish of Kilmany, and had besides some rather strong objections against entering on that career of bustle and formal ceremoniousness which he saw to be next to inevitable in a large city parish, where there would be a great deal of church drudgery, and many fastidious people, of polite and "respectable" pretensions, to be pleased. There were doubtless several considerations that might render a city pulpit desirable to such a man as Chalmers; but as his delicacy of feeling altogether disinclined him for seeking any such promotion through the usual practices of intrigue and personal solicitation, he resolved to be entirely passive in the affair, and to be guided exclusively by the course and issue of events.

The election of a Scottish minister appears to be a somewhat curious concern. We have been exceedingly surprised to find one of Chalmers's correspondents giving him the assurance that his friends at Glasgow had not had occasion to resort to any "bribery!" They considered themselves "certain of carrying their point, having eighteen (if no one flinch) out of one-and-thirty votes;" and "no undue influence, no bribery, no corruption has been practised"—whereupon it is concluded that the "finger of Providence" is evidently discernible in the business. Nevertheless, the providential interference appears to have been for somewhat dubious. A Mr. Tennent, who was apparently the corresponding secretary of the Chalmers interest, is found writing on the 17th of November: "We have had a very hard battle to fight; what with the Duke of Montrose, Sir Islay Campbell, the College interest, and the late and present Provost against us, we have had our hands quite full, and had to put forth all our might." This "might," strenuously exercised, was eventually successful: on the 25th of November, the election, amid no inconsiderable agitation, took place, when the result was a majority for Chalmers. An express from Glasgow was sent with the intelligence to Kilmany; and the next post from Edinburgh brought a letter on the subject, from Dr. Jones. "Heaven and earth," said he, "and all the principalities and powers in high places, have been moved;—from the great officers of state at St. James's, and the Court of Aldermen in King Street, and the Crown lawyers in Edinburgh, down to the little female pieties, who were taught to squall what they did not understand, 'No fanatics, no Balfourites! Rationalists for ever!' No small stir, I'll assure you, has been in that city, and no such stir has been there since the days of John Knox, it is said, about the choice of a minister. And, oh! miserabile dictu, tell it not in St. Andrew's! the fanatics have prevailed, and prevailed against one of the most numerous and well-appointed armies which ever took the field on such an occasion. The order of battle was this:—In the centre of the enemy was the Lord Provost, who commanded the main corps, and which being thou rather weak, as the centre of their opponents was very strong, they strengthened it with the London Guildhall allies, headed by Sir James Shaw. On the right was the Duke of Montrose and the heavy horse; and on the left the Lord Advocate and the light horse. In front were some clerical skirmishers, headed by Principal Dolt, who threw rockets and fire-brands, and said, 'Much learning and religion has made Chalmers mad.' Much was expected from this weapon, but it was rendered quite useless by the opposing remark, 'That it came well from him, as it was notorious to every one that his head was not in the least danger.' These being driven in, confident in their strength, the main body of the opponents came down in full force, made one charge, and went right through the enemy, and so completely defeated them, that in half an hour not two of them were to be seen together; and no sooner had the news reached the town on the afternoon of Friday the 25th of November, than all the town was in an uproar of joy, says my informant, 'Kirkmen, Burghers, Anti-burghers, Independents, and Baptists, all joining in one shout of exultation.' The news has had little less effect, I assure you, in this city. Every one meets or runs to his friend, through a most heavy rain, to say, 'Oh! have you heard the good news?—Mr. Chalmers is elected to the Tron Church of Glasgow!'"

Thus elected, Chalmers decides on quitting Kilmany, deeming the call to Glasgow clear enough to induce him to accept it. Accordingly, he preaches a farewell sermon to his old parishioners, and makes preparations for departure. The anticipation of having a large and more intelligent congregation, and the belief that a more extensive field for exertion would serve the better to develop his own energies and capabilities, seem to have been the principal motives which influenced his decision. Nevertheless, it was not without regret that he turned his back upon the quiet pastoral scenes in which he had now for several years been settled. Looking to the hills which bounded his peaceful valley, and waving his staff to them as if in mournful farewell, he said to a friend who was one day walking by his side, "Ah, my dear sir, my heart is wedded to these hills!" And, coming back to his old parish more than twenty years subsequently, he still remembered and acknowledged the serene influences by which the scene had been endeared, saying, "Oh! there was more tearing of the heart-strings at leaving the valley of Kilmany than at leaving all my great parish at Glasgow."

The first sermon he preached in Glasgow was delivered before the Society of the Sons of the Clergy, on Thursday, the 30th of March, 1815, a few months previous to his regular admission as minister of the Tron Church. The recent excitement of the canvass, and the various rumours that were in circulation respecting the preacher's extraordinary gift of oratory, greatly quickened the public curiosity, and had the effect of drawing together a vast multitude of hearers. Among the crowd was a young Oxford student, the son of a Scottish minister, who had heard Chalmers's Discourse of the Evidences of Christianity mentioned with high approval at the English University. This was he who, a few years later, drew the following interesting sketch, which Dr. Hanna quotes from "Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolks."

"I was a good deal surprised and perplexed with the first glimpse I obtained of his countenance, for the light that streamed faintly upon it for the moment did not reveal anything like that general outline of feature and visage for which my fancy had, by some strange working of presentiment, prepared me. By-and-by, however, the light became stronger, and I was enabled to study the minutiae of his face pretty leisurely. . . . At first sight, no doubt, his face is a coarse one, but a mysterious kind of meaning breathes from every part of it, that such as have eyes to see cannot be long without discovering. It is very pale, and the large half-closed eyelids have a certain drooping melancholy weight about them, which interested me very much, I understood not why. The lips, too, are singularly pensive in their mode of falling down at the sides, although there is no want of richness and vigour in their central fullness of curve. The upper lip, from the nose downwards, is separated by a very deep line, which gives a sort of leonine firmness of expression to all the lower part of the face. The cheeks are square and strong, in texture like pieces of marble, with the cheek bones very broad and prominent. The eyes themselves are light in colour, and have a strange dreamy heaviness, that conveys any idea rather than that of dulness, but which contrasts in a wonderful manner with the dazzling watery glare they exhibit when expanded in their sockets, and illuminated into all their flame and fervour in some moment of high extranced enthusiasm."

After some further observations, from the phrenological point of view, of the preacher's "marked mathematical forehead," his "grand apex of high and solemn veneration," and the "few crisp dark locks, which stand forth boldly," affording "a fine relief to the death-like paleness of the massive temples,"—the writer proceeds to say, that perhaps the world never possessed any orator whose minutest peculiarities of gesture and voice have more power in increasing the effect of what he says, or whose oratory is so wonderfully heightened by a singular delivery.

"And yet," continues he, "were the spirit of the man less gifted than it is, there is no question, these, his lesser peculiarities, would never have been numbered among his points of excellence. His voice is neither strong nor melodious, his gestures are neither easy nor graceful; but, on the contrary, extremely rude and awkward; his pronunciation is not only broadly national, but broadly provincial, distorting almost every word he utters into some barbarous novelty, which, had his hearers leisure to think of such things, might be productive of an effect at once ludicrous and offensive in a singular degree. But of a truth, these are things which no listener can attend to while this great preacher stands before him armed with all the weapons of the most commanding eloquence, and swaying all around him with its imperial rule. At first, indeed, there is nothing to make one suspect what riches are in store. He commences in a low drawing key, which has not even the merit of being solemn, and advances from sentence to sentence, and from paragraph to paragraph, while you seek in vain to catch a single echo that gives promise of that which is to come. There is, on the contrary, an appearance of constraint about him that affects and distresses you. You are afraid that his breast is weak, and that even the slight exertion he makes may be too much for it. But then, with what tenfold richness does this dim preliminary curtain make the glories of his eloquence to shine forth, when the heated spirit at length shakes from it its chill confining fetters, and bursts out elate and rejoicing in the full splendour of its disimprisoned wings. . . . I have heard many men deliver sermons far better arranged in regard to argument, and have heard very many deliver sermons far more uniform in elegance both of conception and of style; but most unquestionably, I have never heard, either in England or Scotland, or in any other country, any preacher whose eloquence is capable of producing an effect so strong and irresistible as his."

Between March and July, Chalmers was busied in arranging matters for his removal; and at last, on Thursday, the 13th of the latter month, the manse of Kilmany was finally forsaken. He spent a few days with his parents at Anstruther, and then, leaving his wife behind him among his friends, proceeded by way of Edinburgh to Glasgow, where he arrived on the 20th, and took up his quarters in temporary lodgings, which he describes as being "in a high and airy situation, as fresh and pure as Kilmany itself," with no other substantial drawback than that another room, in addition to his dining-room and bed-room, could not be got in the house, and that the landlady, with every disposition to oblige him and make him comfortable, had "a quantity and volubility of talk upon every subject," which was rather annoying to a man of silent habits. On the day following, he was properly inducted into his new appointment. At four o'clock he writes to Mrs. Chalmers:—

"I have got the admission over. It was a pretty formidable thing. There were three chairs put in the middle passage before the pulpit. I was placed in the middle one, and Sir Henry Moncrieff and Dr. Adamson on each side of me. I had to stand during a pretty long address. In coming out I stood at the door, and had to shake hands with the people. An immense number I had to do this with; and sometimes I got three hands in my loaf at once."

On the Sunday following he was introduced to the regular services of his church by Sir Henry Moncrieff; and in the afternoon "preached an hour and a quarter" to an immense crowd. On the Monday he received two-and-twenty calls, eighteen on the Tuesday, and on Wednesday he missed a great number by contriving to be out. In this way did his Glasgow life begin.

His popularity from the first was unparalleled. Yet he does not appear to have taken very kindly to his situation. The intrusions and interruptions to which he was liable, contrasted unfavourably in his mind with the pleasing and regular tranquillity of his former parish. In a letter written on the 29th of July, to an old clerical neighbour, he says :—

"I can give you no satisfaction whatever as to my liking or not liking Glasgow. Were I to judge by my present feelings, I would say that I dislike it most violently; but the present state of my mind is not a fair criterion—at a distance from my family, and in a land of strangers; and though beset with polite attentions, feeling that there is positively nothing in them all to replace those warmer and kindlier enjoyments which friendship brings along with it. What is to come out of it I know not; but I may at least say, that all around me yet carries the aspect of desolation. . . . I have got about a hundred calls in the course of this week, and I foresee a deal of very strange work in the business of a Glasgow minister. What think you of my putting my name to two applications for licences to sell spirits, and two certificates of being qualified to follow out the calling of pedlars, in the course of yesterday?"

Then, in a subsequent letter, he remarks :—

"This, sir, is a wonderful place; and I am half entertained and half provoked by some of the peculiarities of its people. The peculiarity which bears hardest upon me is the incessant demand they have upon all occasions for the personal attendance of the ministers.* They must have four to every funeral, or they do not think that it has been genteelly gone through. They must have one or more to all the committees of all the societies. They must fall in at every procession. They must attend examinations innumerable, and eat of the dinners consequent upon these examinations. They have a niche assigned to them in almost every public doing, and that niche must be filled up by them, or the doing loses all its solemnity in the eyes of the public. There seems to be a superstitious charm in the very sight of them, and such is the manifold officiality with which they are covered, that they must be paraded among all the meetings and all the institutions. I gave in to all this at first, but I am beginning to keep a suspicious eye upon these repeated demands ever since I sat nearly an hour in grave deliberation with a number of others upon a subject connected with the property of a corporation, and that subject was a gutter, and the question was whether it should be bought and covered up, or let alone and left to lie open. I am gradually separating myself from all this trash, and long to establish it as a doctrine that the life of a town minister should be what the life of a country minister might be, that is, a life of intellectual leisure, with the otium of literary pursuits, and his entire time disposable to the purposes to which the Apostles gave themselves."

Perhaps the question as to the propriety of closing up the gutter did not, as a sanitary consideration, merit the profound contempt with which Chalmers seemed disposed to treat it, but yet the reader will probably agree with him in thinking that the local authorities might have managed the affair without requiring the sanction or opinion of the minister.

Towards the end of October, Chalmers was rejoined by his good lady, and entered with her upon a house at a rent of 75*l.* a-year. He now began to be a little more settled, or resigned to his position, though his letters are still filled with continual complaints respecting the vast amount of secular business to which he was expected to attend. All the public institutions, such as hospitals, almshouses, and the various other charities for the poor, were left in great part to the minister's management and superintendency. He indeed declares at length that "one must signalize himself by resisting every established practice, or spend a heartless, hard, driving, distracting, and wearing-out life among the bustle of unministerial work, and no less unministerial company." He does not know "what it may come to," but perceives that he shall not be right till he has got himself emancipated from the "multiplied drudgery" of these unprofessional avocations. This emancipation once effected, he is willing to admit that Glasgow would be a highly interesting field for the employment of his powers; that there is "much kindness and much principle" in the place; and that the good which is to be done, and the good which might be done, are in reality incalculable. It was from a desire to devote himself more sufficiently to the accomplishment of such good that he was so urgent to be delivered from the secular employments which so largely, and often needlessly, occupied his time.

In the course of the winter Chalmers was somewhat indisposed from a touch of the lumbago—a circumstance which we mention for the sake of introducing the following characteristic extract :—

"I have got many recipes for it," says he; "and the honest folks of Glasgow have been pouring in such a multitude of specifics, that had I taken the one half of them, I should not have been able to crawl out for six weeks. Among the rest, my beadle, John, told me of a wright, an acquaintance of his, who had been greatly afflicted with the same complaint, and had a cure to propose. I desired him to call between one and two o'clock; when in he came, a fat well-conditioned-looking person, and proposed a blister round the whole amplitude of my back, where the disease is situated. This I begged leave to decline; and have since been entertained with the mention of others in the shape of pills, and external applications of hartshorn, and plasters of mustard, and rubbings of turpentine, and triplicate coverings of flannel, and last, though not least, a process of ironing, with as great heat as was consistent with the feelings of the patient."

Out of such a diversity of prescriptions, Chalmers found it difficult to select any; and so wisely left the thing to nature, and in a short time had the satisfaction to find that he was well.

In the meantime the popularity of his preaching had produced a certain effect upon the heads of Glasgow University. It was a shrewd remark of the Bishop of Drowsydumlie, that when a man has gained a little celebrity of his own he may reasonably expect to be favoured with a few honorary distinctions. In conformity with this rule, on the 21st of February, 1816, the Senate of the University conferred on Chalmers the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Shortly afterwards he was elected by the Presbytery of Glasgow as one of its representatives in the General Assembly. When the Assembly met in Edinburgh in the month of May, Chalmers made a forcible speech in favour of the abolition of pluralities. In reference to this speech, Lord Jeffrey is reported to have said, "I know not what it is, but there is something altogether remarkable about that man. It reminds me more of what one reads of as the effect of the eloquence of Demosthenes than anything I ever heard." After this, Chalmers was appointed to preach before the Lord High Commissioner, "at his Grace's particular desire."

"At so early an hour as nine o'clock in the morning," says Dr. Hanna, "the crowd began to gather in front of the High Church, which, long ere the doors were opened, was manifestly greater than any church could contain, so that when entrance at length was given, in one tremendous rush, hazardous to all and hurtful to many, pews and passages were densely filled. It was with the greatest difficulty that the commissioner, the judges, and the magistrates reached their allotted seats."

Chalmers took for his text on this occasion the following passage from the Psalms:—"When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained, what is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" His discourse was an example of the most striking eloquence. He sent his imagination like a comet through the regions of immensity, and constrained it to take note in its vast wanderings of the grand extent and splendours of the universe. He bade his listeners contemplate the vastness and the multitude of the unnumbered worlds, which stand like illuminated temples in the wide desert grounds of space, and shine in everlasting testimony of the power and the majesty of God. From the sun in his morning glory to the feeblest star that glimmers at the outposts of creation, he took a survey of the firmament, and reckoned up the huge contents which form the sum of created things. And what, (said he,) in comparison with this boundless spectacle, is the significance of man? How pale his littleness, how immeasurably diminished is the pride of his pretensions! He is as the dust upon the balance that weigheth the continents of matter, or as the frail and perishable leaf that falls lonely in the forest. It is but a faint similitude, but yet one which the imperfections of human thought may excuse us in employing, should we say, that the extended universe would sustain no greater diminution of its glories, were the globe which we inhabit and all that it inherits to be dissolved, than the grandeur of the forest in its summer foliage would suffer by the dropping of a single leaf. Then turning to the infidel objection, that upon a theatre so comparatively narrow, and for a race so insignificant as that of man, it were inconsistent with the Divine greatness to lavish such high and distinguishing attentions as Christianity ascribes to it, he hurled argument after argument in refutation of that blasphemy, with such rapidity and potency that the attention of the congregation was stretched to the very limits of its capability, so that when the preacher made a pause at the summing up, "a sort of sigh, as if for breath, was perceptible throughout the house."

Pursuing his theme, after such a pause, he went on to show that if the magnitude of the wonders which astronomical science has revealed had put the infidel in possession of the argument against which he was contending, the inquisitive spirit of man, which finds out so many inventions, had not the less yielded him a discovery that disarms it of its whole effect. If the telescope has led us to see a system in every star, the microscope has taught us to behold a world in every atom. If, when contemplated from the high field of immensity, the globe whereon we live is but a speck in the large variety of creation, in the domain of the invisible and the minute there are evidences of life and activity so wonderful as to outmatch the astonishment which is excited by a contemplation of the magnitudes of space. The world is redeemed from its insignificance when we learn that in the leaves of every tree, and in the flowers of every garden, and in the waters of every stream, there are systems and communities of being as singular and perfect in their littleness as are the most stupendous objects of the universe in their vastness and their grandeur. And if beyond the discoverable bounds of material continuity there may still lie remote and unknown fields of wonder, so also, could we draw aside the mysterious curtain which hangs before our senses and perceptions, we might perhaps discern a region of as much astonishment in the kingdoms of the invisible—might see a universe within the compass of a point so small as to elude the keenest powers of the microscope, but where nevertheless the wonder-working Maker finds room for the exercise of His perfections. They, therefore, who conceive that God would not manifest such power and goodness on behalf of man as the New Testament represents, because he has so many other worlds to look after, think meanly of His attributes. They consider only His capacity for a general superintendence of His works, and leave out of remembrance the impressive proofs which the world affords of His minute and multiplied regard to an endless diversity of operations. Is it not a daring impiety thus to assign a limit to the unsearchable doings of the Almighty? Should a professed revelation from heaven inform me of a generous provision made for the benefit of a separate and fallen world, so wonderful that angels deemed to look into it, and the eternal Son had to assume our humanity to carry it into accomplishment, all I would ask for would be the evidence of the revelation; for whatsoever it might tell me of God's infinite condescension, in behalf of an inconsiderable province of His dominions, would be no more remarkable than what I see in numberless instances around me, and running through the whole of my recollections, and meeting me in every walk of observation; would be no more astonishing or strange than are the wonders which the microscope has unveiled to my admiration, and which are strewn around me with a profusion that baffles my attempts to comprehend it, but yet constrains me to behold in them "the evidence that there is no one portion of the universe of God too minute for His notice, nor too humble for the visitations of His care."

At the end of the burst of oratory which, in a condensed form, we have here endeavoured to reproduce, one who was present on the occasion says, "there ran through the congregation a suppressed but perfectly audible murmur of applause—an occurrence unprecedented in the course of the delivery of a sermon, but irresistible, in order to relieve our excited feelings."

Leaving Edinburgh, after this display, Chalmers refreshed himself by a six weeks' excursion in Fifeshire, and then returned to Glasgow. The principal intellectual labour to which he now addressed himself was the preparation of the famous "Astronomical Discourses," of which the sermon in Edinburgh was one, and the first of which had been delivered in the Tron Church in the previous November. In January, 1817, these discourses were published, and immediately obtained almost everywhere the applauses of the public. Hazlitt said of them:—"These sermons ran like wild-fire through the country, were the darlings of watering-places, were laid in the windows of inns, and were to be met with in all places of public resort." He adds that he once spent a very delightful morning in reading them, "without quitting the shade of an apple-tree," in the orchard of the inn at Burford Bridge. In ten weeks 6,000 copies were disposed of, and the demand still exhibited no symptom of decline. Nine editions were issued within the year, and by that time nearly 20,000 copies were in circulation. Scott's "Tales of my Landlord" had been published about a month before, and the two works, in regard to sale, seemed to run for a whole twelve-month in competition with each other. This exceeding popularity was no doubt in great part owing to the circumstance that the book was the first volume of modern sermons which, in any eminent degree, united religious earnestness with literary graces. It thus won the admiration of a multitude of readers who would have been repulsed by an ordinary volume of serious dissertations. The scientific knowledge which they display is nowise very considerable, nor are the arguments they contain always of a character the most convincing; but the blaze of rhetoric is vehement and often grand, and the impression which they make on a first perusal is one of astonishing intellectual power. As logical and literary compositions they have undoubtedly been overrated; and as a vindication of the truths of Christianity, they form rather an ambitious, than a successful or complete performance. The main objection to revealed religion which they endeavour to refute is one which hardly needs the refutation, since it has, in reality, never been seriously entertained by the class of intellects to which the discourses are professedly addressed. The great merit of these discourses is one that is solely oratorical: they are elaborate displays of verbal eloquence, brilliant and vigorous appeals to the imagination, the fancy, the passions, and the sentiment of veneration; and while they are certainly calculated to produce a dazzling and impressive effect upon either listener or reader, they are very imperfectly adapted to convince or confound the sceptic. In point of style they are showy, high-wrought, and irregular, with a tendency at times to run into bombast. They have no simplicity, no ease, no directness: everything is amplified and reiterated to the uttermost; the phraseology is often ponderous and inelegant, and there is a constant and undue elaboration, accompanied by a vehemence that frequently transcends the bounds of taste. Yet, in spite of many defects, there is a great charm in these discourses—the charm of earnestness, of energy, and fervour—the fascination and the power that belong to the utterances of genius.

While the Astronomical Discourses were in the height of their first celebrity, Chalmers received and accepted invitations to preach in London. He appeared in the great city at a time of strong political excitement, but nevertheless attracted the most extraordinary attention. Peers, statesmen, clergy of the established church, men of business, ladies of fashion—people indeed of every description, thronged to see and hear him. Fêted by Wilberforce, eulogised by Canning, followed everywhere by crowds excited into the most wide-eyed admiration, Chalmers became unwittingly the foremost lion of the metropolis. He came like some foreign wonder, with strange speech and singularity of aspect, and with his marvellous eloquence won the homage and astonishment of all who came within its influence. The Countess of Elgin said she saw Canning melted into tears; and that amiable and able statesman himself declared that he had heard no such preaching before in England.

Overwhelmed with the weight of his popularity, but nowise dazzled or elated by it, Chalmers abruptly quitted London after his triumph; and after a tour of some weeks through Wales and the north of England, in company with Mrs. Chalmers and a friend, he returned again to Glasgow, where concerns of some difficulty awaited him. He continued to be much perplexed by the incessant demands which the secular affairs already mentioned made upon his time; and growing at length absolutely weary of them, he determined to make a bold effort to get effectually delivered from such vexations. The reader will remember the debate about the gutter; and we have now to bring before him another somewhat similar deliberation. A number of the gravest city ministers, and some of the wisest of the city merchants, were one day summoned to consider whether the inmates of a certain hospital should be served with "ox-head broth or pork broth." Opinions differed, and the debate waxed warm, when it was at length determined that the matter should be settled by an actual trial of the relative merits of the particular preparations. A quantity of both sorts of broth was thereupon produced, and each deliberator tasted, and gave a vote according to his preference. The sapient decision that resulted was—"That henceforth there should be served sometimes the one kind of broth and sometimes the other;" a very wonderful exemplification of the civic faculty for solving problems of perplexity! In matters of this sort, and in endless others of a similar solemnity, Chalmers resolved to take no further part. Private remonstrances having failed to relieve him sufficiently of these engagements, he took counsel with himself, and, to the astonishment of his congregation, made the grievance the subject of discussion in the pulpit. His text, as his biographer remarks, was appropriate and ominous: "Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables." He delivered two very animated discourses, vindicating the sanctity of the ministerial calling, and claiming for the clergy the right of exemption from all unnecessary secularities, to the end that they might have a proper leisure for the prosecution of their authentic intellectual and spiritual pursuits. He drew a vivid picture of his present harassed situation, and announced his intention of henceforth abstaining from all such concerns as did not actually belong to his clerical avocation. These sermons caused a considerable stir, and the report of them went as far as Stirling, where an important ministerial charge then happened to be vacant, and was pressingly offered to Dr. Chalmers. As the Glasgow people could not think of losing him, they readily assented to secure him in future from all the secular interruptions he complained of, and proposed such further regulations for his comfort as induced him to remain.

It is not to be presumed, however, that he took no interest in such institutions and arrangements as had a moral and religious object. He assiduously visited all the houses in his parish, where the population amounted to about 11,000; he devised plans for increasing the activity and usefulness of the elders; and was foremost in organizing an entirely new system of local Sunday-schools. Into any account of the management of these schools we cannot enter; but there is rather an amusing anecdote connected with them, which Dr. Hanna has brought forward, and, for the sake of a little variety, we are disposed to insert it here. Mr. James Thompson, at that time a young man, and evidently a very shrewd one, was one of the leading teachers. At some of their meetings—where, with the Doctor present, every one was at liberty to make suggestions—it was discussed whether or not punishment ought to be resorted to in a Sabbath school. One Mr. Stow was very strenuous in condemning its introduction; Mr. Thompson was rather inclined the other way. Among other strong cases, Mr. Stow related the story of a boy who had been so restless, idle, and mischievous, that he was afraid he would have to turn him out of the school, when the thought occurred to him to give the boy an office. He accordingly put all the candles of the school-room under his care; and from that hour he was an altered boy, and became a diligent scholar.

"An opportunity," says Mr. Thompson, "soon occurred of trying my way of it also. A school composed of twenty or thirty boys, situated in the east end of the parish, had become so unruly and unmanageable, that it had beaten off every teacher who had gone to it. The society did not know what to do with it, and the Doctor asked me if I would go out and try to reduce it to order. I was not very fond of the task, but consented. I went out the next sabbath, and told the boys, whom I found all assembled, that I had heard a very bad account of them, that I had come out for the purpose of doing them good, that I must have peace and attention, that I would submit to no disturbance, and that, in the first place, we must begin with prayer. They all stood up, and I commenced, and certainly did not forget the injunction,—"Watch and pray." I had not proceeded two sentences when one little fellow gave his neighbour a tremendous dig in the side; I instantly stepped forward, and gave him a sound cuff on the side of the head. I never spoke a word, but stepped back, concluded the prayer, taught for a month, and never had a more orderly school. The case was reported at one of our meetings. The Doctor enjoyed it exceedingly, and taking up my instance and comparing it with Mr. Stow's, he concluded that the question of punishment or non-punishment stood just where it was, inasmuch as it had been found that the judicious appointment of a candle-snuffer-general, and a good cuff on the lug, had been about equally efficacious."

The Doctor's method of household visitation was somewhat characteristic and peculiar. To visit every family in a population of 11,000 within any reasonable space of time, required no inconsiderable expedition of procedure. His calls, therefore, were generally very short and cursory. A few questions were asked regarding the state of the family as to education and church attendance, a few kindly observations were made, and Chalmers then passed on to the next house, leaving it to the elder who accompanied him to announce that a discourse in some neighbouring school-room or other convenient place would be delivered on an approaching week-day evening, for the benefit of the inhabitants of the district. A pious old widow, on one occasion, solicited the Doctor to stay and offer up a prayer. His answer was,—"If I were to pray in every house I enter, it would take me ten years to get through the work." The work was certainly anything but easy: the wynds were often close and filthy, the stairs steep and narrow, the houses dirty and ill-ventilated—yet buoyantly and resolutely the Doctor went along, cheering at times the flagging spirit of his companion. "Well," said he, in one of these expeditions, looking over his shoulder upon his elder, who was toiling after him up a long and weary stair,—"Well, what do you think of this kind of visiting?" Engrossed with the labours of the ascent, the elder said he had not been thinking much about it. "Oh! I know quite well," rejoined Chalmers, "that if you were to speak your mind, you would say that we are putting the butter very thinly upon the bread." This was no doubt actually the case; but then it may be safely affirmed, that a little butter is decidedly better than none at all. "Till Dr. Chalmers came to Glasgow," says one who knew the city well, "parochial Christian influence was a mere name;"—all the humbler classes of the people were left alone, and, as a consequence, grew up for the most part indifferent to religion.

It was, however, in his public ministrations that Chalmers was most remarkably distinguished. It needed no small diligence and study to prepare the stirring and elaborate orations which he delivered from week to week. The physical exertion also required for their delivery was anything but slight and inconsiderable. Every service was attended by an immense crowd; whether on the sabbath or a week-day, it made but little difference. To give some general impression of the kind of scene which a Glasgow church exhibited whenever he was expected to preach, we could not perhaps, do better than quote the testimony of Dr. Wardlaw. It appears there was a regular service in the Tron Church on Thursday mornings, which was taken in rotation by all the ministers of the city; once in two months the turn devolved on Chalmers; and it is to his displays in this relation that the subjoined description principally applies.

"To see a place of worship," says Dr. Wardlaw, "crammed above and below, on a Thursday forenoon, during the busiest hours of the day, with fifteen or sixteen hundred hearers, and these of all descriptions of persons, in all descriptions of professional occupation, the busiest as well as those who had most leisure on their hands,—those who had least to spare taking care so to arrange their business engagements previously as to make time for the purpose,—all pouring in through the wide entrance at the side of the Tron steeple, half an hour before the time of service, to secure a seat, or content, if too late for this, to occupy, as many did, standing-room,—this was indeed a novel and strange sight. . . . Suppose the congregation thus assembled—pews filled with sitters, and aisles, to a great extent, with standers. They wait in eager expectation. The preacher appears. The devotional exercises having been gone through with unaffected simplicity and earnestness, the entire assembly set themselves for the treat, with feelings very diverse in kind, but all eager and intent. There is a hush of dead silence. The text is announced, and he begins. Every countenance is up—every eye bent with fixed intentness on the speaker. As he kindles, the interest grows. Every breath is held—every cough suppressed—every fidgety movement settled—every one, riveted himself by the spell of the impassioned and entrancing eloquence, knows how sensitively his neighbour will resent the very slightest disturbance. Then, by-and-by, there is a pause. The speaker stops to gather breath—to wipe his forehead—to adjust his gown—and purposely too, and wisely, to give the audience, as well as himself, a moment or two of relaxation. The moment is embraced—there is free breathing—suppressed coughs get vent—postures are changed—there is a universal stir, as of persons who could not have endured the constraint much longer—the preacher bonds forward—his hand is raised—all is again hushed. The same stillness and strain of unrelaxed attention is repeated, more intent still, it may be, than before, as the interest of the subject and of the speaker advance. And so, for perhaps four or five times in the course of a sermon, there is the relaxation and the 'at it again,' till the final winding-up."

What does not speak much for the decency of a Scottish congregation, we are told in addition, that the moment the discourse was ended, the closing prayer was completely drowned by the "hurried rush of large numbers" to the door.

If we had not known it before, we should have seen enough to convince us in the case of Dr. Chalmers, that a man may easily have too much of popularity. To a person of any sense or sensibility it becomes an absolute bore to be continually followed with salvos of applause, or outbursts of curiosity. It is no comfort to him to be the observed of all beholders. With a vain and conceited man it may be altogether different; but a man of common modesty utterly dislikes to be the object of popular celebration or éclat. Like a true saint, he would not willingly be canonized before his time. Chalmers, though a man nowise insensible to approbation, appears to have been frequently disgusted by the unseemly hustle and indecorum of the multitudes that crowded to worship in the train of his celebrity. He had, besides, some singular experiences sufficiently calculated to depress whatever satisfaction he might derive from the circumstance of popularity. One of these may be here related. One Sunday evening, all the seats were occupied before the commencement of the service; but a broad passage running through the area of the church, from the main inner door to the pulpit, was intended to be kept vacant for the better ventilation of the place. As soon, therefore, as the pews which entered it were filled, the door was bolted from within. All the other passages above and below were shortly crowded to overflowing. A dense mass of people was by this time congregated in the lobby, many of whom observed, through the windows of a partition wall, that the middle passage was still empty. They immediately became clamorous for admission, and there was soon a loud and tumultuous knocking at the door. Positive orders had been given to keep the passage clear, so that the door-keepers paid no regard to the demands of the assailants. When the bell commenced, the clamour and importunity of the crowd increased, and from intense pressure the door began to creak. The bell ceased. The headie entered the pulpit with the Bible. The Doctor entered from the vestry. At this moment there was a crash at the passage-door; crash followed crash, mingled with the screams and exclamations of terrified and much disordered females. The door was yielding. The door-keepers rushed to prevent it from being forced in, but being unable to withstand the pressure, they presently retreated. The door gave way with a thundering noise, one of the leaves being wrested from its hinges and trampled under foot. The rush was tremendous; and in an instant the whole vacant space in front of the pulpit was crammed from the one end to the other. A countryman in a pew, who, while waiting for the beginning of the service, had fallen fast asleep, being awakened by the noise, suddenly started up, and lookingly stupidly for a moment or two at the crowd, exclaimed, loud enough to be heard by all around him,—"Gude guide us! they say the mon canna speak when the trance [the passage] is fu'; he'll no' speak muckle the night." The whole church for some minutes was a scene of the greatest disorder. Chalmers was greatly discomposed, and on rising to begin the service he administered a severe rebuke to the invaders. On walking home with Dr. Wardlaw, he expressed a strong antipathy at being always followed by such crowds. "I preached," said he, "the same sermon in the morning; and for the purpose of preventing the annoyance of such a throng, I intimated that I should preach it again in the evening;" and with a sort of ingenuous guilelessness, he asked Wardlaw if he had ever tried that plan? Wardlaw laughed outright at the inquiry. "No, no, my good friend," replied he, "there are but very few of us that are under the necessity of having recourse to the use of means for getting a thin audience." Chalmers enjoyed the joke, and evidently felt, though he modestly disowned the compliment. It may be perceived, however, that the highest celebrity has its drawbacks. The cup of popular applause, even when it does not intoxicate or inflate a man beyond himself, occasions at last an actual weariness and vexation to the heart. Great, on the contrary, are the uses of obscurity. Chalmers, indeed, became convinced of this, and has borne his wise and enlightened testimony against a dizzying popularity. "There is," said he, after many years' experience of its vanity,—"there is a high and far-sounding popularity, which is indeed a most worthless article, felt by all who have it most to be greatly more oppressive than gratifying—a popularity of stare, and pressure, and animal heat, and a whole tribe of other annoyances which it brings around the person of its unfortunate victim—a popularity which rifles home of its sweets, and by elevating man above his fellows places him in a region of desolation, where the intimacies of human fellowship are unfelt, and where he stands a conspicuous mark for the shafts of malice, and envy, and detraction—a popularity which, with its head among storms and its feet on the treacherous quicksands, has nothing to lull the agonies of its tottering existence but the hosannas of a drivelling generation."

After four years' residence in Glasgow, as minister of the Tron Church, Chalmers undertook the charge of the parish of St. John, where a new church had been recently erected. Here he organized an association of day-schools for the education of the children of the parishioners; understanding well that in order to bring the influences of Christianity to bear efficiently upon the people, they must be trained intellectually and morally to comprehend the truth and applicability of its doctrines. He also entered into arrangements and experiments of a novel character in regard to the pauperism of the parish. It is well known that Chalmers was totally opposed to any legal assessment for the poor; and in St. John's parish he endeavoured to carry out a system of pauper-management based solely upon charitable subscriptions and the ordinary contributions collected, as in all Scottish parishes, at the church-doors. It appears, however, that he only partially succeeded; for though the supplies thus obtained might, under ordinary circumstances, be sufficient to meet the most urgent cases of distress, they failed to provide for those extraordinary emergencies which arise out of the depressions and fluctuations to which trading and manufacturing industry in large towns is liable. General distress of this kind, indeed, his scheme did not undertake to deal with; and he thought it might be met by parochial subscriptions for the purpose: a plan which would in reality throw the burden of poverty entirely upon the resources of benevolent individuals, leaving the selfish and the indifferent altogether free and undisturbed in their possessions. Admitting, as we do, the truth and soundness of many of Chalmers's objections to a poor-law, we are yet unable to perceive how the destitution of the country can be otherwise effectually provided for. We agree with him in thinking that a poor-law, in the nature of things, is a curse and an abomination; but we are not the less persuaded that it is a necessity and an indispensability, in the confused and artificial state of society in which we live at present. Whenever social life in England shall be brought into exact conformity with the true and eternal principles on which society should be based, there is a probability that pauperism, in its worst forms at least, will disappear, and thus a legal provision in its behalf will no longer be required. Till then, it is the tax and the penalty which society has to bear as the consequence of deviation from the unchangeable laws of Nature.

While occupied more or less constantly with the duties of his parish, Chalmers continued from time to time to send forth a variety of publications. He wrote on the question of Pauperism in the Edinburgh Review; issued a series of pamphlets on the "Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns;" and published some further collections of sermons, one of which was the admirable volume "On the Application of Christianity to the Commercial and Ordinary Affairs of Life." This appeared in 1820. In 1822, Chalmers made a tour through most of the counties of England in search of information touching the state and prospects of the Poor-Law Administration. This tour is described in a series of letters to Mrs. Chalmers, rapidly and somewhat dashing thrown off, though relating mainly to his personal movements from day to day. On this occasion Chalmers was introduced to various persons of note and influence in the country. He seems to have greatly enjoyed his visits to some of the English clergy, and much admired the comfort and elegance of their parsonages. One of his calls upon a clergyman, however, had something rather awkward in it. He went with Mr. Cunningham of Harrow, to visit "Mr. Vivian, the rector of a parish about eleven miles from London." "I wished to see him," said Chalmers, "from the very striking and peculiar testimony that he gave before a Committee of the House of Commons on the Poor Laws. He is gruff and outspoken, and very decisive in his opinions; and one of his earliest salutations to me was, that he was rejoiced to see a man from Scotland on the subject, for so much nonsense had come in upon them from that country through the Edinburgh Review. Poor Mr. Cunningham knew not how to look. We sat about two hours in conversation with him, and I was much interested by his views. When Mr. C. went off for the gig, I told Mr. Vivian that it would be a want of frankness and fairness in me not to disclose myself as the unfortunate author of the articles in question. This, on the other hand, confused him not a little, but we really got upon better terms after this éclaircissement; and having agreed to exchange publications, we parted very good friends."

Chalmers lived altogether eight years in Glasgow; and though he received several invitations to other more easy and agreeable appointments, he declined them all, till, in 1822, he was solicited to accept the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of St. Andrew's. This was a situation so much in accordance with his tastes, and offered him so much leisure for schemes of authorship which he had long had in contemplation, that he gladly and promptly complied with the solicitation. On the 18th of January, 1823, he was formally and unanimously elected to the office. The Glasgow people were greatly indisposed to part with him, and many of them manifested towards him a certain coldness of behaviour on first hearing of the intended separation; though a general cordiality was re-established before he left. On Wednesday, the 5th of November, he laid before the Presbytery of Glasgow his letter of resignation, which, after many expressions of affectionate regret from different members, the Presbytery was pleased to accept. On the following Sunday, he preached his farewell sermon in St. John's Church, to one of the densest congregations that was probably ever assembled. The church was calculated to hold about 1,700 persons, but more than double that number somehow managed to crowd into it. It was absolutely taken by storm; and such was the confusion that prevailed from the eagerness to obtain admission, that a party of soldiers had to be called out from the barracks to maintain order. No church, perhaps, was ever thronged by such a mob of church-goers. One can readily believe Dr. Hanna, when he says, "It was no gentle or very sabbath frame of spirit that prevailed." However, there was a perfect hush when Chalmers rose to speak. His address, as usual, was passionate and brilliant; and he closed his ministry with a warm expression of esteem and gratefulness for the manifold kindnesses and honour that had attended him from its beginning to its termination.

On the 14th of November, Chalmers was regularly installed in his appointment at St. Andrew's. On the 17th, he delivered his introductory lecture; and on the evening of the same day, a number of his friends from Glasgow entertained at dinner the two Principals, all the Professors of the University, the ministers of the city, and a number of gentlemen from the neighbourhood. "Thus gracefully," says his biographer, "did Glasgow surrender to St. Andrew's what St. Andrew's had originally bestowed."

* Here, for the present, we must wait for further information. In another article, which we hope to write when Dr. Hanna shall have published his concluding volume, we expect to finish our cursory and second-hand biography.

"Six Views in the Oasis of Siwah," drawn on the spot, by Mr. Bayle St. John. These views are intended to illustrate and accompany the interesting "Narrative of a Journey to the Oasis of Siwah," which we had occasion to review some time ago. They are executed very effectively and carefully, in tinted lithography, and accompanied by an excellent map of the route from Alexandria. Besides being valuable as accompaniments to the above work, they are very desirable to those who desire to complete a series of Egyptian views, or even as picturesque varieties for the portfolio or drawing-room.

"A Selection from the Poems and Dramatic Works of Theodore Körner." By the translator of the "Nibelungen-Treasure." A romantic interest hangs over the brief but eventful life of Theodore Körner, the soldier-poet of Germany. His bravery, patriotism, and early, but glorious death—the enthusiastic devotion to a noble cause which was displayed in the actions of his life no less than in the productions of his pen—have combined to give him a distinguished place among the pure and chivalrous spirits whom the world delights to honour. He was born at Dresden in 1791, and fell, bravely fighting for his fatherland against a foreign invader, on the 28th of August, 1813. Before the commencement of his military career, he had distinguished himself as a successful dramatist, and had been appointed poet to the Court Theatre at Vienna. Several of his plays are now presented in an English dress, by a lady already favourably known as an elegant translator, who has boldly grappled with the difficulties of the undertaking, and has succeeded in producing a very interesting volume. Many of the martial strains for which Körner was so famous, and which are full of the true Tyrtæan fire, are also, we may specially remark, rendered with great ease and spirit.

AMERICAN PURITANS.

IN an American paper, a copy is given of some of the early Blue Laws of Connecticut, many of which, especially upon points of religion, are of a most singular character. Thus:—

"No one shall run of a sabbath day, or walk in his garden or elsewhere, except reverently to and from church.

"No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep houses, cut hair, or shave, on the sabbath day.

"No woman shall kiss her child on sabbath or fasting days.

"No one shall read common prayer, keep Christmas or saint's day, make minced pies, dance, play cards, or play on any instrument of music, except the drum, the trumpet, and the Jew's-harp.

"No one shall court a maid without first obtaining the consent of her parents; five pounds for the first offence, ten for the second, and for the third, imprisonment during the pleasure of the court."

THE ENGLISH IN AUSTRALIA.

Less than two hundred and fifty years ago Australia was entirely unknown to Europe. Whether the great South Sea broke round the point of the Antarctic Pole, or whether the immense space left blank upon the maps was occupied by a continent or an archipelago of islands, was a question discussed among speculative men. Nothing was certain—all was left to imagination. Fancy, therefore, could claim this region as her peculiar empire, and every theorist gave to that chaos, without form or void, a shape and colour of his own. Now and then, however, some navigator penetrated into the mysterious ocean in search of facts to substantiate the creations of fable, and occasionally a point of land, faintly discerned in the distance, rewarded his adventure.

A long-troubled question had been settled. The Western World was discovered, and the remotest waters of the Atlantic were visited by the mariners of Europe. The theorists then turned to the south; many a strange fabric was piled up amid the Antarctic snows, and fancy, like the mirage, painted on the vacancy lands and peoples unlike the rest of nature. At length, about the year 1606, Torres passed the Straits which bear his name, and prepared a way for others. Ten years later, the Dutch sent a ship to explore the South Sea, and she fell in with the coast of Australia. After them the English ranged the mysterious shores of New Holland, and gradually, as mariner after mariner opened the scene, the figure of the mighty island emerged from gloom, and was traced distinctly on our maps. New Zealand and Van Diemen's Land were also discovered, though there still exist, among the snowy deserts of the Southern Pole, territories shut out by the severities of nature from the unappeasable curiosity of man.

But, although the enormous island was known to the world at that period, the date of our first intercourse with it is recent. For ages Australia lay in its original condition, untrodden by the feet of white men. In 1770, Captain Cook, immortalized as a minister of civilization, observed on the eastern coast a harbour whose shores were covered with a variety of beautiful plants. He called the place Botany Bay. To him it was endeared by associations of delight; to us its name is repulsive, as attached to a sink of crime. After this voyage accounts of the unknown southern land were circulated through Europe. It was at this unhappy period that the oligarchy of England, blinded by selfish passion, abandoned her interests and lost the brightest jewel in her empire. The American colonies, revolting under oppression, proclaimed their independence; and the mother-state, having cast from her bosom the best child she had nurtured, went forth again to seek a new home for her offspring in the waste places of the world.

An Australian settlement was projected, for the reception of convicted criminals. An expedition was at once equipped. It consisted of two vessels of war, six transports, and three store-ships. On board were 506 male and 192 female convicts; 160 marines with their officers, and the usual complement of crews. Provisions, tools, implements and materials, were provided. Burdened with its load of crime, the squadron spread sail for the "Unknown Southern Land." The departure of a convict ship was a doubly melancholy occasion when the outcasts were sent for the first time to that remote and solitary region, though it is always a saddening spectacle. The theme has been little wrought, because too little appreciated, by the poet; but T. K. Hervey, who infused sentiment and sweetness into all he writes, has touched it in language so pure and beautiful that it would lend a grace to any page:—

"Onward she glides amid ripple and spray
Over the waters, away and away!
Bright as the visions of youth ere they part,
Passing away like a dream of the heart!
Who, as the beautiful pageant sweeps by—
Music around her, and sunshine on high—
Pauses to think, amid glitter and glow,
Oh, there be hearts that are breaking below!

"Look to the waters, asleep on their breast
Seems not the ship like an island of rest?
Bright and alone as the shadowy main,
Like a heart-cherish'd home on some desolate plain!
Who—as she smiles in the silvery light,
Spreading her wings on the bosom of night,
Alone on the deep, as the moon in the sky,
A phantom of beauty—could deem with a sigh
That so lovely a thing is the mansion of sin,
And souls that are smitten lie bursting within!

"Who, as he watches her silently gliding,
Remembers that wave after wave is dividing
Bosoms that sorrow and guilt could not sever, Hearts that are parted and broken for ever!"

The expedition reached the shores of Australia in January, 1788. A sailor, named Jackson, discovered through a gap in the line of cliffs the magnificent harbour named in honour of its discoverer. The situation was preferred to that of Botany Bay; the boats were manned, and the people stepped out of them, literally under the shadow of a forest. All was wild and silent. The tents were pitched, an encampment was arranged, the axe and spade were set to work, and the English name and nation were for the first time established in Australasia. On that distant shore, then clothed with dreary woods, there now stands the capital of a great colony, a prosperous city, embellished with beautiful structures, populous and rich, and stamped with the impress of civilization.

Scarcely sixty-two years, therefore, have elapsed since the birth of a colony now outrivalling, in the rapid growth of its importance, every other in the world. But New South Wales did not spring—it struggled into prosperity. The early years of its existence were full of trouble. The qualities of the soil were not understood; the crops were scanty; the convicts were idle and greedy; the military were insubordinate; supplies arrived at distant intervals, and the hopes of the settlers were depressed by the dread of famine. Scarcity and disease made havoc among them, and before four months had passed, a gallows cast its ill-omened shadow over the birth-place of Sydney. A youth, only seventeen years of age, stained the infant city with crime, and was cut off "in the land of promise" by the hands of the hangman. Another miserable creature, during a time of want, swallowed eight pounds of flour-cakes at a meal, and died of surfeit. Others, sharing the ignorance of more educated classes in England, conceived the idea of escape by travelling overland to China. They started on their journey, and were never more heard of. Probably they were killed by the natives; but possibly, also, some became domesticated among them, and relapsed into the savage state of life. Recently, it is well known, some sailors did so, on the coast above Moreton Bay.

The colony struggled for existence during many years. A settlement was founded at Norfolk island, to relieve Sydney from some of its convict population; but, in spite of every exertion, the century drew to a close while New South Wales was in the most unpromising condition. Deluded by dreams of sudden fortune, many spent their time in an unprofitable search for gold. One of the convicts, noticing the passion of his companions, resolved to profit by it. With a guinea and a brass buckle he manufactured a specimen of ore, and declared he had found it near the hills. The fraud was detected; instead of the reward he looked for, the forger received a flogging, and, afterwards committing a more serious offence, ended his life on the scaffold.

A contrast between the condition of the colony during the first years of its establishment with its present state, displays a remarkable result. Four years after the landing at Port Jackson, the public stock consisted of one aged stallion, two colts, sixteen cows, two calves, one ram, fifty ewes, six lambs, one boar, fourteen sows, and twenty-two pigs. At Paramatta, near Sydney, there were three hundred acres cultivated with Indian corn, forty-four with wheat, six with barley, one with oats, four with vines, and eighty-six laid out in gardens, besides seventeen belonging to the soldiers. In all, therefore, there were a hundred and eighteen animals fed, and four hundred and fifty-eight acres tilled. Before 1835, about seventeen million pounds of wool had been shipped from New South Wales, which now contains about seven million sheep, more than a hundred thousand horses, nearly a million-and-a-half of cattle, and pigs beyond calculation. About thirty-three thousand sheep, and ten thousand cattle are slaughtered annually, producing more than 20,000 cwt. of tallow.

A hundred and eighty thousand acres are under cultivation. They produce nearly three million bushels of grain, and more than sixty thousand tons of potatoes, tobacco, and hay. From such small beginnings has New South Wales risen to this position. A sketch of its extent and resources may explain the rapid progress.

From the river Boyne, near Moreton Bay, on the north to the borders of South Australia, the coastline extends for more than sixteen hundred miles. It is indented by many safe and spacious harbours, and the mouths of some navigable streams. The colony is divided into twenty-one counties, with eighty post towns. Some are well-cultivated and lie along the borders of the sea, with ample means of intercommunication over rivers and highways. Others comprehend the barren ridges of the Blue Mountains, which, with other ranges, runs along the whole province at a distance varying from forty to a hundred miles from the shore. Others are situated beyond these, with spacious plains, affording some of the finest pasture in the world. Not a tenth of this extensive territory has yet been located. The surface of the country is varied. Peaks, in some places, aspire to the height of fifteen thousand feet, and reach the region of eternal snow; deep valleys sink between them, with immense levels, now dotted with cities and hamlets, and large cultivated tracts.

Many imagine Australia to be a land of pastures and corn-fields, unadorned with the graces of nature. Because it is a familiar name—because sheep-farming, shearing, and wool-packing chiefly contribute to its wealth—and because convict colonies have been established on its shores, it is placed beyond the limits of the romantic. But among the magnificent works of nature few excel in grandeur the scenes among the solitudes of the Australian Alps. The truth is, New South Wales is at present too remote for the traveller in search of landscapes. Steam will soon draw it nearer to us; though for many years it will only be in quest of wealth—of peace and comfort—that the emigrant will visit Sydney, its companion cities, and surrounding lands.

Its natural resources are great and varied. Timber, coal, and iron abound, with every means for rendering them the useful adornments of industry. The climate is mild, and the soil produces every useful grain and vegetable. To show how worthless, however, are all these gifts without a people to develop them, we may relate some incidents which occurred about twenty years ago. A gentleman in England found himself proprietor of an estate in Australia—such an estate as George Robins would have displayed superbly in an advertisement: twenty thousand acres of land in a ring fence; a hundred and fifty thousand pounds' worth of timber; inexhaustible veins of coal and iron. The fortunate possessor dreamed at once of a noble mansion, of a splendid park, of pleasure grounds, of game preserves, and a tenantry located in snug farm-houses. He visited his estate, and, like a new Alnaschar, shivered at atoms all his airy castles by one glance at the "nature of things."

He found millions of acres to be had for nothing, so he could not sell his property. He found no labourers, so he could not improve it. He found the timber safe enough; but it would cost fifteen thousand pounds to destroy it, and sums beyond calculation to bring it to market. No one would accept it at a gift. The coal and iron, while they were undisturbed, were harmless; but had they been worked by an army of miners from Staffordshire, all that could be done would be to throw them down the shaft again. Seventy miles from the sea, with no highways! There was enough of the metal to make a railroad; but no one would give in exchange for it all a single Birmingham spade.

Then, as to the mansion. Stone and timber were to be had for nothing; but every pane of glass, every grain of paint, every nail, every piece of furniture—coppers, carpets, and curtains alike—were to be brought from England at Hebrew prices. Besides, there were not enough masons, carpenters, glaziers, painters, or blacksmiths in New South Wales to finish such a mansion, so that was abandoned. But the park? So much was feasible, for the whole estate was a park. And the game preserves? They also were reasonable, for the kangaroos hopped in hundreds among the trees. As for the farmers and farm-houses, the whole fabric vanished like a dream. The reader, however, who may have been interested in the fortunes of this great proprietor need have no pity for him; he possessed already an ample competence, and, while myriads have nothing, we have no sympathy to spare for those who have enough.]

The soil produces an extraordinary variety of fruit. Apples, pears, plums, strawberries, cherries, raspberries, mulberries, medlars, apricots, peaches, nectarines, figs, grapes, melons, oranges, lemons, citrons, loquots, olives, pomegranates, guavas, and bananas, flourish in immense profusion. Peaches are so plentiful that they are cast in heaps to the pigs, and devoted also to the manufacture of a pleasant cyder.¹ Tobacco, of excellent quality, is produced, and the climate has proved favourable to silk, which may at some future period compete with that of China.

One curious fact in connexion with Australia is, that it produces so little indigenous vegetation useful as the food of man. There are roots, growing deep in the earth, which the women dig up; there are seeds, edible fungi, and nuts, poisonous when raw, but, when cooked, pleasant and nutritious. One of the greatest treasures to the natives is the acacia, producing large quantities of gum. In summer the swampy plains, where the tree is plentiful, are covered by the poor savages, eager to feast upon its tears. The dwellers on the coast are more luxurious; they occasionally revel on whale's blubber, and habitually live on the flesh of the kangaroo, on wild dogs, on seals on fish, and on the opossum. Emus, and many smaller birds, are also devoured as delicacies, while frogs are eaten as oysters are with us. Now, the imagination may revolt from such a feast, but we—in days of youthful daring—have ourselves eaten a frog, dressed by a cook of the south of France. It tasted like cold rabbit, and was not very much amiss. Muscles, and enormous grubs, enter also into the Australian list of dainties.

It is remarkable, therefore, that while Australia affords nourishment to every animal and every plant that has been introduced to her shores, she possesses so few of an useful kind native to her soil. But she is rich enough to be prosperous, and the energy of our countrymen at the present day displays a striking picture of her success. The population of New South Wales is now about 220,000, with a yearly increase of 10,000. Hundreds of miles of highway-road intersect the provinces in every direction. Steamers ply along the coast, coaches whirl along the roads, and steam engines, tended by industry, carry on the operations of several manufactures. All the colonies of Australia mainly depend, however, on the mother country for supplies of this sort. Every individual, in each of them, consumes on an average about seven guineas' worth of British manufactures. In a commercial point of view, therefore, we are more interested in the growth of our Australian colonies than in the success of any other among our numerous possessions.

If we look to Sydney, the capital of New South Wales, we shall there find a city rivalling many of her English sisters. It possesses one of the most safe and spacious harbours on the surface of the globe, is built on a regular and tasteful plan, and contains a population of nearly 60,000. Most of the streets run at right angles with each other. Public places are generally named after some benefactor of the place; but at the antipodes of England we find many memorials of her most familiar spots. There is Hyde Park, with its regular arrangement, its trim sward and broad walks for the stately promenaders, and there are the Woolloomooloo hills for less dignified and more romantic rambles.

Passing through the long straight streets leading from the harbour through the city, we find many buildings eminently characteristic of our civilization. There are forts mounted with heavy guns, custom-houses, warehouses, and hotels, where you have the satisfaction of paying well for your dinner. There are churches, theatres, hospitals; post, police, parcel, newspaper, insurance, and steam-packet offices; banks, colleges, distilleries, markets, asylums, and other buildings, all well supported by the wealth of Sydney. In some of the streets shops, dazzling as those of Oxford-street, display their stores. Omnibuses rattle to and fro full of well-dressed people, and cab ranks occupy their appointed stations. There is little, in fact, in the aspect of the city to distinguish it from an English sea-port town. Groups of aborigines, indeed, lounge at the corners, or, more, after a full meal, on the pavement. They work only when pressed by want. To give them money is to injure them; for, when enforced by necessity, they labour on the farms with diligence and skill. This proves that the great sage was wrong who, in theory, condemned this wandering family of the Papuan race to hopeless barbarism, declaring they could never be civilised. We agree with the poet, who has adopted a more humane and a more true philosophy:—

" True, though their souls all fiercer passions run—
These fiery ones, these children of the sun!
But gentler thoughts redeem the frenzied mood,
Repress but quenchless, hid but unsubdued!

(1) In the United States a finely-flavoured brandy is made from peaches.

Theirs is the spell of home, where'er they rove,
The maiden loves with all a maiden's love.
And the dark mother, as she rocks her boy,
Feels in her bosom all a mother's joy !¹

Gradually, therefore, we may hope that the face of nature in the human, as in the inanimate, creation in New South Wales, will be changed; and that the savage, subdued to civilization, will come from the gloom of his native woods and people the cities hereafter to fringe all the shores of the vast island.

Before leaving Sydney, let us mention that the press is active there. The Sydney Morning Herald, the Sydney Chronicle, the Atlas, Bell's Life in Sydney, the Daily Advertiser, the Sydney Guardian, and others, are regularly published, while the principal provincial towns support their own journal.²

There are three other English settlements in Australia.³ South Australia is the next in importance; it was founded in 1834, by a public company, and adjoins New South Wales. Its area is double that of the United Islands, and little less than that of France. The soil is fertile, and rich in minerals, the climate temperate and equable. Among the exportable commodities of the provinces are slate, coal, timber, valuable barks, gums, salt, cured fish, seals, sperm and black whale oil, wheat, flour, wool, hides, tallow, horns, &c., while the climate is favourable to wine. Flax, hemp, almonds, aniseed, bees' wax and honey, cheese for India and China, caraways, cochineal, coriander, dried fruits, hops, vegetable oils, olives, citrons, oranges, and silk, are embraced within the list of commodities. Though but a small portion of the territory has yet been reclaimed from its original state, the colony thrives well. Adelaide, its chief town, with a less English appearance than Sydney, wears the aspect of prosperity. A population of about 12,000 circulates in its spacious open streets, or throng on holidays the splendid promenade surrounding the suburbs. It was originally planned, perhaps, on too large a scale; but this fault is better than its opposite. Had London ever been planned at all, we should never have had the dens it now contains. It is now a city of patchwork, wearing the impress of many generations, with one form of fashion by the side of another, in inconceivable confusion.

From South Australia we transfer ourselves to Fremantle and Perth in the Swan River settlement, on the western coast. There was for the first time discovered, by a Dutchman,⁴ that rare bird upon the earth—a black swan. This marvel was, therefore, no longer a myth. Afterwards it was found that the country, wearing to the careless eye an unpromising appearance, was productive in a high degree. A company was formed in England to colonize Western Australia. They commenced in 1830, and have struggled to this day; but are now beginning to reap the harvest. The vine flourishes exuberantly near Perth. There is one in the government garden which, planted as a cutting, sent out shoots sixteen feet and a half long, in the second year, and yielded more than four hundredweight of grapes. Every agricultural experiment, indeed, which has been made with skill, and pursued with industry, has succeeded. Where the soil was once thought barren, rich corn lands, year after year, yield heavy crops of grain; orchards and plantations abound; farm houses, villas, and villages sprinkle the open country, and the towns increase steadily in size and trade. Labour is still scarce, though the growth of population has been more rapid in this than in any other settlement excepting South Australia. But here let us notice, what it is important to remember: in Australia, industry of the practical kind alone prospers. Tillers of the soil, hewers of wood, and drawers of water; builders of cities, ships, and dock-yards; artisans, and mechanics of every class, can find employment, with wages almost equal to those paid in New York. But gentle crafts avail little to their possessors. Musicians, artists, fancy-workers, schoolmasters—all these are disappointed in Australia. A few lively and thoughtful pens, indeed, are wanted among the colonists, to whom literature is a luxury. The ennobling influence of intellectual minds, acting through books and journals, would be welcome among them. With these exceptions—folks with filbert nails and white hands are far below par in those regions. At Port Essington, indeed, on the northern coast, commercial enterprise is principally needed. There, on a small peninsula, has been established a colony to attract the trade of the Indian seas. The products of the Oriental Archipelago are carried thither in native bargues, which frequently visit the Australian coast in search of the sea-slug. The place is less healthy than the eastern and southern shores; but civilization actually purifies the climate, and the community of Port Essington, in the dawn of their prosperous existence, have already felt the action of industry on the soil. In these four settlements are collected a numerous population, increasing yearly by a large number, consuming the manufactures of Great Britain, receiving her unprovided population, and thus contributing doubly to her welfare. It is calculated that we sent to New South Wales alone, during the first six months of 1850, as many yards of printed cotton as to the whole of Austria; to Van Diemen's Land⁵ as many as to Belgium; and to South Australia more than to Denmark.

A general recapitulation of the present position of our colonies in Australia, expressed in a few figures, may be interesting. It exhibits their progress since 1839. The population of New South Wales was, in 1839, 114,386; in 1848, 220,474—an increase of 93 per cent. The population of Van Diemen's Land was, in 1839, 44,121; in 1847, 70,164—an increase of 59 per cent.: that of South Australia, in 1839, Peck; who, under the modest title of "Recollections at Sydney," (John Mortimer, 1850.) has published a most accurate and complete account of that city. It is a volume which every emigrant should possess, as well as every one interested in the progress of the colony.

10,115; in 1848, 38,666—or 286 per cent.: that of Western Australia, in 1839, 2,154; in 1848, 4,456—or 101 per cent. The great increase of the last two is attributable to their trade with the Indian seas. The entire population of the group rose from 170,676, in 1839, to 333,704, in 1848. The value of the imports—principally from Great Britain—is about 2,600,000*l.* and of the exports about 3,000,000*l.* When examining these figures we must reflect that, sixty years ago, the borders of Australia were silent and desolate wastes, where on one spot a few white men were laying the foundations of an empire.

Of the unoccupied territory much is now known; but we cannot attempt to sketch its characteristics. It must suffice now to observe, that immense tracts of fertile lands, intersected by beautiful rivers, have been discovered. The interior is still unexplored; attempts have been made to penetrate its untravelled depths, but in vain. Sterility and heat have driven back the most enterprising. Theoretical geographers have, therefore, at their command a vast blank on the map. Physical geographers have decided that the island is a young creation, lately risen from the sea, and as yet unformed. Everything tends to support the idea. Few of the known laws of nature prevail in Australia. In geology, in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and in the mountain and river systems, all appear imperfect and without order. The ranges traverse instead of following the length of the region, as in the old world; the streams flow—many of them—inland, to lose themselves in pathless marshes, and the strata in the earth occur in the strangest detail. Of lesser anomalies there are abundance. We have black swans in plenty, white eagles, once considered a myth; crabs of an exquisite ultra-marine colour, and very beautiful; green clouds, insects called walking leaves, cherries with the stones outside, besides that oddest of created things, the duck-billed platypus—a quadruped with a bird's bill. In Australia, also, says a traveller, you discover your approach to a village by the barking, not of dogs, but of trees—a native custom very prevalent in the woody provinces. There are, besides, hills of bright blue limestone, glittering in the sun like enormous piles of jewels. With all these eccentricities of nature should be mentioned what is not an anomaly, that the June of England is, in temperature, the January of Australia.

The prospects of these Austral regions display themselves vividly to the imagination. Prophesying for them no more than a steady progress at the rate they have hitherto advanced, a century may be expected to work a wonderful change in the aspect of all nature there. It will be Australia still—

“But softer beauty sits on every hill.”

Meadows of rich green, corn fields, and gardens, parterres dotted with wandering flocks, fields full of the incense of the harvest home, will take the place of the woods and grassy plains; the English tongue will sound in songs and laughter among millions of happy settlers on the soil; the navies of war and trade will crowd the harbours; cities full of life, echoing with industry, with spires and towers, will stand on the banks of every stream; villas and lawns will occupy what now are wild and silent gleus. Above all, the Christian religion with her minister—civilisation—will move the hearts of the savage races with the gentle impulses of Nature. The sacred structure, consecrated by a pure and holy faith, will take the place of those roofless temples where the barbarian for ages has humbled his soul before an unknown and nameless god. The earth, invigorate, will yield the richest fruits; the climate will favour the strength and stature of all living things; the rivers and surrounding seas will be alive with commerce; the cities and the cultured lands will prosper under the hand of industry—

“While the swart native crowns the glorious plan
In all the towering dignity of man!”

Such a picture may appear romantic; yet it is suggested, not by fancy, but by calculation. Steam must soon draw together the shores of the mother country and her dependent states in the Antarctic Sea; and, if a liberal policy be pursued towards Australia, she will inevitably fulfil the scriptural prediction—“Ye shall make fruitful the waste places of the earth, and the desert shall blossom as the rose.”

THE BURIAL OF WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

BY J. DAFFORNE.

[THE abbey and monastery of St. Etienne or St. Stephen's, at Caen, were erected by this monarch in his dukedom of Normandy, for which purpose he caused a number of edifices, large and small, to be levelled to the ground, and possessed himself of the land whereon they stood. At the funeral of the king, a person in the garb of a peasant forced his way through the crowd, and forbade the rites of sepulture unless payment were made for the spot of earth in which the body was to be laid.]

Torches are blazing fitfully from Orme's grass-cover'd banks,
O'er cuirass'd men and belted knights, in closely serried ranks;
Banner, and plume, and fiery steed, are moving slowly there,
While mitred priest and learned monk unite in solemn prayer.

What means this pageant that disturbs the silence of the night?
Marches a monarch to his throne—a warrior to the fight!
These court the radiance of the noon, with trumpet and with drums,
And yet amidst the midnight gloom a king and hero comes.

William the Norman, he whose arm laid Saxon Harold low,
When England bent her stubborn neck beneath th' invader's blow,
Lies in a narrow coffin there—earth's proudest ruler's doom,
And all this mighty throng have met to lay it in the tomb.

And now St. Stephen's abbey walls enfold their sacred trust,
But ere the sepulchre receives its once anointed dust,
Through the long aisle and lofty arch a voice, like thunder, swept,
That made the living standing by as mute as him who slept.

"Son of the dead!" why com'st thou here, in funeral array,
To seek a quiet resting-spot for thy ancestral clay?
Can the oppressor slumber where his tyranny had birth?
—Away! Thou durst not lay his bones upon my household hearth.

"Son of the spoiler! on this ground my father's castle stood,
The shadows of its old grey towers stretched over stream and flood,
Ay, and by yonder open grave my childhood's feet have trod,
And little fingers often pluck'd bright flowers from the sod.

"Who trampled on my heritage? whose sacrilegious hand
Built up a temple to the skies, where I, now homeless, stand?
As if the pious act would calm th' avenging wrath of heaven,
Or that the wrongs which despots urge were easily forgiven.

"He, the pale tenant of a shroud—the man of high renown—
With all the panoply of war struck my fair birthright down;
Oh, many a fierce and bloody fight hath seen his princely crest,— Earth must take earth unto herself, but this is not its rest.

"Prelates, in vain your holy rites have sanctified a place
Where every stone hath fraud and guilt engraven on its face;
The widow's tear, the orphan's cry, shall sap its mould'ring wall,
While secret curses on the dead for retribution fall.

"Son of the victor, nobles, knights,—base vassals of a king,
Who lent your willing steel and bow to work my suffering;
Unarm'd amid ye all I stand, unknown to every eye,
And yet, with justice girdled round, your vengeance I defy.

"Take up your dead, another tomb his bones may safely keep,
For by my father's blood I swear that here they shall not sleep;
Remorse and shame have mighty power to blanch crime's darkest cheeks,
I see them in your faces when Anselm, the peasant, speaks."

The voice was hush'd, the listening crowds stood motionless and still;
That unknown name had wondrous strength the stoutest heart to chill,
And so a ransom there was paid, silver and gold they gave,
That the dead Conqueror might lie within a quiet grave.
They laid him down, that mighty one, within the abbey walls,
Where yet upon the warrior's tomb the trembling shadow falls;
But ponderous axe and shining steel the prisoner have unbound;
Vainly we seek for royal dust beneath that hallow'd ground.³

THE PINE-TREE SHILLING:

A STORY OF THE OLDEN TIME.

CAPTAIN JOHN HULL was the mint-master of Massachusetts, and coined all the money that was made. His was a new line of business; for, in the earlier days of the colony, the current coinage consisted of the gold and silver money of England, Portugal, and Spain. These coins being scarce, the people were often forced to barter their commodities instead of selling them. For instance, if a man wanted to buy a coat, he perhaps exchanged a bear-skin for it; if he wished for a barrel of molasses, he might purchase it for a pile of pine boards. Musket bullets were used instead of furlings. The Indians had a sort of money called wampum, which was made of clam shells; and this strange sort of specie was likewise taken in payment of debt by English settlers. Bank bills had never been heard of. There was not money enough of any kind, in many parts of the country, to pay their ministers; so that they had sometimes to take quintals of fish, bushels of corn, or cords of wood, instead of silver and gold.

As the people grew more numerous, and their trade with one another increased, the want of current money was still more sensibly felt. To supply the demand, General Court passed a law for establishing a coinage of shillings, sixpences, and threepences. Captain J. Hull was appointed to manufacture this money, and was to have about one shilling out of every twenty, to pay him for his trouble in making them.

Herenpon, all the old silver in the colony was handed over to Captain John Hull. The battered silver cans and tankards, I suppose, and silver buckles, and broken spoons, and silver hilts of swords that had figured at Court, all such curious old articles were doubtless thrown into the melting-pot together. But by far the greater part of the silver consisted of bullion from the mines of South America, which the English buccaneers (who were little better than pirates) had taken from the Spaniards and brought to Massachusetts.

All this old and new silver being melted down and coined, the result was, an immense amount of splendid shillings, sixpences, and threepences. Each had the date of 1652 on the one side, and the figure of a pine-tree on the other side. Hence they were called pine-tree shillings. And for every twenty shillings that he coined, you will remember, Captain John Hull was entitled to put one shilling in his own pocket. The magistrates soon began to suspect that the mint-master would have the best of the bargain. They offered him a large sum of money if he would give up that twentieth shilling, which he was continually dropping into his pocket. But Captain Hull declared that he was perfectly satisfied with the shilling. And well he might be, for so diligently did he labour, that in a few years his pockets, his money-bag, and his strong box, were overflowing with pine-tree shillings. This was probably the case when he came into possession of his grandfather's chair; and, as he had worked so hard at the mint, it was certainly proper that he should have a comfortable chair to rest himself on.

When the mint-master was grown very rich, a young man, Samuel Sewell by name, came courting his only daughter. His daughter—whose name I do not know, but we will call her Betsy—was a fine hearty damsel, by no means so slender as some young ladies of our own days. On the contrary, having always fed heartily on pumpkin pies, doughnuts, Indian puddings, and other Puritan dainties, she was as round and plump as a pudding. With this round, rosy Miss Betsy did Samuel Sewell fall in love. As he was a young man of good character, industrious in his business, and a member of the church, the mint-master very readily gave his consent.

"Yes, you may take her," said he in his rough way, "and you will find her a heavy burden enough."

On the wedding-day, we may suppose that honest John Hull dressed himself in a plain coat, all the buttons of which were made of pine-tree shillings. The buttons of his waistcoat were sixpences; and the knees of his small-clothes were buttoned with silver threepences. Thus attired, he sat with great dignity in his grandfather's chair; and being a portly old gentleman, he completely filled it from elbow to elbow. On the opposite side of the room, between her bridesmaids, sat Miss Betsy. She was blushing with all her might, and looked like a full-blown peony, a great red apple, or any other round and scarlet object.

There too, was the bridegroom, dressed in a fine purple coat and gold-lace waistcoat, with as much other finery as the Puritan laws and customs would allow him to put on. His hair was cropped close to his head, because Governor Edincoott had forbidden any man to wear it below the ears. But he was a very personable young man; and so thought the bridesmaids and Miss Betsy herself.

The mint-master was also pleased with his new son-in-law, especially as he had said nothing at all about her portion. So when the marriage ceremony was over, Captain Hull whispered a word or two to his men servants, who immediately went out, and soon returned lugging in a large pair of scales. They were such a pair as wholesale merchants use for weighing; a bulky commodity was now to be weighed in them.

"Daughter Betsy," said the mint-master, "go into one side of the scales."

Miss Betsy—or Mrs. Sewell, as we must now call her—did as she was bid, like a dutiful child, without any question of a why or wherefore. But what her father could mean, unless to make her husband pay for her by the pound (in which case she would have been a dear bargain), she had not the least idea.

"And now," said honest John Hull to his servants, "bring that box hither."

The box to which the mint-master pointed, was a huge, square, iron-bound oaken chest; it was big enough, my children, for all four of you to play hide and seek in.

The servants tugged with might and main, but could not lift this enormous receptacle, and were finally obliged to drag it across the floor.

Captain Hull then took a key out of his girdle, unlocked the chest, and lifted the ponderous lid. Behold! it was full to the brim of bright pine-tree shillings, fresh from the mint, and Samuel Sewell began to think that his father-in-law had got possession of all the money in Massachusetts' treasury. But it was the mint-master's honest share of the coinage.

Then the servants, at Captain Hull's command, heaped double handfuls of shillings into one side of the scales, while Betsy remained in the other. Jingle, jingle, went the shillings, as handful after handful were thrown in, till, plump and ponderous as she was, they weighed the young lady from the floor.

"There, son Sewell," cried the honest mint master, resuming his seat in his grandfather's chair, "take these shillings for my daughter's portion. Use her kindly, and thank heaven for her, for it is not every wife that's worth her weight in silver!"

The children laughed heartily at this legend, and would hardly be convinced but grandfather had made it out of his own head. He assured them faithfully, however, that he had found it in the pages of a grave historian, and merely had tried it in a somewhat funnier style.

"Well, grandfather," remarked Clara, "if wedding-portions now-a-days were paid as Miss Betsy's was, young ladies would not pride themselves upon an airy figure, as many of them do."

THE STORY OF MARIA FORSTER.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF JEAN PAUL.

THOSE who are familiar with the history of the first French Revolution will remember that, among the distinguished and amiable persons who fell by the guillotine, was a brave German gentleman named Forster. He had hailed the beginning of the Revolution as the dawn of a new and glorified era of humanity, and stood by what he deemed a noble cause, till he saw the last spark of nobleness expire in the black ashes of the "Reign of Terror." It is he who compares this grand convulsion to "an explosion and new creation of the world," but likens the actors in it, as they busily buzzed about him, to a mere "handful of flies" (handvoll Mücken). Falling under the suspicions of the "ruling powers," he indignantly disdained to avail himself of the means of flight that were secretly held out to him by his friends; and thus, after sacrificing country, and kindred, and fortune, and everything else that was dear to him, he had also to yield up his life, as the last contribution he could offer to the holy cause of liberty:—that liberty which, at its advent, came in the guise and glory of a god, but which afterwards took the shape of a raging and destroying fiend, and swept across the land, consuming everywhere its truest worshippers.

After his death, his widow retired with her children, to nurse her sorrows amidst the splendid scenery of the Rhine. Here, from earliest infancy, her two daughters were familiarized with the glowing forms of mountains, with forests, and streams, and waterfalls, and all the brilliant fascinations that appertain to nature in her grandest shapes. This wondrous scenery, the memory of the father's death, and the high-minded instructions of their mother, fostered in the daughters an impassioned love of solitude, and excited in one of them an enthusiasm of disposition which in the end became fatal to her peace. With everything about her to intoxicate the imagination, and with little of grave reality to balance it by cultivating the more sober faculties, Maria (as we believe, the elder,) came indeed to live in an utterly ideal element, which she fancifully peopled with heroic beings, selected chiefly from the immortals of the ancient world, though a few of the more exalted moderns were admitted to the like distinction. With these phantoms of the mind she held a lofty converse; reading continually the records of their noble thoughts, and drawing, along with the lessons of wisdom and of beauty which they offered her, some taint of a too extravagant veneration for the memories or persons of the writers. Not the less, however, did she devote herself with exact fidelity to all her filial and domestic duties; nor did she entirely avoid the society around her, or withdraw herself in disdain from all communication with common minds. On the contrary, she was ever ready to rejoice where there was gladness, and to sympathize with all the sorrowful; to participate, in short, in all the interests and affections in the midst of which she lived. Yet, when her daily rounds of work or of amusement had been finished, when the cares of the day were over, and night had covered all things with her dark and quiet mantle, she would turn with longing and with ecstasy to her beloved books, and sit for long hours in rapt communion with the spirits that spoke to her through their pages.

At this time the writings of Richter had become the general delight of Germany. Maria, when but a child of ten years old, had read some of them with a wondering and innocent admiration, and with childlike enthusiasm had written him a letter, expressing her thankfulness for the pleasure he had thus given her. As she grew up to womanhood, he became the ideal of everything in man that she had ever dreamed of or imagined. As he stood revealed to her in the tender and sentimental portions of his works, her imagination arrayed him with the grandest attributes; in him she saw the purest and holiest of men, a noble saint, a new redeemer, who alone could bear her over the waves and passions of this fretful life, and charm to rest and peacefulness her young but agitated heart. Then came over her the desire to be near him, to live in some relation in his presence, and to hold with him a closer spiritual and personal communion. So, in her thirteenth year, she wrote to him again, and said: "Is it not too bold—dare I write to the dearest friend of man, and call him my father? Ah, I shall perhaps never see him whom I have to thank for so much, for the dearest benefits, the most elevated truths, all the good that excites my imitation, and a whole eternity that has opened before my soul. When I think on your infinite goodness, I burst into tears, and my heart is filled with blessings for you. This firm faith in you is a blessing of which no man can rob me. You will ask, perhaps, who it is that speaks thus boldly to you? But I am only a little girl, so little, that I need not mention my name. Ah, were I grown up, as I shail be, neither land nor sea should prevent me from once in my life seeing him who has long held the place of a father in my heart. But my own faults, and intervening relations, hold me back; and I would not trust myself to write one word to you, if I did not hope to deserve your indulgence and pardon for my wishes." She further told him that her whole life was a continual "striving after goodness," and yet expressed herself distressed at the little progress she could make, owing, as she believed, to her defect of talent, rather than to any want of inward truthfulness or sincerity. Her highest wish, for the present, was to deserve the esteem of the good Richter, and to enjoy the satisfaction of having him once to call her daughter.

As she grew older, Maria still continued to write, closing every letter with an ardent wish to visit her admired author. The first portion of this later correspondence expressed only a longing for a mere spiritual union, deferring the hope of its fulfilment to that future world for which she earnestly prepared her soul. But at length her letters betrayed a desire to unite her being in some sort with the object of her veneration, to partake of the blessedness which she believed would spring from a living relationship with him, and she even signified her impatience for a more intimate connexion. Without ever having seen the man, she had become madly in love with him; or rather in love with her own ideal—the extravagant conception which represented him in her imagination. As she became aware of this, and her eyes were opened to the strangeness of her longings, she was overwhelmed with the bitterest confusion at the wildness of her dreams. It seemed as with impious presumption she had stretched forth her hands to touch the sacred ark of genius, and now the invisible guardian of the ark would fiercely strike her dead! Hitherto her letters had been all anonymous, but the day after making a virtual acknowledgment of her passion, she wrote another letter with her name, imploring to be forgiven for the impatience of the last, and retracting the tender announcement it contained, though, by the confusion of her language, in fact repeating both. Still other letters followed in quick succession, wherein she strove in vain to conceal the conflict that was laying waste her moral nature; for while she prayed him to forget her, she still held fast the hope of being admitted to his presence.

While her letters were anonymous, of course none of them were answered. But now she waited in burning impatience for some reply. Day by day she waited; rising every morning in a flush of expectation, which was daily dissipated, like the gilded dews, or as the brilliant cloud-pictures that heralded the rising sun. In her excited mind she found no explanations for delay; she reckoned not the distance, the interruption of the post by the war-disturbed condition of the country, the literary labours of her friend, or the many possibilities that lie between the reception and the answer to a letter. One sole thought took possession of her mind—the thought that she was despised by the most revered of men; that where she had looked for sympathy and healing, she had found only unmerited contempt. All this pressed with an intolerable weight upon her soul. In the bitterness of her pangs she knew no rest. Like “Mariana in the moated grange,—”

“Her tears fell with the dews at even;
Her tears fell ere the dews were dried;
She could not look on the sweet heaven,
Either at morn or eventide.
She only said, ‘My life is dreary,
He cometh not,’ she said;
She said ‘I am weary, weary,
I would that I were dead.’”

Her self-tortured spirit was persuaded that in death only was peace. Accordingly, in the twilight of a May morning, she stole out of the house, and went with a fearful purpose to the river. The unrisen sun was sending forth his earliest messengers of light, and in the east they were strewing his path with splendours. The misty earth sent up her exhalations of mild incense, in mute worship of the brilliant power that was coming to make her glorious. The forms of the old mountains were clothed with mystic majesty, and, all around, the trees and flowers were still and solemn in their beauty. But the troubled eye saw little, and that dimly, of all this various spectacle; saw only the glimmering river, in whose cold and liquid arms she was longing to be hushed in final rest. Yet she looked round on the home where her mother was still sleeping, and which now the first sun-rays were just touching with a modest glory; and the thought of the inconsolable sorrow which she was about to bring upon that dear and widowed mother, suddenly came over her, and made her waver in her purpose. And now her sister, who had all night long unobservedly been witness of Maria's agony, and had secretly followed her with fearful apprehensions, sprung with painful solicitude to her side, and saved her from her despair. Not yet was she fated to visit the dark kingdoms where the weary seek for quietness. They walked home in silence from the river's brink, and when calmer moments of reflection came, Maria resolved firmly never more to peril her mother's peace by any similar deed of rashness, or in any way to leave her while she lived.

Shortly afterwards, the long expected letter arrived from Richter. He said:—

“Your four letters from a good, but over-excited heart have been received. I guessed the name, and so did a friend of mine, in the first hour. Your noble, departed father is worthy of so good a daughter. But as the earth did not reward him, may he now, when he looks down upon his daughter, be rewarded by seeing her full of a pure ardour for goodness and virtue. He would speak to her thus,—‘May a good man receive my dear Maria as a daughter, and be to her a spiritual father. He will calm her excitement with a kindness and indulgence that cannot be imagined: he will tell her that in actual life, especially in marriage, the strength of passion in women, even innocent violence, has been the thorns and daggers upon which happiness has fallen and bled; that the mightiest and holiest of men, even Christ, was all gentleness, mildness, and peace. He will tell her she may soar with the wings of the spirit, but with the outward limbs must she only walk. She may kindle a holy fire in her heart, but must not act till the fire has become a pure light to guide her.’ I also, who speak to you in the name of your own father, desire such for my dear Maria, and will be that father to her. Your dream to come to me, you have, on awaking, laid aside. Leave your mother? Never! I shall more probably go to you than you come here. I and my wife both love you, and greet you kindly. Remain always good, my daughter.”

To this letter Maria answered gratefully, and forwarded, at the same time, a note she had written the night before the attempted suicide, in which she had entreated Richter to look upon her as one departed, since she could not endure to live under the thought of his contempt. He, on his part, was alarmed and shocked at the recklessness to which the choice between life and death seemed so indifferent. It seemed that the affair was growing ominously serious. However, after a short time, he wrote again:—

“The abundance of what I have to say to you, of which much should go only from the lips to the ear, and my want of time, have delayed my answers to your last letters. The first that you wrote to me after my answer has shaken me more than any calamity for many years; for had it not been for an apparent accident, you would have thrown a frightful death-shadow over the whole of my future life. You should see my coffer of letters, of which at the best I have not, for want of time, answered one-sixth part, and between me and my best friends there is often a delay of months. Your first four letters truly animated me. I saw in them only a rare exalted love, and a glowing soul, but not a single line unworthy of you or of me, and I answered them with more interest and joy than I usually express. You demanded the answers only too hastily, too punctually. Might I then not have journeyed, or been sick, or dead, or absent, or engaged in business? The fearful step that you would on that account have taken, I must, notwithstanding the strength of mind it betrays, condemn most severely ; but never let there be mention of it between us. Besides, I wish you on your own account, and on mine, to show my two letters to your good mother, whose most painful sorrows I know well how to imagine. You think much too well of me as a man. No author can be as moral as his works, as no preacher is as pious as his sermons. Write to me in future very often of all that is nearest your heart, either of joy or sorrow. You will thus relieve your mind of what rests upon it. You have become, by a peculiar bond, more knit to my life than any other absent acquaintance,—only draw not false conclusions from my long silence. Very delightful to me will be our first meeting. May you be happy, my child ; may these apparently only slightly and calmly written words, rejoice, and not confuse or wound your heart."

After the reception of this letter, a pensive calmness seemed to settle on the troubled brow. Maria sought to subdue her restlessness, and to sustain her soul in a state of pensive quietude. This, however, lasted but a little while. The poison of a never-to-be-satisfied and hopeless passion was circulating in the vital currents of her life, and could not be expelled. In the gloomy hour when she resolved on self-destruction, she had discovered or suspected that her inclination towards Richter was more than a girlish reverence ; that it demanded a warmer and more welcome love than that of father or of friend ; and therefore, seeing that she could not, without dishonour, cherish this unhappy passion, she came to a resolution never to see him who was its object, and bound herself with a solemn vow not again to indulge the wish of meeting.

With this feeling she wrote to him :—

"The only honourable way that can lead me to the heart for which I so long, is the grave. You will never be seen by me on this earth, for I love you too much, therefore write to me something consoling ; tell the poor Maria, that you will love her when we meet beyond this world. She can think of no joy in heaven, if there, as here, she is divided from the only soul through which she lives. Never again write me a letter so full of wisdom as the first, but rather one in which there is nothing but a lock of your hair ; and be assured I will not cease to write till you tell me you have sent it willingly, and with the consent of your good wife also, for I deserve it, and would give half my hopes of happiness for it. I have no greeting for you from my mother, highly as she esteems Jean Paul, as neither she nor any one knows to whom I write, nor anything of the whole history. For, as she asked me at that time, 'wherefore I would tear myself from her,' I promised her never to leave her, if she would ask me no questions. She cannot know how resolute I am, nor yet again how unreserved, and that it is my dearest happiness that Jean Paul has taken me for his adopted child. Ah, my father, only love me, and be happy."

To an unromantic reader, the request of a "lock of hair" from a man about fifty years of age, may seem to have a shade of the ridiculous. Nevertheless, to poor Maria it was quite a precious gift. In her unhappy state of mind, this innocent memorial of a beloved head promised the tenderest consolation, and, in her esteem, would have a value utterly transcendent. She believed, apparently, that it would be one of the profoundest of satisfactions to her heart. It is true that, like a stream of oil, it might be likely to quicken rather than soothe the flames on which it was cast ; yet, in her extreme yearning to quell her vast excitement, she might even think that this would yield her some relief. The cold untroubled sense of man or woman must not too closely scan the dreams and longings of a distracted mind. Richter, for his part, did not as yet know how passionately she loved him ; and therefore, regarding her desire for his hair as a merely innocent and romantic whim, he good-naturedly complied with it ; writing, at the same time, with a playful allusion to his scanty possession of the article.

"The lock," said he, "that my wife has just cut from my bald pate, is the best answer to your letter. Be not anxious, I pray you, that I shall let your letters, written as they will, be misunderstood to your disadvantage. I understand your warm, idealizing heart, and its great power : how, then, shall the words of a moment make me err ? What I complain of is, that the sun-heat of your mind ripens too soon, or rather scorches and dries up its sweet fruit. Your vow never to see me comes to nothing, (now comes sermonizing, which you have forbidden,) for, in the first place, one cannot vow for others ; and secondly, we vow only to do what is good, and leave the bad ; and this vow we bring with us into the world in the form of conscience, and no newer oath can contradict it. Another thing ; to swear to avoid a certain city, or a certain man, without reason, is to seek to control Providence ; and finally, your vow does not extend to me, and I shall see you whenever I can. No ; I paint to myself the hour when you will first see my Caroline and my children, and then me, and I shall also see all your friends. You are the only invisible correspondent to whom I write so unreservedly, and send my hair. Could I do it if I had not so much esteem for you, and so much confidence that you would do much more for me than I deserve or can ever repay ? Would you only not err when from business or necessity I am silent to your letters. Do not torment yourself, for your pain is doubled in me.

"P.S.—I have much cause to wish that you should tell all to your mother and sister, and find in their confidential love no occasion for opposition."

The result of this, perhaps, too kind and tender letter was far otherwise than Richter had expected. The words so gently admonitory seemed, in Maria's view, to justify the fond belief that he was disposed to sanction and return her passion.

"He loves me !" she whispered frantically to herself ; "he promises to seek me, nay, he even declares that he suffers on my account."

And again the hope, the burning fierce desire to see him, arose and raged within her; though, as one has said, "the veil of holy innocence lay upon her," and in less enraptured moments she was troubled with a fear that, in her communications with the beloved, she had passed the delicate bounds of womanly reserve; and this again distracted her. From the tone of her many letters, Richter observed, with deep anxiety, the terrific tempest in her soul, and, seeing that he could not calm it, he prudently left off writing. Then the poor bewildered girl began to see her error, and with heart-broken repentance wrote to him, promising to be again only a child, a loving child, who would look up to him as a kindly father who should guide her wandering feelings along the steadfast paths of goodness. After this Richter wrote to her again:—

"I have received your last six letters regularly, but not always actually without the seals broken.¹ Your last three letters were welcome to me, as they again beautifully spake of the only possible relation that can exist between us—that of a father and daughter; a relation in which your first letters enchanted me, and which has hitherto remained unchanged on my part. In this relation alone I ventured to love you so deeply, to send you the lock of my hair, to give you my confidence, and to oppose your incomprehensible scruples to our meeting. The word father is, for a father, no less than the word daughter, a sacred and holy word—dearer than all other words! Why do you imagine me troubled? I am happy with my children and my Caroline, and as truly beloved by them as they are by me. The sciences are my heaven. Why then should I be unhappy, except at these disastrous times, when all the nations of Europe bleed? Your unreserve gives me no pain; at least, unless you feel it yourself; on the contrary, it gives me only joy. You idolize me too much, instead of following my counsels. I shall, therefore, offer you no more advice, so well do I know the female heart, especially the souls of fire to which you belong. Send me, instead of letters that I have not time to answer, rather journals of your life, your family, your little experiences. May it be well with you, dear daughter, and the gentle spirit of love, without that of fire, fill your breast."

In soliciting her "little experiences," Richter apparently wished to divert the gloomy intensity of feeling under which she was suffering, into a channel in which it should have harmless play; to suggest to her, indeed, an interesting occupation, whereby she might record her personal history, and exhibit her excited feelings, in the shape of some real or imaginary narrative, which, by the time and labour needed for its elaboration, would possibly prevent her from dwelling too exclusively upon the remorse and distractions of the hour. As it was, Maria was perpetually perplexing herself with new devices of self-torture; vague notions of intolerable dread arose and haunted her in solitary reveries; her being was a wilderness wherein all fearful and distressing images roamed at large in dim confusion, and where there breathed or bloomed no longer any pleasant thought or thing, but only wild and unconquerable agencies of desolation. Anchoring with long continuance by "one gloomy thought," her soul, when it strove again to brave the perils of the depths of life, was floated wide away out of the genial latitudes of hope, and was wrecked in darkness and tempest on the sandbanks of despair. It seemed to her, at last, that the image of the best and most beloved of men, which she in her idolatry had set up and consecrated in her heart, had, in the delirium of her adoration, been insufferably profaned, and she deemed that an expiation was demanded for the sin. Thus her thoughts flew back to suicide, that drear mystical gulf of desperation, of whose shores only the desperate have knowledge. Not forgetful, however, of her former vow, she determined not to sacrifice herself while her mother was still living. But the mother died, and then she believed she was at liberty to make choice of her own destiny. There was yet another tie which bound her strongly to the earth—her solitary orphan sister, who would be left without a friend. But, as if fate had predestinated and prepared her doom, a friend of the family, who had been long absent from the neighbourhood, unexpectedly returned, and to him, as she conceived, she might safely leave her sister for protection.

Filled with an unquenchable anguish, with a riotous restlessness that she could not calm, she now thought she would go to the beloved, and, in meek prostration at his feet, solicit some word of hope and comfort. Yet, pondering this great adventure, she speedily recoiled from it, deeming that the meeting she desired was an impossible one on earth, and must be left for another world, where there would exist none but spiritual relations. As she could not now have hope to merge her life in unison with his, she would defer the aspiration for fulfilment to a period when worldly ties should be dissolved. Aimless, expectationless, and refusing to be comforted, she at length resolved, in her deep wretchedness, to take a clandestine flight to those invisible kingdoms of hope and dread which lie across the bridgeless stream of death. For this dark journey she prepared herself with singular deliberation. The domestic affairs of her friend and sister were all carefully arranged; whatever she was capable of providing for their comfort was minutely and quietly provided; and when all her duties had, as she conceived, been scrupulously performed, she wrote the following final letter to Richter:—

"Do not be angry, dearest father, at receiving these lines from your unfortunate Maria. My mother has been two months dead, and she will consent that I shall now follow her. She wished me to take care of my sister—that is done. Her happiness is secure, and I can no longer endure to live, where mine has so incomprehensibly failed. Ah! in the great universe of God there will yet be a place where I can recover my peace, and be as I wish. I have suffered so much! I dare to die! Ah! you will despise me as long as I live, for you will never understand how I have languished to do something for you, or for those dear to you, and how much the thought has killed me, when I learned that I could not make you happy. But despise me not so much, as not to let your children, of whom I cannot think without tears, accept a little present from me. Let them not know from whom it came. I would willingly be wholly forgotten, and, unmarked, vanish away. No one can learn my history from myself. I have burnt all books and journals. You hair only remains on my neck, and I take it with me. Farewell, beloved father! Ah, that it must be so with me! Oh, that it were all a dream, and that I had never written to you! My unfortunate spirit will hover about you. Perhaps I shall be permitted to give you a sign, or to bring you some higher knowledge."

(1) Richter, for some reason, wished her to understand that her letters were inspected at the Post-office.

On the day she wrote this letter, Maria employed herself in her customary manner. In the evening she prepared the usual meal for her friend and sister, and, as the former stated afterwards, "fulfilled with graceful attention the duties of a kind and careful hostess." She arose from table to write a letter, and about eight o'clock asked her sister to sit down at the piano, embracing her, at the same moment, with warmth and agitation. She turned away from her, and threw herself on the breast of their mutual friend, saying to him, with choking voice, "Take care of my poor sister:" and then abruptly left the room. When she had gone, the attention of the friend and sister was attracted by the letters she had left behind: their anxiety was instantly aroused, and they hastened out in search of her. They met a multitude of people bringing back her drowned body, which a fisherman had just taken from the stream. They bore it into the nearest house, and applied the ordinary means of resuscitation. Once the unhappy girl opened her eyes for an instant, but being resolved to die, she resisted all the efforts made for her recovery; and, although she became for a time conscious, calm, and self-possessed, she breathed her final sigh before the morning.

The intelligence was sent to Richter, along with the letter already cited, and cast a cloud over his life which it took a long time to clear away. He rejoiced, however, that he had not followed the counsels of some who had advised him to treat the unfortunate with ridicule and severity. The amiable Eliza Lee, (from whose modest and graceful "Life of Richter" the letters here quoted have been taken,) conceives that Jean Paul somewhat erred, nevertheless, in his treatment of this poor girl. She thinks that had he permitted her to visit him, she would probably have been cured of her unlucky passion. The sight of a man fifty years of age, with the look of a farmer more than of a poet, might have brought the bewildered damsel to her senses. "She would have found him fulfilling the duties of a good citizen, a kind father, a faithful husband; leading a prosaic life," with birds and squirrels about his house; paying rents and taxes, and butchers' and bakers' bills, like any other respectable man of civilized society; and the sight and knowledge of these things might have subdued the fever of her imagination, and taught her the bounden need of conforming her notions of men and things to the actual standard they present in every-day reality. We know not what ultimate effect such an arrangement might have produced, but it seems to us that there was at least one very strong objection to it; for however sensible and charitable a man's wife may be, (and Richter's Caroline was eminent in these respects,) it would be hardly likely to contribute to her comfort to introduce as guest into the family a romantic maiden of seventeen, who was violently and avowedly in love with her husband! We incline to think that the proper cure must have been sought for in other directions. If it were put to a jury of married women, we fancy they would unanimously acquit Richter of the charge of blame implied in his refusal to admit Miss Forster into his family. It were difficult to say what ought to have been done in a case so painful and peculiar. There may be a question whether Richter ought to have written so many of those pretty letters. Perhaps, to have drawn her away from solitude into occupations and amusements suited to an intellectual and generous girl, to have given her a larger and more accurate knowledge of the living world, to have allowed her more action and less sentiment, might have gradually enabled her to gain command over her feelings, and in that case would have restored her to reasonable views of her position. Yet it is idle to speculate; rarely is a danger apprehended before it has befallen us; nay, how often will it happen that even if a danger be foreseen, there is wanting either the energy or the means for avoiding it?

This, then, is the literal story of Maria Forster. A noble-minded, high-spirited, passionate, and heroic girl, whose soul was planted with the elements of all greatness, but which rose not to maturity from lack of a suitable cultivation. Nature had endowed her with sense, imagination, large capacity of emotion, courage, and aspirations that towered after a goodness unattainable; but these, unhappily, were all distorted, disrupted, perversely developed, by an extravagant sentimentalism, natural to her character, and also signally encouraged by the circumstances and environment in which she lived. She was one to whom it would have been a blessing to be less bountifully gifted. A child of passion and of fire, whose heart, like a volcano, cast up a burning lava which consumed it, producing barrenness and desolation where the gentlest flowerage of the affections might have grown.

Is there, anywhere among the places which these pages visit, any flashing and unquiet eye, a heart in its best impulses too vehement, and whose imaginative affluence might clothe with grandeurs whatever form of man or woman it might honour, let it be warned that the imagination has its perils as well as its delights, and that to be of any avail in the concerns of mortal and eternal life, it must be controlled by conscience, reason, and the power of self-restraint. The column that is most beautiful looks most sadly in its fall, but must lie in its shivered prostration thenceforth irrecoverable and unrestored for evermore. That which is lost through perversion of the sentiments, or by a misapplication of the faculties, is lost totally to the soul; even as a star that might be extinguished would be an everlasting diminution of the splendours of the universe.

THE ROSE AND THE THORN.

BY S. LEY WOLMER.

(FROM THE ITALIAN.)

I ENVY thee, thou Rose, exclaim'd the Thorn;
With all thy beauties opening to the light,
Sweet to the sense, and lovely to the sight,
Whilst me no charms of hue, no flowers adorn.

I envy thee, thou Thorn, the Rose replied;
For whilst on earth, the King of Glory chose
No laurel wreath, no coronal of rose,
No radiant crown, lustrous with sparkling gem.
When on his sacred brow a diadem
Was placed, thine was the shame, and yet the pride:
A crown of thorns circled the Crucified.

THE VOYAGE AND SHIPWRECK OF ST. PAUL.

THE author of this book is a gentleman of education, fortune, and leisure, "a yacht sailor of more than thirty years' standing," who has concentrated all the resources of extensive study, observation, and maritime experience on the illustration of the narrative of St. Paul's shipwreck. The result has been, in the first place, the identification of every locality, the delineation of every nautical equipment and manœuvre, and the verification of every incident recorded by the sacred historian; and, secondly, the accumulation of materials of unprecedented copiousness and interest as regards the construction and management of ancient ships. On account of the large amount and variety of general information which it furnishes, and also because, of the numerous authorities on our table this is the only recent publication, we have selected it as a text for an article on the Navigation of the Ancients, and would confess at the outset our indebtedness to it for much that we have learned from it, and for much more which it taught us where to find.

The history of navigation commences with the launching of the ark on the waters of the deluge; and it is not a little singular that the artistical merits of this extraordinary structure should have been unrecognised for four thousand years or more. To be sure, now and then a mathematician who revered the Bible had said a patronizing word or two about the ark as a thing that might possibly float without capsizing; and Bishop Wilkins, no mean authority, had given his opinion, that it could not have been built more appropriately for its purpose. But it was reserved for Peter Janson, a Dutch merchant of the seventeenth century, to adopt it for a model; nor can Noah have encountered severer misadventures from the ridicule of antediluvian wags, than annoyed honest Peter while his ship was in building. But he had faith enough in the Hebrew record to build an ark in the precise proportions of that which had saved the patriarch's family; and it was found on trial most admirably adapted for bulky cargoes, as it had thirty or forty per cent. more available tonnage than ships of the usual model requiring the same number of mariners.

The chief objection to its use was, that it had not, like its prototype, the monopoly of the sea, and that, on ocean paths infested by buccaneers, it could not be manœuvred rapidly or adroitly enough to evade pursuit. But it is believed that Janson's experiment led to the general adoption for the carriage of bulky freights of what is commonly called "the Dutch build," of which ships designed for the cotton trade, and often exceeding by twenty per cent. their rateable tonnage, are fair specimens.

Among the most ancient nations, the Egyptians and the Phœnicians took the lead as navigators. The Egyptians built their boats from the root, cut their masts from the stalk, made their sails from the bark, and twisted their cordage from the stoutest fibres, of the papyrus. These vessels were not, and probably could not be, trusted as sea boats; but they served the purpose of an extensive inland trade on the Nile and the numerous canals which it fed. The Phœnicians, on the other hand, masters of a sterile and rugged country, driven to commerce by the paucity of their agricultural gains, and having equal access to the Mediterranean and the Red Seas, established maritime intercourse with the most remote coasts of the then known world. Of the details of their naval architecture we know nothing; but from the extent and danger of their voyages we may infer that they had attained no inconsiderable amount of skill. Sidon was their chief port, and before the Homeric age, they had undoubtedly reached India as their eastward terminus, while they had planted colonies beyond the Pillars of Hercules.

It was by means of Phœnician navigators that Solomon conducted the traffic which flooded his capital with the precious metals, and made his reign proverbial throughout the regions of the East for wealth and magnificence. Ophir and Tarshish were the chief emporia of this commerce. As to the locality of Ophir, there is almost a world-wide difference of opinion. The three years consumed in making the voyage, and the identity of the radical letters of Ophir and Peru, have given rise to the irrational hypothesis that the New World furnished gold for the Hebrew temple. Gesenius supposes Ophir to have been a portion of the sea-coast of Arabia, as that name stands in Genesis among Arabian countries, and may itself be traced, as he thinks, to an Arabian origin. But if this were the case, the gold and silver, as well as the ivory and peacocks, brought thence, must have been imported, not indigenous. Eastern Africa, which has also been supposed by many to have been the terminus of these voyages, could not have furnished the precious stones or the sandal [almug] wood, which made part of the return cargoes. Josephus, who probably was not without traditional authority, speaks unhesitatingly of Ophir as having been the Chersonesus Aurea, now known as the peninsula of Malacca. It is believed that there are none of the commodities named as the products of Solomon's commerce which Malacca might not have furnished from within its own borders, or from nearly adjacent regions. Nor will the voyage appear unreasonably long, when we consider that the ancients coasted where they could, transacted much business from port to port, and had not vessels so rigged as to enable them to cross the Indian Ocean except under favour of the monsoons.

As to Tarshish, the other principal mart of Hebrew traffic, the learned have been still more widely divided, it having been questioned whether there was such a place, or whether the word may not be a generic term either for a gold region or for the sea. But we find no valid reason for doubting that this name denotes a flourishing Phœnician city and colony on the Spanish coast. To be sure, ships of Tarshish are sometimes mentioned in the Bible, where it is impossible that the reference can be to the region that we have named. But this phrase probably denotes vessels of a peculiar construction, such having been first built either at Tarshish, or for the Tarshish trade, just as we English call all vessels of a certain model Indiamen, and as, in Massachusetts, there is a certain class of small fishing vessels called Chebacco boats, simply because the first in use were built in the ancient parish of Chebacco, in Gloucester.

Herodotus describes an exploring expedition, undertaken by a Phœnician fleet under the orders of Pharaoh Necho, who flourished about 600, B. C.; and, if we interpret his words literally, and suppose the narrative authentic, these navigators must have doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and ascended the Western coast of Africa. But the swell occasioned by the junction of the Atlantic and the Indian Ocean is so great at all seasons of the year, that a vessel can make the passage only by standing out to sea; and there is no reason to suppose that the Phœnician vessels, at this early period, were capable of holding off from the shore of the Cape of Good Hope under any possible circumstance of wind and current, so as to avoid shipwreck. Moreover, this discovery of Western Africa is not once alluded to by any ancient writer, but on the other hand, it is expressly asserted by several authors who must have been familiar with Herodotus, that Africa had never been circumnavigated till a much later period. Yet more, in the time of Ptolemy, Africa was universally supposed to sweep round the Indian Ocean, so as to join the continent of Asia to the eastward of Malacca. Pharaoh's navigators undoubtedly reached a southern latitude, but their explorations were probably confined to the Atlantic coast.

Ancient Greece was adapted to maritime enterprise by the character alike of its people and their country. Most of the Grecian states, having been planted by colonists from other shores, inherited from the generation of their founders decidedly seafaring propensities. Then, too, Greece has more sea-coast than almost any other region of similar extent, and abounds in harbours accessible and safe for such vessels as constituted the commercial marine of remote antiquity; while the Ægean Sea is so thickly studded with hospitable islands, that the navigator need seldom have been out of sight of land, and might haul his vessel on shore almost every night,—both which advantages were of inestimable price, in the unformed condition of nautical astronomy, and the absence of the mariner's compass.

The fabulous portion of Grecian history refers repeatedly to maritime adventures and incidents; but the earliest expedition of importance, of which we have a detailed account, is that of the Argonauts. With regard to this, it is difficult to separate fact from fiction. That a band of heroic spirits accompanied Jason, we cannot doubt; but it is hardly probable that Hercules, Castor, Pollux, and Orpheus were all with him; and it is the tendency of popular mythology to indulge freely in anachronisms, in order to group as many illustrious names as possible around every memorable event or hazardous enterprise. The expedition was without doubt predatory in its design, and some light is cast upon it by the coincidence of the Phœnician word denoting treasure with the Greek μαλλός which signifies fleece. In plain terms, Colchis was a rich kingdom, inhabited by a people given to arts rather than arms, and the élite of Grecian chivalry undertook this voyage for the sole purpose of robbery. The amount of authentic information blended with fable concerning the various countries on the Euxine Sea, in the Orphic Argonautics, makes it certain that Jason landed at almost every practicable spot, and is strikingly illustrative of the circuitous and tentative method in which the ancients felt their way towards unknown regions. This voyage may be regarded as having greatly enlarged the geographical knowledge of the Greeks, and as having in at least an equal degree extended the limits of their ignorance; for the voyagers, on their return, seem to have incorporated into their narrative all countries and bodies of water of which they had heard the name. Thus, from the Palus Mæotis they are represented as having passed through a great gulf into the Cronian Ocean, after various adventures in which, they entered the Mediterranean through the Pillars of Hercules! But of the Cronian Ocean, to which name there was no nearer counterpart than the White Sea, they must have heard from the Scythians, and entered it on their logbook, because it was essential to a finished nautical reputation to have explored it.

From this period we may date the colonial system of the Greeks, which gradually extended itself from the Pillars of Hercules to the north-eastern extremity of the Euxine Sea. The colonies retained an intimate connexion and a lucrative commerce with their parent states; and Athens and Corinth, on the score of their extended and various intercourse and traffic, were viewed in very much the same light in which the three great commercial capitals of modern civilization are now regarded. Attica, especially, with a soil unfitted for wheat, relied on commerce for the prime necessities of subsistence, while her silver mines and her olive plantations made her merchants preferred purchasers in every part. We find very early record of double voyages from the Piræus, wine having been first purchased at some of the islands in the Ægean Sea, and exchanged on the shores of the Euxine for wheat, wool, hides, or slaves. The rude beginnings of maritime law may be traced back to the early age of the Athenian republic; loans on bottomry, or on floating security, having been the subject of peculiar enactments, as regarded both the rate of interest and the reimbursement of the principal.

Nor was the navigation of the Greeks confined to pacific purposes. Maritime war is hardly less ancient than commerce; and in point of reputed rank, the buccaneer of the early ages took precedence of the merchant. The Athenians were probably the first people that had a regularly appointed and equipped navy. But their naval service was a prominent part of the public administration. Their war-galleys were divided into two classes, corresponding to our frigates and transports, though, after a few years' service, a fighting vessel was often passed over to the transport list. The Athenian war-galleys frequently carried two hundred mariners, besides thirty or forty epibatae,—a class of soldiers like our marines, performing military, but no nautical, duty on shipboard.

The Iliad and Odyssey furnish the greater portion of the materials in our possession, as to the condition of nautical skill and art prior to the Homeric age. The enumeration of the fleet that carried the allied troops to Troy, though undoubtedly fabulous and exaggerated in its details, must have been not far beyond the range of probability; and, if so, a numerous squadron of ships must have already become a familiar idea. As to the size of the Homeric ships, we have in the Iliad no indication, except in the census of the Boeotian quota of forces, which consisted of fifty vessels, with a hundred and twenty men in each. From the description of the ships built by Ulysses on Calypso's island, we may infer that the keel was laid, and the sides ribbed and covered in substantially the same manner as is practised now. Full-decked vessels were not in use until a much later period; but a large ship generally had a partial deck, under which freight liable to injury might be stowed, and women or effeminate men might find shelter in stress of weather. Stones were the only anchors used; and they were employed rather for bringing vessels to than for mooring them, as in port they were always drawn up upon the beach, and launched anew for every passage. For this purpose, rollers were sometimes used; but more generally, human strength unaided by mechanical contrivance. The ship of that age must needs have been very light in proportion to its capacity; and we find no reason to suppose that metallic fixtures of any kind, except nails and spikes, were deemed essential. Indeed, there were instances in which large ships, nay, fleets, were dragged across very considerable portages. This was done across the isthmus of Corinth, in two instances, according to Thucydides. But the navigators of those ages were more ready at all times to cleave to mother earth than to trust their own element. It was a rare event for a vessel to lose sight of land, and the most approved mode of progress was by daily stages, so as to make a port every night. Yet, when a ship was driven out to sea, or when it was impossible from the nature of the voyage to "hug the shore" all the way, there was a sufficient knowledge of celestial phenomena to direct the course with reasonable accuracy. The Homeric ships were one-masted, and probably had but one sail. Such ships, without rudders too, could not be manœuvred with sufficient rapidity for attack or defence; and war-galleys therefore depended principally upon their oars, while merchant ships and transports were provided with full benches of oars, and with competent crews of oarsmen, who were kept on duty except when relieved by a fair and sufficient wind.

Close and constant as was the maritime intercourse of the Greeks within the limits already described, it was not till the time of Alexander the Great that they essentially enlarged their sphere of communication. The voyage of Nearchus, from the mouth of the Indus to that of the Euphrates, undertaken at the command of that monarch, formed an epoch in navigation, maritime knowledge, and nautical literature. We still have minute contemporary accounts of it, written by the admiral of the expedition. Eight hundred ships, (most of them probably no larger than a modern ship's long boat,) were placed at his direction. The voyage was protracted, eventful, and full of dread, if not of intense peril. It might now be made, under favourable circumstances, in a fortnight;—it took Nearchus about five months. Setting sail with the trade winds against him, and unskilled in traverse sailing, he made but eighty miles in the first forty days. His men were reduced to the greatest distress by want of food and water; for the seemingly obvious necessity of laying in provisions for a long voyage was not then understood, and their course lay by an inhospitable coast that furnished them nothing but shell-fish. They subsequently stood out to the south, and Nearchus says, that they reached a point where the mid-day sun was in the zenith, and objects cast no shadow. This is hardly probable, as the sun was at that time in southern declination; and, had Nearchus actually crossed the equator and entered the southern hemisphere, it is impossible that he should not have described the temperature and the aspect of the heavens, so entirely unlike those of the regions with which he had been familiar. The more plausible account of the matter is, that he had heard that there were remote southern latitudes where objects were shadowless at noonday, and that, by a broad poetical license, he sought to multiply his own marvellous experiences for the amazement of his readers. One of the most important incidents of the expedition was the spouting of several whales, which filled the whole fleet with consternation, till the animals, in their turn alarmed by shouts and the clashing of arms, sank quietly beneath the water. It was probably the great account made of this event in the narrative of Near-chus, that inspired Horace's fearful mention of the "monstra natantia," among the perils braved by the earlier navigators. Next to this encounter, the chief annoyance of our voyagers was connected with a change of diet; for they made sore complaint, not only of an enforced series of fish dinners, with no farinaceous condiment, but of the fishy flavour of their mutton, which, they said, was fattened on no other food but such as the waters yielded. Indeed, so deeply impressed were they with the dietetic habits of the tribes with which they kept up a coasting, gossiping intercourse for many days, that they included them all under the generic name of Icthyophagi. The information contained in the several narratives of this voyage now extant is at once minute and vague, indicating the utmost receptivity of eye and ear, without the power of weighing evidence, of balancing contradictory statements, or of arranging, connecting, and classifying isolated facts.

The Carthaginians next claim special notice as a great maritime power. We study their history and character at a disadvantage, deriving, as we do, almost all our knowledge with regard to them from their rivals and enemies, the Romans. Their commercial reputation could hardly have been won and sustained, and they have continued for many centuries chief factors and carriers for the whole civilized world, had Punic faith been held at as paltry a valuation in port and market as in the Roman senate. Their trade had its regular depôts, periods, and courses, and consequently must needs have made them dependent on their own trustworthiness for the confidence reposed in them. They undoubtedly, in the conflict of wits, in all diplomatic tactics, could readily get the better of their rude antagonists; for their commercial habits gave them superior adroitness in negotiation. They had numerous colonies in Africa, Spain, and the islands of the western Mediterranean. Though they seldom ventured beyond easy reach of land, they were familiar with almost the whole Atlantic coast of Europe. Gades (now Cadiz) was the chief entrepôt of their traffic in this direction. Tin was among their principal imports, and in quest of it they made frequent voyages to Britain and to the Cassiterides, which Heeren shows beyond dispute must have been the Scilly islands. There is little doubt that their regular route of trade extended as far north as Scandinavia.

How early they were extensively acquainted with the African continent must be determined by the view taken of the Periplus of Hanno. This is a narrative (extant in Greek) of a voyage of discovery and colonization under the command of Hanno, a Carthaginian leader, undertaken about five centuries before the Christian era. There can be but little question that this document is either a translation or an abridgment of the record actually deposited by the commander in the temple of Saturn; for the course of the voyage can be distinctly traced, and there is hardly a circumstance related which savours of fable or even of exaggeration, unless it be the immense number of persons attached to the expedition, it being no less than thirty thousand. Now, that Carthage could have sustained a depletion to that extent, and left no other trace of it in history, or that the ends of public policy should have dictated the deportation of so large a body of citizens, is intrinsically incredible. But in the modes of numerical notation adopted by most ancient nations, there was ample room for misconception or erroneous transcription; and it is a well-known fact, that numbers have fallen into inextricable confusion in writings the text of which is in all other respects pure and reliable. Hanno left the greater portion of his companions at the outset of his voyage, founding on what is now the Morocco coast no less than six well appointed colonies. From the last of these he twice sailed in a southward direction, the first time reaching the mouth of the Senegal, and the second descending as far as that of the Gambia. The closing incident of this last voyage is related with an air of quiet indifference worthy of backwoodsmen of the Daniel Boone school, who, if they can get a fair aim with the rifle, care little whether they bring down a panther or an Indian.

"Though we pursued the men, we could not seize any of them; but all fled from us, escaping over the precipices, and defending themselves with stones. Three women were however taken; but they attacked their conductors with their teeth and nails, [δᾶκνυσαι τε καὶ σπαρτρυσαι,] and could not be prevailed on to accompany us. Having killed them, we flayed them, and brought their skins with us to Carthage."

Hanno, though evidently not overstocked with humanity, seems to have been a careful and judicious explorer, and may be regarded as having opened to Carthage the coastwise trade of the African continent. We find that, at a shortly subsequent period, Punic enterprise had traced the receding outline of the continent as it trends towards the east, and had established a productive traffic with the Gold Coast.

The Romans took the lead in no department of maritime enterprise, were behind all other civilized nations in nautical knowledge and skill, and only late and reluctantly availed themselves of the sea as of a military road, or a battle ground, or as an essential medium for the conveyance to Rome of corn, wine, the plunder of conquest, and the revenues of proconsular extortion. Agriculture was the only profession besides that of arms which they held in honour, and even that was esteemed chiefly as developing the physical hardihood, and the almost incredible power both of labour and endurance, which distinguished the Roman soldiery. They despised commerce, deemed it utterly unworthy of a patrician, and regarded the equestrian order as degraded from its pristine dignity by the numerous members of its body who were engaged in traffic. The most liberal estimate in which the mercantile profession was ever held among them might be expressed in these words of Cicero: Mercatura si tenuis est, sordida putanda est; sin magna et copiosa, nulla undique apportans, multisque sine vanitate impertiens, non est admodum vituperanda. At the same time (and we fully accord with the sentiment) he says: Omnium rerum, ex quibus aliquid acquiritur, nihil est agriculturâ melius, nihil uberius, nihil dulcius, nihil homine libero dignius. In accordance with this state of feeling, it was not till the first Punic war, when they were obliged to cope with a nation of immense maritime resources, that the Romans gave their attention to the equipment of a fleet, or even to the principles of ship-building. In the later days of the republic, and under the emperors, they had numerous and well-appointed navies, both military and mercantile, and became familiar with all the maritime routes known to the ancient world; but were always more ready to profit by the nautical skill and prowess of allied or subject nations, than to take active means for cherishing naval enterprise among themselves. Sicily and Egypt were the granaries of Italy; and the necessities of Rome and its densely populated vicinity kept an immense fleet in constant activity during the portion of the year favourable to navigation.

We propose now to give a succinct sketch of the construction and management of ancient ships at the period when the naval art had reached its highest degree of perfection. It is a subject on which no set treatise has come down to us from antiquity; but our information must be gleaned from incidental notices, coins, the marbles and paintings of Herculaneum and Pompeii, and certain inventories of the appurtenances of the Attic navy, discovered in digging up the foundation of a house in the Piræus in 1834. In addition to these sources, during the reign of Commodus, an Alexandrian wheat-ship was driven by stress of weather into the Piræus; and Lucian, attracted by her extraordinary size and exquisite finish, lays the scene of his dialogue, Πλοῖον ἡ Εὐχιδῶ, on board of her, and gives through his interlocutors many details regarding her structure and internal economy.

The prow and the stern of the ancient ships were very similarly built, and both rose by a very considerable elevation above the body of the vessel, and were generally furnished with projecting galleries. Hence the epithets alta and celsa so constantly applied to puppis by the poets. The prow was of course made sharper than the stern, and was distinguished by the rostrum or beak, which, on some medals of an early age, appears three-cleft, whence the trifidum rostrum of Silius Italicus and Virgil's rostris tridentibus,—a reading which, on conjectural grounds alone, some modern editors have changed into stridentibus. The general similarity of both ends of the ship rendered it as easy to anchor her by the stern as by the bow; and that this was sometimes done would appear from the figure of a ship found in a painting at Herculaneum, in which there is a hawsehole aft, and a cable hanging from it at an angle indicating that there is an anchor appended to it. The ancient navigators, from their habit of keeping near the coast, and from the impossibility, with rigging like theirs, of working off from a lee shore, must have been more dependent than the moderns on their ground tackle. In certain positions, a ship could be brought to with greater expedition and safety by anchors dropped from the stern; and, when a vessel was to be run ashore, which was by no means an infrequent resource, this mode of anchorage put her immediately at command, so that she could at once be directed to the safe place on the shore, and the cables then slipped; whereas, if anchored from the bow, she was liable to take a wrong cast, and drift too far to the leeward before she could be brought under command.

Rudders hinged to the stern-posts were not in use until the thirteenth century. Prior to that period vessels were steered by two large paddles, worked one on each side of the projecting stern. In small vessels, these rested in rowlocks in the upper gunwale, and in those of larger dimensions, they were passed through ports, which served also as hawse-holes. When at anchor, the rudders were drawn in, and secured by lashings to the ship's sides. This mode of steering must, indeed, have been toilsome in the extreme; but every mariner was trained to the use of the oar, the ships were numerous manned, and there was but little other hard work to be done. Our readers may here be reminded of the frequency with which πηδάλιον and gubernaculum occur in the singular, and of the uniform mention of a single pilot as governing the course of the ship. This is explained by the fact that the two rudders were generally united by a cross bar, and thus were managed by the same man, or, in a very large ship, by the same set of hands. The pilot's elevated situation was essential to his office. In default of the compass, he needed an unobstructed view of the heavens and of distant landmarks; and, when cloud or fog concealed the sun or the stars, the keen and practised ear stood sentinel in lieu of the eye, so that he was no pilot, who knew not the voices of Aquilo, Notus, and Eurus, or who discerned not the roar of the breakers while it was still a far-off whisper. The pilot had his tutelary deity close at hand; for every vessel had its own divinity, whose image graced the stern, and whose name not unfrequently furnished the sole designation for the vessel. Nor was it unusual for the more devout to multiply these images, and to crowd the stern-gallery with the forms or insignia of all the deities wont to be invoked in maritime emergencies. Thus, in the shipwreck described by Persius in his sixth Satire,

"Ionio jacet ipse in littore, et una Ingentes de puppe dei."

Horace undoubtedly refers to this same custom.

when, in apostrophising the republic under the image of a ship, he says,—

"Non tibi sunt integra lintea, Non Di, quos iterum pressa voces malo."

The ancient style of rigging was exceedingly simple. We cannot recall an instance, in which the plural of lōds or of malus is used with reference to a single ship, nor can we refer to any transmitted figure of a ship in coin or picture, which has more than one mast worthy of the name. This occupied a position a little forward of midships. The chief, and often the sole, reliance for progress was placed on a huge square sail attached to a yard nearly as long as the ship itself. In stormy weather this great sail was furled, and one or two triangular sails, with the apices below, substituted for it. Triangular topsails are found on some of the coins of the Emperor Commodus, but seem not to have been in general use until a much later date. There is reason to believe that top-gallant sails were, in some individual instances, employed; and that, in fine weather, extra sails, corresponding to our studding sails, were spread. A mizzen-mast was very rare; and, when there was one, it was the slightest spar possible, and rigged with a very diminutive sail. The only essential sail besides the mainsail was the jib or foresail, which was square, fastened to a horizontal yard, and attached to a spar occupying the position of a foremast, and taking the direction of a modern bowsprit. This sail was valued principally as an aid in steering, and in keeping the head of the vessel true to her course; but could have been of little assistance as regarded speed.

We are uninformed as to the angle with the wind, at which ships thus equipped could sail. It is very certain that the ancients had no idea of the possibility of reaching a place directly to the windward by successive traverses; but they undoubtedly were able to sail within seven or eight points of the wind. As regards speed, we have the record of several voyages performed at the rate of from six to eight miles an hour, which would give, of course, a much greater velocity for the quickest portions of the passage.

Among the essential furniture of the ancient ship were hypozomata, or cables for tying the sides of the vessel together, either to preclude a strain during an impending storm, or to prevent the opening of the seams and the working of the planks, when the vessel had sustained an unusual shock by wind or wave. From the Attic inventories to which we have referred, it would appear that cables for this purpose were a regular item of naval stores, and as such laid up in the magazines. It is easy to conceive that ships might have been sufficiently frail in their structure to have needed this additional security, though at the present day such a necessity would condemn a vessel as unseaworthy. But there have been several instances in modern times, in which resort has been had to a similar expedient. In 1815, when the Russian fleet was sailing from England to the Baltic, one of the ships, having been severely strained, was held together by three or four turns of cable taken midships.

Capt. Back, on his return from his Arctic voyage in 1837, bound up his shattered ship with two lengths of chain cable, passed under the bottom, hove tight by the capstan, and fastened to ring-bolts in the quarter-deck. An English seventy-four was in one instance saved from sinking by similar means; and recourse has been several times had to the same contrivance in the British navy.

In point of capacity, the ships of the Augustan age must, some of them, have been equal to our largest merchantmen. The ship in which St. Paul was wrecked had 276 persons on board. That in which Josephus was wrecked carried 600. The ship commemorated by Lucian was 180 feet long by 45 broad, which, by the usual rules of computation, would give her a measurement of more than 1300 tons; but the projection at her extremities would probably reduce her actual tonnage one fourth. The ships regularly engaged in the wheat trade were the very largest vessels in the merchant service, inasmuch as there were no others so sure of a full freight, and no other cargo of which the bulk was so large in proportion to the value.

As regards the accommodation of those on board, the earliest navigators must have submitted to the severest hardships. Before decked vessels were in use, there could have been neither shelter from the weather, nor safety for the provisions of the crew. Alcibiades was the first Greek who swung in a hammock; and this is cited as one of the most signal instances of his slanderous effeminacy. But before the Augustan age, separate cabins were constructed, and many of the luxurious appliances of shore life were enjoyed on shipboard. The suspension of navigation through the winter superseded the invention of many of the modes of protection now deemed necessary both for officers and mariners; and the latter seem not to have had any enclosed portion of the ship specially devoted to their use.

The arrangement of the benches of oars in the ancient galleys has largely exercised the ingenuity of modern antiquaries. The trireme was the most common form; but we frequently read of quinquiremes and even of octoremes, while, according to Pliny, the royal galley of Ptolemy Philopator had fifty banks of oars. If the sides of the galley were nearly perpendicular, only the lower rank of rowers could have performed any essential service; and the oars of the upper tiers must have been too long to have been managed single-handed. But we may without difficulty suppose the sides above the water's edge to have flared sufficiently to make an angle of 45° or even 40° with the water. In that case, the several ranks of rowers occupied successive stagings, each kept from interfering with that next below rather by lateral distance than by superior height. By this arrangement, three tiers of rowers could easily have been so seated as to apply their strength without disadvantage; and even in an octoreme, though those of the upper tier must have had a post of peculiar hardship, we can conceive that they may not have laboured wholly in vain. As for Ptolemy's galley, we see no improbability in supposing the same arrangement, if we take into the account what Plutarch says of it, that "it was little better than an immovable building, more calculated for show than use." The oars of the highest rank were 57 feet long, and of course could not have been pulled by one man, nor yet by a gang of men with sufficient rapidity to give much propelling force. The vessels of war were always galleys, and generally triremes. In an engagement, the upper gangways were cleared of oars, and those who manned them became active combatants, while the vessel was manœuvred by the rowers of the lower tier.

The professional character of ancient navigators seems to have been much less distinctly marked than is the case at present. Naval commanders were not a class by themselves; but the successful general was deemed an amply qualified admiral, while the conscripts for the army were, when occasion demanded, drafted for the navy. In the merchant service, the owner, captain, and factor were frequently one and the same man, and his sailors, in their long intervals of shore life, must have resorted to other employments, and cannot have acquired the peculiar dialect, habits, and prejudices, which would make them a class by themselves. Even their nautical experience had little to distinguish them from their fellow-citizens. It required more strength than skill to pull an oar, nor was there any special sea-craft needed for the management of the two simple sails, which were the only ones with which nine-tenths of the vessels were equipped. On the other hand, landsmen, in default of level roads and easy conveyances, made most of their long journeys by water; and civilians, ambassadors, men of learning, and youth in the process of liberal education, were all more or less familiar with the paths and perils of the deep.

Ancient navigation seems to have been straitened not so much by the lack of art, as by the absence of science. Its structures and implements were well adapted to the circumscribed sphere of its exercise, and indicated a degree of mechanical skill and genius, which could not have lingered in the rear of scientific discovery and improvement. But there were two essential desiderata in the nautical knowledge of classic antiquity. One was a mode of determining a ship's place at sea, the other, a mode of directing a ship's course in cloudy weather. The chronometer and the log are both modern inventions. Though after the Ptolemaic epoch the materials of accurate astronomical science were rapidly accumulated, they did not for many centuries assume the tabular form, in which alone they could be employed for purposes of observation. Nay, so long as the lesser equations of the solar and lunar motions were undiscovered, tables and instruments would have misled and bewildered the navigator in the precise proportion in which reliance was placed upon them. We have no proof that any mode of determining place or distance at sea was in use until the middle ages, except that the Romans employed occasionally both by land and water an odometer so complicated in its structure, and so difficult to be kept in gearing, as to need verification whenever used.

All this while, the loadstone was well known in Southern Europe, as endowed with the power of attracting iron, and as communicating its own properties to iron; but the polarity of the magnetized needle was not even suspected. Yet for more than a thousand years before the Christian era, the principle of the mariner's compass had been understood and applied in China. In the age of Cædrius, magnetic carriages were employed in traversing the vast grass plains of Tartary; and, under the emperors, Roman ships must often have encountered on the Indian Ocean Chinese junks under this same mysterious pilotage. Had it fallen to the lot of the Phœnicians or the Carthaginians to make this discovery, California might have been their Ophir, and Russian America their Ultima Thule; and we might have been inditing our lucubrations in "the letters Cædrius gave." Had Athens in the Periclean, or Rome in the Augustan age, possessed the needle, there was not lacking the requisite intelligence to guide, or enterprise to consummate, the attempt to verify the rotundity of the earth. But the Chinese kept their precious secret, as Æsop's dog guarded the manger. Indeed, they could have made no worthy use of it without rendering it the common property of the civilized world. A thoroughly self-isolated nation then, as now, they held communication only with allied, or tributary kingdoms, and excluded foreigners, so that their arts were as unlikely to be learned and copied elsewhere, as if they had been denizens of the moon. The knowledge of the relation of the magnet to the terrestrial poles was at length, in the thirteenth century, brought to Europe through the Arabs, who seem to have been the providentially appointed conductors of Oriental art and science to the Western nations just emerging from the lethargy of the dark ages.

We have spoken of what might have been, had the more enterprising nations of antiquity enjoyed the means of certain self-direction on the ocean. This suggests the inquiry as to the state of geographical belief or theory among enlightened men. That the earth was spherical was, no doubt, from the remotest ages, the prevalent belief, not indeed of the multitude, but of those whose philosophy transcended the sphere of the senses. Pythagoras had inferred this truth from the different altitudes of the same star as seen at the same time from different places,—a demonstrative evidence, which could never have appeared less valid than it did to him. That the then known world was much less than a hemisphere was sufficiently obvious. Thence was inferred the existence of a counterbalancing continent, of Antichthon or Antipodes. This notion is distinctly recognised in the following passage from the Astronomica of Marcus Manilius, written not long after the Christian era.

"Altera pars orbis sub aquis jacet invia nobis, Ignotæque hominum gentes, nec transitæ regna

Commune ex uno lumen ducentia sole,
Diversasque umbras, lævæque cadentia signa,
Et dextros ortus cælo spectantia verso."

The same opinion has left its traces in the seventh book of the Æneid.

"Audiit et si quem tellus extrema refuso
Submovet oceano, et si quem extenta plagarum
Quatuor in medio dirimit plagæ solis iniqui."

This same supposition led to the belief of circumnavigations that can never have taken place. Thus we have seen that the Argonauts were supposed to have returned from their Western voyage through the Fretum Herculeum; and the voyages of Eudoxus and of Hanno received from ancient commentators not dissimilar expositions. Pomponius Mela, a geographer of the first century, in his description of the earth, evidently identifies the unknown continent with the southern triangle of Africa. He carries Africa but little beyond the Niger in a southerly direction, extends it thence westward to the outlet of the Red Sea, and terminates it by a peninsula which juts out into the Indian Ocean. South of this continent he places the ocean which surrounds and divides the two hemispheres. He then locates the continent of the Antichthones as a distinct southern hemisphere, describes it as triangular in contour, with the apex at the south, and makes its base coextensive in longitude with the united continents of Africa and Asia. This hypothesis enables him to cut the knot, which the geographers of so many centuries failed to untie. He places the sources of the Nile in this unexplored hemisphere, and supposes that river to pass under the ocean and to reappear in Æthiopia.

Had we space, we might find much worthy to be written concerning the ancient literature of the sea. The delineation of nature in any of its aspects was seldom a direct or express object with the earlier writers. Descriptive poetry may be almost regarded as of modern origin; for even the ancient Bucolics were, for the most part, mere dramatic sketches with a rural background. The forces of nature were, to the outward sense, too capricious and too formidable, and, in the belief of the Pagan world, too much distracted by the conflicting jurisdiction of benign and malignant divinities, to invite prolonged contemplation, or to cherish that safe and happy feeling which alone could give interest and fervor to the detailed description of natural phenomena. A sense of the Divine unity, trust in an unslumbering Providence, the habit of beholding in the outward universe the reflection of unbounded wisdom and beneficence,—in fine, the entire circle of Christian ideas, must have been essential to the development of the descriptive view in literature. But the sea perpetually furnished the ancients with tropes, illustrations, and terms of comparison; and their very limited maritime experience excited the same sensations of awful beauty and unspeakable grandeur, which we attach to the vast expanse of the ocean. Indeed, often, when they are speaking of some shallow bay, or describing the quick, short swell of some inland sea, we can hardly believe that they had not traversed the Atlantic, and witnessed the full sublimity of its storm-lifted waves. This phenomenon may be accounted for by two considerations. In the first place, the ultimate elements of beauty and grandeur in the creation are few, though their combinations are innumerable. Modern fancy portrays the concrete forms. The imagination of the earlier ages seized upon their primitive elements, and, in lieu of detailed description, gave those single, intensely graphic traits, which reveal the very heart of nature, and, because they are so genuine and characteristic, bring before the mind any and every class of combinations into which they enter. The physiology of the torrent, waterfall, river, sea, and ocean may indeed be widely dissimilar; and yet, in the last analysis, (an analysis to which the imagination leaps intuitively,) the elements that please or move, astonish or enrapture, are the same, and the vivid outline sketch of one may seem drawn for all.¹ Secondly, the very limited maritime scenery with which the ancients were conversant, was as vast compared with their knowledge and control of natural agencies, as are our more expanded views and experiences compared with our more ample knowledge and superior command of the elements. Without chart or compass, driven a few miles from the shore, the guiding stars veiled for the time from their sight, they felt the same fearful solitude, the same sense of isolation, powerlessness, and dread, that overwhelms us when a thousand leagues of ocean are between us and the nearest human dwelling.

It is, indeed, beyond our power to overrate our indebtedness on literary grounds to the imperfect condition of ancient navigation. Had not the polarized needle been laid up in the Chinese limbo, where would have been the Odyssey? If Æneas had owned a chronometer, Dido would have remained till death loyal to the memory of Sichæus. A modern lyrist could hardly summon up so many phantoms of dread, and give vent to such fervent deprecations of evil for a Ross or a Franklin about to bury himself in polar night and ice, as Horace for Vigil bound on a pleasure-trip from Rome to Athens. Ovid has made richer materials for poetry out of a thunder squal, on his voyage to the land of his exile, than a poet of our own day could find in a passage round Cape Horn; and to the terrors of this single storm, and his pro-

(1) We are reminded in this connexion of an apostrophe to the sea, in the Prometheus of Æschylus, which in four words conveys much more to our apprehension, and reflects far more fully our own unutterable emotion in the frequent survey of ocean scenery, than could be done by volumes of the most glowing, eloquent, passionate description. Whenever we look upon the ocean, whether from deck, beach, or crag, by sunshine, moonlight, or its own phosphorescent glow, we find ourselves absolutely haunted, sprighted by these words, as they pulse upon the inward ear in unison with the rhythm of the waves. The passage to which we refer is that where Prometheus, in calling on all nature to witness his cruel wrongs at the hand of Jupiter, addresses the sea as κράταιον ἀνιρθῆναι τὴν ὁρμήν. This cannot be transfused without damage into another language.

"'Tis odour fled

As soon as shed."

We know not how to convey in current English the multiform unity indicated by the original. "The innumerable laugh of the sea-waves," is literal, but awkward. "The many-twinkling smile of Ocean" (which we copy from a Lexicon) is preferable on the score of euphony, but less adequate to the sense.

THE GREAT RIVER OF THE NORTH

found sense of the vast distance (now permeable in a week) which separated him from the imperial city, we owe his conversion from the merriest and most licentious to the most sombre and lachrymose of bards,—the very Jeremiah of profane literature. Scylla and Charybdis are not now of consequence enough to deserve a place on a chart, or a moment's extra vigilance of the pilot, in the Strait of Messina. A modern shipmaster would as soon think of stranding his ship on Mont Blanc as on the Syrtis. Critics are utterly at fault in the attempt to ascertain where the island of the Sirens was; and the Circean cup with its brutalizing potion remains almost the only peril of serious concern for the mariner, in those waters that used to swarm with the direst portents, bearing the breath of an incensed god on every gale, girdling every islet and crowning every promontory with supernatural horrors.

The poetry of the sea must be written over again. Modern fancy in this department relies too much on the traditional names of effete images, and still reproduces in verse the dwarfed and obsolete forms of ancient wonder, awe, and terror, instead of taking to itself the fire wings of recent art and science, and enriching from its own peculiar vein the more just and adequate conceptions of the ocean and its laws that belong to the higher culture of the present age. The steam-ship has not yet found its laureate, and our modern Argonauts have no Orpheus among them. It would seem that in proportion as the ocean has occupied a larger and larger space in the prose of actual life, it has entered less and less into poetry and the higher fiction. We ask not that any one should set himself deliberately to write sea-lyrics, or scaphrhapsodies. The Muses ignore all task-work. But why is it that, while every poet travels by water as well as land, and every American poet crosses the Atlantic with the proceeds of his duodecimo firstling, they rarely give us the means of inferring, from a single verse of their inditing, that they ever beheld a larger body of water than the brook which, we believe, runs, by immemorial prescription, in the field behind every poet's dwelling?

GIRLHOOD.

BY M. J. J.

Come forth, young Ianthe, come forth, in the light of the day,
With thy locks floating careless about thee, like those of a fay,
And stand now before me, with eyes so serene meeting mine,
Those dark eyes, whose expression we love, though we cannot define.

There's a grace half majestic, half drooping, about thy young form,
Like that of a tree, strong though slender that's sway'd by a storm,
And thy voice hath a mystical music, half tender, half wild,
Like the sigh of the wind, yet, anon, like the laugh of a child.

A spirit looks constantly forth from thy dark, fervid eyes,
They are bright but not cloudless, as are our own early spring skies,

There are tears in their depths, and proud glances that sometimes outflash,
And sweet, loving looks, that steal timidly forth 'neath the lash.

There are signs of thy nature, deep, earnest, and haughty, thou girl,

In thy proudly arch'd neck, in thy ruby lip's scarce conscious curl,

In thine every gesture, or playful, commanding, or free,
In thy look, whether serious with thought, or all sparkling with glee.

May thy pride never turn 'gainst thysel', and so make thy despair,

There's an instinct of doubt at my heart, and I bid thee beware!

For the yearning that dwells in thy heart for the high and the true,

Is a birthright, alas! that may safely be holden by few.

Thy purity all world-experience shall never defile,

Though it take from thine eyes their proud light, from thy lips their sweet smile,

And the spiritual lustre, so womanly, yet so divine,

That, air-like, environs thee, that shall for ever be thine.

May the world never teach thee hard truths as thou journeyest on,

May the sun of affection beam on thee as aye it hath shone,

And its brightness all danger-fraught mists from before thee dispel.

These my prayers are for thee; and farewell, young Ianthe, farewell!

RAPIDS ON THE SHANNON AT CASTLE CONNELL.

THIS is a romantic scene on the principal river of Ireland, as yet but little explored by English travellers, but displaying on its banks many objects of antiquarian interest and picturesque beauty well worthy of exploration. The navigation of the river, which extends far into the interior, is here interrupted by a ridge of rocks over which the waters pour and foam impetuously along, forming a miniature resemblance of similar scenes on the Niagara River, and affording an admirable subject for the skilful pencil of Creswick.

OR, THE RAILROAD OF LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XLIX.

CONTAINS MUCH SORROW, AND PREPARES THE WAY FOR MORE.

THE letter to which reference was made at the conclusion of the preceding chapter, and which Lewis received on the day following that on which he visited Mr. Coke, the family solicitor, proved to be from General Grant, and ran as follows:—

"MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND,—for in that light I must, after the many important services you have rendered me, ever consider you,—I am anxious to lose no time in forwarding to your account, at Messrs——, your salary for the year beginning May, 18—; and as you have been compelled by honourable feeling to throw up your appointment so unexpectedly, and may not be fortunate enough to meet immediately with another suited to your wishes, you will, I feel sure, allow me, as some small testimony of the high esteem in which I hold you, to enclose a check for 500*l.* instead of 300*l.* I should feel hurt if you refuse to accept this token of my regard."

"Two hundred pounds for giving up his daughter! he would scarcely have bought me off so cheap if I had looked at the matter in a pecuniary point of view," was Lewis's ironical comment, as with an inward resolution instantly to return the 200*l.* he continued to peruse the letter.

"You will be glad to hear that Sir Walter bears your absence wonderfully well; your kind consideration in leaving him the dog has produced a very good effect, as the animal serves to amuse him. We have not as yet been able to disabuse him of the notion that you will return, although I have impressed upon my daughter, who appears to have more influence with him than any other member of the family, the necessity for so doing. The mention of my daughter's name leads me for the last time to touch upon a subject, which I can conceive to be painful even to your well-disciplined mind. During an interview which I had with her yesterday, she expressed her readiness to be guided entirely by my wishes: with her full concurrence the engagement to Lord Bellefield was formally renewed, and the marriage is to take place as soon as she comes of age. I may add, that as far as I am able to judge upon so delicate a point, I cannot doubt that her intended bridegroom possesses her warm and entire affection. You will not think me unnecessarily communicative, or careless of your feelings, in mentioning these facts; but I conceive the knowledge of them may tend sooner to restore your mind to its usually healthy tone. Should you still be in England after my daughter's marriage, I shall have much pleasure in seeing you, either at Broadhurst or in Park Crescent. Convey my respects to Mrs. and Miss Arundel, and believe me to remain, your's, sincerely and faithfully,

"ARCHIBALD GRANT."

Lewis read the letter steadily to the end. With trembling lips and starting eyeballs did he re-peruse it; he could not avert his gaze, it appeared to possess a species of horrible fascination for him; he felt as if his brain would burst, as if his reason were failing him. Annie loving Lord Bellefield, and allowing the engagement to be formally renewed,—oh, it was impossible! he must be going mad;—an evil which his worst fears pointed at only as a remote possibility, when time should have effaced his image, and the influence of those around her have conquered her lingering scruples, come to pass ere the rosebud she had given him had withered on its stem. Why was it that the trial had become too great for him to bear,—that his self-control had failed,—was it only the intensity of his own feelings that he feared? or was it that he hoped, yet dreaded to learn, that he was beloved? Did the sacrifice that he had made consist only of his love for her, or did the belief that he was relinquishing the certainty of winning hers in return, add a redoubled bitterness to his self-renunciation? were a thousand remembered words, looks, glances, realities, or the creations of his morbid fancy? He rose, and paced the room, as was his wont when deeply excited. Where should he seek a clue to this mystery? could he believe—the thought flashed like lightning through his brain, like lightning, searing as it passed: could he believe that he had again been duped by a coquette? were all women false and heartless alike? could the goodness, and innocence, and purity, which rendered beauty such as Annie's a link between earth and heaven, be mere counterfeits, and not the angel-instincts they appeared? Did good exist at all? or was this world an initiatory hell, and the evil principle predominant? Were Annie untrue, truth itself might be but a great and specious falsehood.

From this chaos of passionate distraction a few clearer, but on that account no less painful ideas began to evolve themselves; his new-found dream of joy had vanished; rank and fortune, valued only because they would bring him nearer to Annie, would become a tie and a burden without her—he would have none of them. For his mother and sister he would still labour; to support them was his first duty, in works which he must perform lay his only refuge against despair, perhaps even against madness. There was something else: some promise he made, what was it? his brain swam, he could recollect nothing clearly; hastily removing his neckcloth, he plunged his head and face into a basin of cold water—this precaution in all probability saved him from a brain fever. Having partially dried his streaming locks, and resumed his walk up and down the apartment, he remembered his promise to Hardy. Yes, that also was a sacred duty, the girl must be discovered, rescued from a life of infamy, separated for ever from— and, here he stopped abruptly, as a new idea occurred to him—Lord Bellefield! the retribution he had vowed to exact from him! he was now free, in a position to demand it! For a moment his eyes flashed, and the fingers of his right hand involuntarily closed as if grasping a weapon, and then many conflicting thoughts crowded upon him, and the eyes sought the ground, and the fingers insensibly relaxed. If he provoked Lord Bellefield to meet him now, at this particular juncture, would not it appear as if he were actuated solely by jealousy of his more fortunate rival, as if his hopeless love for Annie were the cause of his animosity? This idea was especially repugnant to him for many reasons. In the first place he had argued himself into the belief, that his resentment against Lord Bellefield was a just and reasonable feeling, and that in punishing him for the insults he had unmanly heaped upon him, he was only exacting a due penalty; it was by this subtle argument alone that he could regard the act he contemplated as at all a justifiable one. Again, he considered that it would be completely beneath him to be jealous of Lord Bellefield. If Annie could love such a character, she was all unworthy his affection. Lastly, although he was scarcely himself aware of the feeling, and although a personal meeting with the object of his hatred, a contemptuous word or insolent look, would in a moment have conquered it, he felt a natural repugnance to take any step which might necessitate the possibility of shedding a fellow-mortal's blood. To plan a duel à l'outrance, as a distant possibility, was one thing, to take measures coolly and deliberately to bring about such an event immediately was quite another affair. So catching at the only grey spot among the blackness that surrounded him, he consoled himself with the reflection, that as Annie would not be of age till the expiration of between two and three years, he might during that period contrive to learn how far her heart was likely to go with her hand in the proposed alliance, and to regulate his conduct accordingly. Shaping his plans for the present in accordance with this resolve, he wrote sundry letters (one to General Grant respectfully declining his present,) more or less coherently, and then going to bed in the frame of mind of one who must have been singularly fortunate if he enjoyed a very good night's sleep.

"Dotes yet doubts, suspects yet fondly loves."

We must now take a retrospective glance at Broadhurst, during the short space that had elapsed since Lewis quitted it, and learn how events, which have caused him such bitter grief, can have been brought about.

'Tis the night of Lewis's departure, and Annie Grant sits at her open window gazing pensively at the moon, which moon, by the way, was at that identical moment lighting the old abbey and shining on her lover's throbbing brow, as he stood thinking of her beside the ruined altar. Now Annie was by no means in a comfortable frame of mind; in the first place she more than suspected that she was falling deeply in love, and in the second, "the thing she loved" had not exactly "died," but what was quite as inconvenient, and much more inexplicable, had suddenly "conveyed itself away" without telling her why or wherefore. Lewis and Walter had of late been in the habit of spending their evenings in the drawing room, General Grant considering that it was desirable to accustom the latter to the forms and habits of society, but on that evening they had not made their appearance as usual; Annie had inquired of her aunt the reason of their absence. Miss Livingstone, looking like a very old vicious owl, replied, "that really she was the last person likely to know; General Grant was doubtless well informed on the subject, but he was always strangely, and as she thought, most unnecessarily reserved; she believed Mr. Arundel had been driven to resign his situation, and she was not surprised; she did not know who, that could avoid it, would reside in a family, ordered about like a regiment of Dragoons; she dared say Lord Bellefield had some broken down black-leg ready to recommend as tutor, to teach Walter gambling and horse-racing. Would Annie oblige her by looking under the sofa? she thought she saw the shadow of a man's foot against the chimney piece; she expected they should all be murdered in their beds, now the only person able to defend them was driven away. Would Annie oblige her by ringing the bell? she wished to ascertain whether Robert had neglected to load the percussion cap of his blunderbuss." Foiled in this quarter, Annie waited till Lord Bellefield was so obliging as to stroll out in pursuit of a cigar, "smoking under difficulties," being one of his most severe trials during a visit at Broadhurst. When he was gone, she attacked her father with a direct inquiry as to what had become of Walter and Mr. Arundel?

"Walter was in his own study, Mr. Arundel was absent," was the reply.

"Absent," returned Annie, "why, where is he gone, papa?"

"I did not inquire Mr. Arundel's intended route, my dear; his age and character render him fully competent to regulate his own movements," was the stiff response.

Annie's lip curled, "able to regulate his own movements!" she thought him fit to rule a universe.

"When is he coming back, papa?"

"A—ahem! not at present, my dear, that is, in fact, you may consider his absence as permanent; the reasons for his departure which he imparted to me lead me to this conclusion."

"There, I told you so—I said he was sent away," observed Minerva, snappishly.

"Madam, you have been misinformed," interposed the General with much irritation; "Mr. Arundel has not been sent away, he resigned his position as tutor to my ward, of his own free will, for reasons which I considered good and sufficient."

"And what were these wonderful reasons, if one might make bold to ask, without having one's nose snapped off?" inquired Minerva, curiosity and crossness combined, overcoming her habitual fear of her august nephew-in-law.

"A—really I am not accustomed to be cross-questioned in this way. A—you, madam, strangely forget; however I may as well mention once for all, that I have Mr. Arundel's authority for stating that his reasons for quitting Broadhurst are purely of a personal nature:—and now do not let this subject be alluded to again;—I am the last person who should be accused of driving him out of the family;" and having by this time worked himself up into a very considerable passion, in which frame of mind he was like most other of his fellow-mortals particularly unreasonable and incautious, he glanced furiously at poor innocent Annie, and strode out of the room like an offended autocrat, as he was.

And this agreeable little scene formed the subject of Annie's reverie, as, with her golden hair hanging like a veil around her, she watched the moonbeams sleeping on the velvet turf. Why had Lewis left them so suddenly?—why, if her father knew the reason, did he refuse to reveal it; and still more strange, why should Lewis so scrupulously have concealed it from her? Then again, her father had appeared angry with her—could he suppose she had had anything to do with the young tutor's departure? And then an idea struck her, which even there, alone, beneath the silent night, caused her face and neck to become suffused by a burning blush—could it be possible that she had betrayed herself, that Lewis had discovered her affection for him. And then she blushed yet more deeply at the plain words in which she had for the first time expressed, even to herself, her heart's secret yearnings. The idea was painful in the highest degree to a mind of such child-like purity as Annie's, and yet the more she thought of it, the more probable did it appear;—it would account for everything that perplexed her. If she really had been so madly imprudent, so utterly deficient in maidenly reserve, as to allow Lewis to perceive the depth of her regard for him, his honourable feeling would instantly oblige him to leave the family, and no doubt her father's cross-questioning had in some degree elicited from him the truth. Oh! what deep humiliation—regard it in whatever light she would, what bitter, endless misery! Lewis's calm manner, his gentle unimpassioned kindness, his late avoidance of her society, since—distracting thought—since he had begun to perceive her regard, his stern resolve, so soon acted upon, to quit the family, all proved that her affection was not returned. Cruel degradation, to love a man who was indifferent to her, and to have allowed him to perceive it. Annie possessed a spice of her father's haughty disposition, though, in general, the many essentially feminine points of her character prevented it from appearing; but this was an occasion which called forth every particle of pride in her nature. What could she do to remove this stain (for such in her morbid self reproach did she consider it,) from her; would to Heaven she could lie down and die! Her father too evidently suspected the truth; Lord Bellefield would probably be the next person to become acquainted with the disgraceful history,—and, with the recollection of her cousin's name, a new idea flashed across her. Yes, there was a way of escape—a method of silencing every busy tongue! But at what a sacrifice! Could she bring herself to consent to marry Lord Bellefield, her object would be at once attained. No, she felt it was impossible. But then, on the other hand, could she bear to labour under the suspicion of loving, without return, (there was the bitter sting!) a man beneath her in station?—(she could remember this difference now, when it would add to her self-torment.) Well, fortunately, she was not called on to decide the question at once; she would think more upon the matter: at all events, there was the possibility, to fall back upon as a last resource.

Then her thoughts reverted to Lewis, the brave, the true, the noble-hearted! She should never see him again; he would achieve greatness,—(she felt as sure of that as if she had held in her hand the Gazette announcing his acceptance of the Premiership,)—and some other would share it with him, while she should be the wife—the alternative was too hateful to contemplate, so she substituted—in her grave. Yes, she should never see him again! And she recalled his image, as, on that summer day, he had approached the window to summon her to the German lesson,—when, as she read of Max Piccolomini, she had realized his appearance in the dark proud beauty of him who sat beside her. She remembered his joyous, animated look, as he bounded across the lawn, his glowing cheek, his bright, sparkling eye, the waving masses of his raven hair, and his eager, happy smile, as his glance met hers! Two ideas engrossed her:—he did not love her—she should never see him again; and, forgetting her pride, her woman's dignity, even her self-upbraiding, in the intensity of her sorrow, the poor child flung herself on her bed in an agony of tears, and poured forth the bitter desolation of a lonely, breaking heart.

The next morning she pleaded a headache (a heart-ache would have been nearer the truth) as an excuse for breakfasting in her room, and did not make her appearance till it was nearly luncheon time; during that meal the General was unusually dictatorial, not to say fractious, and more than once spoke so harshly to Annie, that she had some difficulty in repressing her tears. The meal was above half concluded ere Lord Bellefield, who excused himself by saying he had had some important letters to write, made his appearance. When at last he joined them, he did so apparently in the most amiable frame of mind; he received a reprimand from the General for his want of punctuality, with a good-humoured smile, and introduced a carefully veiled compliment into his apology, which greatly tended to soften that gallant veteran's ill-temper; he interposed with skillful kindness to avert sundry crabbed attacks, aimed by Miss Livingstone at poor Annie, and introduced some interesting topic which drew out the elders, and gave a new and agreeable turn to the conversation; he sympathised with Annie's headache, for which he invented an equally opportune, plausible, and false excuse, and in short he laid himself out to fascinate, and succeeded, à merveille. Annie felt really grateful to him, for he had come to her rescue at a moment in which kindness and sympathy were peculiarly acceptable to her.

When luncheon was concluded, the General requested his daughter's presence in the library. Poor Annie rose to obey him. A strange wild idea seized her that he might be going to refer to Lewis's departure, perhaps, to upbraid her for her share in causing it; and she trembled so violently that her knees almost refused to support her:—in a moment Lord Bellefield was at her side.

"Take my arm," he said kindly, "the effects of your headache have scarcely passed away even yet." Annie accepted his arm in grateful silence, and in her guileless gentleness of heart accused herself of never having done proper justice to her cousin's kindly nature. As they approached the library he detained her.

"Dear Annie," he said, "it would be affectation on my part to pretend ignorance of the subject on which your father is about to converse with you; the General appears for some cause, which I am not able to divine, especially irritable this morning: do not oppose him unnecessarily; and, should he chance to urge my cause ungently, remember, dear one, how entirely my future happiness is involved in your decision"—as he ceased speaking, he opened the library door without giving her an opportunity to reply, then, leading her in, pressed her hand, cast towards her an appealing glance, and turning, quitted the room. Lord Bellefield was a good tactician: for the first time the idea crossed Annie's mind, "He loves me then," and contrasting his devotion with Lewis's supposed indifference, she pitied him;—could she have seen his change of countenance as the door closed upon him, she would scarcely have done so; his look was that of some fiend who had compassed the destruction of a human soul, the personification of triumphant malevolence.

The General began his harangue: he informed Annie that she was no longer a child, and so far he was right; but he did not add, as he might have done, had he been as well acquainted with the workings of her mind as we happen to be, that the last twenty-four hours had performed the work of years to effect the change from the thoughtless child to the thinking, feeling woman, for the first time cognisant of those fearful realities, LIFE and LOVE! But if the worthy General said nothing of love, he soon discoursed at great length of (we were about thoughtlessly to add) its usual termination, marriage; which institution he looked upon solely in a military point of view; viz. as a solemn alliance between two powers for their mutual benefit;—having given his oratorical powers a good breathing canter around (as he attempted to depict them) the flowery meads of matrimony, he gradually narrowed his circle till he was ambling about his daughter's proposed union with Lord Bellefield, and, having by this time pretty well exhausted his eloquence, he dashed at once in medias res, by inquiring whether she knew any just cause or impediment wherefore the engagement, broken off by him on the ground of her cousin's falsely supposed misconduct, should not there and then be renewed, with a view, at the fitting time, i.e. as soon as she should attain the age of twenty-one, to their becoming man and wife. To this Annie replied with down-cast looks and many blushes, that, if her father had no objection, she had made up her mind to live and die an old maid, she was going to add, like Aunt Martha, but, on second thoughts, doubting whether the association of ideas was likely to aid her cause, she repressed the simile. To this the General merely said "Pish!"

and took snuff contemptuously: so Annie tried another tack.

"If ever," she observed, "she were to marry, it must be a great many years hence; she was such a careless, silly little thing, not at all fit to manage a family. Did not papa remember when she went with him and Charles Leicester on their grouse-shooting expedition, and their cottage was fifteen miles from everywhere, how she forgot to take any tea and sugar, and they were obliged to drink whiskey-and-water for breakfast for nearly a week?"

But to this papa turned a deaf ear, and showed such unequivocal signs of being about to get into a rage, that Annie in despair fell back upon her last argument, which was that, although her cousin Bellefield was very kind to her, and she had always looked upon him and Charles Leicester as her brothers, yet she did not like him well enough to wish to marry him,—“she was sure it was wicked to marry any one unless you loved him better—than anybody else,” she was going to say, but she changed it to, “than she loved Adolphus.” Thereupon the General's anger, scarcely hitherto controlled, burst forth, and he informed her, with great volubility, that she had spoken the truth when she had called herself silly; for that her whole argument was so childish and absurd, that he was perfectly ashamed of it and of her; and that if she chose to talk and act so childishly, she must expect to be treated as a child, and submit to the decision of those who were older and wiser than herself—that he would give her five minutes to reconsider the matter; and if she then refused to consent to a renewal of the engagement, he should begin to fear that she must have some unworthy reason for such continued obstinacy. And as he uttered the last cruel words, he fixed his little sharp eyes upon her, as if he were trying to look her through and through. For a moment his reproach roused somewhat of his own spirit in his daughter; and, drawing herself up proudly, the girl confronted him with flashing eyes and heaving bosom, and then, poor child! the consciousness of her secret attachment rushed upon her, and, with streaming eyes, she threw herself at his feet, exclaiming, “I am very foolish—very wicked. Dearest papa, forgive me, and I will do whatever you wish!”

And thus it came about that the engagement with Lord Bellefield was so speedily renewed.

CHAPTER L.

VINDICATES THE APHORISM, THAT “'TIS AN ILL WIND WHICH BLOWS NO ONE ANY GOOD.”

RICHARD FRERE sat at his breakfast-table; before him stood an egg, untasted, which, having once been hot, was so no longer; whilst a cup of coffee, that had undergone the same refrigerating process, threw out its fragrance unregarded. In his hand was an opened letter: we will take the liberty of peeping over his shoulder, and making our readers acquainted with its contents,—they were as follow:—

"DEAR FRERE.—I have quitted Broadhurst for ever, and broken off all connexion between General Grant and myself. Why I have done this, I cannot tell you now,—years hence, when time shall have seared wounds which now bleed at the slightest touch of memory, you shall know all. I have suffered, and must suffer, much; but suffering appears identical with existence,—at least, in this present phase of being. I am ill in mind and body; the restless spirit within is at length beginning to tell upon even my iron constitution. The mind must have rest if I would continue sane,—the body must be braced by exertion, if I wish not to degenerate into a mere nervous hypochondriac. Accordingly, when you receive this letter, I shall have quitted England. My project—if such vague ideas as mine deserve the title—embraces a walking tour through Europe, which may possibly be extended to Syria and Persia, should my object not be previously attained. At my banker's lies the sum of 500*l.*—the wages (minus the little my travelling expenses will require) of my two years' slavery; before that is exhausted, fresh funds will be placed at the disposal of my mother and sister, or I shall be dead;—in either case, I leave my family as a sacred deposit to your care. Dear old Frere, do not judge me harshly. I am not (if I know my own motives) acting with selfish rashness in this matter. My whole being, intellectual and physical, has received a fearful shock; and the course I propose to pursue appears to offer the only chance of a restoration to a healthy frame of mind. I could not do this, did I not know that in you my mother and Rose will find a more efficient protector than the one they will lose for a season;—I could not do this, did I not love you so well as to have perfect faith in your friendship in the very highest sense of the word. Enough on this head—we know each other. In the unlikely event of pecuniary difficulty arising, apply to Mr. Coke, the solicitor, in Lincoln's Inn. He has my directions also in case of any accident befalling me; and from time to time he will be informed of my whereabouts, as, for at least the next year, I shall not write to any of you—it is my wish to forget that such a country as England exists. I enclose a note for poor Rose;—may I ask you to deliver it in person, and break this matter to her and my mother; as yet they are not even aware that I have quitted Broadhurst. God bless you, and good-bye for—; but we will not pry into the future,—'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.'

"Yours ever, LEWIS ARUNDEL."

This letter Frere read carefully through; having done so, he ejaculated, "Well!" in a tone of the utmost astonishment; then pushing his hair back from his forehead, as if he sought to give his intellectual powers freer play, he steadily reperused it, but apparently with little better success; for when he had a second time arrived at the signature, he gazed round the room with an expression of the most intense perplexity, exclaiming, "I never read such a letter, never!"

Spreading the paper before him, he carefully turned up his wristbands, seized a silver butter-knife, which in his abstraction he believed to be a pen, felt the point to see if it would write, dipped it into the milk by way of ink, and thus prepared, again attacked the mysterious document, sentence by sentence, keeping up during this third reading, a running fire of comments somewhat after the following fashion:—

"Hum! well! he's left Broadhurst for ever, &c. &c., and he can't tell me why now, but will years hence—when he has forgotten all the minute particulars which would make the affair intelligible, I suppose: sensible, very. Thrown away three hundred pounds a-year, with a mother and sister depending upon him, and 'no future prospects,' as they say in all the 'shocking destitution' advertisements. Oh, wise young judge! Well, never mind. 'Scared wounds—existence identical with suffering—restless spirit affecting iron constitution,'—cum multis aliis, &c. Now, all that done into plain English, means that he has got into a state of mind, which, interfering with the gastric juices and all the other corporeal chemicals, has put his digestion out of sorts; ergo, in order to repair damages, he has started on a continental walking tour:—might have done worse; the peristaltic motion will settle the dyspepsia in double quick time; I'm doctor enough to know that. Then he leaves five hundred pounds to support one mother and sister till further notice, or till I receive intelligence of his untimely decease. In the mean time, he very obligingly commits the live stock aforesaid, to my care, as a sacred deposit; so, without being allowed so much as even a voice in the matter, I suddenly find myself plus a mother and sister—more peculiar than pleasant, eh? Well, never mind. Then he asserts the truism that he could not do this without faith in my friendship, mentioning the unnecessary fact that we know each other. Next comes a very funny idea: if the money runs short, I'm to apply to a lawyer of all people in the world. Now, in my innocence I should have fancied just the reverse, and that if we had been burdened with more cash than we knew what to do with, the lawyer would have been the boy to help us out of the difficulty! Well, one lives and learns—what have we next? Oh! my young friend wishes to forget the existence of—England! nothing more—wishes to forget the existence of his own glorious country! The boy's as mad as a March hare. Then he very coolly hands over to me the pleasant task of breaking the news of his most uncomfortable conduct to his left-off mother and sister; and for the prospective performance of all this toil and trouble, he benevolently blesses me, and adducing a text of Scripture, which applies much more to my case than to his own, concludes.

"Well, I should just like anybody to explain to me the meaning of that letter; for, as to making out either what he has done, or what he is going to do, from that document, I'd defy Cedipus himself to accomplish it. Now, let me see what is the first article in my little list of commissions: enlightening our mother and sister, I suppose; and a very hazy style of illumination I expect it will be, unless sister's note should happen to throw some brightness on the matter. 'Poor Rose!' He may well say poor! Why, she dotes on him—actually dotes on him. I'd give anything in the world to have her,—that is, to have a sister love me as that girl loves him. I know she will be miserable; I'm certain of it," and sticking the butter-knife behind his ear, a place in which he still retained the schoolboy habit of putting his pen, Frere rose from his seat, and resuming his soliloquy, began to pace the room with hasty strides.

"What can have induced the boy to throw up his appointment in this insane fashion, I can't conceive. If it were any one else, I should fancy he had misconducted himself, and that the rhapsodical letter was merely an excuse for avoiding a plain statement of a disgraceful truth; but there's something about Lewis Arundel which makes one certain he'd never commit a small sin, or conceal a large one. If he had murdered that scamp Bellefield in a duel, he would have mentioned it directly. Perhaps old Grant has insulted his dignity; Arcades ambo, they're a peppery pair; 'high stomached are they both, and full of ire.' The elder gentleman has a double claim, literal and metaphorical, to the quotation, if I remember his build rightly. Poor Lewis! I expect he is in a dreadful state of mind; I should feel very sorry for him, if I were not so angry with him for bothering Rose in this way. Well, I must think about starting; no science shop for me to-day, or to-morrow either. By-the-by, I must ring for Jemima, and enlighten her as to my movements, and she'll be as cantankerous as a bilious crocodile, I expect. However, it must be done, so here goes;" and giving the bell a very modest pull, he dropped into his reading-chair awaiting the arrival of his acclimated domestic, with a singularly mild, not to say timid expression of countenance.

"Oh, Jemima, I rang—that is to say, the bell rang—to tell you I am obliged to go out of town to-day, and shall not return till to-morrow evening at the earliest," began Frere in an apologetic tone of voice, as his ancient duenna, puffing and blowing from the ascent of the staircase, entered.

As he spoke, the positively cross expression of her antique features advanced a degree, and became comparatively crosser, as she replied with a toss of the head:

"Well, I'm sure! what next, I wonder!" Then addressing her master in a tone of withering contempt, she continued: "Do you know what it is you're a sayin' of, Master Richard?"

"Well, I believe I do," returned Frere, humbly.

"I believe you don't," was the unceremonious rejoinder. "I believe you go on reading them foreign books in heathen Greek till you don't know what you're a saying or a doing of; here you tell me one thing one day, and something liarmetrically contradictory of it the next, till old Nick his blessed self wouldn't know how to act to please you!"

"Why, what have I said contradictory, as you all it?" inquired Frere.

"What have you said?" repeated Jemima, in a tone of intense disgust; "why you've told me to get ready a dinner for six this here very day, and now you say you're a going out of town, and won't be back till to-morrow night. Do you call that behaving as a master of a house ought to do, let alone a sanitary Christian?"

"A true bill, by all that's unlucky," muttered Frere.

"It's a true bill that you'll have to pay, for as fine a couple of chickens as ever was trussed, which is now cast away before swine, for as to 'em keeping till the day after to-morrow, it's a model impossibiltude."

"I should rather have thought a physical one," suggested Frere, sotto voce.

"Then there's a tongue," continued Jemima, unheeding the interruption, "as beautiful a one as ever I set my two eyes on."

"I wonder if it's as long as her own," observed Frere, speculatively pursuing the under current of his private annotations.

"A tongue, that with care and good carving would have lasted you for breakfast for a fortnight."

"Then it would not have gone by any means as fast as a certain unruly member with which I am acquainted," continued the commentator.

"Together with a lovely turbot, which I almost had to go down on my bended knees to get out of the fishmonger, turbots being like pearls of price at this time of year, with three dozen of natives, which was astonished not to be able to procure, so was forced to put up with lobster sauce instead, and a beauty it is now, though it will be non compos uentis by the day after to-morrow, and fit only to make people sick in the dusthole, where it's a sin to let it go, with so many poor starving creatures a wanting it, which was not the case when your blessed mother was upon the face of the earth, in a violent satin gown, a setting you moral copies 'A woeful waist makes wilful want,' and 'My name is Norval, on the (strumpy) Hills,' which ought to have taught you better than to have asked five friends to come here, looking like fools, and yourself the sixth, gone out of town, leaving me to tell 'em so, with the house full of good things all turning bad, and nobody but me to eat 'em, which is a hard trial for an aged woman, that, taking you from the month, ought to be respected, if grey hairs is honourable, which they don't seem to be now-a-days, when we've got a bad lot of wigs over our heads, with half of 'em nothing in 'em but crimped horsehair, I do believe."

Here the worthy woman's breath failing her, Frere was at length able to get in a word or two.

"My good Jemima," he began blandly, "listen to me. When I invited my friends and ordered a dinner, I was of course not aware that I should be suddenly called upon to leave town; such being the case, however, we must make the best of it. I will, therefore, despatch notes to the gentlemen who were to have been my guests, putting them off; and in regard to the comestibles, such as from their animal fabric require cooking, must be cooked, and we must endeavour to consume them in detail at—at our earliest convenience. Now have I slain your Hydra, my good Jomima?"

"I don't understand your gibberish, Master Richard, nor don't want to. My poor dear mistress, which piously departed this life in a mahogany coffin and silver nails, didn't used to talk so, though she'd been brought up at boarding school with the best of pastors and masters to honour and obey, but this I know, that the blessed dinner will go to rack and ruin in spite of all your cooking retail combustibles, and that puts me in mind, what have you been doing with your breakfast? why, goodness gracious! he's never touched a bit of it, and" (here she caught sight of the butter-knife,) "Oh lor, oh lor! if he ain't gone clean demented. What's the matter?" she continued, as Frere, astonished at her unusual vehemence, sought to learn the cause of her disquietude; "what's the matter indeed? Look in the glass, and if you're fit for any place but Bedlam you'll soon see what's the matter."

Thus apostrophized, Frere turned his eyes in the unwonted direction of the chimney glass, and there descriing the butter knife was somewhat disconcerted; and muttering that it must have got there by accident, of its own accord, instead of a pen, he felt that his position was quite untenable, and so, retreating ignominiously to the stronghold of his own bedroom, he busied himself in preparation for his departure, actually going the length of shaving himself, and putting on a decent suit of clothes; another half hour saw him on his road to —.

It was on the afternoon of the same day, that Rose Arundel sat at the window of their little drawing-room, sketching the tower of an old church, which peeped prettily from amid a luxuriant group of giant elms. Mrs. Arundel had gone in a friend's carriage, to execute a host of minor commissions at a neighbouring town, and Rose, having written part of her quota for the next month's magazine, was rewarding her industry by endeavouring to catch a peculiar effect of sunlight on the tower aforesaid. Having worked with brush and pencil for some minutes, she paused to criticise her drawing. It was a faithful copy of the landscape before her, nicely executed, but she shook her head in dissatisfaction.

"It is laboured, and tame," she said, "half a dozen touches from Lewis's pencil would have given the effect twice as well. What a strange thing is the power of genius, the hand creating at a touch the brilliant conceptions of the mind;" and then she drew out some of her brother's sketches in Germany;—bold, free, spirited, and marked by refined, severe taste, skilled alike to select the telling points and reject the commonplace details, save where such details were required to assist in carrying out the leading idea, they all bore indisputable evidence of a true artist-mind.

From the sketches, Rose grew to think of him who had traced them. She had not heard from Lewis for quite three weeks, and his last letter had indicated a mind ill at ease, and Rose had written to him to entreat him to confide in her, if, as she feared, he was unhappy. Why did he not reply to her letter? Answering her question with a sigh, she turned again, pencil in hand, to the window, and perceived a gentleman advancing rapidly along the road leading to their cottage. For a moment her pulse beat quickly: could it be her brother? but Lewis's was a figure not easily to be mistaken, and a second glance convinced her she was wrong; and then she gave a little start, and a bright blush made her look so pretty, that it was quite a shame nobody was there to see her; had there been, perhaps she would not have turned to the glass, and, still blushing and smiling, smoothed the glossy bands of her rich brown hair. Why she performed this ceremony at that particular moment, we leave our female readers to discover, and having done so, of their courtesy to enlighten us. Then, like a puritanical little hypocrite as she was, she reseated herself at her drawing table, sketching away as zealously as if the results of fixature and bandoline had been as little known to the philosophy of the nineteenth century as is the secret of alchemy.

In another minute the full, rich tones of a man's voice were heard, bearing down the shrill expostulations of Rachel:

"Never mind about your mistress, young woman; where's Miss Rose?"

"Up-stairs, sir; but —"

"There, that'll do, 'but me no buts;' let me get by; which is the door?—here we are."

And as he uttered the last words, Frere, tired and dusty, with a carpet bag and a parcel of books in one hand, and his hat and the umbrella in the other, entered the little drawing-room. Rose advanced to receive him with a bright smile.

"This is an unexpected pleasure, Mr. Frere, she said, extending her hand. Frere shook it heartily, squeezing it in the process much harder than was agreeable.

"Why, how prett—a—I mean to say, how well you are looking," he began. "Country air suits you better than the pea-soup-coloured atmosphere of London."

So unable did he appear to remove his eyes from her face, that, in spite of her best endeavours, the becoming blush again overspread her features; turning away as if for the purpose of arranging her drawing materials, she observed:

"Mamma is taking a drive with a friend; I'm afraid she won't return just yet."

"So much the better," began Frere; then, perceiving the rudeness of the remark, he continued, "what I mean is, that I want to talk to you about a letter I've received from Lewis, and I can get on better with you than with mamma, I expect. You and I understand each other, you see; now Mrs. Arundel thinks I'm a bear or thereabouts, and fit for nothing but growling and biting."

"Perhaps I think the same," remarked Rose, smiling at this unexpected proof of his penetration;

"but you spoke of a letter from Lewis; I'm so glad he has written to you, for it's three weeks since I've heard from him.—You are looking grave," she added, hurriedly; then, becoming suddenly alarmed, she continued:—"Something has happened to him, and you have come to break it to us—is it not so?"

Frere regarded her with a good-natured smile, half laughing at, half pitying her, then holding up his finger, as if he were rebuking an impetuous child, he said:—

"How thoroughly woman-like and unreasonable, jumping to a conclusion without any sufficient data to go upon; selecting the most dolorous hypothesis imaginable, and then preparing to afflict yourself at sight of the phantom your own fancy has conjured up; now," he continued, taking her hand and half leading half urging her to the sofa,—"sit down, listen quietly to what I have to tell you—think the matter over with your usual good sense—and then we'll consult together as to the best course to pursue; and if anything useful and expedient can be devised, rely upon me to execute it."

Pale and trembling, but in every other respect collected, Rose obeyed. As soon as she was seated Frere placed himself by her side, and drawing out Lewis's letter, said,

"Your brother has left Broadhurst, and thrown up his tutorship; his reasons for so doing he has not explained to me; but as he evidently wrote in a state of considerable mental agitation, that may account for the omission. Moreover, he promises to tell me all at some future time; he sends also a note for you, which may, perhaps, throw more light upon the matter. Here it is."

So saying, he produced the enclosure, and breaking the seal, handed it to Rose. It ran as follows:—

"Do not fancy me unkind, dearest Rose, or insensible to the blessing (almost the only one now left me,) of your affection, when at this miserable crisis of my fate, I deny myself the consolation of your sympathy: I say deny myself, for wretched as I am, torn as is my soul by the blackest unbelief in the existence of human truth and goodness, I yet know you to be good and true, and love you more entirely than I have ever done. Frere will tell you that I am even now, as you read these words, upon a foreign soil; the length of my self-imposed exile is as yet unfixed, but many months must elapse ere I shall again visit England. Had I come to you, I could not have withheld my confidence; your sympathy would have utterly unmanned me; I should have lost the little strength and self-reliance remaining to me, and have totally succumbed to the blow that has fallen upon me. Rose, love, at times I fancied, when you were staying in Park Crescent, that you divined my secret! The struggle was then going on, and I dreamed in my folly that self-conquest was attainable; thus madly have I accomplished the ruin of my happiness. I have quitted Broadhurst by my own act,—fled to preserve my honour; that and an aching heart are all that remain to me. I trust to you and Frere to communicate this matter to my mother: of course, should you from my broken hints divine the truth, you would never dream of imparting it to her; a thousand reasons forbid it. In regard to Frere I leave you to judge; he is trustworthy as yourself. If he smile at my folly in loving so poor a thing as he holds woman to be, his kind heart will sympathise with my wretchedness, even if my own weakness has produced it. I have entrusted him to pay my mother the usual yearly allowance, and placed funds at his disposal to enable him to do so. While I live, she and you shall never know greater poverty than you endure at present. I go to regain, in foreign travel, the vigour of mind and body which this blow has well-nigh paralysed. Thank God, in your prayers, that He has spared my reason, and left me strength to make this effort: may He watch over you both! In all difficulties apply to Richard Frere. Good-bye, dearest; forgive me the sorrow I occasion you; it seems as though I were fated alike to suffer myself, and to cause suffering to all I love. Yours ever affectionately,

"LEWIS."

Rose perused her brother's letter eagerly; as she proceeded her bright eyes filled with tears. Frere waited until she had concluded, and then without speaking handed her the epistle he himself had received. When she had also finished this, he inquired, "Well, what do you make of it,—anything?"

Rose turned away her head, and drying her eyes, replied with a deep sigh, "Poor fellow, it is only too clear!"

"That's just about the very last remark now that I should have expected any one to make, after having read that letter. What a thing it is to be clever!" observed Frere.

Without noticing his observation, Rose placed in his hand Lewis's letter to herself. Frere read it with a gradually elongating countenance, merely pausing to mutter, "Much he knows about my opinion of women."

Having finished it, he refolded it carefully, and handing it back to Rose, began, "This enlightens us in some degree as to the matter; Lewis has, it seems, fallen in love as they call it, disastrously, with some party unknown."

"Oh, you cannot doubt to whom he refers," exclaimed Rose, earnestly. "It is this to which my fears have pointed ever since I first beheld her; thrown into constant communication with such a creature, one fitted——"

"Why you don't mean to say he's fallen in love with Miss Livingstone?" interrupted Frere, looking the very picture of astonishment.

"This is scarcely a subject on which it is kind to jest, Mr. Frere," rejoined Rose, almost sternly; "of course I refer to that gentle, lovely, fascinating Anne Grant."

"I do assure you I was perfectly serious," returned Frere, hastily. "I wouldn't joke about anything that makes you unhappy, if my life depended upon it; but I never dreamed of its being Annie Grant; why she's engaged to her unpleasant cousin Lord Bellefield."

"I thought the engagement was broken off," observed Rose.

"Aye, but it's on again," resumed Frere. "I met a man yesterday who is one of Bellefield's intimates, and he told me that his lordship was staying at Broadhurst—that he has made up his feud with the General, and that the engagement has been formally renewed."

"Now then I see it all," exclaimed Rose. "Poor Lewis has been long struggling against a deep attachment for that sweet Annie, whom none could know without loving; nourishing, perhaps half unconsciously, a secret hope that she was not wholly indifferent to him, a hope which to an honourable mind like his must have brought more pain than pleasure. And now, this renewal of the engagement must have proved to him how entirely he was mistaken, and, unable to witness his rival's triumph, he has, as he tells me, fled the spot where each kind word from Annie, and every haughty glance from Lord Bellefield would have been like a dagger to his heart. No wonder the mental conflict has nearly maddened him, my poor, poor, Lewis."

Preoccupied by her sympathy for her brother's sorrow, Rose did not observe the effect her words had produced upon Frere; nor was it till he spoke in a low deep voice which trembled with suppressed feeling, that she observed his emotion.

"Aye," he said, more as if communing with his own spirit, than as though he were addressing her, "Aye, it must be a hard thing to love with all the depth of such a passionate nature as Lewis's one who is indifferent to him; but it is a more bitter thing still to see the long years gliding by, and to pass from boyhood to youth, and from youth to manhood, and to find middle age stealing quickly upon you, and never to have had any human being to love you—never to have found any heart on which you might pour out the riches of affection, which every generous nature pants to bestow." He paused—then, as the recollections he had excited, seemed to crowd upon him, continued, "Oh the bitter tears I have shed when scarcely more than a child, I have wept to hear other boys tell of happy homes, and a mother's love, and the affection of brothers and sisters; then came the silent but more enduring sorrow of youth, when tears can no longer form a vent for the heart's isolation, and the restless spirit preys upon itself; and last, the struggle of maturer manhood, which in its meridian strength contends against the sorrows of its weaker morning, and strives to live down the fruitless longing for that affection which it cannot attain, and conquering all but the one abiding grief, remains to own itself still lonely-hearted, and sees its only hope of comfort in the grave. Aye, this is grief, which the help of God alone can enable one to endure."

The deep feeling, the simple manly pathos with which he spoke, were more than Rose, or any true woman could hear unmoved. Laying her hand on his to attract his attention, she said, in a sweet gentle voice, "Indeed, Mr. Frere, you do your friends injustice. Lewis loves you as a brother; my dear father had the warmest affection for you, and often said that if Lewis did but resemble you, if he proved as high-principled, as kind-hearted, and as persevering, his dearest wishes would be fulfilled: even I myself—" she paused, glancing timidly at her companion; but as he remained with his hand pressed upon his brow, apparently buried in abstraction, she gathered courage, and continued—

"Even I feel that in you God has given me a second brother, and that I should be most ungrateful, most unworthy such disinterested kindness as you have invariably shown me, did I not feel the warmest esteem and—and—gratitude——"

And here, suddenly becoming aware that Frere's beautiful eyes were fixed upon her, with the same peculiar expression of delight which she had once before observed in them, on the occasion of his telling her how he had convinced Rasper the irascible of the evil of duelling, poor Rose's eloquence failed her, and she became abruptly silent. Frere paused for a moment, and then, with a forced calmness which scarcely veiled the depth of his emotion, said:

"Dear Rose, forgive me if I am about to cause you pain; but your kindness has afforded me a vision of such exquisite happiness, that it would be a source of endless self-reproach to me, if through any reserve on my part I failed to realize it. Rose, you cannot be my sister, but you can, if you will, hold a far dearer title—you can become my honoured wife. I have loved you long, although it was my sorrow at your departure from London, which first opened my eyes to the nature of my feelings. Since then, my sense of my own unworthiness to aspire to the joy of possessing such an angel has alone kept me silent. Rose, I know my own presumption in thus addressing you; I am aware only too painfully of my own uncouthness, my deficiencies in all the polished conventionalities of life; but if the deepest, tenderest devotion of a heart, which has pined through a life-time, for some object on which to pour forth its treasure of love, can make you happy; if you think that in time you could in some degree return my affection——"

"Oh, hush, hush!" interrupted Rose, in a broken, faltering voice; "I cannot bear to hear you speak thus! If, good and noble as you are, my love can indeed make you happier——"

She could not conclude her sentence, but Frere seemed perfectly satisfied with the fragment as it stood.

The result of the interview may best be gathered from the following remark of Mrs. Arundel, who, returning home about an hour after the occurrence of the conversation above related, declared that when she came in, "she found to her horror and astonishment, ura major all but hugging Rose, and, stranger still, Rose appearing rather flattered by the attention than otherwise."

LIFE AND TIMES OF JOHN EVELYN.

JOHN EVELYN, the author of the famous treatise on Forest-Trees, which has procured for him the name of "Sylva Evelyn," was born in the year of our Lord 1620, and died in 1706, at the ripe age of eighty-six. He lived, therefore, in the reigns of four sovereigns,—Charles I., Charles II., James II., and William III.,—and under the Protectorate of Cromwell. He was an acute observer of some of the most interesting and important incidents recorded in our annals, and he has left behind him, in a valuable and voluminous collection of notes, his impressions on passing events, together with the minutest details of his own life. His personal character appears to have been amiable and exemplary. He was a man of quick sensibilities and strong feelings, an earnest, but not over active partisan, and distinguished among his contemporaries for sound judgment, varied information, and excellent taste.

Evelyn's Diary was first published in 1818, and a subsequent edition appeared in 1827. Both these editions having been long out of print, a republication has been issued;¹ and although the work has been already widely circulated, and often quoted, we venture to think that the readers of this Magazine may not be displeased with another attempt to bring to their notice some portions of its contents. The character of the author, no less than the historical value of the book, will afford, we submit, a sufficient justification for such a course.

The journal from which the original edition was printed, and with which the present one has been compared, is stated to have been written by the author "in a very small close hand," in a quarto volume, containing 700 pages, commencing in 1641, and continued to the end of 1697, and carried on from thence in a smaller book till within a short time before his death. It will be our object to select, and condense in a necessarily brief and imperfect narrative, such portions of this work as appear to us to illustrate most forcibly the character of the writer, and the peculiar features of the period in which he lived.

He was born at the family seat of Wotton, situated in the most fertile and beautiful part of the county of Surrey, about three miles from the town of Dorking, and six from Guildford, on Tuesday the 31st of October, 1620. He was the second son and fourth child of his parents, Richard and Eleanor Evelyn, upon whose excellent qualities he has dwelt with filial fondness. Having been christened, with due solemnity, in the dining-room of Wotton, "according to the forms prescribed by the then glorious church of England," by Parson Higham, the incumbent of the parish,—described in a subsequent portion of the Diary, as "a plain preacher, but innocent and honest man," he was afterwards (in regard, he tells us, to his mother's weakness, "or rather custom of people of quality") put out to nurse, "to one Peter, a neighbour's wife and tenant, of a good, comely, brown, wholesome complexion, and in a most sweet place, towards the hills, flanked with wood, and refreshed with streams;" the affection to which kind of solitude, he adds, "he sucked in with the very milk."

His recollections of childhood are interesting and characteristic. He "was not initiated into any rudiments till near four years of age," when he was taught by "one Frier, at the church-porch of Wotton." In the following year (1625) he was sent to Lewes in Sussex, to pass the remainder of his childhood, under the care of his maternal grandfather. "This was the year," he adds, "in which the pestilence was so epidemical, that there died in London 5,000 a-week, and I well remember the strict watches and examinations upon the ways as we passed." At the age of eight, he was put to learn his Latin rudiments of a Frenchman, living in Lewes, named Citolin. He was subsequently transferred to the care of a Mr. Potts, and then to a free school near the town, where he remained till he was sent to the University. The practice of keeping a diary, and recording therein each day's occurrences, he commenced at a very early period, as the following extract will prove. "1631. There happened now an extraordinary dearth in England, corn bearing an excessive price; and, in imitation of what I had seen my father do, I began to observe matters more punctually, which I did use to set down in a blank almanack." From the age of eleven, therefore, Evelyn became a punctual journalist, though certainly not with the object of gratifying the curiosity of remote posterity.

Among the misfortunes of Evelyn's youth was the loss of an affectionate mother, who died in 1635; and the solemn pathos with which he has described the death-bed scene proves the deep impression that it made upon his mind. It was with no common emotion that he copied into his diary the particulars of her saint-like death. "When near her dissolution," he says, "she laid her hand on every one of her children; and taking solemn leave of my father, with elevated heart and eyes, she quietly expired, and resigned her soul to God." The next great event of his life was his removal to the University, which he entered, as he confesses, badly prepared; going thither "rather out of shame of abiding at school, than for any fitness." On the 10th of May, 1637, he was admitted a fellow-commoner of Balliol College, Oxford, but his University career presents no subject for remark. His father had designed him for the study of the law, and, as was not uncommon at that time, had entered his name, at a very early period, in the books of the Middle Temple. In June, 1640, he became a resident in Essex Court, Temple, occupying with his brother "a very handsome apartment just over against the Hall-court, but four pair of stairs high."

The metropolis had at this juncture begun to wear

(1) "Diary and Correspondence of John Evelyn, F.R.S., author of the 'Sylva.'" Edited from the original MSS. at Wotton, by William Bray, Esq. A new Edition, corrected, revised, and enlarged, 1840." Vols. I. and II.

an alarming aspect. The opposition to the Court was assuming a formidable shape, and the signs of civil discord (destined to admit of no other arbitration than the sword) were everywhere apparent. The growing proofs of insubordination on the part of the citizens of London excited the indignation of the young Templar, as the following passage in his Diary shows:—

"London, and especially the Court, were at this period in frequent disorders, and great insolences were committed by the abused and too happy city; in particular, the Bishop of Canterbury's palace at Lambeth was assaulted by a rude rabble from Southwark, my Lord Chamberlain imprisoned, and many scandalous libels and invectives scattered about the streets, to the reproach of government, and the fermentation of our since distractions."

The next year (1641) had to Evelyn "a sad and lugubrious beginning;" for on the second of January he followed the mourning hearse which contained his father's corpse, to the church at Wotton. He was now bereft of both his parents, and that too, as he observes, at a period when he especially stood in need of their counsel and assistance, being "of a raw, vain, uncertain, and very unwary inclination." Soon after this sad event, he returned to London to pursue his legal studies. He witnessed in Westminster-hall the trial of the Earl of Strafford, and he was also a spectator of the tragic scene that followed.

"On the 12th of May," he writes, "I beheld on Tower-hill the fatal stroke which severed the wisest head in England from the shoulders of the Earl of Strafford, whose crime coming under the cognisance of no human law or statute, a new one was made, not to be a precedent, but his destruction. With what reluctance the king signed the execution, he has sufficiently expressed; to which he imputed his own unjust suffering—to such exorbitancy were things arrived."

Soon after this tragedy, Evelyn departed for the Continent, and visited the principal cities of Flanders and Holland, minutely recording in his Diary the various observations which he was enabled to make during his journey. On his return to the Middle Temple, he witnessed the procession of his majesty through the City, 'after his coming out of Scotland, and a peace proclaimed, with great acclamations and joy of the giddy people.' But these outward appearances of popularity were most delusive, and, to the deep grief of his loyal heart, Evelyn was soon obliged to record a series of disastrous events. Having spent the earlier part of the year 1642 in London, "studying a little, but dancing and fooling more," he was in the autumn roused from his lethargy, by calamitous news, which induced him, as the following extracts show, to take the field for a time in defence of the royal cause.

"3d October [1642]. To Chichester, and hence the next day to see the siege of Portsmouth; for now was that bloody difference between the king and parliament broken out, which ended in the fatal tragedy so many many years after. It was on the day of its being rendered to Sir William Waller; which gave me an opportunity of taking my leave of Colonel Goring, the governor, now embarking for France. This day was fought that signal battle at Edgehill.

"12th November was the battle of Brentford, surprisingly fought, and to the great consternation of the city, had his majesty (as it was believed he would) pursued his advantage. I came in with my horse and arms just at the retreat; but was not permitted to stay longer than the 15th by reason of the army marching to Gloucester; which would have left both me and my brothers exposed to ruin, without any advantage to his majesty.

"7th December. I went from Wotton to London, to see the so much celebrated line of communication, and on the 10th returned to Wotton, nobody knowing of my having been in his majesty's army."

Thus ended his brief campaign. From this period Evelyn continued to prosecute his journeys between Wotton and London, till the turbulence of the times drove him into seclusion. On the 2d of May, he beheld "the furious and zealous people destroy the stately cross in Cheapside," and on the 4th he says, "I returned with no little regret, for the confusion that threatened us. Resolving to possess myself in some quiet, if it might be, in a time of so great jealousy, I built, by my brother's permission, a study, made a fishpond, an island, and some other solitudes and retirements at Wotton; which gave the first occasion of improving them to those water works and gardens which afterwards succeeded them, and became at that time the most famous of England."

After an interval of some months, "finding it impossible to avoid the doing very unhandsome things," which had been hitherto the great cause of his perpetual motions between Wotton and London, he obtained the king's licence to leave the kingdom, and once more set forth upon his travels.

We will not follow him on his journey; for although his observations on the manners and customs of foreign lands are curious and valuable, greater interest attaches, in our mind, to those portions of his Diary which are devoted to the historical events and social usages of his own country. We cannot, however, pass over so large a portion of the work without making a few extracts, and from amongst other passages of general interest we venture to select the following description of the galleys at Marseilles.

"We went then to visit the galleys, being about twenty-five in number. The Capitaine of the Galley Royal gave us most courteous entertainment in his cabin, the slaves in the interim playing both loud and soft music very rarely. Then he showed us how he commanded their motions with a nod, and his whistle, making them row out. The spectacle to me was new and strange, to see so many hundreds of miserably naked persons, their heads being shaven close, and having only high red bonnets, a pair of coarse canvas drawers, their whole backs and legs naked, doubly chained about their middle and legs, in couples, and made fast to their seats, and all commanded in a trice by an imperious and cruel seaman. One Turk amongst the rest he much favoured, who waited on him in his cabin, but with no other dress than the rest, and a chain locked about his leg, but not coupled. This galley was richly carved and gilded, and most of the rest were very beautiful. After bestowing something on the slaves, the capitaine sent a band of them to give us music at dinner where we lodged. I was amazed to contemplate how these miserable creatures lie in their galley crowded together; yet there was hardly one but had some occupation, by which, as leisure and calms permitted, they got some little money, inasmuch as some of them have, after many years of cruel servitude, been able to purchase their liberty. The rising-forward and falling-back at their oar, is a miserable spectacle, and the noise of their chains, with the roaring of the beaten waters, has something of strange and fearful in it to one unaccustomed to it. They are ruled and chastised by strokes on their backs and soles of their feet, on the least disorder, and without the least humanity, yet are they cheerful and full of knavery."

Among other adventures recorded in the minute relation of his travels, Evelyn encountered a violent storm, during a voyage from Cannes (a small port on the Mediterranean) to Genoa. A heavy sea broke over the small vessel in which he had embarked, and all hands were employed in pumping and laving out the water. Happily, a calm succeeded, and he reached Genoa in safety. On his arrival he took up his abode at an inn kept by one Zacharias, an Englishman, who regaled his illustrious countryman with a story that bears no slight resemblance to some of the narratives of the renowned Munchausen.

"I shall never forget," says Evelyn, "a story of our host Zachary, who, on the relation of our peril, told us another of his own being shipwrecked, as he affirmed solemnly, in the middle of a great sea somewhere in the West Indies; that he swam no less than twenty-two leagues to another island, with a tinder-box wrapped up in his hair, which was not so much as wet all the way; that picking up the carpenter's tools with other provisions in a chest, he and the carpenter, who accompanied him, (good swimmers it seems both,) floated the chest before them; and arriving at last in a place full of wood, they built another vessel, and so escaped! After this story we no more talked of our danger, Zachary put us quite down."

His travels in Italy, and more especially a lengthened residence at Rome, furnished Evelyn with much matter for observation; and we have great pleasure in referring the reader to his entertaining narrative. On his return to Paris, he set his affections on the daughter of Sir Richard Browne, the English resident at the French Court; and on the 27th June, 1647, he was married to her, according to the rites of the Protestant Church, by Dr. Earle, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury. In the September following, after a four years' absence, business called him to England. Leaving his young wife in the charge of "an excellent lady and prudent mother," and having duly sealed and declared his Will, he departed on his homeward journey, and reached London in safety on the 2d of October.

He arrived in England at an important juncture. His sovereign was in the hands of enemies, who thirsted for his blood; the reign of the Puritans had commenced; and we can imagine the consternation with which the loyal Evelyn must have contemplated these disastrous events. As soon as circumstances would permit, he did not, however, omit to pay his duty to his unfortunate king; and he duly notified the event in his Journal:—

"[October 5.]—I came to Wotton, the place of my birth, to my brother, and on the 10th to Hampton-Court, where I had the honour to kiss his majesty's hand, and give him an account of several things I had in charge, he being now in the power of those execrable villains who not long after murdered him."

Evelyn remained in England during the whole of the following year (1648). On the 18th of December, he narrates that he "got privately into the council of the rebel army at Whitehall, where he heard horrid villanies;" and not long after this, the blow was struck which had been so painfully apprehended. The terms in which he speaks of the king's trial and death evince the deep impression which these events left upon his mind, and the gloomy horror with which they were regarded by himself and other loyal gentlemen.

"[January 23.]—The villany of the rebels proceeding now so far as to try, condemn, and murder our excellent king on the 30th of this month, struck me with such horror, that I kept the day of his martyrdom a fast, and would not be present at that execrable wickedness, receiving the sad account of it from my brother George and Mr. Owen, who came to visit me this afternoon, and recounted all the circumstances."

We have not hitherto alluded to the piety which formed a distinguishing and important feature in Evelyn's character. But it is not improper that we should mention it here. He proved himself, in dangerous times, a faithful son of the Church of England, and his attachment to her appears to have been augmented by her reverses. When her altars were overthrown, and her pulpits filled with sectaries, he eagerly sought out her persecuted ministers, and attended, occasionally at some personal risk, the few places where her ritual was still read to her devoted adherents. The following extracts from the Diary evince his fervent zeal for the Establishment, and curiously illustrate the history of the period:—

"[March 18, 1649.]—Mr. Owen, a sequestered and learned minister, preached in my parlour, and gave us the blessed Sacrament, now wholly out of use in the parish churches, in which the Presbyterians and fanatics had usurped."

"[March 25th.]—I heard the Common Prayer (a rare thing in these days) in St. Peter's, at Paul's Wharf, London; and in the morning, the Archbishop of Armagh, that pious person and learned man, Usher, in Lincoln's Inn Chapel."

Furnished with a pass from "the rebel Bradshaw, then in great power," in the following June, Evelyn prepared to return to France. There he remained for some months, till business once more recalled him to England. Landing again at Dover, he found Puritanical observances carried to still greater lengths than during his former visits. The day after his arrival being Sunday, he was not permitted to ride post. On the following Sunday, being in London, and "having a mind to see what was doing among the rebels, then in full possession at Whitehall, he went thither, and found one at exorcise in the chapel, after their way; and thence to St. James's, where another was preaching in the court abroad." On another Sunday afternoon, during his short sojourn, he "wandered to divers churches, and found the pulpits full of novices and novelties."

With another pass¹ from Bradshaw, after two months' absence, Evelyn rejoined his wife in Paris. France was at this period full of loyal fugitives, and their society relieved the tedium of exile; whilst the metropolis presented then, as it does now, a succession of objects to gratify the stranger's curiosity. As a specimen of the circumstances which were brought under Evelyn's notice during his stay, and as an illustration of the legal barbarities of the period, we present the reader with the following dreadful sketch of the process of judicial torture at that time made use of in France, to extort confession from a suspected malefactor:—

"[March 11, 1651.]—I went to the châtelet, or prison, where a malefactor was to have the question, or torture, given to him, he refusing to confess the robbery with which he was charged, which was thus:—they first bound his wrist with a strong rope, or small cable, and one end of it to an iron ring made fast to the wall, about four feet from the floor; and then his feet with another cable, fastened about five feet further than his utmost length, to another ring on the floor of the room. Thus suspended, and yet lying but aslant, they slid a horse of wood under the rope which bound his feet, which so exceedingly stiffened it, as severed the fellow's joints in miserable sort, drawing him out at length in an extraordinary manner, he having only a pair of linen drawers on his naked body. Then they questioned him of a robbery (the lieutenant being present, and a clerk that wrote), which not confessing, they put a higher horse under the rope, to increase the torture and extension. In this agony, confessing nothing, the executioner with a horn (just as they drench horses with), stuck the end of it into his mouth, and poured the quantity of two buckets of water down his throat and over him, which so prodigiously swelled him, as would have pitied and affrighted any one to see it. For all this, he denied all that was charged to him. They then let him down, and carried him before a warm fire, to bring him to himself, being now, to all appearance, dead with pain. What became of him, I know not; but the gentleman whom he robbed constantly averred him to be the man; and the fellow's suspicious pale looks, before he knew he should be racked, betrayed some guilt. The lieutenant was also of that opinion, and told us at first sight (for he was a lean, dry, black young man) he would conquer the torture; and so it seems they could not hang him, but did use in such cases, where the evidence is very presumptive, to send them to the galleys, which is as bad as death.

"There was another malefactor to succeed, but the spectacle was so uncomfortable, that I was not able to stay the sight of another. It represented yet to me the intolerable sufferings which our blessed Saviour must needs undergo, when his body was hanging with all its weight upon the nails on the cross."

In 1652 Evelyn reappeared in England. Everything was now in the hands of the rebels, and he could see no prospect of any immediate change; he had led for the last ten years a wandering and unsettled life, and began, not unnaturally, to sigh for seclusion and repose; his own property, and the property of some of his nearest relatives, had been jeopardized by his continual absence, and required his personal superintendence and protection:—these and other circumstances induced him to think seriously of sending over for his wife, (whom he had left behind in France,) and settling down quietly in his own country. Having temporarily taken up his abode at Deptford, on the 14th of March, he writes: "I went to Lewisham, where I heard an honest sermon on 1 Cor. ii. 5—7, being the first Sunday I had been at church since my return, it being now a rare thing to find a priest of the Church of England in a parish pulpit, most of which were filled with Independents and fanatics." On the 29th of April, he notices "that celebrated eclipse of the sun, so much threatened by the astrologers, and which had so exceedingly alarmed the whole nation, that hardly any one would work, nor stir out of their houses. So ridiculously were they abused by knavish and ignorant star-gazers." In the following June, his wife being on her way to England, Evelyn went to Rye to meet her, and on Whit-Sunday he attended the parish church, "where he heard one of the canters, who dismissed the assembly rudely, and without any blessing." At the end of the year we find him in London, where he spent his Christmas. Under the rule of the Puritans, however, this cheerful season had ceased to be observed, except in strict privacy, either by festivity or religious exercises; and Evelyn thus records the fact in his Diary:—

"[25th December.]—Christmas-day; no sermon anywhere, no church being permitted to be open; so observed it at home. The next day we went to Lewisham, where an honest divine preached."

On the 19th of June following there is an entry which must have been made by the writer with a light heart:—

"This day I paid all my debts to a farthing; oh, blessed day!"

On the 21st of August he heard a sermon from good old Parson Higham, endeared to him by many sacred recollections.

"I heard that good old man, Mr. Higham, the parson of the parish of Wotton, where I was born, and who had baptized me, preach, after his very plain way, on Luke, comparing this troublesome world to the sea, the ministers to the fishermen, and the saints to the fish."

We will now throw together a few more extracts from about the same period, which appear to us interesting and characteristic, and require no comment.

"[October] 28th, [1653.]—Went to London, to visit my Lady Gerrard, where I saw that cursed woman called the Lady Norton, of whom it was reported that she spit in our king's face as he went to the scaffold. Indeed, her talk and discourse was like an impudent woman."

"4th December.—Going this day to our church, I was surprised to see a tradesman, a mechanic, step up. I was resolved yet to stay and see what he would make of it. His text was from 2 Sam. xxiii. 20: 'And

(1) It may be observed, that this document, carefully endorsed, "The Pass from the Council of State, 1650" was preserved by Evelyn among his papers; and under Bradshaw's signature was added, "The hand of that villain who sentenced our Charles I. of B[lessed] M[emory]."

Benaiah went down also, and slew a lion in the midst of a pit, in the time of snow.' The purport was, that no danger was to be thought difficult when God called for shedding of blood; inferring, that now the saints were called to destroy temporal governments, with such feculent stuff: so dangerous a crisis were things come to."

"[May] 11th, [1654].—I now observed how the women began to paint themselves, formerly a most ignominious thing."

"[July] 8th, [1656].—I had the curiosity to visit some Quakers here [Ipswich] in prison; a new fanatic sect, of dangerous principles, who show no respect to any man, magistrate, or other, and seem a melancholy, proud sort of people, and exceedingly ignorant. One of these was said to have fasted twenty days; but another, endeavouring to do the like, perished on the tenth, when he would have eaten, but could not."

On Christmas Day, 1657, Mr. Evelyn proceeded to London with his wife to celebrate that holy season. But the ordinances of the church could not be then observed without peril, and the zealous churchman was on this occasion subjected to serious annoyance and inconvenience. The chapel in which the service for the day was being performed, was surrounded with soldiers, who surprised and captured the whole congregation. Evelyn, himself, was apparently treated with some consideration; being confined in a room adjoining the chapel, where he was permitted to dine with his friends. What followed we will give in his own words:—

"In the afternoon came Colonel Whalley, Goffe, and others, from Whitehall, to examine us one by one. Some they committed to the marshal, some to prison. When I came before them, they took my name and abode; examined me why, contrary to the ordinance then made, that none should any longer observe the superstitious time of the Nativity (so esteemed by them), I durst offend, and particularly be at Common Prayers, which they told me was but the mass in English, and particularly pray for Charles Stuart; for which we had no Scripture. I told them we did not pray for Charles Stuart, but for all Christian kings, princes, and governors. They replied, in so doing, we prayed for the king of Spain too, who was their enemy and a papist, with other frivolous and ensnaring questions, and much threatening; and, finding no colour to detain me, they dismissed me, with much pity of my ignorance. These were men of high flight, and above ordinances, and spake spiteful things of our Lord's nativity. As we went up to receive the Sacrament, the miscreants held their muskets against us, as if they would have shot us at the altar; but yet, suffering us to finish the office of communion, as, perhaps, not having instructions what to do, in case they found us in that action. So I got home late the next day. Blessed be God!"

At the beginning of the year 1658, Evelyn sustained a most painful domestic calamity, in the loss of two of his children. The eldest of these was a boy, about five years old, who must have been for his age a prodigy of learning. "At two years and a half old," writes the disconsolate parent, "he could perfectly read any of the English, Latin, French, or Gothic letters, pronouncing the three first languages exactly." Before his fifth year, he had shown a strong passion for Greek, could readily turn English into Latin, and vice versa, and was able to recite a prodigious number of verses and parts of plays.

The dear child was as amiable as he was clever, and was endeared to his parents as much by his docile and affectionate behaviour, as by the remarkable qualities of his mind. "He was all life," says the father, "all prettiness, far from morose, sullen, or childish in anything he said or did. The last time he had been at church, (which was at Greenwich,) I asked him, according to custom, what he remembered of the sermon; 'Two good things, Father, said he, bonum gratie and bonum glorie,' with a just account of what the preacher said."

Although it is a sad tale to dwell upon, we cannot resist the temptation of transcribing the father's touching description of his poor child's death-bed, with the pious and eloquent remarks that accompany it:—

"The day before he died, he called to me; and, in a more serious manner than usual, told me, that for all I loved him so dearly, I should give my house, land, and all my fine things, to his brother Jack,—he should have none of them; and, next morning, when he found himself ill, and that I persuaded him to keep his hands in bed, he demanded whether he might pray to God with his hands unjoined; and a little after, whilst in great agony, whether he should not offend God by using his holy name, so often calling for ease. What shall I say of his frequent pathological ejaculations, uttered of himself?—'Sweet Jesus, save me, deliver me; pardon my sins: let thine angels receive me!' So early knowledge, so much piety and perfection! But thus God, having dressed up a saint fit for himself, would not longer permit him with us, unworthy of the future fruits of this incomparable, hopeful blossom. Such a child I never saw; for such a child I bless God, in whose bosom he is.* * * Here ends the joy of my life, and for which I go even mourning to the grave."

Passing from this melancholy subject, we may notice that it is remarked in the Diary, that "this (1658) had been the severest winter that any man alive had known in England. The crows' feet were frozen to their prey. Islands of ice enclosed both fish and fowl frozen, and some persons in their boats."

The Restoration of royalty—an event for which Evelyn had almost ceased to hope—called forth from him many expressions of joy and thankfulness. In the chain of circumstances which rescued Charles II. on the throne of his ancestors, the pious royalist discerned the finger of Providence, and most devoutly acknowledged the merciful interposition.

"3d May, 1660, came the most happy tidings of his majesty's gracious declaration and applications to the parliament, general, and people, and their dutiful acceptance and acknowledgment, after a most bloody and unreasonable rebellion of near twenty years. Praise be for ever the Lord of heaven, who only doeth wondrous things; because his mercy endureth for ever."

On the 29th of May, Evelyn beheld the triumphant entry of his majesty into London, escorted by a military force of 20,000 men, "who brandished their swords, and shouted with inexpressible joy." The bells rang and the streets were strowed with flowers. The mayor, aldermen, and all the companies, were there in their gayest liveries, with their gold chains, their banners, and every circumstance of civic pomp. The windows and balconies were filled with ladies, the streets were hung with tapestry, the fountains ran with wine, trumpets sounded, and bands of music played in all directions; whilst myriads of people flocked into the city, and from two in the afternoon till nine at night, all was bustle, splendour, and gaiety. Mixing for a time with the crowd, the pious Evelyn stood in the Strand, as the gay procession passed, and, in his own words, "beheld it, and blessed God."

We will not dwell on the splendours of the king's coronation, which took place on the following year, and is duly chronicled by Evelyn. It will be better for us to turn from public events to a few entries which illustrate some of the social characteristics of the period, and the tastes of the journalist. Notwithstanding his serious habits, Evelyn appears to have been tolerably fond of amusement. When the theatres were reopened, he was often found among the polished audiences, who in their antipathy to Puritanism, and in their anxiety to encourage what fanaticism had proscribed, were too often led to countenance and applaud immorality and profaneness. We cannot say much for his theatrical taste, as exhibited in his Diary, although we must recollect it was the taste of the age, and was recommended by royal sanction. Thus, on the 26th of November, 1661, we have the following entry:—

"I saw Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, played; but now the old plays began to disgust this refined age, since his majesty's being so long abroad."

On the following January, he writes:—

"I saw acted 'The Third Part of the Siege of Rhodes. In this acted the fair and famous comedion called Roxalana, from the part she performed; and I think it was the last, she being taken to be the Earl of Oxford's mise. It was in recitative music."

The laxity of morals which began to prevail in the Court awakened many regrets in Evelyn's mind; some unpleasant thoughts obtruded themselves there, which in spite of his ardent and enthusiastic loyalty he could not repress. On the 16th of January, 1662, having spent the day at Blackwall with the Duke of York, he returned to London with his Highness, and then observes that, "this night was acted before his Majesty, 'The Widow,' a lewd play." On the 18th he writes, (and the entry appears to us rather significant,) "I came home to be private a little, not at all affecting the life and hurry of Court." In the following month occurred a great storm, which "made such havoc on land and sea, that several perished in both;" in recording which calamity Evelyn speaks out more boldly and indignantly on the corruptions of the age. "Divers lamentable fires," he adds, "were also kindled at this time; so exceedingly was God's hand against this ungrateful and vicious nation and Court."

In October 1663, Evelyn engaged the nephew of our great Epic poet as tutor to his surviving son. He records the appointment in these words:—

"24th October.—Mr. Edward Phillips came to be my son's preceptor. This gentleman was nephew to Milton, who wrote against Balamasius's 'Defensio,' but was not at all infected with his principles, though brought up by him."

During the prevalence of the terrific pestilence which desolated the metropolis—the Great Plague of 1665—Evelyn displayed his habitual piety, together with considerable fortitude and energy of character. When so many thousands were perishing around him, he did not omit to express his sense of gratitude to Heaven that he and his were left unharmed. It was a dismal period, as the following entries—which we select as brief and characteristic—show:—

"[August] 28th.—The contagion still increasing, and growing now all about us, I sent my wife and whole family (two or three necessary servants excepted) to my brother's at Wotton, being resolved to stay at my house myself, and to look after my charge, trusting in the providence and goodness of God.

"[September 7.]—Came home, there perishing near 10,000 poor creatures weekly; however, I went all along the city and suburbs from Kent-street to St. James's,—a dismal passage, and dangerous to see so many coffins exposed in the streets, now thin of people; the shops shut up, and all in mournful silence, not knowing whose turn might be next."

On the night of the 2d of September, 1666, about ten o'clock, began the Great Fire of London, following close upon the heels of the former calamity which had befallen the ill-fated city. Evelyn was a spectator of the awful spectacle, and has admirably described its terrific grandeur.

"God grant," he says, "mine eyes may never behold the like, who now saw above 10,000 houses all in one flame! The noise, and cracking, and thunder of the impetuous flames, the shrieking of women and children, the hurry of people, the fall of towers, houses, and churches, was like a hideous storm; and the air all about so hot and inflamed, that at the last one was not able to approach it; so that they were forced to stand still, and let the flames burn on, which they did for near two miles in length, and one in breadth."

These calamitous events, however, made but little impression on the king and his courtiers. Open profligacy and impiety were still encouraged in high places, and the theatres were given over to scurrility and indecency.

"This night [October 18th, 1666] was acted," says Evelyn, "my Lord Broghill's tragedy called 'Mustapha,' before their majesties at court, at which I was present, very seldom going to the public theatres for many reasons now, as they were abused to an atheistical liberty," etc. . . . "I was invited by my Lord Chamberlain to see this tragedy, exceedingly well written, though in my mind I did not approve of any such pastime in a time of such judgment and calamities."

As might be readily supposed, Evelyn was deeply affected by the disgrace of Lord Clarendon, one of the staunchest friends of the monarchy, whose gravity of demeanour inspired respect among all its more serious supporters. The fall of such a man indicated the triumph of frivolity and licentiousness over all that was decorous and respectable in the English court. By the gay danciers about Whitehall, and by the king himself, he had been long, and for very obvious reasons, heartily disliked. "His morals as well as his politics," observes Mr. Macaulay, "were those of an earlier generation. . . . On the vices of the young and gay he looked with an aversion almost as bitter and contemptuous as that which he felt for the theological errors of the sectaries. He missed no opportunity of showing his scorn of the mimic revellers, and courtizans who crowded the palace; and the admonitions which he addressed to the king himself were very sharp, and what Charles disliked still more, very long." Still, there were not a few in that corrupt Court who regarded him with respect; and when his disgrace was made known, many indignant expressions escaped the lips of some of those who had suffered and imperilled life and liberty for the royal cause. Evelyn appears, from his Diary, to have taken every opportunity of showing his respect, and expressing his sympathy, for the fallen Chancellor, and thus speaks of his dismissal:—

"27th [August, 1687].—Visited the lord chancellor, to whom his majesty had sent for the seals a few days before; I found him in his bed-chamber, very sad. The parliament had accused him, and he had enemies at Court, especially the buffoons and ladies of pleasure, because he thwarted some of them, and stood in their way. I could name some of the chief. The truth is, he made few friends during his grandeur among the royal sufferers, but advanced the old rebels. He was, however, though no considerable lawyer, one who kept up the forms and substance of things in the nation with more solemnity than some would have had. He was my particular kind friend on all occasions. The cabal, however, prevailed, and that party in parliament. Great division at court concerning him, and divers great persons interceding for him."

From these historical details we turn to a few entries, which illustrate the manners and amusements of the period:—

"4th February, [1688].—I saw the tragedy of 'Hiorace' (written by the virtuous Mrs. Phillips) acted before their majesties. Betwixt each act a masque and antique dance. The excessive gallantry of the ladies was infinite, those especially on that . . . Castlemaine, esteemed at 40,000*l.* and more, far outshining the queen."

"19th June.—To a new play, with several of my relations, 'The Evening Lover,' [perhaps Dryden's comedy of 'An Evening's Love, or, the Mock Astrologer?'] a foolish plot, and very profane. It afflicted me to see how the stage was degenerated and polluted by the licentious times."

"[February] 18th, [1689].—I went with Lord Howard, of Norfolk, to visit Sir William Ducie at Charlton, where we dined. The servants made our coachmen so drunk, that they both fell off their boxes on the heath, where we were fain to leave them, and were driven to London by two servants of my lord's. This barbarous custom of making the masters welcome by intoxicating the servants had now the second time happened to my coachman."

"16th June, [1670].—I went with some friends to the Bear Garden, where was cock-fighting, dog-fighting, bear and bull-baiting, it being a famous day for all these butcherly sports, or rather barbarous cruelties. The bulls did exceedingly well, but the Irish wolf-dog exceeded, which was a tall greyhound, a stately creature indeed, who beat a cruel mastiff. One of the bulls tossed a dog full into a lady's lap, as she sat in one of the boxes, at a considerable height from the arena. Two poor dogs were killed, and so all ended with the ape on horseback, and I most heartily weary of the rude and dirty pastime, which I had not seen, I think, in twenty years before."

We have a curious instance of the perplexities, expenses, and delay of the law, in Evelyn's time, and of the inefficiency of legal arbitrations, in the following entry, under the date of the 26th May, 1671.

"Having brought an action against one Cooke, for money which he had received for me, it had been referred to an arbitration by the recommendation of that excellent good man, the Chief Justice Hales; but, this not succeeding, I went to advise with that famous lawyer, Mr. Jones, of Gray's Inn, and, 27th May, had a trial before Lord Chief Justice Hales; and, after the lawyers had wrangled sufficiently, it was referred to a new arbitration. This was the very first suit at law that ever I had with any creature, and oh that it might be the last!"

Sincerely attached, as we have seen, to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England, Evelyn was affected and annoyed in no slight degree by the encouragement given to the Roman Catholic faith in certain high quarters, and had long begun to apprehend from it the most serious consequences to the nation. He noticed with some alarm the open revival of superstitious ceremonies, and the display of foolish but gorgeous spectacles, calculated to attract the attention of the idle and curious. As an instance of the lengths to which these were carried, we insert his description of an Easter pageant of 1672:—

"4th April.—I went to see the fopperies of the Papists at Somerset House and York House, where now the French ambassador had caused to be represented our blessed Saviour at the paschal supper with his disciples, in figures and puppets made as big as the life, of wax-work, curiously clad, and sitting round a large table; the room nobly hung, and shining with innumerable lamps and candles: this was exposed to all the world; all the city came to see it. Such liberty had the Roman Catholics at this time obtained."

In this month of May following, Evelyn was hastily despatched by his majesty to the Kentish coast, with instructions to watch the motions of the Dutch and English fleets. At Dover he beheld the magnificent squadron, commanded by the Duke of York, sail by, "after the Dutch, who were newly withdrawn," and a "goodly yet terrible sight," he describes it to have been. The next day he took horse for Margate, and "here," he says, "from the North Foreland Light-house-top (which is a Pharos, built of brick, and having on the top a cradle of iron, in which a man attends a great sea-coal fire all the year long, when the nights are dark, for the safeguard of sailors,) we could see our fleet as they lay at anchor." Having arrived at Margate, he was introduced to a rustic Kentish widow, whose portrait is worth insertion:—

"19th. Went to Margate: and, the following day, was carried to see a gallant widow, brought up a farmer's and I think of gigantic race, rich, comely, and exceedingly industrious. She put me in mind of Deborah and Abigail, her house was so plentifully stored with all manner of country provisions, all of her own growth, and all her conveniences so substantial, neat, and well understood; she herself so jolly and hospitable; and her land so trim and rarely husbanded, that it struck me with admiration at her economy."

(1 Macaulay's History of England, vol. i.

Among the many wonders of which Evelyn was an eye-witness, his description of Richardson, the famous fire-eater, is not unworthy of a place:—

"He devoured brimstone on glowing coals before us, chewing and swallowing them; he melted a beer-glass and eat it quite up; then, taking a live coal on his tongue, he put on it a raw oyster, the coal was blown on with bellows till it flamed and sparkled in his mouth, and so remained till the oyster gaped and was quite boiled. Then, he melted pitch and wax with sulphur, which he drank down, as it flamed; I saw it flaming in his mouth a good while; he also took up a thick piece of iron, such as laundresses use to put in their smoothing boxes, when it was fiery-hot, held it between his teeth, then in his hand, and threw it about like a stone; but this, I observed, he cared not to hold very long; then, he stood on a small pot; and bending his body, took a glowing iron with his mouth from between his feet, without touching the pot or ground with his hands; with divers other prodigious feats."

On the 4th of June, 1679, Evelyn, under singular circumstances, dined in the Tower with our friend Pepys, whose diary has furnished so much amusement to posterity. He had been recently committed by the House of Commons, on the absurd charge of having forwarded information to the French court of the state of the English navy, and was furthermore suspected and accused by his opponents of being a Papist. It is not uninteresting to imagine the two men who took such accurate note of every event, and so minutely described the most trivial features of the period in which they lived, conversing together on the politics of the period—the popish plot, the corruptions of the Court, and the prospects of the nation, and indulging each other with their amusing reminiscences.

Although our extracts have been very copious, we cannot refrain from presenting the reader with one or two more recollections of Charles II.'s court; so remarkable for its gaiety, its splendour, and its immorality. In the gilded saloons of Whitehall ambassadors from strange and barbarous lands were often entertained in right hospitable style; and the fair ladies of that brilliant court appear to have been as much enraptured by the presence of the rude Muscovite and swarthy Moor, as our modern damsels by the apparition of the Nepalese ministers.

"This evening," says Evelyn, "[24th January, 1682,] I was at the entertainment of the Morocco ambassador, at the Duchess of Portsmouth's glorious apartments at Whitehall, where was a great banquet of sweetmeats and music; but at which both the ambassador and his retinue behaved themselves with extraordinary moderation and modesty, though placed about a long table, a lady between two Moors, and amongst these were the king's natural children, viz. Lady Lichfield and Sussex, the Duchess of Portsmouth, Nelly, &c. concubines, and cattle of that sort, as splendid as jewels and excess of bravery could make them; the Moors neither admiring nor seeming to regard anything, furniture or the like, with any earnestness, and but decently tasting of the banquet. . . . In this manner was this slave (for he was no more at home) entertained by most of the nobility in town. . . . He went sometimes to the theatres, where, upon any foolish or fantastical action, he could not forbear laughing, but he endeavoured to hide it with extraordinary modesty and gravity. In a word, the Russian ambassador, still at court, behaved himself like a clown, compared to this civil heathen."

The 25th of January, 1685, with a heavy heart, Evelyn made the following note in his Diary:—

"Dr. Dove preached before the king. I saw this evening such a scene of profuse gaming, and the king in the midst of his three concubines, as I had never before seen—luxurious dallying and profaneness."

But a few days after this, on the 2d of February, the profligate monarch was seized with an apoplectic fit; and on the 6th, at half-past eleven in the morning, he gave up the ghost.

"I can never forget," says Evelyn, "the inexpressible luxury and profaneness, gaming, and all dissoluteness, and, as it were, total forgetfulness of God, (it being Sunday evening,) which this day so night I was witness of. . . . Six days after was all in the dust."

This year Evelyn was grievously afflicted by the loss of two daughters; one of whom he describes as a miracle of goodness, and comeliness of mind and person. They both fell victims to that frightful malady, the small-pox, which at that period made such frequent and dreadful ravages. In addition to his private calamities, Evelyn was deeply affected by the gloomy aspect of public affairs. The popish tendencies of the king and his Court filled him with horror and alarm. But though a great bigot, James II. appears to have had less superstitious credulity than is usually attributed to him. In September, 1685, Evelyn waited on the king, at Winchester, and makes the following note of what occurred during his interview with the new sovereign.—

"His majesty was discoursing with the Bishops concerning miracles, and what strange things the Saludadors would do in Spain,—as by creeping into heated ovens without hurt; and that they had a black cross on the roof of their mouths, but yet were commonly notorious and profane wretches; upon which his majesty further said, that he was so extremely difficult of miracles, for fear of being imposed upon, that if he should chance to see one himself, without some other witness, he should apprehend it a delusion of his senses."

With respect to these Saludadors, Evelyn has added in a note, that his friend Mr. Pepys, passing through Spain, and being curious about miracles, (as he was about everything else,) found a very famous Saludador, and "offered a very considerable reward, if he would make a trial of the oven, or any other thing of that kind, before him." The wary miracle-worker, however, seeing that Pepys "was a more than ordinary curious person," respectfully declined, and ingeniously acknowledged that it was all a trick. "This," added Evelyn, "Mr. Pepys affirmed to me; 'but,' said he, 'I did not conceive it fit to interrupt his majesty, who so solemnly told what they pretended to do.'"

Proselytes of all shades of character were now gained over to Rome; though it was the general opinion that Rome gained little credit by some of her converts.

"Dryden, the famous play-writer," says Evelyn, (January 19th, 1686,) "and his two sons, and Mrs. Nelly (miss to the late —) were said to go to mass; such proselytes were no great loss to the Church."

The events of the year 1688 must have excited in Evelyn's mind many conflicting emotions. Notwithstanding his attachment to the son of the martyred king, he could not shut his eyes to the dangerous attacks which had been made on the constitution and the Protestant religion. He witnessed, however, with sorrow the departure of the dethroned monarch; and with some feelings of compunction and regret, transferred his allegiance to a stranger. When the new queen and king were proclaimed, he beheld with indignation the levity and eagerness with which the daughter assumed the father's crown; and, it may be, bitterly called to mind the words of anguish which were wrung from that father's lips,—"God help me, my own children have forsaken me!"

"It was believed," he says, "that both, especially the princess, would have showed some (seeming) reluctance at least, of assuming her father's crown, and made some apology, testifying her regret that he should by his mismanagement necessitate the nation to so extraordinary a proceeding, which would have showed very handsomely to the world, and according to the character given of her piety; consonant also to her husband's first declaration, that there was no intention of deposing the king, but of succouring the nation: but nothing of all this appeared; she came into Whitehall, laughing and jolly, as to a wedding, so as to seem quite transported."

As we approach the conclusion of the Diary, we find fewer entries which are likely to interest the general reader. We will extract one or two, which illustrate the manners of the times, and furnish matter for reflection:—

"[4th February, 1693.] Unheard-of stories of the universal increase of witches in New England; men, women, and children, devoting themselves to the devil, so as to threaten the subversion of the government.—At the same time there was a conspiracy amongst the negroes in Barbadoes, to murder all their masters, discovered by overhearing a discourse of two of the slaves, and so preventing the execution of the design."

"[24th November, 1699.]—Such horrible robberies and murders were committed, as had not been known in this nation; atheism, profaneness, blasphemy, amongst all sorts, portended some judgment, if not amended; on which a society was set on foot, who obliged themselves to endeavour the reforming of it, in London and other places, and began to punish offenders, and put the laws in more strict execution: which God Almighty prosper!"

Notwithstanding his great age and growing infirmities, Evelyn continued to note down the events of his life, with the utmost care and exactness, to the last. He lived till the beginning of the year 1706, and in the latest entry but one which the Diary contains, his cheerful piety shines forth with undiminished lustre.

"1705-6, 1st January.—Making up my accounts for the past year, paid bills, wages, and new-year's gifts, according to custom. Though much indisposed, and in so advanced a stage, I went to our chapel [in London] to give God public thanks, beseeching Almighty God to assist me and my family the ensuing year, if He should yet continue my pilgrimage here, and bring me at last to a better life with Him in His heavenly kingdom. Divers of our friends and relations dined with us this day."

On the 27th of February, Mr. Evelyn died, and was buried at Wotton.

We have not in the course of the present narrative noticed the public employments to which Evelyn was promoted, nor alluded to his various literary performances. But, very recently, a posthumous publication has proceeded from the press, which is deserving of something more than a common notice, and which we regret we have not space at present to review.¹ It is enough to say, that in the work alluded to, Evelyn has defended by eloquent and perspicuous argument the faith that was so admirably illustrated by the practice of his life. We should also add, that the philosopher of Wotton was one of the earliest members of the Royal Society, and enriched its transactions by many valuable contributions. In the present paper, we are fully aware that we have presented nothing that can be called new to a large portion of our readers; but, notwithstanding the familiar nature of its subject-matter, we are not without hope that it may be perused with some interest, or at least regarded with indulgence, as a well-meant homage to the memory of a true Englishman and sincere patriot.

ITALY.

A CHAPTER ON RELICS.

BY S. LEY WOLMER.

Wonders will never cease, and just now that the English world is in a state of excitement at the new cardinal-archbishop seat of the power which aims at such gigantic supremacy, it is quite à propos to take a glance at some of the curious things which are especially associated with the land of the claimed "centre of unity."

These pages are not, however, the place to discuss whether the glorious revelations of Christianity may not be shrouded by too much of outward forms, and pomp, and earthly doctrine. The calm majesty, and the true magnificence of a spiritual worship may only be clouded by union with mysterious adjuncts of human invention,—and the gorgeous display which affects the senses, does not necessarily elevate the affections heavenward, or purify the heart. But who that knows or feels anything of the classic, or the influence of the beautiful, can remember Italy without thoughts of the precious dowry it has received through ages, and the treasures it yet retains? The associations of the past in connexion with its arts, arms, eloquence, and history, throw an indescribable charm over the land, which, though its ancient glories are past, nature delights to brighten still by her changeless smile.

Italy, and Rome in Italy! What pictured remembrances are awakened, as my mind reverts to the scenes of the worship and the wonders of thy church! The pagan temples have either mouldered to ruins, or been adapted for Christian service. Old monasteries and convents now crown the heights, or stand in "lands of valleys and streams," their positions chosen with singular good taste and foresight by their ancient founders. Let me still walk in imagination within the cloisters, where monks meditate on the follies and the sorrows of a world they affect to despise, amid traceried pillars, lovely landscapes, and surrounded by invitations to indolent repose. And then what glorious churches there are in the land, with St. Peter's the monarch of them all! Think of the stately domes, the cathedrals, the baptisteries, and the campaniles or bell towers. Why have we not in England one as beautiful as that of Florence? An emperor of taste once said, that although so grand, it was worthy also from its beauty of being kept under a glass case. How sumptuous are the altars glittering with gems, and covered with silver and gold:—what crowds of priests of all grades, and adorned with all manner of vestments, pass before my mental vision—mitred men, and crosiered abbots, and monks with missals, breviaries, and rosaries; and then I see the swinging of the incense vessels by youths in white garments, and feel the air heavy with odour of frankincense and myrrh. How the light of heaven falls in coloured rays through the richly-stained windows, lighting up altars and monuments and pictures with hues of rainbow beauty. And then there are the shrines with the images of saints, with lights burning before them, and surrounded by votive offerings and pictures of all varieties of shape and subject. Think of the banners and crucifixes, and the processions, and the hundreds of lights burning before the great altar, and the solitary lamp placed within a darkened cell, just to discover and render more forcible the view of the skeleton which is seen dimly underneath.

Shall we try to visit the nuns? No; "Clausura"—shut up—appears on all around, and forbids our progress, but still we can fancy them white-robed, with pensive eyes looking towards heaven from chapels at midnight, when the moon-beams are casting pale light over the marble monuments. What remembered sounds, too, steal back over the mental ear, "like sweet thoughts in a dream,"—the pealing anthem when the full chorus swells, which sounds like a host of rejoicing voices, and then dies away in long-subsiding sounds amidst the aisles! Hark! too, there is the evening bell for vespers from the convent; the sound is coming faintly over some still lake as the sun is setting, and the evening star is discovered just appearing in the clear sky.

But enough—such dreams of the past must cease. Let us awaken to the every-day world—to facts and realities. Italy, fair as it is, beautiful in natural productions, and glorious in the triumphs of art, possesses wealth of another description, more profusely than all the other countries of Europe together. It is the land, par excellence, of saintly and singular relics.

You may find there not the names only, but what is stated to be some actual personal portion of nearly all the saints in the calendar; and not only the churches, but many of the museums boast the possession of objects connected with the deep interests of early Christianity.

Those who have not the faith of the Romish Church, might have feared that some of these precious things would have been lost amidst the uncertainty of the first centuries of the Christian Church, or in the lapse of after ages; but that Church seems to claim a guardianship of relics quite amazing, and that nothing shall be wanted to embellish the land, even angels we are there informed have been called in to do it service, and bring from the very ruins of Nazareth the house of the blessed Virgin herself. This house of our Lady is now at Loretto, and contains a miraculous image of the Virgin, who is represented as quite dark in colour, and is covered with jewels. A large ecclesiastical establishment acts as a kind of body-guard to the treasure.

During a long residence in Italy, I had the opportunity of visiting the most celebrated shrines, and inspecting the most famous of the relics. In offering some reminiscences, I must be permitted to narrate things according to the popular belief in Italy, not as stating my own. I wish to be considered as not referring to religious associations; the facts may be left to the judgment of those who read them.

My attention to relics was first attracted by an announcement in an Italian town, that one of the bones of St. Augustine, which had been dismembered from his skeleton, was to be conveyed to Algeria by some priests, who had been deputed to receive the precious relic—(I believe it was part of the shoulder-blade bone,) and to convey it, as they afterwards did, in a kind of ambassadorial procession, to its destination. In passing through various cities, the relic was duly greeted, or venerated as it is termed by the clergy and people, and services made in honour of the occasion. The bone arrived in Africa, and no doubt will add in due time its proportion of works of wonder.

I shall follow no regular traveller's route in a relic-describing excursion, but pass from one place of interest to another with a greater speed than if there were railway communications between them, which by the way have as yet received very little patronage in the papal dominions.

Our first visit shall be to the cathedral of Savona. Savona is one of the large cities of the Riviera, a term given to the sea coast of the Mediterranean, between Genoa and the French frontier.

It was late in the evening preceding a Good Friday, when I entered the cathedral, and extensive preparations had been made for the celebration of some grand services on the next day.

Near the principal altar a place was decorated as a kind of stage, on which were to be represented on the morrow, the scourging, the crucifixion, and the sepulture of our Saviour! On the Easter Sunday following, the resurrection was to be scenically exhibited, and ~~emblems of sadness~~ were to be changed for festoons of flowers and ornaments of silver and gold, amidst which figures of cherubim were to descend, whilst a thousand lights blazed around them.

The evening closed in whilst I looked over the cathedral, and the lamps burning before several of the altars only shed sufficient light to half discover the ranges of large massive pillars and vaulted roofs of the buildings; but the courtesy of one of the officiating priests, on ascertaining that I was a stranger, enabled me to view objects of interest in the interior of the building, under circumstances calculated to make a more than ordinary impression.

I shall pass over the pictures, and the marbles, and the decorated carvings—there are relics of higher fame. Amidst the “darkness visible,” and with all the associations of night in a cathedral, I and my ghostly guide proceeded from altar to altar.

At one part, he drew aside a silken curtain, and there, within a glass case, the light from the monk's taper fell on a skeleton lying at full length.

It was no little privilege, I was assured, to look on such blessed bones, for they had formerly belonged to Octavianus Benedictus, (I had never heard his name before,) who was both a saint and a martyr some seven hundred years ago. I was glad when the curtain was redrawn. But there was another glass case, and on the curtain being drawn back, there lay a Pope, the grinning head looking out from beneath a triple-crowned tiara, and the fleshless bones adorned with sacerdotal robes—it was all that remained of a Sixtus.

I attended at Savona the rehearsal of some music, which was to accompany a curious image procession, to take place on the Good Friday. The inhabitants of Savona are distinguished for exhibitions of this sort; a former worthy citizen of the place, who had great skill in the art of wood carving, has secured both his own and their fame, by first carving, and then bequeathing to the town, quite an acting company of large life-like figures, by which some of the awful scenes of the passion week might be scenically represented.

A public announcement stated that the authorities of the town, with the various Fraternities and Societies, would accompany these figures in procession to the Cathedral, and that solemn music would be performed during the service; and the inhabitants of Savona were called upon with their accustomed devotedness to do all honour to such an august and interesting ceremony. The large hall, in which the rehearsal took place, was filled with dilettanti, and with visitors; there also were the wooden figures, about thirteen of them, large as life; vivid and graphic in their expression, and clothed in various coloured costumes.

They were in different parts, either standing as solitary figures, or in groups; and as the company moved about, they seemed to mingle with the scene.

There, stands with turbaned head, solemnly scowling on all around, Caiaphas, the High-priest, unaccountably finding himself jostled in the midst of a Savonese musical party. And he, with malignant eye and dark brow, looking like the personification of evil, is Judas, to whose loathed form those fair and innocent youthful living faces, who stand beside him, form such a contrast. There—is the beloved disciple, John; his anxious, yet benignant face, seems to breathe affection. One wishes that those “lips had language.” He stands, as in life, near his Master; but that Master's sacred form, with its deep expression of untold sorrow, and bearing, as he does, that heavy, heavy cross, is no fit subject for such a place, or any comment upon it here.

Close to a stately, yet sorrowful female form, representing the Virgin Mary, is one of the bright-eyed damsels of Savona, who looks at her with an expression so earnest, that one may almost be sure that an “Ave Maria” is passing from her mind if not from her lips. And there—is the Magdalene, and Mary, the mother of John, and Herod, and the Jewish citizens, all looking as if alive again; and to-morrow, the whole wooden society, like so many deputies from Jerusalem itself, will be taken in procession to visit the Cathedral of Savona.

As a contrast, both to the relics and to the figures, let us look in for a moment at the Church of Saint Giacomo, not far from the Cathedral.

The tomb of Chiabrera, a celebrated Italian poet of the seventeenth century is there, and may furnish us with the text for a sermon, as profitable as from the relics themselves. The following striking and beautiful epitaph is on the monument, and is said to have been written by himself:—

“Amico, lo vivendo, cercava conforto
Sul Monte Parnasso,
Tu, meglio consigliato, cercatelo—
Sul Monte Calvario.”

Which may thus be put into an English form:—

“On Mount Parnassus' height I thought
Life's happiness to be;
But seek it thou—more wisely taught—
Upon Mount Calvary.”

Amongst the wonderful things of Naples is a large wooden image, representing the Crucifixion, which is kept with such reverence as to be exhibited but on one day in the year—the day after Christmas. On that day I followed the multitude who were hastening to the church of Santa Maria del Carmine.

The interior was gaily fitted up for a grand spectacle: the pillars were covered with scarlet cloth, and the altars shone with tinsel and artificial flowers. All the peasant population of Naples, in their varied and picturesque costume, seemed either in the church or its neighbourhood.

The ceremony, I imagined, from such an assemblage, was principally for the lower classes; but a kind of make-way movement, communicating itself all around, attracted my attention to the entry of another set of visitors. These were the senators of the city, in their antique velvet mantles and doublets, wearing apologies for wigs, in the shape of some dangling artificial ringlets adorning their cheeks; then came the magistrates in their robes; others with point-lace bands and swords; and a train of judges and counsellors, with square black hats, looking for all the world like so many inquisitors. The official phalanx proceeded to a raised platform prepared at the head of the church, took the seats appointed to their several dignities, and looked on with all due gravity; whilst the crowd before waited in open-mouthed suspense.

All eyes were now directed to an elevated balcony, built at a considerable height in the church, in front of the great altar. A large curtain hid the middle part from view. A ringing of bells in all parts of the church, seeming to vie with each other in the noise they made, called the attention to something about to take place. Numerous priests moved rapidly about, tapers were lighted, and music burst forth; and then some of the ecclesiastics ascended the balcony, and the curtains gradually were drawn aside. The whole congregation were in a moment on their knees, and the sound of artillery from without announced the event of the exposure of the miraculous crucifix.

It was a large cross of black wood, with a black figure on it, intended, of course, for the Saviour. The head was bent down, and a bunch of hair hung on the side.

No one of whom I inquired could give me any precise detail as to the origin of this figure. Exclamation after exclamation, however, assured me it was antichissimo, fumosissimo, and miracolocissimo, (most ancient, most famous, and most miraculous;) and no doubt it would be so indeed, if half that is told of it were true. You are assured that the hair on it not only grows, but increases sometimes to profusion, so as to require cutting; and in this the figure might claim sympathy with the relics of St. Pellegrino himself, which are preserved in another place I have visited, and whose beard now and then needs to be shaved. On this fête-day, if necessary, the hair-cutting was to be performed; and the precious relics taken off, no doubt, would possess some extraordinary powers.

The growth of the hair, however, is not surprising on a head gifted with sufficient sagacity to save itself from a cannon-shot blow. Although the head is now inclined on one side, it was not always so: this useful member was originally much more erect, and remained so until a siege of Naples, in the year 1439, when a cannon-ball, dashing through the church, came in the direct line of the head, which gently bent and turned aside, to allow the shot to pass. The missile rested imbedded in the wall, and the head, in sign of the miracle, never resumed its original position. The shot is now suspended in the church, (and a very formidable ball it is,) with a long explanatory account of all the circumstances appended near it.

At the close of the ceremony, the authorities present were formally presented with a print representing the crucifix, and a short account of the miracle; and, for the benefit of the general visitors, numerous vendors of medals and small pictures, with similar representations, were both inside and outside the church, busy pursuing their vocations; and amongst the most active sellers, I observed one of the monks of the convent.

The municipal officers all paid their respects to the crucifix, which they kissed, and many of the male part of the populace followed their example: female feet are not allowed to pass the convent entrance.

The exterior of the church presented a strange contrast to the interior. Vendors of bonbons, trinkets, rosaries, beads, crucifixes, cakes, and juvenile bijoux, had established their moveable warehouses all around; and an assortment of plaster or wooden figures, principally of a ludicrous character, amongst which were several Punchinellos, also offered their attractions to the crowd.

I waited until the departure of the solemn-looking civic procession, and as it passed, in company with the numerous ecclesiastics and monkish orders, from the church to the portals without, I felt that the whole scene not only offered interest for a tale, but, if rightly considered, would "point a moral" also.

Who has not heard of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius at Naples? It is so often repeated, now-a-days, that it almost ceases to be a miracle.

St. Januarius is the patron saint of the Neapolitans, and appears to have high claims to their confidence, having, on several occasions, as inscriptions record of him, by his active intercession, either prevented the eruptions of Vesuvius, or stopped them when they have commenced; and to show the continued watch he keeps, a large statue of bronze is erected, in which the worthy saint is represented, looking towards the burning mountain, in readiness to interfere on the first appearance of danger.

St. Januarius, it appears by the legends, was a Christian bishop, who, after various attempts to martyrize him ineffectually made by the pagans, ultimately suffered by decapitation, in the reign of the Emperor Diocletian.

On one occasion, he was thrown, with several of his companions, into a burning furnace. However, they all escaped without injury. Another time, the wild beasts to whom he was thrown fell at his feet, like so many lambs, and the Roman prefect by whom he was condemned was struck blind. But Januarius soon restored his sight; a favour which the ungrateful governor repaid by again ordering him to be executed.

There was an old man of Puteolana, where the martyrdom took place, who so much admired the saint that he begged to have a morsel of his garment; upon which Januarius promised that, after his execution, he would give him some remembrance. Accordingly, immediately after the decapitation, he appeared to the old man, presenting him, as a relic, the cloth with which his eyes had just been bound, and which was saturated with his blood. On the return of the persons from the execution, the bandage was exhibited to the authorities, to their utter confusion and astonishment. The cathedral of Naples, amongst its treasures, claims to have some of the blood of St. Januarius:

perhaps this legend may explain something as to the source from whence it was obtained.

One of the chapels of the cathedral is called the Treasury of St. Januarius; and few saints can claim such riches as have been offered at his shrine. The chapel itself, a beautiful piece of architecture, is adorned with paintings of the great masters, and illustrative frescoes, and in different niches around are upwards of thirty large life-size busts of various holy characters, all in silver or silver-gilt, and some of them adorned with precious stones and gems; they form quite a court around the representation of the saint himself. Within the altar are guarded the precious relics of the blood, produced only on grand days and miracle-working occasions. One of these occurred whilst I was at Naples.

Picture the cathedral full of an animated population of Neapolitans, all in expectation, yet all certain that the miracle would be performed. The saint is called upon several fixed times in the year, besides on extra occasions, when his aid is considered necessary. The whole row of the saintly busts are carried in procession, as on a kind of visiting excursion, and placed in due order, perhaps in due precedence, before the high altar, with a wax light burning before each of them. They form a row of silent representative spectators, in silver. But the priests approach, with the sacred cup or ampulla. It is fastened by a silver chain round the neck of an ecclesiastic in full pontificals. The vessel is of silver, and is in form not unlike a small reflecting carriage-lamp, with a long handle below, two round glasses forming the case. Figures of cherubim supporting a crown and a crucifix are above. Within the glasses are two small bottles of unequal dimensions, fixed by a kind of cement at each end. Within one of the bottles is a quantity of red-coloured material, which is evidently not in a liquid state. In the smaller bottle are some stains on the glass, of a dark brown colour.

The Church service is chanted; the prayers are said; the music is pealing through the cathedral; the miracle is performing, for the silver vessel held in the hands of the priest is passing from lip to lip of the thousands who throng to the altar, and kisses, fast as they can be bestowed, are falling upon the consecrated glasses. The mass within is losing its consistency,—it flows from the side:—the miracle is performed. The priests with conscious pride return their thanks to the saint, hold up the ampulla, turn it from side to side, and the admiring crowd view the flowing liquid, and Januarius has gained a new triumph by still showing his affection to the people of Naples. Priests remain during the greater part of the day at the altar, to expose the completed wonder to the veneration of all who may come.

I entered within the rails of the altar to examine, if possible, the relic vessel more closely. As I passed in, the small gates were closed upon me, and I found a ceremonial was to take place before my inspection of the wonder.

One of the officiating priests observing that a stranger was desirous of witnessing the miracle, at once accosted me, and then mentioned the request to the bishop-looking ecclesiastic, who guarded the vase. He rose, put on a sacerdotal garment, and going before the altar, made a genuflection and a prayer, and then taking the vessel, put the chain which held it over his neck, and approaching me, turned the case upside down, and side-ways several times, so that I might be fully satisfied of the contents being liquid. I of course had nothing to say on the subject.

The priest inquired if I was desirous of venerating the relic by kissing it; my manner, however, showing him that I had no such intention, he made a courteous salutation, no doubt secretly pitying one who could have so little reverence for antiquity and St. Januarius.

There are occasions, I was informed, on which St. Januarius is not particularly complaisant, and either will not perform the miracle at all, or takes too much time about it. It seems a pity to state it, but truth must be told. The people become at such times also disagreeable, and actually begin to abuse the saint, call him names, and altogether have been known to act in a very disrespectful way. But we will make no disclosures which may discredit the saint or the lively people who have chosen him as their patron. So let us change the scene; it would be a pity to leave such a prolific neighbourhood without ascertaining the real size of the Virgin Mary's foot. Let us step into the church of Saint Gennaro dei Poveri, (Saint Januarius, patron of the poor.)

There—is the traced outline of the size of the foot of the Virgin against the wall, and if the visitor has any faith in the indulgences granted by popes, he may kiss it if he pleases, and for the "greater glory," as it is expressed, "of the Queen of Heaven," he is privileged also to take a copy of the foot, which by the same authority is blessed with communicative virtues like the original. But here is the announcement itself annexed to the drawing.

"Giusta misura del Piede, della Beatissima Vergine, Madre de Dio, cavata dalla sua vera scarpa chi si conserva, con somma devozione in un monasterio de Spagna.

"Il Papa Giovanni XXII. concesse 300 anni d' indulgenze a che dirà le sue preghiere e bacerà il piede. È permesso per maggior gloria della Regina del Cielo di trarre da questa misura, altre simili, le quali avranno tutte le medesime Indulgenze."

The foot of the Virgin is certainly small enough. Not more than a full span in length, narrow, but a little square-toed.

Naples still further abounds with wonderful things, for, in the Convent Church of San Domenico Maggiore —(Saint Dominic the Greater)—is a celebrated picture

(1) "Exact measure of the foot of the most blessed Virgin, the mother of God, taken from her true shoe, which is preserved with the greatest devotion in a monastery in Spain

"The Pope John the XXII. grants three hundred years of indulgence to whosoever shall say his prayers, and shall kiss the foot.

"It is permitted for the greater glory of the queen of Heaven to draw or take likenesses of this measure, which shall be entitled to the same indulgences."

of the crucifixion; and on one occasion it is asserted that the pictured Saviour audibly and orally approved of the writings of Thomas Aquinas, the angelical doctor. In company with one of the monks of the Order, I visited the chapel. He bent his knee as he entered; the curtain which veiled the picture over the altar was withdrawn, and several wax tapers were lighted, and the custode, or guardian of the church, held one before the picture that I might more carefully examine the figures. I could only discern what was evidently a very old picture, representing the Saviour on the cross, and two figures kneeling beside it. Ornaments of gilt or gold were about the heads; the picture itself and the figures appeared of such obscure colours as to be almost black, and scarcely discernible.

Underneath the altar is a bust of St. Thomas, looking upwards to a small crucifix with the figure of the Saviour on it; from whose mouth proceeds a representation of words:—

"Bene scripsisti di me, Thome:—"

"You have written well of me, Thomas."

The monk informed me that it was an undoubted verity; St. Thomas was at prayer before the crucifixion when these words were pronounced; and, in addition, the question was proposed to him, "Quam mercedem accipies?"—"What reward will you receive?" St. Thomas replied, and his answer may well be admired, whether or not we believe the legend, "Non aliam nisi te, Domine!"—"I will receive nothing but thyself, O Lord."

In the church of Santa Maria Novella, in Florence, on the celebration of a feast-day in honour of St. Vincenzo di Ferrara, his saintly virtues afforded the Dominican preachers a subject for extended eulogy. The miracles stated to have been performed by the saint were numerous and surprising,—so much so as to make Vincenzo, according to the preachers' account, one of the patrons, most worthy to be selected and trusted by the excellent people of Florence,—to whom the monk appealed if they ever had sought assistance from the saint in vain. After the service I observed numbers of the people visiting and kissing a shrine which appeared to be appropriated to St. Vincenzo. In a glass case covered with silver ornaments, was the precious relic of the very walking-stick, or baculus, of the worthy man himself—and a very old-fashioned and shillelagh-like looking twig it was. Its antiquity, however, was unquestionable, for the worms had long ago commenced the destruction of it. Some women rubbed their rosaries against the outside of the case, no doubt to imbibe some virtue from the contact. Underneath the relic I observed a little hole, into which votive offerings of money were constantly made by the faithful.

In one of the chapels in the cathedral of St. Syriacus, at Ancona, is the celebrated picture of the Virgin, which is said to have opened its eyes repeatedly at the time of the French dominion in Italy. The invaders, it is stated, were not very particular in their gallantry to the images of the saints; depriving them of their ornaments with singular inattention to their good looks, or, possibly, thinking they were just as well without such worldly adornments. However this may be, it appears that the picture of the Virgin to which we are now alluding escaped the desecration. Napoleon himself, or one of his generals, was desirous of taking from this picture the splendid jewels with which it was adorned. The order was ruthlessly given in the presence of the picture; when the pictured virgin, opening her eyes—until then downcast in deep modesty—looked touchingly, or fiercely,—I did not hear which—at the captors. The victor was conquered—the jewels were left untouched—and the eyes re-closed. ;

The expression of the face of this painting is beautiful. It is a master-piece of Sassoferrata, whose Madonnas are all beautiful. As I gazed on this lovely face, I tried to imagine what it must have been when life was given to the eyes. It is a pity they must remain cast down and closed as they now are, until some other great event, or another Napoleon awake them from their beautiful repose. A crown of gold is on the Virgin's head, and a bouquet of flowers made of glittering jewels lies on the bosom. I asked the sacristan if any well-attested memorial had been preserved of such a prodigy. "Did it really open its eyes?" I incredulously demanded. "Not once or twice," he replied, "but frequently, during the course of some weeks, in which numbers of persons saw it;" and a record, he assured me, had been kept of the event, and was then still preserved in the archives of the cathedral. I did not, however, see the document, and had I done so, all the assurance it contained would not have convinced me of its having been a miracle, although I might have been convinced of it as a fact; and the means of its accomplishment, I think, could have been shown—one has seen in other places and in other images closed eyes unexpectedly and prettily opened.

Let us pass on to Rome—the Eternal City. It is the very treasury of relics. Shall we enter the catacombs, those vast store-houses from which all Christendom has been supplied with saints' bones for centuries, and which are ready, like inexhaustible mines, to pour forth further treasures whenever required? Shall we spend our days in the Vatican, or at St. Peter's? Shall we visit the Tre Fontane, (the Three Fountains) which sprung up successively as the decapitated head of the blessed apostle St. Paul bounded and rebounded as it fell from the blow of the executioner? Shall we not look within the silver case which contains part of his very skull? or enter the prison where the rude gaoler, in forcing St. Peter himself into the inner dungeon, threw him with such violence against the stone wall, that to leave a record of such indignity, the marble itself became soft, and retains the impression of the apostle's head, for the indignation and advantage of all time? Shall we watch the multitudes ascending the Santa Scala (the Holy Staircase) on a fête-day, on their knees, each believing—or seeming to believe—he is passing over the very steps where, more than 1800 years ago, the blessed feet of the Saviour passed to Herod's judgment hall! or shall we visit first the church of St. Paul—or the church of Santa Maria degli Angeli—or La Santa Croce en Gerusalemme—each fraught with relics for a kingdom—or which other of the beckoning treasure-houses shall we first explore?

The choice demands a pause!

QUEEN MARY AT LANGSIDE.

IN this engraving, the artist has brought before us the Queen of Scots as, surrounded by her train, she watches with intense anxiety the issue of that battle on which her fate depended—which proved, indeed, the fatal turning point of her wavering fortunes. The circumstances of the battle are generally known. Mary was advancing from Hamilton in order to seize Dumbarton, when interrupted on her course at the village of Langside, about a mile and a half from Glasgow, by the Regent Murray, who succeeded in utterly routing her forces. As soon as the unhappy queen beheld their defeat, she fled from the disastrous field, and never halted until she had gained the shelter of Dunsinnan Abbey, on the Solway—a distance of sixty miles. Thence she crossed into England, never again to return to the country over which her reign had been so brief and troublous.

During a recent visit to Glasgow, we took the opportunity of walking over to view the field of battle, in the company of two American gentlemen who had but recently landed, and were deeply interested in the events of a history common to us all. On reaching the little village, which stands on a long ridge of hill, we looked around us for a cicerone—nor had we long to seek. The Scottish peasantry, generally more intelligent than those of the south, are fond of historical and legendary lore; and thus it happened that the very first person we accosted, who was no other than the village blacksmith, plying his craft on the open street, immediately laid down his hammer and accompanied us to a spot where the whole scene lay outstretched before us. With the utmost accuracy he then explained every point connected with the battle, and then directed us to the Castle of Cathcart, whence Mary is traditionally said to have watched the defeat of her troops. It is said that many persons are better acquainted with the prominent scenes of English history from the dramas of Shakspeare than the folios of Hume; the same remark applies to that of Scotland as brought before us in the novels of Sir Walter. Many a reader of "The Abbot," or "The Monastery," is no doubt familiar with the graphic account of this engagement, in which, however, there is an inaccuracy, afterwards corrected by Scott in the notes, namely, that Queen Mary took her stand at the Castle of Crookstone, and not at that of Cathcart, as he afterwards admitted must have been the case. Crossing the scene of the battle from the hill of Langside to the opposite elevation, we stood beneath the venerable tower of Cathcart, almost shrouded from sight by a thick plantation of trees. It stands upon a bold terrace, which, before the existence of this obstruction, commanded a complete view of the scene of the encounter. On the right were the rising grounds over which the queen's army was advancing, the valley at its foot, and, on the other side, the ridge which was occupied by the forces of Murray, and to carry which all the efforts of the queen's troops proved to be ineffectual. We stood probably within a stone's throw of the very spot where once stood the unhappy queen, as she beheld the encounter as it rolled on to the heights of Langside, where the struggle was long and obstinate—gazing with fearful intensity upon the smoke and turmoil of the field—hope and fear alternating by turns in her breast, until her forces were seen in full retreat, and the fugitives, galloping madly from the scene of defeat, confirmed the fatal intelligence.

The old tower of Cathcart that once looked down upon this scene, and perhaps witnessed within its walls the agony of the defeated queen, is now roofless and floorless—rent and cracked with time, and half-shrouded in a mantle of ivy. While on one side it commands the rolling ground which forms the battle field, on the other it impends over a deep and romantic glen. Glasgow is seen in the distance, with its forest of churches and chimneys; and it is a matter of surprise that, in the immediate vicinity of a great manufacturing city, the scene of a battle, which happened two hundred years ago, should be so little changed.

MY FIRST TROUBLE.

BY J. M. W.

"The tear down childhood's cheek that flows
Is like the dew-drop on the rose.
When next the summer breeze comes by
And waves the bush—the flower is dry."

SCOTT.

THAT is a very easy way of settling the matter; and it sounds well, too, in such pretty poetry; but I sometimes think we, grown people, are apt to under-rate the sorrows of a childish heart. I question whether we did not all experience some troubles before our tenth year, which caused us more acute agony—more deadly terror—more sickly heart-chill—than any we have experienced since. In some children there is a refinement of feeling, a delicacy of perception, which is a constant source of pain to them. It is impulsive, intuitive; and as reason is not yet developed in the little creatures, and does not, therefore, act as a controlling power over their feelings, they suffer more than it is possible for a reasonable person to conceive. A child's grief may seem a trifling thing to an adult; but to the child's heart it is terrible, overwhelming, and blackens the whole universe. Look at a sensitive child's countenance when it is disturbed by pain, or pity, or indignation, or sympathy with the sorrow of its parents. Can anything in nature be more affecting? If your heart be not moved when you see a little child unhappy,—(I do not mean cross, or in pain from cutting its finger; but suffering mentally, and unselfishly.)—why, the sooner you get your heart softened, the better. You may stand a chance of figuring as the hero of a story I once heard. A little girl came running home to her parents in great alarm.

“What is the matter, my dear?” asked the father.

“Oh! papa, papa! I have just seen King Herod!”

“King Herod, my dear?” asked the astonished parent. “What made you think it was King Herod?”

“Oh! because he looked as if he could kill little children!”

It has been said before—but it will bear repeating—grown people are not respectful enough to children. They do not pay sufficient respect to their individual tastes, characters, and feelings. They speak of them in a heap—in a mass—as “the children,” just as some folks say always, “the herd,” “the poor.” Of course, the terms are perfectly correct, proper, and indispensable, sometimes; but still, we should do well to remember that the poor and the children have each a distinct, and God-created, immortal individuality; and that each individual is as precious to himself and to his Maker, as you or I, or Cæsar or Napoleon. Perhaps, in this fact of the deficiency of respect in the conduct of adults to children, may be found part of the cause of that lamentable evil of our age,—the want of reverence in children and young persons—ay, and of mature persons, too—for all things but wealth, and power, and show, and renown. If we wish children to revere high things—things simple, and pure, and lovely, and of good report—we must set them the example. Above all, let us teach them (by example) to respect, as much as possible, the feelings and tastes of all persons who are brought into contact with them.

I was talking in this strain the other day to an old gentleman. He was a native of Yorkshire; a simple-hearted, intelligent, shrewd, country gentleman, who knew little of the world beyond his own immediate neighbourhood. But, though he had scarcely ever been out of Yorkshire, he had learned more, and lived more than many a man who has travelled half over the world. He was full of memories and thoughts, stored and worked out within his mind, in the course of sixty years; and his conversation was original, racy, and full of anecdotes concerning person and places with which he was well acquainted. He knew nothing at second-hand. He listened to my talk about the importance of paying respect to children, and the falseness of the doctrine that children do not know what real trouble—real suffering—real, intense grief are, and when I concluded he said,—

“Well now, that’s a doctrine of the modern school which I like to hear. I mind my childhood well; and the time when I was a boy, the time when I was a young man, the time when I was of middle age, and, I know how I feel now. I’ve had my share of this world’s good and ill, and the ill, as you know, was not dealt to me sparingly; my trials and struggles in life have been tough ones; and yet, I believe that some sorrows of my childhood affected me more keenly than anything in after life. The intensity of the pain endured makes me close my eyes and shrink even now; and yet, when I think of the actual causes of such pain, I cannot help laughing, they seem to me, now, so ridiculous, so ludicrously inadequate to the effect they produced at the time. This makes me think how very absurd we shall deem the causes of our present sorrow when we are grown a little older, when we have grown into immortality. Then may we say, In that earthly existence ‘I felt as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child,’ but now ‘I have put away childish things.’ Even then, though we may despise the cause of the grief, I think we cannot (if we retain personal identity) despise the grief itself; grief becomes part and parcel of ourselves; it becomes assimilated with our being, and when we remember it, it is too sacred to be despised or laughed at.

“Now we are on this subject, I will tell you what, as well as I can remember, was my first trouble; what was the trifle that threw my young soul into an agony of grief, and pity, and terrible compunction for the wrong-doing of one near and dear to me. But before I do so, it will be necessary to add another sketch to the picture gallery I have already furnished you with, of the queer, old-world folks, who flourished in my native place before you were born. This personage is no less than the school-mistress. I do not mean the Dame of the village school, who taught in the manner of Shenstone’s heroine, the urchins of the lower classes. No, Miss (or, as she chose to be called, Mistress) Garth was of gentle birth herself, and taught none but children of gentle birth. In our immediate neighbourhood there were many such; for it was composed mainly of the families of small gentry; people who had small estates, and farmed them themselves. Such a thing as a governess at home was never thought of among them; sending the children to a boarding-school in, or near London, was never heard of; indeed, I am not sure that boarding-schools existed in those days. It was the custom for all the respectable families in the vicinity, i.e. within two miles of Carrfell Church, to send their children to be taught by Mistress Garth. Boys and girls both went to her, and were taught together. The boys remained generally under her tuition till they were ten years old, when they were transferred to the teaching of Mr. Crabbe, the clergyman, who kept a select school. The girls remained under the tuition of Mistress Garth till they were fourteen, when they were supposed to have learned all that was necessary to be known by a country young lady. Playing on the harpsichord, working pictures in embroidery, and suchlike worldly vanities and snares of Satan for the female soul, were looked upon with horror by Mistress Garth. She had once known a young lady who had acquired these accomplishments, together with the art of speaking and reading French; and they had been the ruin of her. She afterwards scorned the superintendence of the dairy, the still-room, the laundry, and the kitchen; she wasted several hours a day in unprofitable reading, and in playing tunes and working pictures out of the Bible, in profane silks and coloured cruels, and never could be brought to a right conception of the duty of a country gentlewoman. This young lady had married in opposition to the will of her parents; had lost her husband within two years, and was left a widow, with a child. This extraordinary fate was considered as a special judgment of Providence upon the young lady, for her impious, new-fangled education; and she was always held up as a frightful example by Mistress Garth, when any adventurous parent asked her advice as to the propriety of sending Miss Dorothy or Miss Kitty to her aunt in York, or cousin in Durham, that she might take lessons on the harpsichord from a greatly famous master. But in justice to Mistress Garth, let me hasten to say that she was not actuated in her conduct solely by motives of self-interest. She honestly believed that modern accomplishments for young ladies were extremely dangerous. She thought that what was education enough for herself and their own mothers was education enough for them. If they loved music, they could sing Psalms and old ballads, which she would teach them; if they loved needlework, they could make a hundred useful things instead of wasting time and money upon a badly embroidered picture of 'Moses in the bulrushes' or 'Jephtha and his daughter,' to say nothing of the impiety of working, 'Christ and the doctors' and 'the Crucifixion,' in silk and worsted.

"Later in her life, when a London-bred damsel displayed to Mistress Garth with mute satisfaction a picture of 'Charlotte at the tomb of Werther,' and explained to her that it was taken from a German novel which was 'all the rage' in London; and added a vivid, an enthusiastic account of what the novel was all about, nothing could exceed her astonishment, except her indignation that his Majesty King George the Third and the virtuous Queen Charlotte could sit on their thrones in the Court of London, and suffer such things to go on beneath their very noses. She rose, and ordering her scarlet-hooded cloak, and the boy who carried her lantern, she grasped her gold-headed cane, and with a stately leave-taking, retired from that tea-party, an hour before her usual time for returning home. She would not expose herself to the contaminating effect of the society of that London lady. 'Why, the wretched girl seems to see no harm in anything! She does not know the distinction between good and bad!' the angry old lady said to me, as I followed and respectfully tendered my arm for her support to her own door. 'What will become of this nation, if the next generation grow up like that girl?' I was silent, for I admired the girl. She became my wife; and Mistress Garth never got over my marriage. I was a favourite with her; and she dreaded lest my poor Grace should lead me into the broad path. All Grace's winning ways and endeavours to sooth and convert the old lady from her evil opinion were unavailing. She always pitied me for having married such a woman.

"I say I was a favourite with Mistress Garth; and that reminds me of what I was going to tell you; the little circumstance which caused my first trouble. I was sent to school daily, when I was three years and a-half old. From the first I took a liking—a liking, tempered with awe and terror—to Mistress Garth. She was an extraordinary person in appearance. How shall I describe her? She was more than six feet in height, well-proportioned,

'Erect, sedate, slow, solemn and serene.'

No one ever saw her stoop, or bend; except in church. When she walked, her demeanour was very imposing. Her old-fashioned dress added to its effect. Her gown was of dark brown brocade, (or, on week-days, of stuff,) made with a short train, often tucked up, so as to display the quilted petticoat beneath. A white muslin handkerchief, of many folds, was crossed over her bosom; round her neck was a massy gold chain, suspending a watch which might have come from Nuremberg in the beginning of the sixteenth century. This was fastened, conspicuously, at her girdle. Her head-dress was just such as you never see in these days. She wore her own grey hair combed over a high cushion, and powdered. The face beneath was none of the comeliest; she had large, hard features, with a severe and laughty expression, acquired, probably, by her constant occupation of ruling over rebels. As she sat in her great chair, at the head of the school-room, with her gown spread out carefully on either side, and her gold-headed cane lying on the table beside her, I used to fancy she was like a queen with a sceptre.

"During school-hours the rigid severity of her features never relaxed; but once or twice when they were over, and I was waiting for the servant to fetch me, she would allow me to approach—call to me softly—stroke my hair—look kindly into my face, and try to make me smile. She even allowed me once or twice to look at her huge watch, and from that time I began to love as well as to fear Mistress Garth. This pleased her; and I can remember many little acts of tenderness which I received from that cold, stately dame. I have learned since, that when she was young, (for she, too, was young once,) my father was supposed to have made an impression on her heart. He was a gay and handsome young man; she was plain, unattractive and penniless; when he married a beauty and an heiress, Mistress Garth set up a school in Carrfell. She had taught all my elder brothers and sisters in succession. I was the youngest but one.

"When I had been under her care for two years, or perhaps three—not more, for I was not quite seven years old at the time,—my youngest brother, Reginald, then five years of age, was sent to the school with me. Reginald had been taught to consider school as something unpleasant, and shrank from it accordingly. He was a delicate, excitable child; and I was passionately attached to him. I tried to persuade him that he would be, as I was, quite happy at school; that he would be glad to go every morning when he had got used to it. He had a great dread of Mistress Garth, whom he had seen, at a distance, in church; but into whose face he had never dared to look, lest she should catch him in the act. Her awful height, her unbending dignity, her terrible office of instructor and punisher, made her something fearful to think of. In vain I told him that I liked Mistress Garth. He was not reassured; and when the morning came for his first visit to the school-room, Reginald looked anything but happy. I told him how to behave on first entering the schoolmistress's presence; but he was a petted child, and was disposed to do only what he liked, and I trembled lest by his unruly behaviour my little brother should bring disgrace upon us both. We entered the room, and I made my bow, as usual. Reginald rejected my advice, and would not do so. He walked just as he would have done at home, and when I led him up to Mistress Garth, and said, 'This is Reginald, my little brother, ma'am,' he did not bow, as I told him to do, but stood staring up into her face, with the forefinger of one little hand resting on his ruddy lip. She smiled benignantly, and held out her hand to him. The child did not advance, but frowned hard, while he still stared at her. I was petrified at his conduct. 'Come to me, Master Reginald,' said the schoolmistress in a coaxing tone. To my horror, the little fellow shook his head, and showed decided signs of opposition. I tried to push him forward, and whispered into his ear an entreaty that he would 'be a good boy.' To the surprise of all, the schoolmistress, the surrounding children, and poor little me, Reginald burst into a loud roar of weeping. My heart was a prey to contending emotions. There was shame at the disgrace in the eyes of the whole school; fear of Mistress Garth's displeasure with my brother, and most of all, strong pity for him. That overcame every other feeling, and I threw my arms round his neck, to try to soothe him. In vain;—he wept loudly. The other children found their sympathies excited, and tried to quiet him. Mistress Garth herself tried to take him on her knee; but he kicked and struggled violently at that, and screamed as if his little heart would break. At last she commanded me, in what I thought was an angry tone, to 'sit down and place my little brother beside me.' The whole school sat down, and proceeded to work. Reginald still sobbed and cried, though more quietly. Whenever the schoolmistress looked at him, however, it seemed to increase his trouble, and he cried more. At last her patience seemed exhausted, and she commanded him to 'tell, directly, what he was crying for.' A sob was the only reply. The command was repeated, and the whole school turned with anxious eyes to the little one who dared to disobey Mistress Garth. The command was reiterated, in an angry tone;—and at length, to my confusion, Reginald replied in a broken, sobbing voice, 'Oh! oh! oh!

ma-a-a-am! you are such—such—such—such an ugly woman!'

I turned sick with terror and shame. That my brother should have dared to say or think such a thing!—What a horror!—What a scandal! What would Mistress Garth do to him!—Of course we could never show our faces there again. She, too!—I really loved her. Ah! you may talk of strong feelings and delicate distresses; but I have experienced few of either kinds that affected me so much as this, the first trouble I can remember. I think I have the scene before me now. I dared not look up at the ugly face which had so excited my little brother; for I expected it would be convulsed with wrath. I believe I almost fainted with contending emotions, and was only roused by hearing Mistress Garth say in a cheerful tone, 'Well! well! Never mind, my little man. I am ugly, you think, now: but when you come to know me, you won't think me ugly. Cuthbert, here, does not think me ugly now. Do you? See! Reginald, you have made poor Cuthbert quite ill. You must be a good boy, and leave off crying, or else Cuthbert will be unhappy, and then I cannot let you come to my school any more. Come to me, Cuthbert.'

"I ran into her arms and kissed her. It was so good of her, I thought, not to be angry with Reginald. 'You are not ugly, ma'am!' I whispered; 'Reginald is a naughty boy. I love you! He must not call you ugly.'

"'Hush! hush! my dear,' she replied in the same tone, 'I am ugly, Cuthbert. Ask Papa, when you go home. But that is no reason why you should not love me, you know. A little boy can love an ugly woman, if she is kind to him, and teaches him good things. Reginald will find that out. There, go and kiss him, and take him out to play. Don't scold him for what he said. He said what he thought was the truth. We will make him think differently in time.' This, my first trouble, was the origin of one of the strongest friendships of my life. I never had a better friend than Mistress Garth."

ROMANISM AT HOME AND ABROAD.

THE actual residence of a real live Cardinal among us, is so unlooked for, so astonishing, we were going to say so astounding, an event, the last personage of that dignity in England being no other than Cardinal Pole, the favourite and ferocious adviser of "bloody Queen Mary," that we are naturally tempted to inquire into the habits, functions, and attributes of such an unexpected addition to the British aristocracy; as naturally as the zoologists were last year to ascertain the peculiar characteristics of the hippopotamus, on his arrival in the Regent's Park.

Sir Henry Wotton defined an ambassador as "one who is sent to lie abroad for the benefit of his master." A cardinal we suspect to be somewhat of the same genus, though we do not mean to say that he may "lie abroad" more than at home.

It seems, however, that he may blend his spiritual functions with temporal ones, after the fashion of his impeccable and infallible master, the Pope; at least, so we are informed by a little paper called "The Lamp," which deals out its will-o'-the-wisp rays, for the peculiar enlightenment of the Roman Catholic world, at a penny a week, and is really well worth double the money, for the amusement its absurdities afford.

"A bill for diplomatic relations with Rome," says this tiny luminary, "and on Roman terms," (the italics, we must explain, are the Lamp's, not our own,) "must be passed by the British legislature. Britain must yield, as the younger state should; Rome cannot bend. Her legate must be received at St. James's, and that legate must be a cardinal." And that cardinal, we suppose the "Lamp" means to say, must be Cardinal Wiseman.

We are then informed that the Cardinal's hat will be "quite as attractive and as comely an object, in a court cavalcade, as the jewelled turban of an infidel, or even the variegated caftan of a Persian ambassador." We will not venture to decide this delicate question of the attractive and the comely; indeed, "The Lamp" does its best to frighten it out of our heads, directly after suggesting it, by the startling intelligence, that "the English who rail at Rome and the Archbishop of Westminster," are troubled with such stiff necks, that "nothing less than a special grace from heaven will bow them."

Probably, however, the cardinal-archbishop will be moved by compassion to favour us with his interest with the saints, to provide that special grace for us, in the form of some miracle, after the latest fashion; such as that of the Virgin at Rimini, which during the last summer has condescended repeatedly to open and shut its eyes, "to the great advantage of the faithful," as Pio Nono informs us; though in what the advantage may consist, our heretical eyes are not quick enough to discover. The act itself, however, has been rewarded by his holiness with a crown of gold; a compliment generally paid in Italy to a Virgin that has worked a miracle; and he has, moreover, granted the inauguration of a solemn annual festival in her honour, at the scene of her exploits; dating from the year 1850, of the nineteenth century; much to the amazement, we should imagine, if not to the edification, of those who may happen to hear of it in the twentieth.

This sort of "dodge," however—if we may be allowed to borrow the facetious term used by the "correspondent" of one of our leading journals, relating the despair of an unfortunate Roman, which led him to stab himself in the presence of some of Cardinal Wiseman's fraternity—this sort of dodge would, we fancy, have but little influence upon the proof-requiring temperament of John Bull: more especially as that witty and irreverent rascal Punch, though himself of Italian, and consequently of Catholic extraction, has had the audacity to forestall any such pious fraud, by his most impertinent, or as some of our readers may deem it, pertinent narration of a similar mode of producing rational conviction having already occurred, in a very significant winking of the left eye, by the statue of St. Mary Aze, opposite the Post Office, which winking, we are assured by the same illustrious Signore Pulcinello, simultaneously effected the conversion of thirty-three letter-carriers, and two commercial gentlemen, staying at the Bull and Mouth, to Romanism.

We would advise "the faithful," if they need consolation in this matter, to recollect that one of the venerable Fathers of the Church, whom they so dearly love to cite as authorities, whenever it suits their own views,—yea even one of the most zealous and learned of them, John Chrysostom, of the Golden Mouth, has declared that miracles had ceased in his time; and many others have opined that those which were still pretending to take place, were actually neither more nor less than the work of the devil himself; he having, it should seem, ever since he assumed the similitude of the serpent, a great talent for imitation, which he contrives to exercise with considerable success, "even unto this day."

But the merriment of Punch, or even the tenebrosity of the "Lamp," however diverting they may be for the moment, cannot prevent our regarding this visitation of a cardinal among us, with all the

"Pride, pomp, and circumstance" of his state, as an event not to be placed among either the pleasant or the profitable occurrences of the present year.

We have always considered that if ever the Roman Catholic religion can be seen to advantage anywhere, it is in England; where, till within a very short period, its ceremonies have been confined within the bounds of decency and good sense; its legends and miracles kept out of sight; its most offensive tenets not insisted upon; its rational ones set forth with fairness and moderation; and its ministers, almost without exception, exemplary in the discharge of their spiritual duties, and keeping themselves to those duties; with but little of the base and demoralizing interference in domestic life, which makes the continual presence of their continental brethren, in private families, as loathsome as it is offensive and injurious.

Under this view of the matter, we have regarded with Christian charity, of which pity forms no small part, the instances that have occurred from time to time, of persons, even of superior education, connecting themselves with the worn-out errors of the Romish Church, in preference to abiding by the simpler creed and purer practice of their own. But it must be always borne in mind that every religious question has also a political side; or rather we would say a politico-economical side; as that term conveys more clearly than any other the connexion between the religion of a country and its political organization; consequently, with its moral and intellectual advancement, its social happiness within itself, and the respectability and importance of its position in the scale of nations. It is on these grounds that we abhor the thought of every thing like the retrograde march towards popery in our own realm, or in any other, equally happy, if such can be found, in the possession of religious and civil liberty.

Let us look at those countries where the papal sway is most acknowledged, and shall we not find that they are pre-eminently distinguished for tyranny in their governments, and poverty, ignorance, and degradation among the people? Italy, Spain, Austria; Franco, we might add, but her religion, like her policy, is a mere mask, at the present moment, for the desigus of the president of her nominal republic; a republic professing itself the friend of rational liberty, and which has, nevertheless, basely lent its aid to the re-establishment of the foulest tyranny that ever yet sought to enslave alike the souls and bodies of those who have most unjustly been compelled to bend again beneath its yoke.

Among the arguments that Louis XIV. used with the King of Tonquin, to convert him to Catholicism, he assured his saffron-coloured majesty, that it was not only the highest, noblest, and holiest of religions; but that above all, it was the one most admirably adapted to enable kings to reign absolutely over the people, ("surtout la plus propre pour faire regner ABSOLUMENT sur les peuples.")

Now we are quite ready so far to admit the accusation of the "Lamp," respecting the stiffness of our Protestant necks, as to acknowledge that this last recommendation, whatever it might be in the eyes of le Grand Monarque, and his royal brother of Tonquin, is none at all in ours; not that we pretend to doubt the truth of his majesty's assertion.

We will, however, pass over the political evils, the system of espionnage, the secret accusations, the domiciliary visits, the closed courts of justice, the long incarcerations, the bribery and corruption of the seats of Absolutism and Catholicism we have mentioned, in order to examine more nearly the effects of priestly sway upon the domestic character, and the habits of private life.

M. de Montalembert, and the rest of the Cinque Cento school, would fain lead us back to the middle, nay even to the dark ages; but we will be generous enough not to follow him there, to drag into the light of day the crimes, the abuses, the moral turpitudes of the popes and priests of those times, which have made the history of them so foul a chronicle that no parent would submit it to the eyes of his children, no husband knowingly suffer it to meet those of his wife: well may the Professors of Public Instruction in Italy, "wiser in their generation than the children of light," banish the chair of history from their universities, and anathematize the study of it, as revealing the monstrous profaneness and audacity to which human beings, entrusted with the worst of all power, that of keeping their fellow-creatures in ignorance and absolute subjection, have reached, and would, we doubt not, reach again, if the same opportunity of doing so were afforded them.

But we wish not to look back: the present is a field sufficiently extensive, and sufficiently important to demand all our attention. We have to consider Rome and Romanism as it is; not as it has been; though, alas! in all that rests with itself, it is the same, as far as the WILL goes; and it is only by the opposing WILL, more powerful, because rightly based, of the free and enlightened portion of mankind, that a purer system of moral and religious government can be secured to future generations.

Taking Romanism, then, as it is at this present moment,—what is its effect upon the living society of any country whatsoever, in which its principles are fully developed, its influences fully acknowledged? We will instance Italy; though at the same time, we beg leave to state our full conviction that the papal influence in that country,—so favoured by nature, so cursed for the last thousand years by its priestly government,—is fast falling away.

It is a singular anomaly that whilst the English delight more to visit Italy than any other country in Europe, insomuch that persons of rank and fortune seem to think their lives incomplete if they have not done so, there is yet less sympathy between them and the Italians, than between any other people on the continent. The reason is that the faults of which the Italians have long been accused, as a nation, are precisely those that are most repugnant to an Englishman; viz. lying, cowardice, and superstition. We can afford to grant that they may have had a tendency to those faults, because we are prepared to prove that the majority of them have it no longer. From the charge of cowardice they have for ever exonerated themselves, by their noble bravery and unflinching devotedness in the disastrous campaigns of last year; and it would be easy to prove that all their faults have been the effect of their education and their government, whilst all their virtues are their own. Yes; their kindness of heart, the amenity of their manners, their affability towards their inferiors, their charity and compassion for every kind of suffering, the simplicity of their tastes, the temperance of their habits, their total exemption from personal pride and affectation, their engaging cheerfulness, their quick sensibilities, and their fine intellectual organization, are all their own; whilst, we repeat it, all the failing points that tarnish these admirable qualities, they derive from their priests and rulers.

It is indeed curious to remark how the faults of a government engender their like among the people. The base of the Roman Catholic religion is falsehood; it falsifies everything that passes through its hands—the Scriptures, to begin with; its traditions and its history, its ceremonies and its institutions, all originate in, or are dictated by, some impudent invention or pious exaggeration. There is scarcely a church in Rome of which the dedication is not founded upon, or connected with, some falsehood. The magnificent Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore was built in consequence of a pretended vision of the Virgin, appearing in a fall of snow, in the middle of summer, the remembrance of which is handed down, for the edification of the beholders, year after year, in a festival, wherein the shreds of paper and linen made to fall in showers from the roof, in imitation of the miraculous snow, are eagerly caught at by the multitude, who are taught by the priests now, as they were three hundred years ago, that they possess a saving efficacy in cases of disease. In Santa Maria Trasteverine the image of the Virgin came alone all the way from Jerusalem, and immediately entered into a long conversation with a crucifix in the same church, which expressed its astonishment at seeing her come in—as well it might. In Santa Maria in Cosmedin, she came down direct from heaven, with the miniature portrait of our Lord round her neck. The Temple of Vesta is the depository of a picture of the Virgin, which came floating down the Tiber, and being brought to land, and shut up in a box, filled the place with sunbeams, whenever the lid was lifted up; whereupon it was placed upon the altar; and the temple was in consequence dedicated to the Virgin of the Sun—Santa Maria del Sole. The church of Santa Maria della Pace was built to shelter the image of the Virgin, at whose head an unlucky hand had thrown a stone, and real blood, still shown upon the pavement, followed the sacrilegious blow. Santa Maria del Pianto had a church raised to her, because she was seen to weep, at being put into a dark corner; the real tears, however, are not shown. At SS. Cosimo and Damiano we are informed by a marble tablet, hung up by Gregory the Great, that the image of the Virgin personally rebuked that pontiff, for passing it by, without saluting it. At Santa Maria del Capitol, the Virgin escaped from an obscure niche, in the night, and placed herself in the church, without aid of mortal hands. The church of St. Gallo was raised expressly for the accommodation of a picture of the Virgin, presented by an angel to St. John: we may of course presume it to have been painted by the angel himself. Santa Maria del Pozzo commemorates the finding of an image of the Virgin in a well, the waters of which, it should seem, had had the virtue of imbuing it with miraculous powers. The church of St. Agostino, the wonder of Rome, for the magnificence of the jewels and ornaments offered up to its Virgin, as well from the highest nobles as the most notorious brigands in the land, owes the chief part of its riches to that same image calling out lustily to the monks, to know why they did not come to light her lamp!!

It may scarcely be credited that this impudent and clumsy fabrication was only offered to the public in 1821; that it met with belief at the time, and is believed still, by all those who put their faith in the solemn asseverations of the monks and priests respecting its truth. And this is one branch of the instructing of the people, and the training them up to regard veracity as a moral duty!

But what is to be said of these things, when Pio Nono himself has so recently, as we have already stated, professed his solemn belief in, and his religious veneration of, the shameless imposture at Rimini; so clumsily performed by a monk standing behind the “miraculous” image of the Virgin, and pulling its eyes, made movable for the purpose, backward and forward by a string, that the cheat would not escape detection five minutes at Bartholomew Fair? If Pio Nono really believes in this senseless and useless pretended miracle, he must be one of the weakest and most ignorant of men; if not, he must be one of the falsest;—and if he will thus deliberately lend his pious aid to deceiving his subjects in one thing, will he not equally do so in another? yea, in any and every thing; whenever it may suit either his own purposes, or those of the ambitious and crafty cardinals whose tool he has become?

We have only mentioned a few of the instances of these pious impostures, with which we could fill a volume; and those we have confined to the Virgin Mary: but we might go through the whole calendar of saints, in the same manner; and we will not hesitate to affirm, that out of the three hundred and twenty churches of Rome, with all their attendant chapels and oratories, there is not one that does not, either by picture, image, tablet, or tradition, insult the understanding, and pain the feelings, of a really rational and devout observer.

A witty writer has said, “Rome is a great lie.” The adoration of the pope is the public acting of this lie; the effects of which circulate throughout the community. From their earliest infancy, the people see nothing but falsehood before them. They are taught legends and miracles, which revolt the common sense of the humblest and most ignorant among them: they are told that they must confess their sins, in order to obtain pardon through repentance: their confession made, and their absolution granted, which when their offence is only against their neighbour, and not against the Church, is a very easy matter, they see they have gained a licence to repeat the same sins, on the same lip-deep conditions.

They see their Spiritual Head pretending to infallibility, and every day committing the greatest errors, and falling into the grossest inconsistencies; they see men “clothed in purple and fine linen,” aspiring to succeed him as “the servant of the servants of God;” they see troops of idle able-bodied men, living upon the industry of the working classes, for “the love of God,” that God who has decreed that all men should labour, and whose apostle says, “Is there any man among you who will not work, neither let him eat.”

Children see their mothers conceal money for the priests, and hear them tell falsehoods to their husbands to account for its disappearance. For these falsehoods, however, a salvo is afforded to their consciences in the Secreta Moneta of the Jesuits. One of the chapters is headed, “How to gain rich widows;” the next, “The art of seducing widows, and gaining possession of their goods;” and another, the sixteenth, runs thus: “Let women who complain of the vices of their husbands, and the grievances they suffer from them, be taught to get money from them secretly, in order to apply it to the expiation of their sins, and the procuring of pardon for them.”

The youths who are intended for the priesthood are initiated into such precious councils as these, as soon as it appears they may be safely trusted with them; and meanwhile, what are the preparatory steps of their education? They learn from Cardinal Baronius, the oracle to whom they are taught to look up, that the popes have "never erred." For the truth of this assertion, "I appeal," says he,—to whom? "to the popes themselves!" and this too in treating of times when their holinesses, to all impartial judgment, seemed to do nothing but err. He is, however, right enough in appealing to themselves, for the eighth Boniface, who, nevertheless, by some strange mistake of the Council of Paris, was pronounced guilty of every vice that a human being could commit, declares that "when the powers of the earth are in error, they ought to be judged by the spiritual power, which is always incarnate in the person of the pope; who himself can be judged by God alone; never by man." The reason assigned for this is, that the spiritual authority, though consigned to a human being, and exercised by a human being, is always, in itself, more divine than human; "therefore," this infallible spiritual power sums up, "whoever resists the pope, resists the orders of God."

In the same spirit Cardinal Baronius exclaims, in a sort of ecstatic transport, "To the Pope there is given all power in heaven and upon the earth; he reigneth from sea to sea, and from the flood to the end of the world." This blasphemous effusion is to be found in his epistle against the Venetians; wherein he moreover affirms that "the ministry of the representatives of St. Peter is two-fold, namely, to feed and to slay, according to the saying, 'Feed my sheep,' and according to that other saying, 'Kill, and eat.' For when the bishop hath to deal with refractory and wicked persons, (such as the Venetians are,) then Peter is commanded to kill and eat them, and to bury them in his own bowels."

Now, we should verily believe that Pio Nono has been studying this latter text, with the zealous cardinal's commentary upon it, only we strongly suspect that he has no bowels; notwithstanding the goodly show he made of an increase in them on his return from Mola di Gaeta; ergo, he cannot bury his stray sheep therein, whatever his pastoral appetite might lead him to desire.

We are next told, that "the Pope may do all things that God himself may do;" and, vice versa, we might suggest, that he may not do anything which God will not do. Let us, however, leave Baronius and his school, and follow our young neophyte into the college of the Jesuits, which is as much the fashionable place of education in Rome as Oxford is in England. Here, treated with alternate mildness and severity, he gradually begins to merge his individuality into the spirit of that Order which seeks to spread its invisible fetters over the earth, as the indefatigable spider weaves its scarcely palpable threads, with unerring precision, to entrap the unwary fly. Kept on his knees for hours together, in the outward practice of the most wearisome and senseless forms of devotion, the dry repetition of his Latin prayers, varied but by the perusal of the life of the founder, or the miracles of the saints, he is only consoled for the smothering of all natural affections, the renunciation of all innocent enjoyments, by the ambition of becoming eminent in the Society; an ambition fanned from day to day, and from hour to hour, by the plausible and crafty brethren that surround him, who seek, by implanting it in his young breast, to fill up the "aching void" which the rooting up of all its best feelings must otherwise leave.

He is gradually moulded like wax in the hand of the modeller, to take any form that may be suited to the missions or offices intended to be consigned to him. He is perfected in passive obedience, nay, the most slavish subserviency to the superiors, and in the art of obtaining, on a lesser scale, implicit influence over those below him. He is by cautious degrees made acquainted with the full value of that golden maxim of the Jesuits, the foundation of all their power, that "the end sanctifies the means," or, in other words, that all means are allowable for the attainment of their object, provided always that such means are employed with the secrecy and subtlety requisite to preserve the Order from disgrace, and its members from suspicion. This maxim, the most mischievous and deceitful weapon ever wielded by him who was "a liar from the beginning," is engraved from day to day in deeper characters upon the memory of the young aspirant, and exhibited to him continually in the actions of his teachers.

We have known English Protestant fathers send their sons to Jesuit colleges in England, under the idea that the practice of confession must of necessity act as a salutary check upon their moral conduct. Little do these fathers know the use to which that confession is turned; that it is not only made the means of drawing forth from the youths themselves every possible particular relating to the habits, pursuits, circumstances and connexions of their parents, relatives, and intimates, of all which a regular account is entered from time to time into a large volume; (a sort of annual register or spiritual ledger, alphabetically arranged for the purpose, and kept from year to year, ready for reference as occasion may call for;) but that it is also the chief instrument by which the affections of those young men are alienated from their natural ties; inasmuch that we feel a perfect conviction that no one ever left a Jesuit's college with the same respect and love for his parents, and the same confidence in them, that he took into it with him; and moreover that the saying, "Once a Jesuit and always a Jesuit," is so firmly grounded in truth and experience, that scarcely any one whose natural perceptions of integrity have been warped under Jesuit tuition in his youth, can entirely shake off the influence of that tuition during the remainder of his life. It is a dear price to pay for classical learning and natural decorum of manners. We have also known many fathers in Italy who have taken their sons away from the Jesuit colleges, in consequence of never being allowed to see them alone, or even to write to them; justly preferring to forego the prospects of worldly advancement for their children rather than relinquish their affection. We might indeed give such statements of the general plan of education throughout Rome, as would at once show the evil of its being confided to priests alone. It is a perpetual subject of grief and vexation to parents, who, having experienced all the inconveniences resulting from it to themselves, ardently desire to secure something better to their children; but our present limits only allow us to glance at the various themes which the discussion of the papal sway might open to us. One, however, is so universal, so fatal to the best interests of society, and the finest feelings of the heart, that we cannot pass it over without remark. We mean the demoralization of the female sex under priestly influence. When wives and mothers are legally corrupted, if we may so express it, how can it be expected that husbands and sons will be manly and honourable? "When the priest comes in," said a Roman gentleman to us, one day, "the husband has nothing to do but to put on his hat, and walk out." He bitterly complained at the same time, that in all cases of matrimonial differences, even such slight ones as "will happen in the best regulated families," the wife always flew to the priest, who in order to increase his influence over her, more frequently endeavoured to widen the breach, than to persuade her either to frank explanation or affectionate submission. How would an English husband like this sort of perpetual interference? A Protestant would not submit to it one single day, and we rather think even a Catholic would find it hard of digestion, in this our fortunate land, where every man's house is his castle, and where, however hospitable he may be, he expects his guests to be of his own inviting.

It is to strengthen their influence over the female sex that the church of Rome insists so strongly upon the celibacy of her priests, regardless of the frightful evils into which they have been plunged by the unnatural and impious law ever since its establishment, which acts in direct opposition to the will of the Creator, sets his fiat at naught, and requires the murderous stifling of all the sacred feelings which He has implanted in our breasts at once for the preservation and happiness of human society. Nevertheless it is far too valuable an adjunct to priestly power to be abandoned. Without it, priests would approach their female penitents and parishioners on the same footing as other men, and would have no excuse for working on the compassion of their nature for further consideration. But we respect our readers too much to lift up the insidious veil thrown by sanctified hands over the corruptions and deceits they introduce into the bosom of families. Confession and the celibacy of the priest are, we repeat it, the great hinges on which the whole papal structure turns; but they are rusting more and more every day, and the portentous creakings sound the note for their final standing still, and that at no distant period. Already the Pope has found to his dismay, by a careful reckoning up of the tickets of confession given in the present year, at Easter, as usual, and of which he issued private directions for secret notes to be taken and sent to him, that not more than one-third of the Roman population had actually visited the confessional, although at that season it is, that all are obliged to confess, who ever confess at all; under pain of having their names pasted on the church-doors, if they are found missing.

There is in England a large class of persons secretly converted of late years to popery, and that is, domestic servants, particularly female ones. Their employers remain in ignorance of the change of religion in those around them, who must unavoidably be familiar with their habits, pursuits, and even their opinions. All these are delicately wormed out of the converts, by the artifices of Jesuit confessors, to be by them reported to the Fountain Head, whenever the information may be deemed likely to be of use at a future period.

"When we took possession of the convent where the tribunal of the Inquisition had its seat," says Signor Nicolini, Staff Officer in Rome during the republic, in a highly interesting pamphlet he has just published, under the title of "the Fifth of November," "among other books we found a secret correspondence directed to the Pope, as president of the Inquisition, and just glancing through it, we were astonished to find that most of those letters or reports came from England, written by various prelates and priests residing there. Dr. Wiseman was one of the most voluminous correspondents. In those epistles was a minute account of the conduct and transactions of several English and Irish gentlemen; in them the writer particularly pointed out what might be expected from the one, and dreaded from the other; the tendency of the opinions of these different parties was particularly indicated; their character, their inclination, their taste described with graphic accuracy; hopes were entertained of finding in Puseyites and some bishops, powerful allies for bringing back England under the Popish yoke; and in all those letters the writers never omitted to say, To conform ourselves to your holiness's wish, we send you a report of the state of religion in England, and we are happy to say that it is most favourable." (P. 15.) For the truth of this statement, Signor Nicolini pledges his word of honour, and says that he can call witnesses of the most unexceptionable honour and integrity in corroboration of it: but his own reputation as a man equally honourable and brave, is quite sufficient guarantee to those who know him, for the correctness of all that he says; and those who do not, will be content to take it upon its own good sense and reasonableness. The whole of the correspondence is still in existence, and may speedily be given to the world. Signor Nicolini, meanwhile, only adds his warning voice to the thousands that are already lifted up to protest against the shameless and monstrous assumption of the court of Rome over our constitution and our social liberties.

We have erred hitherto on the right side, that of generosity and liberality. Our motives have been misunderstood, our concessions abused, and it is high time that we should be explicit in explaining our sentiments, and firm in maintaining them.

The prompt removal of English Catholics from their official situations at Rome, Florence, and Malta, which they have lately filled, by one of the mistaken acts of liberality the effects of which are now developing themselves, is one of the first steps that has been taken by Government towards a reform in our foreign department. Of the fallen, as of the dead, we wish not to speak harshly; truth might sound like harshness, so of them we say no more; but this we feel called upon to declare, that from the lowest step in the Romish ladder up to the topmost, it appears to us impossible that a staunch Roman Catholic can be a faithful and loyal subject, under any Protestant power whatsoever. Indeed, in no mere worldly thing can the heavenly precept of our blessed Lord, "No man can serve two masters," be more clearly exemplified than in this instance. It may in vain be urged that a liberal Roman Catholic will find means of reconciling his duty to both—there is no such thing in creation as a liberal Roman Catholic. A Roman Catholic must be devoted soul and body to the Pope of Rome, or he is no Roman Catholic at all. He may believe in particular dogmas, he may be obedient to all the outward observances required of him, but unless he "goes the whole hog," (to use a most forcible, though, we acknowledge, very vulgar English phrase,) unless he acknowledges the infallibility of the Pope, and consequently his own duty of entire submission to him in all things divine and human, he is no Roman Catholic. How then can the Cardinal-Archbishop of Westminster evade or palliate the oath which he took when he was consecrated bishop, to extirpate heresy, to wage war with all heretics, and to labour to the utmost of his power to support the Roman Catholic faith? Can he be at the same time a sincere and active bishop to the Pope, and a loyal and true subject to Queen Victoria, under whose wise and just laws he is permitted to reside in this country in peace, and yet whom as a heretic he is bound to dethrone, should it come within his power so to do; and whose Protestant subjects he has vowed to watch and betray, instead of regarding them as neighbours, and endeavouring to conciliate them as friends?

We do not enter into a view of the continental disturbances in which we may be involved by the insidious arts of the court of Rome, and the selfish policy of France and Austria in upholding her misdeeds; first, because we have no fear of them, and secondly, because we have confined our observations to what we may call a home view of the question, and its influence upon the principles of our own people, and the comfort and integrity of our own firesides. When the Austrians advanced towards Rome, in the time of the republic, the priests preached in the surrounding towns and villages, that the emperor was a descendant from king David, consequently was a relation of the Virgin Mary, and that it was, therefore, unholy and impious to make war against him. We fancy the priests would have some difficulty in establishing a similar claim for non-resistance in the cardinal-archbishop Wiseman's good see of Westminster; nor do we think that General Haynau himself would be very fond of marching up Bankside, and beginning to storm Barclay and Perkins's brewery, even with his Croats at his back, and the hangman and the flogger-in-ordinary bringing up the rear. But how ready the spirit of persecution and absolutism is to develop itself, wherever the Papal influence extends, may easily be seen in the language of the journals that are their tools and advocates. The Univers found the rejoicings in the metropolis, on the 5th of November, over the bon-fires, (which, fed with the effigies of the Archbishop of Westminster, did, it must be acknowledged, blaze up with portentous brilliancy,) "a disgrace to the government that tolerated them." What then would it have advised should be done with the offenders? Would it have had them beheaded, forthwith, on Tower Hill? or would it have had them made a bon-fire of, themselves, in Smithfield? or would it have been merciful enough to content itself with simply recommending the treadmill as a gentle sedative for their too buoyant spirits? Still, we repeat, it is the enemies within, and not those without, from whom we have the most to fear, against whom it behoves us to be most upon our guard. Jeremy Taylor, quoting the words of Sackville respecting the Jesuits, says, they "did more prevail by whispering to ladies, than all the Church of England and the more sober Protestants could do by fine, force and strength of argument; for they, by prejudice or fears, terrible things and zealous nothings, governing the ladies' consciences, who can persuade their lords, their lords will convert their tenants, and so the world is all their own."

But "fore-warned, fore-armed." We are all of us fully aware, or at least we may easily acquaint ourselves, of the weapons, spiritual and temporal, with which we are threatened; it is for us to provide ourselves with others as sharp and true, wherewith to meet them; and as in well-ordered warfare care is early taken to provide for the safety of the helpless and the young, let us then attend particularly to the defence of our wives and families, our servants and apprentices, from the secret machinations of a Proteus-like enemy, so that at any rate the foes we may have to contend with may not be those of our own household.

Let it not, however, be supposed, from the strictures which the emergency of the moment has drawn forth from us, that we wish to look upon such of our countrymen as happen to be Roman Catholics, in any other spirit, individually, than that of Christian charity, and equal fellowship. We have not to learn that there are thousands among them of the most benevolent and upright character, and of the most inflexible honour of intention.

"For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right;"
says one of our greatest poets; who, though a Roman Catholic himself, was assuredly no zealot; neither, we might add, if we were in the humour to play upon words, though a Pope himself was he any stickler for the pope's supremacy—not in our kingdom at any rate. We are quite willing, moreover, to admit the excellence or beauty of all that may remain of beauty or excellence in the theory, or from the earlier practice, of the Romish Church. The spirit of Christian love, for instance, so different from the cold-hearted narrow calculation of modern parochial relief, that breathes throughout its numerous charities for every kind and grade of suffering, mental or bodily, cannot be too much admired, or too closely imitated; we only have to regret that the mal-appropriation of their funds in the present day, as they pass through the hands of the priests who are the sole administrators of them, is such as to render at least one half of the pious intentions of the testators and benefactors of none effect. We are equally ready to allow that even in the outward ceremonies and discipline of the Romish Church, among much that is formal, useless, senseless, nay, even impious and injurious, yet there are things among them which might be advantageously adopted in our own, or rather which never need have been abolished in it.

The decking of "the House of God" with the choicest treasures of nature and art, cannot in itself be deemed a misappropriation of the gifts of Him from whom all good cometh. The temple of St. Peter, the most magnificent of the modern world, fades into insignificance compared to the description given us in Holy Writ of that of Solomon; with its walls, its beams, its floor of cedar, "overlaid with gold;" its pillars, and its chapiters "of lily work;" its molten sea, "for the priests to wash in;" "two thousand baths;" its lions, oxen, and cherubim;" its "altar of gold," and its "table of gold," with its "candlesticks of pure gold," and its "hundred basins of gold;" its veil of "blue, and purple, and crimson, and fine linen, and wrought cherubim, thereon;" its carvings "within and without," its precious stones, with which the house was "garnished," "for beauty;" all the splendours, in short, which the countless and incalculable wealth of the richest as well as the wisest of men, enabled him to lavish upon it. And we are told that these splendours were accepted by the LORD, and found favour in his sight; as did also the "priests arrayed in white linen, and the singers and trumpets, and instruments of music," insomuch that "the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the LORD; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud: for the glory of the LORD had filled the house of God." 2 Chron. v. 14.

It is not therefore to the mere magnificence of external worship that rational objections can be offered; it is the mixing up of the worship itself with other objects than Him to whom alone worship is due, and who has declared that He will not give His "glory to another."

Let us suppose, for a moment, that amid the splendours of the temple thus described to us, the statue of St. Moses had been introduced, sitting like that of St. Peter at Rome, in a brocaded robe, with a golden crown upon his head, and holding out a gold toe, for the people to kiss—would not all the sacredness and solemnity of the place have been changed at once into a mere worldly gewgaw?

We revere the cross, wherever it meets our eyes, as a memorial of the death of our Lord upon it for our redemption, and in that view we would willingly see it replaced upon our altars, along with the flowers which, as beauteous gifts from the hand of our heavenly Father, who has gemmed the earth with them for our delight, could only call forth feelings of gratitude and love; but, alas! the use and the abuse of outward things are so closely allied, that, seeing as we do the insidious tendency of Romanism to convert matters of mere harmless observance into measures of formal efficacy, we cannot but come to the conclusion, that it is better to abstain from what might be agreeable than to risk falling into that which is wrong. The same argument as to the discrepancy between external show, and internal utility, will apply to nearly all the forms and institutions of the Romish Church, in the present day. To deny that monkish institutions had their use, and their great use, in the middle ages, by protecting the mass of the people against the brutality of feudal tyranny, promoting agricultural and other peaceful occupations, feeding the poor and ministering to the sick, preserving ancient literature and cultivating their own, would be as absurd as unjust; but their uses were soon overbalanced by their abuses, their virtues by their vices; as the dark records of their time too plainly prove: and any attempt to continue or revive them in the present day, when all the objects on which their popularity was founded, as long as they were really popular, have passed away, or are otherwise provided for, is still more absurd, and more unjust to society at large, and can only be prompted by that love of domination, extension, and extortion which is the besetting sin of the Romish Church, to gratify which there is not any form of superstition, ignorance, and error, that it would not gladly resuscitate and cherish. Thus it is meditating the re-establishment of the Franciscan societies in this country; but what a degrading, ridiculous, nay, melancholy sight would a troop of sturdy bare-footed friars lounging towards Westminster Abbey to tell their beads in the presence of the Cardinal Archbishop, and stopping at Charing Cross to refresh themselves with the discipline of their knotted cords, present to the eyes of all thoughtful and rational members of the community! Fortunately, however, on this point their laws and ours are in direct opposition. Theirs say, "You shall live by begging, and by that alone;" ours say, "No one shall be a public beggar, on any plea whatsoever." We know the shifts and quirks they can resort to on these occasions, such as carrying little images and pretended reliques about with them, as if for sale, like lucifer matches, and employing some pious hand to collect for them the money they are forbidden to touch for themselves; but our police are a stalwart, straightforward set, no casuists, not much given to the imaginative or the theoretical, but quick of sight, strong of arm, and firm of purpose. But we have as a nation other guards against deceptive innovations,—the good common sense which enables the generality of us to form tolerably rational opinions, and the liberty of speech which allows us to express those opinions, without fear of the Inquisition. We are, moreover, a progressive nation, not a retrograde one. Indeed, the "Lamp" itself says England must go forward; she "cannot go back;" and she will 'go forward too, and that at a rate that will leave the "Lamp," and all such feeble luminaries, so far behind as to render their rays of no other use than to make visible the barrenness of the tortuous path which those who encourage them are threading, with most crab-like assiduity.

LEGENDS OF THE RHINE.¹

KÖNIGSDORF:—THE ELECTION OF A BISHOP.

THE episcopal chair of Cologne was vacant, and no small excitement prevailed in that city. The clergy and the bourgeoisie were divided into various parties; and each individual was actively engaged in canvassing for his favourite candidate.

Charlemagne, who was residing at this period at Aix-la-Chapelle, became aware of these dissensions, which were daily increasing in bitterness, and forthwith resolved to arrest the disorder by his presence, and to fill up the vacancy with a bishop of his own making. Without informing any one of his purpose, he set forth alone upon his journey; and riding along, absorbed by lofty thoughts, he reached Königsdorf before he was aware of it, when the tinkling of a small bell roused him from his reverie. A crowd of people were slowly wending their way towards a neighbouring chapel, to hear mass. The pious emperor immediately fastened his horse to a tree, and mixed incognito with the humble worshippers. The service ended, he approached the ecclesiastic, and tendered him a golden florin. To his great surprise, he beheld his gift refused by the priest. "It is not the custom here," said the servant of God, "thus to receive oblations; keep your gold, which we do not require. But if you wish to do our church a service, send me the skin of the first deer you kill: my missal is sadly in want of a new binding, and, by your appearance, you are a huntsman."

The truly disinterested and pious spirit of these words made a deep impression on Charlemagne, and he inwardly resolved to remember the worthy ecclesiastic. On his arrival at Cologne, he summoned the superior clergy, and also the representatives of the people, to repair to his presence, and then informed them that he had come there for the purpose of personally directing the election of a bishop, and of choosing one for them in case of dispute. The contending parties immediately sought, by means of large bribes and costly presents, to influence the emperor in favour of their respective candidates. Charlemagne caused all the money that was offered to be brought to him, and commanded that it should be appropriated to discharge the debts of the archbishopric. He then addressed those who impatiently waited for his decision, and spoke to this effect:—

"It is in vain that you have endeavoured to corrupt me by your presents. I find no one amongst you so worthy of the mitre as the priest of a rustic chapel near Königsdorf, who refused my gold when I offered it, and who, far from thinking of his own interests, asked no other gift than the skin of a roebuck or a stag, to repair the worn-out binding of his missal. Go, therefore, seek out this worthy man, for he shall be your archbishop."

The simple and honest priest was petrified with astonishment when the unexpected intelligence was communicated to him. But as the grace of God was with him, he was soon able to make himself respected in his high position. To this day his venerable name is remembered with honour. It was the bishop Hildebold, founder of the ancient church of St. Peter, which has given place to the present cathedral of Cologne.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE:—ORIGIN OF THE CITY.

Charlemagne, who was accustomed to fix his residence sometimes in one and sometimes in another part of his mighty empire, once upon a time held his court at Zurich, close to the borders of the lake whose natural beauties enrapture and allure the traveller. The renowned monarch, (ever the friend of justice, and accessible to all his subjects), had caused a column containing a small bell to be erected not far from his palace, on a steep bank, remarkable as the spot where, in former times, the two martyrs Felix and Regula were beheaded.

Whoever desired an audience of the emperor had nothing to do but to ring the bell at mid-day, and immediately the monarch appeared in person, ready to listen to the complaints and representations of his subjects.

One day the bell rang, and no one could be found on the spot. The same thing occurred on the morrow, and the emperor, accordingly, commanded one of his pages to conceal himself on the following day in the neighbourhood of the column, to find out the cause of the ringing. The page was not a little frightened to see a large serpent come out of a cavern in the bank of the lake. His astonishment was at its height when he saw the reptile proceed to set the bell in motion. He immediately ran to inform Charlemagne, whom he found at table. The monarch lost not a moment in repairing to the spot, and, perceiving the serpent, said:—"Whoever asks justice of me, whether man or brute, justice shall be done him." The reptile, beholding the emperor, inclined his head three times before him, and then quietly withdrew into his cave.

(1) Translated from the French; "Légendes et Traditions du Rhin." Cologne. 1847.

The emperor, with all his train, followed the animal, desirous, if possible, to discover the reason of his appearance. At the entrance of the cavern, they beheld an enormous toad; and it was therefore concluded that the serpent desired to be relieved of the troublesome guest, who thus obstructed his passage. In order that strict justice might be done, and that his royal word might be kept, the monarch caused the toad to be taken and killed upon the spot.

Some days after this remarkable event, to the great astonishment of every one present, the same serpent entered the banqueting-hall of the emperor, at the hour of dinner. After three times inclining his head respectfully, the reptile made his way towards a goblet placed before the monarch, and dropped into it a precious stone of a remarkable size and beauty. He then disappeared, before the emperor and his guests had recovered from their surprise.

Charlemagne presented the stone to his spouse, who was accustomed, from that time, to wear it as a conspicuous ornament in her hair. The jewel had the wonderful property of communicating to the person who wore it the whole of the emperor's favour and affection; so from that moment the monarch became devoted to his consort with a love so ardent, that he could scarcely leave her for a moment.

The empress was not long in divining the cause of her lord's increased affection, and never parted for an instant with the precious stone. In her last illness, feeling her end approaching, she feared that the jewel, passing into other hands, might transfer to unworthy persons the emperor's love; to avoid this result, she concealed it under her tongue, where it remained after life had departed.

Although the empress was dead, the attachment of Charlemagne did not in the least diminish. Her body was embalmed, and accompanied the emperor in all his travels. An affection so remarkable at length awakened a suspicion in the mind of a certain Archbishop Turpin, the companion and counsellor of the monarch, who began to think that there was something supernatural in it. The prelate accordingly availed himself of the first opportunity which presented itself to make a narrow examination of the corpse, in order to discover the talisman which possessed such singular virtue, and finished by finding the precious stone. He immediately took possession of it, and as from that moment he constantly carried it about his person, the emperor's love passed from his departed wife to the archbishop. So fervent was the affection with which the monarch thenceforth regarded the prelate, that he would scarcely suffer him to be out of his sight for a moment, and the poor archbishop soon became fairly weary of the inconvenient attachment.

During a journey through Western Germany, the prelate, being thoroughly tired of his sovereign's excessive regard, relieved himself of the talisman by casting it into a spring. But the charm continued to work, and when the archbishop ceased to be the object of the imperial favour, it was transferred to the spot which had received the marvellous stone. From that moment Charlemagne felt such an attachment for the place, that he caused a palace to be built and a city founded there.

The city is Aix-la-Chapelle, whose cathedral is full of mementos of the great emperor. But it was the clear and tranquil streams of the surrounding meadows which especially charmed the monarch; for there was secreted the talisman which the archbishop had thrown away. Charlemagne would remain there for hours, wrapt in a soft melancholy; his eyes continually directed into the crystal abyss of a small lake of limpid water.

Popular belief attributes to this charm the marvellous cures which have been effected by the hot springs of Aix-la-Chapelle, whose waters escape from the bosom of the earth for the blessing of humanity.

ALTON LOCKE.¹

THIS is, in many respects, a remarkable book, and one which we would earnestly recommend to the attention of our readers. It is remarkable for the pure, noble spirit of Christianity which animates every chapter—for its thorough sympathy with the sufferings of the working classes—and for its teaching, directly and indirectly, the great truth that those sufferings will not be lessened by attributing them to the oppressive selfishness of the wealthy portion of the community.

These are not the days in which men or women (with a grain of Christian charity or a spark of intellectual light within them) will shrink in terror, or turn away in disgust from the words "Chartist," "Socialist," "Communist." Those words stand for large classes of people,—like ourselves, my most Christian readers,—children of God; and sent on earth, as you have been, "to work out their salvation with fear and trembling." Mistaken, sorely mistaken, have many of them been—suffering, and the cause of suffering. But is that any reason why you, who know better,—or who think you know better, should put them beyond the pale of your sympathies? If you are indeed more holy than they, show your holiness by its fruits;—let the ignorant and the unhappy have the benefit of your "longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith and meekness." This is the lesson which "Alton Locke" teaches to the higher classes; to the lower classes it teaches an equally important lesson. Learn, you—it says—that no political franchise can set you free from the tyranny of your own vices; that to become men, you must cease to care for mere brutish pleasures; that the liberty you cry after should not be the liberty of self-indulgence; that hatred towards those who are more fortunately situated in the social scale than yourselves is not a divine feeling, but one quite the reverse. Still further does this book go, in its labour of love. It assures the low-born noble and true man, that the high-born noble and true man feels for his hardships, and is ready to work with him towards their amelioration. It endeavours to foster an amicable spirit between different classes, by showing that their interests are radically one and the same, in a large political view; that their duties are reciprocal, in a moral one; and that in a religious one, there is one God and Father of us all, with whom is no distinction of persons. Now, a book with aims so high as these cannot be classed with mere fictions for the amusement of an idle hour. "Alton Locke," therefore, must not be judged of as we would judge of a new novel by Mr. James or Mrs. Trollope, Mrs. Gore or Mrs. Marsh. We do not demand that before all other qualities it be amusing. This book is written to make us think and feel; and people who read to drive away thought and feeling have nothing whatever to do with it.

There is very little of story in "Alton Locke." That it is not a genuine autobiography is quickly seen by a discerning reader; that its author is not a tailor—not a working man at all—is pretty evident, but that he is a well-educated man and a gentleman. It has not, therefore, the strong charm which every real autobiography has; but it has another charm. The author speaks, out of his own heart, what he knows and feels to be the condition, body and soul, of the over-worked and under-paid classes; speaks eloquently, forcibly, and with all the adornments of refinement and cultivated taste, what they have not the power or the leisure to speak for themselves. He knows how to put the painful truths which he wishes to promulgate among the people of his own class into a form which will be acceptable to them. He has made them pause and say, "Can such things be?" And it is to be hoped that some among them may be led on to say, "Such things shall not be,—as far as I have the power to remedy them." "Alton Locke" has been called a Chartist novel because its hero is a Chartist; we should be inclined to call it a novel for the Clergy and Gentry, because its chief aim seems to be, to awaken, in them, a desire to become acquainted with the real causes of the prevalent political and social grievances of the classes who believe that the Charter will give them all the good things they have a right to. We will now proceed to give some more particular account of the contents of these two volumes. Let the hero speak for himself in the following extract:

"My earliest recollections are of a suburban street; of its jumble of little shops and little terraces, each exhibiting some fresh variety of capricious ugliness; the little scraps of garden before the doors with their dusty, stunted lilacs and balsam poplars were my only forests; my only wild animals, the dingy merry sparrows, who quarrelled fearlessly on my window-sill ignorant of trap or gun. From my earliest childhood, through long nights of sleepless pain, as the midnight brightened into dawn and the glaring lamps grew pale, I used to listen with a pleasant awe to the ceaseless roll of the market waggons, bringing up to the great city the treasures of the gay green country, the land of fruits and flowers, for which I have yearned all my life in vain. They seemed to my boyish fancy mysterious messengers from another world; the silent, lonely nights, in which they were the only moving things added to the wonder. I used to get out of bed to gaze at them, and envy the coarse men and sluttish women who attended them, their labour among verdant plants and rich brown mould, on breezy slopes, under God's own clear sky. I fancied that they learnt what I knew I should have learnt there; I knew not then that 'the eye only sees that which it brings with it the power of seeing.' When will their eyes be opened? When will priests go forth into the highways and the hedges, and preach to the ploughman and the gipsy the blessed news, that there, too, in every thicket and fallow-field is the house of God—there, too, the gate of heaven?

"I do not complain that I am a cockney. That, too, is God's gift. He made me one, that I might learn to feel for poor wretches who sit stifled in reeking garrets and work-rooms, drinking in disease at every breath, bound in their prison-house of brick and iron, with their own funeral-pall hanging over them, in that canopy of fog and poisonous smoke, from their cradle to their grave. I have drank of the cup of which they drink. And so I have learnt, if, indeed, I have learnt to be a poet—a poet of the people. That honour surely was worth buying with asthma and rickets and consumption and weakness, and—worst of all to me—with ugliness. It was God's purpose about me; and, therefore, all circumstances combined to imprison me in London. I used once, when I worshipped circumstance, to fancy it my curse, Fate's injustice to me, which kept me from developing my genius, and asserting my rank among poets. I longed to escape to glorious Italy, or some other southern climate, where natural beauty would have become the very element which I breathed; and yet, what would have come of that? Should I not, as nobler spirits than I have done, have idled away my life in Elysian dreams, singing out like a bird into the air, inarticulately purposeless, for mere joy and fulness of heart; and taking no share in the terrible questionings—the terrible strugglings of this great, awful, blessed time—feeling no more the pulse of the great heart of England stirring me? I used, as I said, to call it 'the curse of circumstance,' that I was a sickly decrepit cockney. My mother used to tell me 'that it was the cross which God had given me to bear.' I know now that she was right there. She used to say 'that my disease was God's will.' I do not think, though, that she spoke right there also. I think it was the will of the world and of the devil; of man's avarice and laziness and ignorance. And so would my readers, perhaps, had they seen the street in the city where I was born and nursed; with its little garrets reeking with human breath, its kitchens and areas with noisome sewers. A sanitary reformer would not be long in guessing the cause of my unhealthiness. He would not rebuke me—nor would she, sweet soul! now that she is at rest in bliss—for my wild longings to escape, for my envying the very flies and sparrows their wings, that I might flee miles away into the country, and breathe the air of heaven once, and die. I have had my wish. I have made two journeys far away into the country, and they have been enough for me."

His widowed mother is a stern Baptist, and brings up her two children, Alton and Susan, in all the severity of Calvinistic discipline. The infant poet's love for the beautiful and his desire of improvement are crushed under the combined effects of rigid poverty and a mistaken religion. At the age of fourteen a rich grocer-uncle apprentices him to a tailor. The horrors of the work-room and of the sweating system are set forth eloquently. The boy's love for reading brings him acquainted with Sandy Mackaye, an old second-hand bookseller—a great reader, a strong but silent friend of the cause of the people—a Scotchman—a philosopher—a humourist—a true-hearted though singular human being. This is the best drawn character in the tale, and is original. He becomes Alton's friend, adviser, and benefactor; and when the young man is turned from his mother's house, for having dared to cultivate in secret the genius which God gave him, Sandy Mackaye receives him into his. When Alton first becomes a poet, he reads his verses to Sandy Mackaye, who is an excellent critic. Alton, like most young poets, scorns the common and the familiar. He writes about far-off islands of the Pacific; their palm-trees, and simple, naked savages. When he has proceeded some way in his reading, old Mackaye breaks forth thus—Let our readers take good heed of the following. It may not be amiss to whisper in their ear that the author of this book is a Clergyman—to his honour be it said, he has followed in his divine Master's steps, and gone about doing good, or he could not have shown men and women of his own standing in society, how much good lies at their backdoors waiting to be done. Here, in this city of London, is a work to be performed by all who have the will to do it.

"What the deevil! is there no harlotry and idolatry here in England, that ye maun gang speering after it in the Cannibal Islands? Are ye gaun to be like they puir aristocrat bodies, that wad suner hear an Italian dog howl, than an English nightingale sing, and winna harken to Mr. John Thomas till he calls himself Giovanni Thomasino; or do ye tak yoursel for a singing bird, to go all your days tweedledumdeeing, out into the lift, just for the lust o' hearing your ain clan clatter? Will ye be a man or a lintie? Coral Islands! Pacific! What do ye ken about Pacifics? Are ye a cockney or a Cannibal Islander? Duuna stand there, ye gawk, as fusionless as a docken, but tell me that! Where do ye live?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Mackaye?" asked I, with a doleful and disappointed visage.

"Mean—why, if God had meant ye to write about Pacifics, He'd ha put ye there—and because He means ye to write about London town, He's put ye there—and gein ye an unco sharp taste o' the ways o't; and I'll ge ye anither. Come along wi' me."

"And he seized me by the arm, and hardly giving me time to put on my hat, marched me out into the streets, and away through Clare Market to St. Giles's. It was a foul, chilly, foggy Saturday night. From the butchers' and greengrocers' shops the gas-lights flared and flickered, wild and ghastly, over haggard groups of alipshod dirty women, bargaining for scraps of stale meat and frost-bitten vegetables; wrangling about short weight and bad quality. Fish-stalls and fruit-stalls lined the edge of the greasy pavement, sending up odours as foul as the language of sellers and buyers. Blood and sewer-water crawled from under doors and out of spouts, and reeked down the gutters among offal, animal and vegetable, in every stage of putrefaction. Foul vapours rose from cowsheds and slaughter-houses, and the doorways of undrained alleys, where the inhabitants carried the filth out on their shoes from the back yard into the court, and from the court up into the main street; while above, hanging like cliffs over the streets—those narrow, brawling torrents of filth, and poverty, and sin—the houses, with their teeming load of life, were piled up into the dingy choking night. A ghastly, deafening, sickening sight it was. Go, scented Belgravian! and see what London is! and then go to the library which God has given thee—one often fears in vain—and see what science says this London might be!

"'Ay,' he muttered to himself, as he strode along, 'sing awa, get yourself wi' child with pretty fables and gran' words, like the rest of the poets, and gang to hell for it.'

"To hell, Mr. Mackaye!"

"'Ay, to a verra real hell, Alton Locke, laddie—a worse one than ony fiend's kitchen or subterranean Smith-field that ye'll hear o' in the pulpits—the hell on earth o' being a flunkie, and a humbug, and a useless peacock wasting God's gifts on your ain lusts and pleasures—and kenning it—and not being able to get out o' it, for the chains o' vanity and self-indulgence. I've warned ye. Now look there—'

"He stopped suddenly before the entrance of a miserable alley—

"Look! there's not a soul down that yard, but 's either beggar, drunkard, thief, or worse. Write about that! Say ye saw the mouth of hell, and the two pillars thereof at the entry—the pawnbroker's shop o' one side, and the gin palace at the other—two monstrous devils, eating up men, and women, and bairns, body and soul. Look at the jaws of the monster how they open and open, and swallow in anither victim and anither. Write about that."

"What jaws, Mr. Mackaye?"

"The foulding doors of the gin-shop, goose. Are na they a mair damnable man-devouring idol than any red-hot statue o' Moloch, or wicker Gogmagog, wherein thae auld Britons burnt their prisoners? Look at thae barefooted, bare-backed hizzies, with their arms round the men's necks, and their mouths full o' vitriol and beastly words! Look at that Irishwoman, pouring the gin down the babbie's throat! Look at that raff o' a boy gacen out o' a pawnshop, where he's been pledging the handkerchief he stole the morning, into the gin shop, to buy beer poisoned wi' grains o' paradise and cocculus indicus, and saut, and a damnable, maddening, thirst-breeding, lust-breeding drugs! Look at that girl, that went in wi' a shawl on her back and cam' out wi'out ane! Drunkards frae the breast!—harlots frae the cradle!—damned before they're born! John Calvin had an inkling o' the truth there, I'm a' most driven to think, wi' his reprobation deevil's doctrines!"

"Well—but—Mr. Mackaye, I know nothing about these poor creatures."

"Then ye ought. What do ye ken about the Pacific? Which is maist to your business!—thae bare-backed hizzies that play the harlot o' the other side o' the world, or these—these thousand o' bare-backed hizzies that play the harlot o' your ain side—made out o' your ain flesh and blude? You a poet! True poetry, like true charity, my laddie, begins at home. If ye'll be a poet at a', ye maun be a cockney poet; and while the cockneys be what they be, ye maun write, like Jeremiah of old, o' lamentation and mourning and woe, for the sins o' your people. Gin ye want to learn the spirit o' a people's poet, down wi' your Bible, and read the old Hebrew prophets; gin ye wad learn the style, read your Burns frae morning till night; and gin ye'd learn the matter, just gang after your nose, and keep your eyes open, and ye'll no miss it."

"But all this is so—so unpoetical!"

"Hark! Is there no the heaven above them there, and the hell beneath them? And God frowning, and the deevil grinning? No poetry there! Is na the verra idea of the classic tragedy defined to be, man conquered by circumstances! Canna ye see it there! And the verra idea of the modern tragedy, man conquering circumstance? And I'll show ye that, too—in mony a garret, where no eye but the gude God's entem to see the patience, and the fortitude, and the self-sacrifice, and the love stronger than death that's shining in thae dark places o' the earth. Come wi' me and see."

And he is conducted to a scene of poverty, where suffering has no alleviation but the patience, and religious faith, and the generous self-sacrifice of the friends who suffer together. Alton Locke heeds Sandy Mackaye's advice, and becomes a genuine poet—a poet at first-hand. His worldly-minded cousin, (son of the grocer-nucle,) a clever, handsome young man, studying for the Church, at Cambridge, is the person he asks to help him to get his poems published. At Cambridge, he falls in again with the family of a dean, who had been struck by his appearance when examining a picture in the Dulwich Gallery. They spoke with him then, and the young tailor-poet fell in love with Lillian, the Dean's beautiful daughter, in that first interview. At Cambridge the good Dean patronises the rising genius, and invites him to his distant deanery. Here, Alton, for the first time, sees cultivated ladies and gentlemen, and loves the pretty, shallow Lillian more than ever; while her cousin Eleanor, (afterwards Lady Ellerton,) a noble woman, whose sympathy with the working classes is genuine and discriminating, he dislikes, because she sees and disapproves his passion for her cousin. But it is with the intellectual, cultivated Eleanor that he converses, and by her is he taught much about the higher classes which he did not know. Take the following as an example;—and this time, we need scarcely remind the reader that it is a gentleman and a clergyman who writes.

"The next afternoon was the last but one of my stay at D—. We were to dine late. After sunset, and before dinner, we went into the Cathedral. The choir had just finished practising. Certain exceedingly ill-looking men, whose faces bespoke principally sensuality and self-conceit, and whose function was that of praising God, on the sole qualification of good bass and tenor voices, were coming clattering through the choir gates, and behind them a group of small boys were suddenly transforming themselves from angels into sinners, by tearing off their white surplices, and pinching and poking each other noisily as they passed us, with as little reverence as Voltaire himself could have wished.

"I had often been in the Cathedral before—indeed, we attended the service daily, and I had been appalled rather than astonished by what I saw and heard: the unintelligible service—the irreverent gabble of the choristers and readers—the scanty congregation—the meagre portion of the vast building which seemed to be turned to any use: but never more than that evening did I feel the desolateness, the doleful inutility of that vast desert nave, with its aisles and transepts—built for some purpose or other, now extinct. The whole place seemed to crush and sadden me, and I could not re-echo Lillian's remark—

"How those pillars, rising story above story, and those lines of pointed arches, all lead the eye heavenward! It is a beautiful notion, that, about pointed architecture being symbolic of Christianity."

"I ought to be very much ashamed of my stupidity," I answered, "but I cannot feel that, though I believe I ought to do so. That vast groined roof, with its enormous weight of hanging stone, seems to crush one—to bar out the free sky above. Those pointed windows, too,—how gloriously the western sun is streaming through them! But their rich hues only dim and deface his light. I can feel what you say when I look at the cathedral on the outside, there indeed every line sweeps the eye upward—carries it from one pinnacle to another, each with less and less standing ground, till at the summit the building gradually vanishes in a point, and leaves the spirit to wing its way unsupported and alone into the ether.

Perhaps," I added, half bitterly, "these cathedrals may be true symbols of the superstition which created them. On the outside offering to enfranchise the soul, and raise it up to heaven: but when the dupes had entered, giving them only a dark prison, and a crushing bondage, which neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear."

"You may sneer at them if you will, Mr. Locke," said Eleanor, in her severe, abrupt way. "The working classes would have been badly off without them. They were, in their day, the only democratic institution in the world; and the only socialist one, too. The only chance a poor man had of rising by his worth, was by coming to the monastery. And bitterly the working classes felt the want of them when they fell. Your own Cobden can tell you that."

"Ah," said Lillian, "how different it must have been four hundred years ago!—how solemn and picturesque those old monks must have looked, gliding about the aisles;—and how magnificent the choir must have been, before all the glass and carving, and that beautiful shrine of St. —, blazing with gold and jewels, were all plundered and defaced by those horrid Puritans!"

"Say, reformer-squires," answered Eleanor; "for it was they who did the thing: only it was found convenient, at the Restoration, to lay on the people of the seventeenth century the iniquities which the country gentlemen committed in the sixteenth."

"Surely," said I, emboldened by her words, "if the monasteries were what their admirers say, some method of restoring the good of the old system, without its evil, ought to be found, and would be found, if it were not—I paused, recollecting whose guest I was.

"If it were not, I suppose," said Eleanor, "for those lazy, over-fed, bigoted hypocrites, the clergy. That, I presume, is the description of them to which you have been most accustomed. Now let me ask you one question. Do you mean to condemn, just now, the Church as it was, or the Church as it is, or the Church as it ought to be? Radicals have a habit of confusing those three questions, as they have of confusing other things when it suits them."

"Really," I said—for my blood was rising—"I do think that with the confessed enormous wealth of the clergy, the cathedral establishments especially, they might do more for the people."

"Listen to me for a little, Mr. Locke. The laity now-a-days take a pride in speaking evil of the clergy, never seeing that if they are bad, the laity have made them so. Why, what do you impute to them? Their worldliness, their being like the world, like the laity round them—like you, in short. Improve yourselves, and by so doing, if there is this sad tendency in the clergy to imitate you, you will mend them, if you do not find that, after all, it is they who will have to mend you. As with the people, so with the priest, is the everlasting law. When, fifty years ago, all classes were drunkards, from the statesman to the peasant, the clergy were drunken too, but not half as bad as the laity. Now the laity are eaten up with covetousness and ambition: and the clergy are covetous and ambitious, but not half so bad as the laity. The laity, and you working men especially, are the dupes of frothy, insincere, official rant, as Mr. Carlyle would call it, in Parliament, on the hustings, at every debating society and Chartist meeting, and therefore the clergyman's sermons are apt to be just what people like elsewhere, and what, therefore, they suppose people will like there."

"If, then," I answered, "in spite of your opinions, you confess the clergy to be so bad, why are you so angry with men of our opinions, if we do plot sometimes a little against the Church?"

"I do not think you know what my opinions are, Mr. Locke. Did you not hear me just now praising the monasteries, because they were socialist and democratic? But why is the badness of the clergy any reason for pulling down the Church? That is another of the confused irrationalities into which you all allow yourselves to fall. What do you mean by crying shame on a man for being a bad clergyman, if a good clergyman is not a good thing? If the very idea of a clergyman was abominable, as your Church destroyers say, you ought to praise a man for being a bad one, and not acting out this same abominable idea of priesthood. Your very outcry against the sins of the clergy shows that, even in your minds, a dim notion lies somewhere that a clergyman's vocation is, in itself, a divine, a holy, a beneficent one."

"I never looked at it in that light, certainly," said I, somewhat staggered."

We regret that the stern necessities of space, or, rather, of want of space, will not allow us to quote the whole of Eleanor's reply. She concludes thus: "Mark my words, Mr. Locke; till you gain the respect and confidence of the clergy, you will never rise. The day will come when you will find that the clergy are the only class who can help you. Ah! you may shake your head. I warn you of it. They were the only bulwark of the poor against the mediæval tyranny of Rank; you will find them the only bulwark against the modern tyranny of Mammon." It is not our business to discuss the question; but we cannot help stating our opinion that it would be good for both parties that it should be as Eleanor says.

There is great improbability in this sudden intimacy and friendship between a high-born Church dignitary and the ladies of his family, and an unknown youth—an ultra-radical—a sceptic—uneducated—a tailor's apprentice, who has struck for higher wages in his craft. He has not even become famous as one of the million poets, when he is received as an honoured guest in this deanery. This disregard of probabilities serves the author's purpose of bringing the hero into direct communication with the class which he (the author) believes most likely to assist and support the working-men in their struggles for political and social reform. It enables him to put forth doctrines which he holds dear;—but we think that he might have done this somewhat more artistically. Defects of a nature kindred to this are to be found in abundance in "Alton Locke." It has many weak points; but they are not of a kind to render the book disagreeable. Its strong points—the enthusiasm—the hopeful, loving, encouraging tone of its philosophy, are not much affected by its defects.

After this extraordinary visit among lords and great people, the hero returns again to old Sandy Mackaye, rather less of a democrat than when he went to Cambridge. He turns literary man, and writes for all sorts of liberal papers and magazines—with a due result, in money and experience. His poems are published, and are successful. But in spite of all his talent and reading, and the moral bolstering-up of the strong Sandy Mackaye, we are bound to declare that Alton Locke is a miserably weak young man, by no means a pattern People's man. He is not single-minded, and is unstable in all his ways.

For the first time, he attends a Chartist meeting, with his friend and fellow-workman, Crossthwaite; on their return home they talk thus:—

"Well, Alton! where was the treason and murder? Your nose must have been a sharp one, to snuff out any there. Did you hear anything that astonished your weak mind so very exceedingly, after all?"

"The only thing that did astonish me, was to hear men, men of my own class—and lower still, perhaps, some of them—speak with such fluency and eloquence. Such a fund of information—such excellent English. Where did they get it all?"

"From the God who knows nothing about ranks. They're the unknown great—the unaccredited heroes, as Master Thomas Carlyle would say, whom the flunkies aloft have not acknowledged yet—though they'll be forced to, some day, with a vengeance. Are you convinced, once for all?"

"I really do not understand political questions, Crossthwaite."

"Does it want so very much wisdom to understand the rights and wrongs of all that? Are the people represented? Are you represented? Do you feel like a man that's got any one to fight your battle in parliament, my young friend, eh?"

"I'm sure I don't know."

"Why, what, in the name of common sense—what interest or feeling of yours, or mine, or any man's you ever spoke to, except the shopkeeper, do Alderman A—or Lord C—or B—represent? They represent property—and we have none. Vested interests—we have none. Large capitals—those are just what crush us. Irresponsibility of employers, slavery of the employed, competition among masters, competition among workmen, that is the system they represent—they preach it—they glory in it. Why, it's the very ogre that is eating us all up. They are chosen by the few, they represent the few, and they make laws for the many—and yet you don't know whether or not the people are represented!"

"We were passing by the door of the Victoria theatre; it was just half-price time—and the beggary and rascality of London were pouring in to their low amusement, from the neighbouring gin palaces and thieves' cellars. A herd of ragged boys, vomiting forth slang, filth and blasphemy pushed past us, compelling us to take good care of our pockets."

"Look there! look at the amusements, the training, the civilization, which the government permits to the children of the people! These licensed pits of darkness, traps of temptation, profligacy and ruin, triumphantly yawning night after night—and then tell me that the people who see their children thus kidnapped into hell, are represented by a government who licenses such things!"

"Would a change in the franchise cure that?"

"Household suffrage mightn't;—but give us the charter, and we'll see about it! Give us the charter, and we'll send workmen into parliament that shall soon find out whether something better can't be put in the way of the ten thousand boys and girls in London who live by theft and prostitution, than the tender mercies of the Victoria—a pretty name! They say the queen's a good woman—and I don't doubt it. I wonder often if she knows what her precious namesake here is like!"

"But, really, I cannot see how a mere change in representation can cure such things as that."

"Why, didn't they tell us, before the Reform Bill, that extension of the suffrage was to cure everything? and how can you have too much of a good thing? We've only taken them at their word, we Chartists. Haven't all politicians been preaching for years that England's national greatness was all owing to her political institutions—to Magna Charta, and the Bill of Rights, and Representative Parliaments, and all that? It was but the other day I got hold of some Tory paper, that talked about the English constitution, and the balance of queen, lords and commons, as the "Tallmanic Palladium" of the country. 'Gad, we'll see if a move onward in the same line won't better the matter. If the balance of classes is such a blessed thing, the sooner we get the balance equal, the better; for it's rather lopsided just now, no one can deny. So, representative institutions are the talismanic palladium of the nation, are they? The palladium of the classes that have them, I dare say; and that's the very best reason why the classes that haven't got them should look out for the same palladium for themselves. What's sauce for the gander is sauce for the goose, isn't it? We'll try,—we'll see whether the talisman they talk of has lost its power all of a sudden since '32,—whether we can't rub the magic ring a little for ourselves, and call up genii to help us out of the mire, as the shopkeepers and the gentlemen have done."

From that day Alton Locke becomes a Chartist, and works heart and soul in the cause. But he has lost his integrity, by having allowed what he believed to be the very pith and marrow of his poems to be suppressed, to suit the taste and feelings of a class to which he does not belong. He is conscious also of sympathies with those higher classes which his brethren would call treason. He has written many things for money, which he did not write with the concurrence of his whole nature—principles, taste, and feelings;—he feels that he has sacrificed the high aim of his life for the means of living—that he does what he would not, and what he would, that does he not. In short, Alton Locke is a weak hero, and labours, as we said before, under the curse of conscious weakness. It is a good thing for him when he is imprisoned for three years on account of his implication in a Chartist riot. The solitude and study of those years serve to mature his powers. When he is set free again, he finds Lilian on the point of marriage with his clever unscrupulous cousin, now a popular high-churchman. This drives him half-mad. He helps to organize the Chartist movement of the tenth of April, 1848, and is crushed to the earth at the notable and ridiculous failure of his party on that occasion. That affair works prodigious effects in the tale before us. It kills poor old Mackaye, and converts Alton Locke, Crossthwaite, and others at the head of the Chartists, from a blind belief in the purity of their party.

Alton Locke is seized with a violent fever, and is for a long time delirious. During his illness he is carefully attended by Eleonor, (now the widow of Lord Ellerton,) who has left the great and gay world to devote her whole life to alleviating the sufferings of the outcasts of society. Some of the dreams or imaginations of the hero, during his period of delirium, are very fine—reminding us of De Quincey's Opium Dreams. They do not read at all like inventions, but like actual dreams. Eleonor works hard at the conversion of Alton Locke to vital Christian faith and a right political belief, during the time of his convalescence; and, having succeeded, she sends him to recover physical strength and to mature his poetical genius in a New World, and in a tropical clime. As may be expected—he dies, within sight of the Promised Land.

We have little more to say of the book, except to recommend it again to our readers. Its graceful and eloquent style—its honest enthusiasm—its faith in God and man—and its high hope for the future of humanity, cause it to take fast hold of the mind, during perusal; and it is only upon afterthought, that the reader finds a certain weakness and want of coherence about the whole, which he would fain have changed for steadiness and power.

In fact, "Alton Locke" is so good in some respects, that we are tempted to wish it were free from the lot of human productions in all. But as that cannot be, we can only say, in conclusion,—Here is a very fair piece of imperfection. If you are wise, you will take to heart the beauties, and, for love of them, cast but a slight glance at the imperfection.

LYNCH'S ESSAYS AND POEMS.¹

THIS little book we heartily commend to our readers, and especially to those who know the value of stimulants to sober thought and kindly feeling. There can never be too many invitations and helps to such attainments; and we are greatly mistaken if these Essays and Poems will not be appreciated and admired by those whose spontaneous verdict in such a case is more accordant with the truth than that arrived at by the application of the nicest criticism,—educated reflective young persons of both sexes. It will so much the more readily win its way with them, by the fact, patent to every reader,—but which will not be regarded as a recommendation by veterans in thought and literature,—that its author is almost one of themselves. It would not do, whatever the wise ones may opine, for all to wait for maturity of years before venturing to say what they have to say to the world; and though it is possible for men to commence authorship too early, it would be worse by far if all were to put it off till there should be none in whose words the young could feel that they were reading the echoes of their own inward life. While, for authors themselves, nothing so greatly aids the acquisition of ability to speak with clearness and power, so that all, both old and young, must hear, as having fairly tested their capabilities, and their works, "in the light of the public square," as Michael Angelo said to the young sculptor, who was arranging the lights of his studio so as to enhance (as he thought) the effect of his statue.

We say this, not apologetically, for Mr. Lynch needs it not, but for the sake of doing justice to him, and to our readers, and to ourselves, at once. As a trial-shot it is admirable. Given years, the man who can write this book can write what we shall all wish to live to read. The Essays are on various themes: all abounding with thought; things trite and commonplace, by felicitous illustration and the exhibition of novel relations, are made to wear a genial freshness; and while there is much that is distinctly religious in its character and tendency, and over all there is perceptible a religious hue, dogmatic narrowness of mind never appears. Mr. Lynch writes as a religious man, not as a theologian, and so what he says has force without harshness, and would do more to commend such thoughts to many hearts, than the best conducted argument, or the most elaborate discourse could do.

The poems have the same characteristics, and are smooth and free; but they show, more plainly than the essays, the beginner; and the writer himself can see, we doubt not, now that his songs are in print, what a large use he has made of compounded words not in common currency; and how the rhythm halts in some lines of his best stanzas.

We do not suppose Theophilus Trinal to be an imitator, because there is an own-ness (as the Germans would say) about the style, as well as about the material of his productions; and if he were, he would deserve some praise, for as we read his essays, involuntarily some turn of expression, some quaintness of thought, reminded us of the best essayists of our language—Emerson, Bacon, the author of "Essays written in Intervals of Business;" while the poems recalled the hymns in "Festus," and some of the sweetest productions of the Oxford school.

Take these as specimens of the metrical part of these "Memorials."

THE FIVE FLOWERS.

- "Look, love, on your bosom
Are flowers five;
But one has droop'd its head—
Four alone live."
- "So, late in our nursery
Were children five:
One rests in grassy darkness—
Four alone live."
- "Your four flowers bloom freshly, love;
'The fifth, not as they—
Its colour, and form, and odour,
Have passed away.
Take, then, from your bosom
The withered one:
Can the air now nourish it?
Can it feel the sun?"
- "I have bound the five together
With a fresh willow leaf,
That grew large by a river,
As by flowing love, grief;
And they all will fall asunder
If I loose the tie:
So a love-clasp for living babes
Is a dead one's memory."
- "Let the five flowers in your bosom, love,
Its sweet shelter share;
As bound in one, within your heart,
Our five darlings are.
The dead will make the living dearer;
And we will joy the more,
That the Giver hath but taken one,— Hath left us four."

MORNING HYMN.

- "Again I wake,
O living One! in Thee
Newly I am, and move;
Wilt thou not make
My heart a garden be,— Thy presence unto me,
Soft sunny air of love?"

"Forth shall I go,
Pursuing without fear
My work of life begun;
If thee I know
As great, yet very dear,
Far off but very near,
A sunshine, and a Sun."

And this, which is of a different cast:—

- "The Difficult, like a cocoa-nut,
Rich milk it hath within;
Through husk and shell, by labouring well,
An entrance you may win;
You hear the flowing of the milk
If angrily you shake it;
But if you would the sweetness taste,
Try patiently and break it."

And here are some detached thoughts from the Essays; they will not show what the Essays themselves are, but they will show of what stuff they are made; and that is all we have space for.

"The more holy the man, the more has the world for him a 'beauty of holiness,' and a wisdom of holiness."

"At every moment beauty is seen and bounty enjoyed somewhere;—and at every moment a like reality have gloom and grief."

"If our garden be small, then let us fill it with choice flowers; and such a love of choice things shall we find in ourselves, that if a larger garden be given us, it will be worthily filled."

"To do well, is to do choicely."

"In practicalness, we require honesty to do something, wisdom to do the thing possible, and next us; courage to do poorly, and as at our worst, when we must do this or nothing."

"Spiritual men are they who give more earnest mind to what they shall be and shall do, than to what they shall possess and enjoy."

"The hungry soul cannot always get the honeycomb; so it seeks a loaf; and then, when it can get honey also, finds it the sweeter."

"The young man's doubt may be but the child's faith; dying in order to grow."

"Often, men cannot feel and believe they have a Father, till they find they have brothers. Believing in man, they can believe in God."

"We must beware alike of misanthropy and of philanthropy so called. A thorn is a changed bud."

"If our life is to be an overcoming, we must fight as to music."

"WINE AND FUNGUS.

"A certain man had in his cellar choice wine. It remained there long, carefully locked up. The wine being wanted, they sought it in the cellar, but the door could not be opened. So it was broken through, and the cellar was seen to be filled with tough fungus. The wine was all gone, and this huge growth of fungus was its transmutation. The choice wine is spiritual truth, which we carefully lock up for safety in the cellar called Creed. The wine being wanted to strengthen or comfort us, we find the door of the cellar shut against us, and soon discover to our dismay that the wine has changed into that tough disgusting fungus called cant."

We must add that the substance of the book is very slenderly connected with the "Student" whose name it professes to memorialize. The fiction is so slight as to be hardly worth the trouble of inventing.

But we will not quarrel with our Author, on such a minute and debateable question as this; but take our leave of him with real friendliness, and hope to see fulfilled the hinted promise of the last paragraph in the book, and to have to notice a production of greater pretensions and more mature performance; for of both he has shown himself capable.

A CAROL FOR CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY F. LAWRENCE.

God rest ye, merry gentlemen !
 'Tis bitter cold to-night;
 But through the parlour sash I see
 The fire is burning bright.
 I like to watch its cheerful blaze,
 And listen to the din
 Of loud and boisterous merriment
 That echoes from within.

God rest ye, merry gentlemen !
 Whom God has favour'd so;
 Consider, in the streets and lanes
 How cold the night-winds blow !
 Amid your revels call to mind
 "The woes that wretches feel,"
 And from your Plenty spare a crumb
 For the poor Outcast's meal.

God rest ye, merry gentlemen,
 And bless your happy homes !
 But think what darksome dens there be,
 Where Christmas never comes !—
 Where seasons God has hallow'd pass
 Unblessing and unblest'd;
 And not a day is holier
 Or happier than the rest.

God rest ye, merry gentlemen !
 Have pity on the poor;—
 This night, at least, you will not spurn
 A suppliant from the door.
 With gentle deeds, and kindly thoughts,
 And loving words withal,
 Welcome the merry Christmas in,
 And hear a brother's call !

SCRAPS.

EASTERN ORIGIN OF MUFFINS, &c.

THE day we landed at Rabat we heard a little tinkling bell in the street, just like the four o'clock muffin bell in London. These cockney cakes are just as common here as within the sound of Bow bells. In maphula, the Moorish name, we have the word employed in England. Taking away the final vowel, added by the Greeks, and changing l for its cognate n, maphula or mufula become mufuz. These names have puzzled the most learned. The griddle on which muffins are baked in London, is precisely the same as that used in the East, and fixed in the same manner over the fire.

A soft flat roll, resembling the common bread of Barbary, is called in Scotland bake. If so called because it is baked, it must have been at the origin of baking. Now this very word is written in a book two thousand three hundred years old. (Herodotus, b. ii. c. 2.) There we learn that the Phrygian name for bread was bake; bake was therefore asked for three thousand years ago by Pelethite or Cerethian at Escalon, or Gorja, just as to-day by the barefooted callant of Paisley or Linlithgow.—Urquhart.

THE CORONATION STONE.

IN Westminster Hall there is a stone on which the kings of England are crowned. It was carried thither from Scone, where the kings of Scotland had been crowned upon it, and had there been placed by Kenneth, son of Alpen, after his victory over the Picts in 843. To Scone it had been transported from Dunstaffnage, where the successors of Fergus had been crowned upon it. To Dunstaffnage it had been brought from Turah, where the Scottish kings of Ireland had been crowned upon it, and Ireland had been named from it Iunisfail. To Turah it had been brought from Spain, and to Spain, it was said, from the Holy Land. It emitted under the rightful prince a sound like that of the statue of Memnon, and remained dumb under an usurper. The importance attached to it was such, as to make its removal to England to be considered, in the time of Edward I., a necessary step towards the subjugation of the Scottish kingdom. They called it the stone of fortune, and the stone of destiny (hio fail).—Urquhart's Pillars of Hercules.

POPULAR USE OF SIGNS IN SPAIN.

THE Castilians are sparing in words; indeed, throughout Spain, much intercourse is carried on by signs, especially among the lower classes. Admiration is expressed by collecting the five fingers' tips to a point, bringing them to the lip, kissing them, and then expanding the hand like a bursting shell. Dissent—or have nothing to do with it, her, or him—is quietly hinted by raising the single forefinger to the nose, and wagging it rapidly and horizontally backwards and forwards. Astonishment, incredulous surprise, or jocular resignation under unavoidable afflictions, is dumbshowed by crossing oneself, as is done on entering a church. The ancient contemptuous "fig of Spain,"—"a fig for you,"—is digitally represented by inserting the end of the thumb between the fore and middle fingers, and raising the back of the hand towards the person thus complimented. The telegraph of the fair sex is the fan, and a volume might be written upon its polyglot powers.—Ford.
